

R
Class 251.4E

Book Sp 23

General Theological Seminary Library

Chelsea Square, New York

From the Library of

REVEREND AUGUSTUS VALLETTE CLARKSON

G. T. S. 1863

Things New and Old.

ΚΑΙΝΑ ΚΑΙ ΠΑΛΑΙΑ

THINGS NEW AND OLD,

OR

A Storehouse of Illustrations,

BY

JOHN SPENCER,

WITH PREFACE BY THOMAS FULLER;

TO WHICH IS ADDED

A TREASURY OF SIMILES,

BY

ROBERT CAWDRAY;

BOTH BEING CAREFULLY EDITED;

WITH

AN INTRODUCTION, BY J. G. PILKINGTON, M.A., Clerical Secretary to the Bishop of London's Fund.

Fourth Edition.

LONDON:

Richard D. Dickinson, 92, Farringdon Street.

MDCCCLXXX.

R 251.4E
Sp 33

LONDON:
REPRINTED BY RICHARD FOLKARD AND SONS, DEVONSHIRE STREET, QUEEN SQUARE, BLOOMSBURY.

NEW YORK LIBRARY
CENTRAL LIBRARY

THE PUBLISHER thinks it right to say that this Edition of SPENCER'S Things New and Old and CAWDRAY'S Similes is not a mere reprint. Both works have been carefully edited, the Scripture References have been examined and verified, and in some places additional references have been given. Where an old or obsolete word occurs, the modern representative word has been placed after it in a parenthesis. CAWDRAY'S Similes have been arranged in alphabetical order, according to the original design of the Author, and the word constituting the subject of each section is printed in the heading in Roman letters, so that the reader may the more easily observe it. Copious and elaborate Indexes have been added, by which reference to the subjects as well as to the headings has been provided, and no pains have been spared to present the works in a form worthy of their intrinsic value. The Publisher believes that no more suggestive and generally useful works for Ministers of the Gospel have been published for many years; and, to place them within the reach of all classes, he offers them in one volume at a price which he ventures to think makes it one of the cheapest books ever printed.

ΚΑΙΝΑ ΚΑΙ ΠΑΛΑΙΑ.

THINGS NEW AND OLD;

OR, A

STOREHOUSE OF SIMILES,

Sentences, Allegories, Apophthegms, Apologues,
Adages, Divine, Moral, Political, &c.,

With their several Applications.

Collected and observed from the Writings and Sayings of the Learned in all Ages to the Present.

BY

JOHN SPENCER,

A Lover of Learning and Learned Men.

WITH PREFACE BY THOMAS FULLER.

"Deus nobis hæc otia fecit."—VIRGIL, Eclog. i.

LONDON:

Printed by W. WILSON and J. STREATER, for JOHN SPENCER, Sion College.

MDCLVIII.

44645

INTRODUCTION.

The Use of Illustration.

YOU have no 'likes' in your sermons. Christ taught that the kingdom of heaven was 'like' to leaven hid in meal,—'like' to a grain of mustard-seed, &c. You tell us what things are, but never what they are like." This was the criticism of Robert Hall on a brother-minister. And the words of Christ, "hereunto shall I liken it," bring us into the presence of a crowd whose attention was not allowed to flag, and we seem to see how it was that "the people were attentive to hear Him."

Luke xix. 48.

In every age of the Church's history the most effective preachers have been those who have imitated the manner of Christ's teaching. The Homilies of Chrysostom and Augustine are eminent examples of this among the Fathers; and in our own Church, we have only to contrast the abstract theological essays of the last century with the vivid discourses of the preachers of the seventeenth in order to learn that the use of Illustration was one great secret of pulpit power (both amongst Catholics and Puritans) in the latter case, while the absence of it in the former has laid too much ground for Sydney Smith's sarcastic inquiry—Whether sin was to be taken from men, as Eve was from Adam, by casting them into a deep slumber?

Preface to Sermons.

He, indeed, who, taking good George Herbert's advice, gives a "busy cast of his net on his auditors," will see that it is absolutely necessary to employ Illustration in the case of children and persons of untrained minds. Their powers of observation are stronger than those of abstraction. They are not accustomed to long trains of reasoning. But no sooner is an example given than, as the echo answers to the bell, the listless expression of countenance gives place to one of intelligent attention. It is not among the lower classes alone that Illustration will be found to be beneficial. In the time of Lord Bacon, men had begun to discover that they reasoned too much and observed too little. It may well be doubted whether the vast mass of so-called educated men should not now be classed amongst those who, while they know much, know hardly at all.

Print in the Temple, chap. vii.

A consideration, too, of the subject-matter of Christian teaching will show that, in pre-eminence, it requires illustration. The barrister has, in a new "case," that which necessarily stimulates alike the attention of the hearer and his own argument; while the preacher has an oft-told tale to set before his people, with which they are just sufficiently familiar to render them inattentive, unless the preacher seeks for pleasing and acceptable words."

Eccles. xii. 10.

Introduction.

Philosophy of Rhetoric, book i., chap. x.

Dr. Campbell has further observed that the bar has an advantage over the pulpit, in that it treats of persons, and not things—of the vicious rather than vice. Cicero delivered his oration against Verres the oppressor, and not merely against oppression. The obvious remedy is to employ personification to such an extent as to correct the abstract nature of the teaching.

Philip Goodwin's Evangelical Communicant.

The words of an old writer are suggestive of a principle that may be a guide to us in the selection of Illustrations. "Sights," he remarks, "as they come sooner to the eye than sounds to the ear, so they abide longer: audible words are more transient, visible words more permanent." For as all our knowledge of earthly things comes by reflection and experiment on the things of sight, so the things of sight are our most powerful instruments in conveying instruction to the mind, by imparting vividness and force to the style. This principle is applicable not only to the choice of historical incidents, but also to the selection of words and metaphors.

Charles Wolfe's Remains, p. 175 n.

Priest to the Temple, chap. vii.

As regards the first, indeed, there seems to be a law at work similar to that of gravitation, which, acting "inversely as the square of the distance," gives the greatest effect to events that have taken place near us, either in time or space. We are more moved, for example, by a calamity that has happened in our own time or our own country than in a foreign land and in a time long past; and that affects us most of all, and rouses our strongest feelings, which relates to our own families or friends, or which our own eyes have seen. The Story-teller instinctively acts on this principle, when he represents his story as having happened not far off or not a long time ago. And this is why the author of the "Burial of Sir John Moore" wrote, for his own guidance, that he must "seize late, almost present, occurrences." It is the philosophy, too, of George Herbert's advice to the preacher, "to serve himself of the judgments of God, as those of ancient times, so especially of the late ones, and those most which are nearest his own parish."

Luke xii. 27.

Something corresponding to this obtains in regard to the use of words. Force and vivacity will be imparted to our style just in proportion as we use individual and avoid abstract or general terms. For example, a wolf is likewise a beast, an animal, and a creature, each succeeding term being more general than the one preceding it; but the word wolf conveys the most distinct, and therefore the most forcible, idea to the mind. So, when our Lord says, "Consider the lilies . . . Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these," He imparts a depth of colour to the picture which would be altogether lost by the use of the more general terms "flower" and "king." The individual term requiring less knowledge than the more abstract, and being the sign of what is very familiar in daily life, "comes home to men's business and bosom." As the individual term, too, alone conveys the idea of independent existence, it at once appeals to the eye, and, as the Eastern proverb has it, "he is the best teacher who turns our ears into eyes."

It may be well, perhaps, to say a few words as to the various kinds of illustration contained in this book. The principle just stated is applicable to them all.

The simplest kind of illustration is the Simile, in which the resemblance is distinctly stated, as, "The kingdom of God is like a grain of mustard-seed." The most effective, however, is the Metaphor, in which the resemblance is understood and not expressed, as when our Lord says, "I am the vine." The Simile drawn out becomes a Parable, and the Metaphor, similarly expanded, becomes an Allegory. The Simile and Metaphor just given are thus enlarged by our Lord.

Introduction.

Luke xiii. 18, 19.

John xv. 1-7.

Allegories, such as Adams' "Old Man's Home," Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," and Spenser's "Fairy Queen" are, from their length, only suitable for private reading; but brief Allegories, such as that in St. John above referred to, will frequently be suitable in public addresses. Parables and Fables, likewise, such as those of Krummacher, Gotthold, and Lessing (to mention other than those contained in this book), will likewise be found effective as illustrations, when used with judgment.

Metaphor, however, as is remarked by Aristotle, is the figure most suitable for the orator, as men find a positive pleasure in catching resemblances for themselves. Vividness and force will result when, in the Metaphor, intellectual or spiritual things are likened to things that are visible—the unseen to the seen. Thus we speak of high-handed rebellion, burning words, and the pulses of the soul. We should, likewise, with the view of imparting energy to our language, give life, motion, and personality to inanimate things. Thus we say, "father Tiber," "the furious wind," and read of "the blood of sprinkling that speaketh better things than that of Abel."

Rhetoric, book iii, chap. iv.

Heb. xii. 24.

It is most important to distinguish between illustrations that are used merely to explain or give pleasure, and those that embody an Argument for probability. The word "like" has in it the germ of both these ideas. We like—that is, we are pleased by—that which is like some other object; while, as Bishop Butler observes, that which is likely to happen, or is probable, is so because of a resemblance in the relations of the two things compared. When, for example, we say two is to four as four is to eight, we indicate an analogy between the relations of two and four, and four and eight. This kind of illustration may be employed, so as at once to impart beauty to the style and to remove objections that may be lurking in the minds of the hearers. In the words "What man knoweth the things of a man save the spirit of man which is in him? even so the things of God knoweth no man but the Spirit of God," we have an analogy which shows us the unreasonableness of expecting to discover, by human sagacity, what is hidden in the mind of God.

1 Cor. ii. 11.

So also Saint Augustine, in his sermon on the "three dead persons whom the Lord raised," brings out an analogy between spiritual and physical death. He points out that the daughter of Jairus, the son of the widow of Nain, and Lazarus, though each equally dead, manifested different phases of death. The daughter of Jairus had but just died, the son of the widow was being carried out to his burial, while, in the case of Lazarus, corruption had some time begun its work. So it may be of spiritual death, that those who show no outer sign of death, and those who, by overt act, give indication of spiritual decay, and those, too, who live in open rebellion against the laws of both God and man, are all equally dead in the sight of God, and all equally require the voice of Christ to raise them to spiritual life.

Homilies on New Testament, No. 48.

Introduction.

It is only necessary to observe, with regard to Historical incidents or Anecdotes, that, if we follow the examples of the best preachers, we shall not, as a general rule, employ them at the commencement of a sermon. A Paradox, a Proverb, or an Epigram, flowing naturally from the text, will arrest the attention without putting the text out of sight as an anecdote would be apt to do. Anecdotes, however, may very suitably commence a Lecture, as they will do for it what the text does for the sermon—bring the subject prominently before the hearers. The commencement of Archbishop Whately's lecture on "The Intellectual and Moral Influences of the Professions" affords an excellent illustration of this use of a classical story.

Where fitting illustrations cannot be found, a Supposed case may often be effectively introduced, and vividness will be imparted by presenting the subject under consideration in as pictorial a manner as possible, and by using in description the present instead of the past tense.

Before we leave the consideration of this subject, it may be well to allude to an objection that has been urged against the use of illustration,—that there is a danger of its superseding vigorous teaching. It may be at once conceded that there is a risk of concealing the doctrine to be taught under a cloud of tropes and metaphors, yet the abuse of a thing will hardly be considered a fair argument against its use.

Archbishop Whately says, that, while the true object of oratory is to carry one's point, "many a wandering discourse one hears in which the preacher aims at nothing and hits it." As a contrast to this kind of oratory, we have the remark made as to the speeches of Bishop Blomfield, that they were "those of one who had something to say, not of one who had to say something." The very word "illustration" indeed conveys the idea of a doctrine to be explained, and he who really enters into the importance of his work will keep this well before him, and will judiciously prune away every metaphor, however brilliant, which is not necessary to this one end. We may safely assert that Jeremy Taylor is none the less vigorous for illustrating the long-suffering of God by the Rabbinical story that the Archangel Michael, being God's messenger of vengeance, had but one wing, that he might labour in his flight, while Gabriel had two wings, that he might "fly swiftly" when bringing the message of peace. And the nature of repentance and faith is set before us all the more clearly when Adams likens Faith to a great queen in her progress, having Repentance as her messenger going before her, and Works as the attendants following in her train.

The earnest teacher, then, will consider the nature of his audience, knowing that "it may be clearly intelligible to a house of commons which would appear as if spoken in an unknown tongue to a conventicle of enthusiasts," and will endeavour to adapt himself to it by every means in his power, with the one grand object of "carrying his point." He will first strive to have "thoughts that breathe," and will then endeavour as best he can to ally them to "words that burn."

CARL GWYN, ST. ASAPH,

September, 1867.

J. G. P.

Rhetoric, part ii.,
chap. iii., § 2.

Memoir, vol. i., chap. 5.

Campbell's Rhetoric, book i., chap. 8.

The Names of the several Authors cited in this Collection.

A.

Petrus Abælardus.
George Abbot.
Robert Abbot.
Robert Abbot, Sarum.
Laurentius Abstemius.
Jacobus Acontius.
Josephus Acosta.
Adamantius.
Thomas Adams.
Melchior Adamus.
Paulus Ægina.
Ælianus.
Ælius Spartianus.
Æmilius Probus.
Alardus Æmstelredamus.
Æschylus.
Æsopus.
Agathias.
Albertus Magnus.
Andreas Alciatus.
"Alcoranus Turcorum."
Ulysses Aldrovandus.
Alexander Alensis.
Alexander ab Alexandro.
Petrus de Alliaco.
John Henricus Alstedius.
Isaac Ambrose.
St. Ambrosius.
Robertus Amesburiensis.
Ammianus Marcellinus.
Anacharsis.
Pierre d'Ancre.
James Andrews.
Lancelot Andrews.
John Angier.
"Annotations on the Bible."
St. Anselmus.
Antonius Eremita.
Sidonius Apollinaris.
Apollodorus.
Levinus Apollonijs.
John Apostolius.
Michael Apostolius.
Appianus Polyhistor.
Thomas Aquinas.
Benedictus Aretius.
Aristophanes.
Aristoteles.
Simeon Ash.
St. Athanasius.
Athenæus.
Athenagoras.
William Attersoll.
St. Augustinus.
Aurelius Victor.
Ludovicus Aurigarius.
Ausonius.
Avicenna.

B.

Gervase Babington.
Sir Francis Bacon.
Sir Richard Baker.
Walter Balcanquel, D.D.
Peter Bales.
Isaac Bargrave.
John Barlow.
Cæsar Baronius.
Caspar Barthius.
Bartholomæus.
Basilius Seleuciæ.
St. Basilus.
Thomas Bastard.
Richard Baxter.
John Bayly.
Paul Bayne.
Venerabilis Beda.
Robertus Bellarminus.
Fulk Bellers.
Hieronymus Benzonijs.
Petrus Berchorius.
Jacobus Bergomensis.
Richard Bernard.
Bernardinus Senensis.
St. Bernardus.
John Berry.
Theodorus Beza.
Jacobus Billius.
Petrus Bizarius.
Petrus Blesensis.
John Bodinus.
Robertus Bodius.
Hector Boethius.
Mauritius Bohemius.
Robert Bolton.
Bonaventura.
John Bond.
Samuel Bond.
Antonius Bonfinius.
Carolus Bonfinius.
Martinus Borhaius.
Philippus Bosquierus.
Giovanni Bosteno.
Immanuel Bourn.
Thomas Bowyer.
John Boys.
Edward Brerewood.
John Brinsley.
Johannes Bromiardus.
L. Brook.
Matthew Brooks.
Thomas Brooks.
Jonathan Brown, D. Hereford.
John Browning.
Georgius Buchananus.
Abrahamus Bucholcerus.
Samuel Bugges, D.D.
Johannes Buntingus.

Anthony Burgess.
John de Burgo.
Jeremiah Burroughs.
Robert Burton.
Johannes Buxtorffius.

C.

St. Cæcilius.
Edmund Calamy.
Calvino Turcismus.
Joh. Calvinus.
Seth Calvisius.
Gulielmus Camdenus.
Philippus Cameracensis.
Johannes Camero.
Nathaniel Cannon.
L. Capel.
Ludovicus de Carbone.
Carolus R.
John Carpenter.
R. Carpenter.
Vincenzo Cartari.
Thomas Cartwright.
Joseph Caryl.
Joh. Cassianus.
Cassiodorus.
Catena, Patrum Græ.
Robert Cawdray.
Robert Cecil, Earl Salisbury.
William Cecil, Lord Burleigh.
Cedrenus.
Michael de Cervantes.
Pierre Charon.
Thomas Cheast.
Martinus Chemnitius.
Thomas Cheshire.
St. Chromatius.
St. Johannes Chrysostomus.
Nathaniel Chytræus.
Franciscus de St. Clara.
Isidorus Clarius.
R. Clark, D.D.
Samuel Clark.
Claudianus.
Petras de Clavis-rubeis.
Clemens Alexandrinus.
Ludovicus Cœlius.
John Collinges, D.D.
Columella.
Johannes de Combis.
Philippus Comineus.
James Connyers.
Patrick Copland.
Janus Cornarus.
Ægidius Corozetus.
Samuel Cottesford.
William Crashaw.
Petrus Crinitus.

Samuel Croke.
Sir George Croke, judge.
J. Crompton.
Henry Cuffe.
Ezekiel Culverwel.
James Curle.
Quintus Curtius.
Joh. Cuspinianus.
St. Cyprianus.
Cyriacus Spangenbergensis.
Cyrillus Alexandrinus.

D.

Sir Robert Dallington.
Joh. Dalton.
Damascenus.
Samuel Daniel.
Dares Phrygius.
Joh. Davenport.
Martin Day, D.D.
William Day.
Demosthenes.
John Denison.
Pontius Diaco.
Paulus Diaconus.
"Dialogus Creaturarum."
Philippus Diez.
Diodorus Siculus.
Diogenes Laertius.
Dion. Cassius.
Dionysius Carthusianus.
"Sermones Discipuli de Tempore."
John Donne.
George Downham.
Joh. Downham.
Matthæus Dresserus.
Hieronimus Drexelius.
Joh. Drusius.
Edward Dunsterville.
Bryan Duppa.
Daniel Dyke.
Jeremiah Dyke.

E.

Richard Edes.
Philip Edlin.
Thomas Edwards.
John Elborow, D.D.
Edward Elton.
Gaspar Ens.
Epiphanius.
Erasmus.
Euripides.
Eusebius Pamphili.
Eustathius Thessalonicensis.
Eutropius.
Evagrius.
Joh. Evans.

F.

Benevent. Fabius.
Thomas Fathers.
Samuel Fawcet.
Daniel Featly, D.D.
Owen Feltham.
Nicholas Felton.
Joh. Fenelius.
Ludovicus Fenestella.

M. Fenner.
Arnold Ferron.
Johannes Ferus.
Marsilius Ficinus.
Richard Field.
Johannes Fienus.
Nigid. Figulus.
Julius Firmicus.
John Fisher.
Charles Fitz. Jeffery.
Flaccus Illyricus.
Thomas Fletcher.
Christoph. Fonseca.
Rodolphus Fornerius.
James Forsyth.
John Fox.
Paulus de Francis.
Frontinus.
Fulgentius.
Baptista Fulgosus.
William Fulke, D.D.
Thomas Fuller.
Johannes Funcius.
"Funeral Sermons."

G.

Petrus Galatinus.
Claudius Galenus.
Franciscus Garcia.
R. Gardiner.
Samuel Garey.
Thomas Gataker.
John Gauden, D.D.
Joh. Gee.
Aulus Gellius.
Johannes Gerhardus.
"Germanicarum Rerum Scriptores."
Johannes Gerson.
Conradus Gesnerus.
Guilielmus Gibieuf.
Abraham Gibson.
Gillebertus.
Rodolphus Goclenius.
M. Goddard.
Franciscus Godwinus.
Thomas Goffe.
Franciscus Gomarus.
Godfrey Goodman.
Philip Goodwin.
Thomas Goodwin, D.D.
John Gore.
Nich. Gorranus.
Stephen Gosson.
William Gouge, D.D.
Ludovicus de Granada.
Thomas Granger.
John Gray.
John Green.
Richard Greenham.
Gregorius Magnus.
John Grent.
Matthew Griffith, D.D.
Hieronimus Guadalupense.
Fr. Guicciardino.
Guido Bituricensis.
Henricus Guilimannus.
William Gurnall.
Lilijus Gyraldus.
Gyraldus Cambrensis.

H.

George Hackwell, D.D.
Joseph Hal.
William Hall.
John Hampton.
H. Hardwick.
Nathaniel Hardy.
Sir John Harrington.
Robert Harris, D.D.
Andrew Harwood.
Sir John Hayward.
Hegesippus.
George Herbert.
Thomas Hering.
Hermes Trismegistus.
Herodotus.
Hesiodus.
Peter Heylin, D.D.
Samuel Hieron.
St. Hieronymus.
Hilarius.
Arthur Hildersham.
Augustine Hill.
John Hill.
Thomas Hill, D.D.
Hippocrates.
"Hispanicarum Rerum Scriptores."
William Holbrook.
Robert Holcot.
Richard Heldsworth, D.D.
Ralph. Hollingshed.
Homerus.
Jocodus Hondius.
Honorius.
Richard Hooker.
John Hooper.
Quintus Horatius Flaccus.
John Howe.
William Howel, D.D.
Thos. Hugget.
John Hughes.
Hugo de S. Victorie.
David Hume.
John Hume.
Henricus Huntingdonus.

I.

Ignatius Martyr.
Gabriel Inchinus.
"Index Expurgatorius Hispanie." Irenæus.
Isidorus Hispalensis.
Isocrates.

J.

Thomas Jaggard.
King James.
Cornelius Jansenius.
George Jay.
William Jemmat.
William Jenkin.
Michael Jermin.
John Jewel.
Thomas Jones, D.D.
William Jones.
Josephus Judæus.
Paulus Julius.
Franciscus Junius.

Justin Martyr.
Justinus Trogus.
Juvenalis.

K.

Henry King.
John King.
Richard Knoles.

L.

Lactantius Firmianus.
Pomponius Lætus.
Arthur Lake.
Ælius Lampridius.
Cornelius à Lapide.
Hugh Latimer.
William Laud.
Thomas Laurence, D.D.
Wolfgangus Lazius.
Jeremy Leech.
Edward Leigh.
Leo Hebræus.
James Leslie, D.D.
John Lightfoot, D.D.
Thomas Lightfoot.
Peter Lilie.
Aloysius Lippomannus.
Justus Lipsius.
"Tenures de Littleton."
"Liturgia Eccles. Anglicanæ."
Titus Livius.
Petrus Lombardus.
Johannes Lorinus.
Christoph. Love.
William Lowe.
Lucanus.
Lucianus.
Conradus Lycosthenes.
Nicholaus de Lyra.

M.

J. Mab.
Nicholaus Machiavellus.
Macrobius.
"Centuriæ Magdeburgenses."
Johannes Magirus.
Johannes Malcolmus.
Gulielmus Malmesburiensis.
Constant, Manassus.
Johannes Manlius.
Thomas Manton.
Jacobus Marchantius.
Antonius Margarita.
Gervase Markham.
Stephen Marshall.
Ramundus Martinus.
Peter Martyr.
"Martyr's Letters."
Marcus Marulus.
Andreas Masius.
Henry Mason.
Radford Maverick.
Anthony Maxey, D.D.
St. Maximus.
Maximus Tyrius.
Richardus de Mediavilla.
Philippus Melancthon.
Otho Melander.
Gaspar Melo.

Menander.
Fred. de Mendoza.
Stephanus Menochius.
Paulus Merula.
Methodius.
Pedro de Mexia
I. Micklethwayt.
Richard Middleton.
Petrus Molineus.
Basilius Monnerus.
Sir Thomas More.
Fines Morison.
Philippus Mornejus.
M. Mosse.
Thomas Moufettus.
Simeon de Muis.
Sebastianus Munsterus.
Abrahamus Musculus.
Joachimus Mynsingerus.

N.

Sir Robert Nanton.
John Nash.
"Triumphs of Nassau."
Gregorius Nazianzenus.
Benjamin Needler.
William Negus.
Philippus Nepos.
Gulielmus Neubrigensis.
Solomon Neugebaverus.
"Newlander's Cure."
T. Newsham.
Nicephorus Calistus.
Nicephorus Gregoras.
Nicetas.
Gervase Nid, D.D.
Petrus Nonnus.
Aloysius Novarinus.

O.

Olaus Magnus.
Timothy Oldmayn.
Oppianus.
Origines.
Lucas Osiander.
Samuel Otes, D.D.
Pub. Ovidius.

P.

Georgius Pachimerius.
Ephraim Paget.
Saintes Pagninus.
Antonius Panormitanus.
Henricus Pantaleon.
Onuphrius Panvinus.
David Pareus.
Matthæus Parisiensis.
Johannes Passeratius.
Velleius Paterculus.
Sir George Paul.
Pausanias.
Mynheer Paw.
Asconius Pedjanus.
Isidorus Pelusiota.
William Perkins.
Aulus Persius.
Thomas Pestell, D.D.
Franciscus Petrarcha.

Johannes Philastrius Philemon.
Jeremiah Philips.
Philo Judæus.
Philostratus.
Phocylides.
Josephus Phovorinus.
Johannes Picus, C. Mirandula.
Johannes Pierius.
John Pigot.
Pin-darus.
Pinke Avoth.
Charles Pinner.
Hector Pintus.
Marcellinus de Pisc.
Petrus Pizarus.
Johannes Plantavitius.
Baptista Platina.
Plato.
Plautus.
Thomas Playfair, D.D.
Plinius Secundus.
Thomas Plummer.
Plutarchus.
Polienus.
Arnoldus Pontanus.
Porphyrius.
Possidonius.
John Potter.
Gabriel Powel.
M. Powel.
Gabriel Prateolus.
"Preachers' Travails." John Preston, D.D.
Daniel Price, D.D.
Sampson Price, D.D.
William Price.
John Prideaux, D.D.
Sylvester de Prierio.
Primasius.
Robert Prior.
Prochorus.
Procopius.
Catullus Tibullus Propertius.
Prosper.
Ferdinando Pulton.
Samuel Purchase.
Pythagoras.

Q.

Quintilianus.
Quirinus de Salazar.

R.

Sir Walter Raleigh.
Johannes de Rampegolis
Petrus de Ravenna.
Fr. Rawlinson, D.D.
J. Rayment, D.D.
J. Reeks.
Thomas Reeve.
Georg. Ressoldus.
Nicholaus Reusnerus.
Reynierius de Pisis.
Edward Reynolds, D.D.
Rhemi-gius Attissiodorensis Rhemi-gius Rhemensis.
Rhenanus.
Cælius Rhodoginus.

Francis Roberts.
 Angelus Roccha.
 John Rogers, D.D.
 Nathaniel Rogers.
 Nehemiah Rogers.
 Valerius Rothmarus.
 John Rowlandson.
 Hieronymus Rubens.
 Rufinus.
 Samuel Rutherford.

S.

Coccius Sabellicus.
 Francis Salis.
 Alphonsus Salmeron.
 Salvianus.
 Sir Edwin Sands.
 George Sands.
 Laurentius Scalabonius.
 Josephus Scaliger.
 Gulielmus Schickardus.
 Socrates Scholasticus.
 Abrahamus Schultetus.
 William Schlater, D.D.
 Obadiah Sedgwick.
 Henricus Sedulius.
 Luc. An. Seneca.
 Richard Senhouse.
 Jean de Serres.
 Sulpitius Severus.
 Josias Shute.
 Nathaniel Shute.
 Richard Sibbes, D.D.
 Carolus Sigonius.
 Silius Italicus.
 Shadrach Simpson.
 John Simson.
 Robert Skinner.
 Johannes Sleidanus.
 John Smith.
 Miles Smith.
 Samuel Smith.
 Julius Solinus.
 J. Some, D.D.
 Sophocles.
 Palladius Soranus.
 Sozomenus.
"Speculum Exemplorum."
 John Speed.
 John Spencer, D.D.
 Henricus Spondanus.
 William Spotswood.
 John Squire.
 Richardus Stanihurstus.
 Thomas Stapletonus.
 Didacus Stella.
 Matth. Stiles, D.D.
 Richard Stock.
 John Stoughton, D.D.
 John Stow.
 Strabo.

Gaspar Strezo.
 Walter Strickland.
 George Strode.
 William Strong.
 Suetonius Tranquillus.
 Suidas.
 Laurentius Surius.
 Thomas Sutton, D.D.
 Reginald Swale, D.D.
 John Swan.
 M. Swinburne.
 Fredericus Sylburgius.
 Æneas Sylvius.
 Archibald Symmer.
 Jos. Symonds.

T.

Cornelius Tacitus.
"Talmud Judeorum."
 Thomas Taylor, D.D.
 Terentius.
 Tertullianus.
 Theodoretus.
 Theophrastus Eresius.
 Theopompus.
 Johannes Theutonicus.
 Hieronymus Thriverus.
 Thucydides.
 John Timberlake.
 Franciscus Tolletus.
 Samuel Torshel.
 Alphonsus Tostatus.
 Alexander Trallianus.
 John Trapp.
 Johannes Tritenhemius.
 Thomas de Trugillo.
 M. Tullius Cicero.
 Adrian Turnebus.
 Thomas Turner, D.D.
 Isaac Tzetztes.

U.

Ephraim Udall.
 Loys de Urretta.
 Jacobus Usserus Armachan.

V.

J. Valentine, D.D.
 Valerius Maximus.
 Maph. Vegius.
 Claudius Veixmontius.
 Venatorius Honorius.
 Ralph. Venning.
 Verinus.
 Georgius Vetterus.
 P. Victorius.
 Vincentius Burgundus.
 Richard Vines.

P. Virgilius.
 Vitruvius.
 Ludovicus Viſſi.
 Rodolphus Volateranus.
 Flavius Vopiscus.
 Daniel Votyer.

W.

Nathaniel Waker.
 Johannes Walchrius.
 George Walker.
 John Wall.
 Thomas Walsingham.
 Paulus de Wann.
 Samuel Ward.
 Anthony Warwick.
 Edward Waterhouse.
 Thomas Watson.
 John Webb, D.D.
 John Weems.
 Thomas Wentworth.
 Thomas Westfield.
 S. Whaley.
 Degothy Whear.
 Jeremiah Whitaker.
 Francis White.
 John White, D.D.
 Thomas White.
 Michael Wigmore.
 Henry Wilkinson.
 Ro. Willan.
 Andrew Willet.
 John Williams.
 J. Wilson.
 M. Wincop, D.D.
 R. Wingfield.
 Dr. Winniff.
 Thomas Wood.
 John Woodnoth.
 Sir Henry Wootton.
 Thomas Worrall, D.D.
 Edoardus Wottonus.

X.

Xenophon.
 Xyphilinus.

Y.

John Yates.
 R. Yong.

Z.

Hieronymus Zanchius.
 Hieronymus Zeiglerus.
 Zeno.
 Zenodotus.
 Zonaras.
 Conradus Zuingerus.

C L E R O

Gentisque Anglicanæ Populo, Florilegium hoc quale qualecunque

D, D. Q.

J. S. De Utcester Staffordiensis, et Collegii Sioni apud Londinenses nunc Bibliothecarius, minimé dignus.

To the Reader.

XCEPTIONS are easier prevented than removed: a dim eye may foresee such as this book must encounter reducible to two heads, as made either against the Author or matter thereof. Against the Author, as if it were presumption in him, no scholar by profession, to adventure on such a design. It is answered—

First, I know no such monopoly, for scholars to engross book-making to themselves; secondly, he hath from his childhood conversed with books and book men, and, always being where the frankincense of the temple was offered, there must be some perfume remaining about him; lastly, what he lacks in learning he hath supplied in industry. Indeed, filling stones, which require more pains for portage than art for polishing, are in their kind (though not so graceful) as useful as squared stones, and as much benefit may redound from the reading of this book as from those of more elaborate composition.

Against the matter of the book it may be objected, that it is taken out of other men's books and sermons; but was it not, I pray, true of the ax of the sons of the prophet, "Alas! it was borrowed!" Is the spider's poison the better for being sucked out of herself, 2 Kings vi. 9. or bees' honey the worse for being extracted from flowers? Some men's books are, indeed, mere kites' nests—a collection of stolen things. Such are pure plagiaries, without any grateful acknowledgment; but herein the ingenuity of our Author is commendable, that on the margin he hath entered the names of those at whose torch he hath lighted his taper; and I am confident that, by such quotations, he hath revived the memories of many worthies, and of their speeches, which otherwise had utterly been lost.

The title acquaints us with the nature of the book—"THINGS NEW AND OLD." Only to propound things new and new doth please rather than profit, and more tickle the itch of the ears than satisfy the appetite of the soul. On the other side, to present us with things old and old doth show a lazy writer, and will make a weary reader: such books are like an imperfect map of the world, wherein all America is wanting. This Author hath endeavoured to compound both together, and I hope with good success; and like as changeable taffeta, having the woof and the warp of different colour, seemeth sundry stuffs to several standers-by, so will this book appear with wrinkles and gray-headed to the lovers of antiquity, smooth and with down to such to whom novelty is most delightful. He doth desire and hope that his book shall find that candour, of course, and courtesy general (which custom hath almost made a due) to forgive all venial (though false divinity, true morality) mistakes. But the reader will catch cold by keeping him too long in the porch of this preface, who now (the door being opened) may enter into the house itself, with the best wishes of

Thy servant in Christ Jesus,

THOMAS FULLER.

From my Chamber in Sion College, London,

January 10th, 1657.

ΚΑΙΝΑ ΚΑΙ ΠΑΛΙΑ.—MATT. xiii. 52.

THINGS NEW AND OLD;

OR,

A LARGE STOREHOUSE OF SIMILES,

Sentences, Apologues, Allegories, Apophthegms,
Adages, Divine, Moral, Political, &c.,

WITH THEIR SEVERAL APPLICATIONS.

I.—God to be consulted at all times, but more especially in the beginning of all public concerns.

A Jove principium was the law of nature; the Gentiles were wont to begin from their oracles and oratories. It was ever the style of the civil law to begin, "A Deo optimo maximo." Our old Saxon laws had the ten great precepts of the Decalogue prefixed in their front; and it is said of Scipio Africanus that it was his custom, before the day broke out, to go into the Capitol (in cellam Jovis), and there to stay a great while, as if he were advising with his god concerning the commonwealth's good. But the example of David may stand for all, who, in all his straits, in all his undertakings, went to ask counsel of the Lord of heaven and earth. Thus it is that the children of God are to consult with God, to auspicate all their solemn actions, to preface all great consultations for the common good, with some such religious acts as shall best conduce to the glory of God, making their Creator, who is the Alpha and Omega of all creatures, the beginning and ending of all their actions.

Virgil, Ecol. iii.

In præfat. Reg. Aluredi ad leges suas.

Spelman, in Concil.

Aul. Gellius, in Not. Attic.

Ps. cxix.

Bargrave's Serm. 1624.

Rev. i. 8.

II.—Dreams not to be altogether slighted.

It is said of St. Cyprian that, in a dream, he saw the Proconsul give order to the clerk of assizes to write down his sentence (which was to be beheaded), which when the clerk by signs made known to St. Cyprian, the good bishop desired some delay of the execution, that he might set his house in order; and the clerk answered him in his dream, that his petition was granted; and so it fell out accordingly that that day twelvemonth after he had this dream his head was struck off. Thus it hath been from the beginning, that God hath been so gracious to many of His children by dreams, or otherwise, to give them notice of their departure hence; to some He hath "Pont. Diaconus in vita ejus, ut est videre in ep. præfixa operibus ex edit."

—SIM. GOULART.

House of Murrenberg, in Fun. Serm.

"Quæ sensu volvuntur voia di-urno; Tempore noctur-no reddit amica quies."
CLAUD.

made known the year, to some the month, to some the very day and hour; and not only so, but the manner also of their death; some per viam lacteam (by the pleasant passage of nature); some per viam sanguineam (the bloody way of martyrdom), &c. Dreams, therefore, as they are not with Eastern people superstitiously to be observed, so neither are they amongst us Christians totally to be neglected as idle and vain nocturnal phantasies.

III.—Sin mortified, the Devil's terror.

Contr. Zvingeri, Theat. Hum. P. 2. c.

De Wann, Ser. de Tempt.

"Speculum exemplorum."

"Peccatimortifica-tio, diaboli flagellum." — SEDUL., Hybern.

It is mentioned of a city strongly besieged by a potent enemy, which, holding long out, was brought to extreme want: no hope of relief appeared; famine and sword, the two sad concomitants of war, attended—the one without affrighting, the other within dismaying, the poor inhabitants, insomuch that they were even at their wits' end; and thereupon fell upon a serious consultation what was best to be done for their better safety, the result whereof was this: That there should be a considerable number of dead bodies (of which they had great store lay starved in the streets) clapped up in armour and set upon the walls in the still time of the night, that next morning the enemies upon sight thereof might be somewhat amazed, which fell out accordingly; for it was thereby conceived that some fresh supplies were brought in to their assistance; and thereupon the siege was raised and the city relieved. This distressed city, so strongly besieged, is the soul of man; the potent enemy that lieth before it is the devil—that great commander-in-chief over all such regiments as the world and the flesh can possibly raise for his service. And what course must the poor soul take in such a case? Surely no other, but—consultation first had with God by prayer—to set out its dead and mortified lusts and affections; and then, no doubt, the devil, upon the sight thereof, will quit the place, and never for the time to come adventure his whole strength to so little purpose.

IV.—Worldly thoughts and distractions in the time of prayer condemned.

Mart., ab Aspilcueta Navarri Concilia, in cap. de oratione et liris canonicis.
In Dialogo ad Luciferium.

"Non vox, sed votum," &c.

Isa. lxxv. 5.

Ps. cxli. 2.

THERE is a story, how that one offered to give his horse to his fellow, upon condition he would but say the Lord's Prayer, and think upon nothing but God. The proffer was accepted, and he began: "Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be Thy Name." But I must have the bridle too," said he. "No, nor the horse neither," said the other; "for thou hast lost both already." And thus it is that too, too many men and women, in their both private and public addresses unto God by prayer, are, by the suggestions of Satan, walking with St. Jerome in the galleries of Rome, having their hearts roving after pleasures of sin, their thoughts taken up with the things of this world, and their whole man set upon vanity; whereas they should rather mind that which they are about, keep close to God and be so watchful and intentive over their souls, that their hearts and tongues may go comfortably together; for the outward work only is but like the loathsome smoke of Sodom, whereas the inward devotion of the heart is not unfitly compared to the pleasant perfume of the sweetest frankincense.

V.—How it is that tyrants are usually not long lived.

Aver., Metaph.
Thales, Miles.
"Fœlix criminibus nullus erit diu."— AUSONIUS.

Plin., Nat. Hist.,
lib. viii., cap. 11.

As in nature, so in government; nothing is permanent that is violent. It is therefore hard to see an old tyrant, was the saying of a wise man: and good reason had he for so saying; for though for a time he may uphold his state by force and policy, yet in the end Divine justice confounds his practices and infatuates his counsels to his own ruin and overthrow. For, as in that mortal war between the great elephant and poisonous dragon, this one with his tail enclaspeth that other's feet, making him fall, and he in his fall bursteth himself and crusheth that other in pieces; so when ambition and envy meet as combatants in the heart of a man, he needs no outward force to assail him, for the venomous tail of his envy entangleth the winged feet of his ambition, making him fall, and in the fall to burst with his own weight.

Dallington's Apherims.
"Ingens mole sua,"
&c.

VI.—Policy above strength.

THE dolphin finding himself unable to hurt the crocodile, by reason of his hard scales, which no weapon can pierce, diveth under him, and with his sharp fin striketh him into the belly, being soft and tender, and so killeth him. Thus, what nature taught the creature, experience hath taught man, to strike the enemy where he may with most hurt, and leave things impossible unattempted, for prudence is of force where force prevails not. Policy goes beyond strength, and contrivance before action; hence is it that direction is left to the commander, execution to the soldier, who is not to ask Why? but to do what he is commanded.

Plin., Nat. Hist.,
lib. viii., cap 25.

"Experientia docet."
"Militumprivatum, non solum debere esse violentem," &c.
Xen., Cyropæd., lib.
ii.

VII.—The state of a kingdom or commonwealth known best by the administration of justice.

THE constitution of a man's body is best known by his pulse: if it stir not at all, then we know he is dead; if it stir violently, then we know him to be in a fever; if it keep an equal stroke, then we know he is sound and whole. In like manner we may judge of the state of a kingdom or commonwealth, by the manner of execution of justice therein, for justice is the pulse of a kingdom. If justice be violent, then the kingdom is in a fever, in a bad estate; if it stir not at all, then the kingdom is dead; but if it have an equal stroke, the just and ordinary course, then the kingdom is in a good condition—it is sound and whole, without the least corruption imaginable.

Jean Bodin, de la Republique.
Justitia Rep., format. Ant. Benfuius,
lib. iii., "rerum Hungar."

Jer. xxii. 15.

VIII.—The prevalency of fervent prayer.

SOCRATES telleth that when a terrible fire in Constantinople had fastened on a great part of the city and took hold of the church, the bishop thereof went to the altar, and, falling down upon his knees, would not rise from thence till the fire, blazing in the windows and flashing at every door, was vanquished, and the church preserved, so that with the floods of his devotion he slacked the fury of that raging element; and the same shall be the force of England's prayers for England's peace and welfare, if we be fervent therein, Heretics and schismatics may rage, enemies conspire, and the people rise up in tumults; but let us trust in Him that never forsaketh them that faithfully call upon His holy name.

Lib. vii., cap. 28.

White's Serm.,
Lond., 1612.
"Electus iratus voce rogante Deus,"—OVID,
Ps. l. 15.

IX.—God only to be seen in Christ Jesus.

A MAN cannot behold the sun in the eclipse, it so dazzleth his eyes. What doth he then? He sets down a basin of water, and seeth the image of the sun shadowed in the water. So, seeing we cannot behold the infinite God, nor comprehend Him, we must, then, cast the eyes of our faith upon His image, Christ Jesus. When we look into a clear glass, it casteth no shadow to us; but put steel upon the back, then it casteth a reflex, and showeth the face in the glass. So, when we cannot see God Himself, we must put the manhood of our Lord Jesus Christ as it were a back to His Godhead, and then we shall have a comfortable reflex of His glory.

Holdsworth's Serm., Lond., 1624.

"Videmus Deum per Christum," &c.
—FULGENT.

X.—*Riches avail not in the day of wrath.*taught's Serm.,

It is said that there stands a globe of the world at one end of the Library in Dublin and a skeleton of a man at the other. There it is that one need not study long for a good lesson. And what lesson is that? Though a man were lord of all that he sees in the map of the world, yet he must die, and become himself a map of mortality; and therefore, if the devil tempt him with a view of the glory of the world (omnia hæc tibi dabo), he may resist him with the words of our Saviour, "Sed quid proderit homini, &c. (What will it profit a man to win the whole world and to lose his own soul?)"

"Haud ullas portabit opes Acherontis undas,"—PROPERT,
MATT. iv. 9.
Mark viii. 36.

XI.—*Affliction from God is for His children's good.*White's Serm.,
Lond., 1617.

A TENDER-HEARTED father, walking with his little son, suppose in the city, when he perceives him gaze up and down and wander from him, withdraws himself behind some pillar, or hides himself in some corner of the street, not that he means to lose him, but to make him cry and seek after him and keep closer to him afterwards; so doth our heavenly Father with us. He correcteth every son whom He loveth; He hides Himself and, as it were, pulls in the beams of His gracious favour for a time, when we are rambling about in our thoughts and roving in our imaginations, but it is to make us cry after Him the louder, and to keep closer to Him for the time to come, and to walk more circumspectly than ever we did before.

"Exiguo percussus fulminis ictu.
Fortior ut possit claudius esse suis."
—OVID, Ep.

XII.—The peaceable man's comfort.

Deut. xx. 7.

If a man slain were found in the field, and it not known who slew him, God provided that the elders of the next city should wash their hands in the blood of an heifer, and say, "Our hands have not shed this blood, neither have our eyes seen it. Be merciful, O Lord, unto thy people Israel, whom thou hast redeemed, and lay not innocent blood unto thy people of Israel's charge," and the blood shall be forgiven them. So this, one day, will be a comfort to the consciences of all well-minded men, that they may appeal to the great God of heaven, that they prayed heartily for peace, have petitioned humbly for peace, have been contented to pay dearly for peace and to their powers, have endeavoured to refrain from sins, the only breakers of peace, and therefore trust that the Christian English protestant blood which hath already been, and hereafter may be, shed shall never be visited on their score, or laid to their charge.

Udal's Serm.,
Lond., 1642.

"Pacem to pos-cimus omnes."

XIII.—Knowledge very useful in the matter of reformation.

Fuller's Holy State,
"Ubi virtus discretionis perditur," &c.—GREG., lib. iii.

DANGEROUS was the mistake committed by Sir Francis Drake, in 1588, when, neglecting to carry the lantern (as he was commanded) in the dark, he chased five hulks of the Dutch merchants, supposing them to have been of his enemies the Spaniards. Such and worse errors may be committed in the reforming of a church or commonwealth: good mistaken for bad, and bad mistaken for good, where the light of knowledge is wanting for direction.

XIV.—*How to know whether a man belong to heaven or not.*Stanhurst, de Rebus Hybern.

Rom. vi. 12.

It was wont to be a trial whether land belonged to England or Ireland, by putting toads or snakes, or any other venomous creature, into it, and if they lived there, it was concluded that the land belonged to England, if they died, to Ireland. So, if venomous lusts live in us, if sin reign in our mortal bodies, we belong to hell ; but if they die by mortification, if there be no life in them, then shall we be sure to set up our eternal rest in heaven, and be made heirs of heaven, and have full possession of those mansions which Christ our Elder Brother hath prepared for us.

Shute's Serm.,
Lond., 1619.

John xiv. 2.

XV.—God's way the safe way to walk in.

If a man, travelling in the king's highway, be robbed between sun and sun, satisfaction is recoverable upon the county where the robbery was made ; but if he take his journey in the night, being an unseasonable time, then it is at his own peril : he must take what falls. So, if a man keep in God's ways he shall be sure of God's protection ; but if he stray out of them, he exposeth himself to danger.

Skinner's Serm.,
Lond., 1636.

"Via divina, via tuta."

XVI.—God's time the best time for deliverance.

THE physician turns the hour-glass, and resolves the physic shall work so long ; the impatient patient desires ease, cries out he is tormented, and thinks every hour two till he be refreshed : but the other knows the fittest time, and will not till then afford any comfort at all. Thus the children of God cry out in the midst of their heavy pressures, "How long, Lord, how long shall the rod of the wicked lie always upon the back of the righteous ?" But He hath turned the glass : He will not hearken to their cry. They must stay their time ; He knows best when and how to deliver them, had they but so much faith as to believe it, or patience to wait for it.

Stock's Serm.,
Lond., 1616.

Rev. vi. 10.
Ps. cxxx. 3.

"Tempus divinum tempus opportunum"

XVII.—The difference betwixt spiritual and carnal prayers, in respect of answer.

CHILDREN shoot arrows on purpose to lose them, and never so much as look where they light ; but men, when they shoot, aim at the mark, and go after the arrow, to see how near it falls. So wicked, carnal men, when they have said, not made, their prayers to Almighty God, it is but opus operatum ; they have no more regard of them. But God's children, when they, upon the bended knees of their souls, dart out their prayers, when they pour out their requests unto Him, they look after their prayers, eye them up into heaven, observe how God entertains them, and wait for a happy return at His good will and pleasure.

Wilkinson's Serm.,
Lond., 1639.

XVIII.—God's knowledge and man's knowledge, the difference in event of things.

IN a sheet almanac a man may, uno intuitu (at one view), see all the months in the year, both past and to come ; but in a book almanac, as he turneth to one month so he turneth from another, and can but look only on the present. This is the true difference betwixt the knowledge of God and man. He looketh in one instant of time to things past, present, and future ; but the knowledge of man reacheth only to a few things past and present, but knoweth nothing at all of things that are to come. That's God's peculiar so to do, and a piece of learning too high for any mortal man to attain unto.

Price's Serm.,
Lond., 1620.

1 John iii. 20.

1 Cor. ii. 11.

XIX.—Riches, honours, preferments, &c., transitory.

Plutarch, in Vita Alexandri.

Shute's Serm.,
 Lond., 1619.

Acts xx. 38.

"Nilūl in vita durabile, non opes, non honores, non potentia," &c.—CON.
 MINOR, Annal.

THE great conqueror of the world caused to be painted on a table a sword in the compass of a wheel, showing thereby that what he had gotten by the sword was subject to be turned about by the wheel of Fortune. Such is the condition of all things here below, whether they be riches, honours, or preferments: there is no more hold to be had of them than Saul had of Samuel's lap; they do but, like the rainbow, show themselves in all their dainty colours, and then vanish away; and if by chance they stay with us as long as death, they do but, like St. Paul's friends, bring us to the grave, as they brought him to the ship, and there leave us. So uncertain, deceitful, unconstant, are the things of this world to the owners thereof.

XX.—The Church of God still on the decaying hand.

Com. in Matt. xiii.
 Boys, Postill.

Luke xviii. 8.

THE Church of Christ (saith St. Hilary) is aptly resembled to a ship, for as the ship is small in the fore-deck, broad in the middle, little in the stern, so the Church, in her beginning, was exceeding little; in her middle age flourishing; but in her old age her company will be so small, and her belief so weak, that when the Son of man shall come to judge the sons of men, He shall scarce find faith on the earth.

XXI.—A good neighbour a great blessing to all men, especially a minister of God's Word.

Plutarch, in Apophthegm.
 Aut., in Melissa, p. 2.

Westfield's Serm.,
 Lond., 1641.

Ps. cxx.

THEMISTOCLES, intending to sell a farm (as Plutarch hath it), caused the crier to proclaim that it had, amongst other commodities, a good neighbour, as being assured that this one circumstance would be advantageous to the sale, and much induce the chapman to purchase it. And surely he that hath a good neighbour hath a good morrow; but a minister that liveth amongst such hath got a rich benefice. He may acknowledge, with David (rebus sic stantibus), that his lot is fallen into a fair ground, and bless God that he is not a brother to the dragons and a companion to the estriges of the times, nor constrained, to his great grief, to dwell with Mesech and to have his habitation amongst the tents of Kedar.

XXII.—Christ fully revealed in the New Testament.

Numb. xiii.
 Boys, ut antea.
 Luth., in loc. Com. de Christo.

"Plus vident oculi quam oculus,"
 John i. 29.

THE bunch of grapes that the spies of the children of Israel carried from the Land of Promise (it is Luther's observation) was borne by two strong men, upon a pole or staff: he that went before could not see the grapes, but he that was behind might both see and eat them. So the fathers, patriarchs, and prophets of the Old Testament did not, in like manner, see the bunch of grapes—that was, the Son of God made man—as they that came behind. The evangelists, apostles, disciples, under the New Testament, both saw and tasted it, after John had showed this Grape—"Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world!"

XXIII.—The danger of trusting to worldly greatness in time of distress.

As a passenger in a storm that, for shelter against the weather, steppeth out of the way, betaketh him to a fair spread oak, standeth under the boughs, with his back close to the body of it, and findeth good relief thereby for the space of some time, till at length cometh a sudden gust of wind, that teareth down a main arm of it, which, falling upon the poor passenger, either maimeth or mischieveth him that resorted to it for succour; thus falleth it out not with a few, meeting in the world with many troubles and with manifold vexations, they step aside out of their own way, and too often out of God's, to get under the wing of some great one, and gain, it may be, some aid and shelter thereby for a season, but after a while that great one himself, coming down headlong, and falling from his former height of favour or honour, they are also called in question, and so fall together with him, that might otherwise have stood long enough on their own legs, if they had not trusted to such an arm of flesh, such a broken staff, that deceived them.

Gataker's Parley with Princes.

"Nulla fides pietasq.
viris," &c.

XXIV.—Riches cannot follow us out of the world.

RICHES, though they have alas aquilinas (great eagles' wings) to fly away from us whilst we are here in this world, yet have nè passerinas quidem (not so much as little sparrows' wings) to fly after us, and follow us when we go hence. Nihil attulisti, nihil hinc attolles. ("We brought nothing into this world, neither shall we carry anything hence. Naked came we into this world, and stark naked must we return again.")

Gataker's True Contentment in God's Way, 1619.

Job i. 21.
"Linquenda tellus et domus," &c.—
HOR., car. ii., iii.

XXV.—Not to be over hasty in the desire of justice, for wrongs sustained.

As one that hath been either robbed himself or that hath his friend murdered, if he have the party apprehended and laid fast in prison, is not presently out of patience because he seeth him not instantly executed, but is well content quietly to expect the time of the assizes, though it be half a year after, as long as he is sure that he shall then have justice against him; so ought we not presently to fly out because evil-doers prosper, or grow impatient, if we see not justice done instantly, so soon as our hasty hearts shall require it, upon those we suppose have wronged us; but rest content to stay God's leisure, and to expect that day of His great assize, when we shall be sure to have justice done us, according to that which the equity of our cause shall require; remembering withal that all wicked ones are in the meanwhile in this world, as in God's jail, under the chains of a guilty conscience, out of which there is no possible means of escape without judgment.

Garcia, Concomat.
Evan.
Eccles. viii., 11.

Gataker's Appeal from Princes to God.

"Carcer ejus est cor ejus,"—BERNARD.

XXVI.—God's favour above the world's contentments, to a godly man.

THE old Grecians that had fed altogether on acorns before, after that bread came in amongst them, they made no reckoning of their mast any more, but kept it only for their swine. And leathern and iron money began to grow out of request amongst the Lacedemonians, after that gold and silver came in use. So when a man hath once found the favour of God in his heart, and the love of God in Christ hath once lighted on it, and got assurance of it, he ceaseth then to be greedy of this world's trash, which is, in regard of it but as dross, or pebble stones, to gold and diamonds, as mast to the best bread-corn; yea, rather of far less worth or value to that than either of these are to it.

Eustath., in Homeri Iliad.

Gataker's Guilt of Godliness.
Seneca, de Benefic.
"Virtutibus aurum vilius,"—HOR.

XXVII.—A good heart is a melting heart.

It is observed, that gold is both the fairest and the most solid of all metals, yet is the soonest melted with the fire; others, as they are coarser, so more churlish and hard to be

Bp. Hall, Occasional Meditat.

Vilius, argentum t auro."—HOR.

wrought on by a dissolution. Thus a sound and a good heart is easily melted into fear and sorrow for sin by the sense of God's judgments, whereas the carnal mind is stubborn and remorseless. All metals are but earth, yet some are of a finer temper than others; all hearts are flesh, yet some are, through the power of grace, more capable of spiritual apprehensions than others are.

XXVIII.—An idle man subject to the least temptation.

Ep. Hall, antea.

SET a narrow-mouthed glass near to a bee-hive, and you shall soon perceive how busily the wasps resort to it, being drawn thither by the smell of that sweet liquor wherewith it is baited; and how eagerly they creep into the mouth of it, and fall down suddenly from that slippery steepiness into that watery trap, from which they can never rise, but, after some vain labour and weariness, they drown and die. Now there are none of the bees that so much as look that way; they pass directly to their hive, without any notice taken of such a pleasing bait. Thus idle and ill-disposed persons are easily drawn away with every temptation; they have both leisure and will to entertain every sweet allurements to sin, and wantonly prosecute their own wicked lusts, till they fall into irrecoverable damnation; whereas the diligent and laborious Christian, that follows hard and conscionably the works of an honest calling, is free from the danger of those deadly enticements, and lays up honey of comfort against the winter of evil.

XXIX.—A cheap religion the beloved religion with most men.

Serm. in divites avaros.

J. Boys' Serm.
Φασηλιτών θύμα.—
ZENODOTUS, Eudemi ex Callima-cho.

ST. BASIL complained of the covetous rich in his age, because they preferred only that kind of devotion which is without cost—as, to pray for fashion and fast out of miserableness; but they would not offer one halfpenny to the poor. Such are to be found in our days, who are content to hear God's Word read and preached with their hats on their heads, and leaning on their elbows, and, if need be, they will make bitter invectives against atheism and popery; yet they are willing to serve God with that which cost them nought. Let but the parish impose an ordinary charge towards the necessary repairs of the church, or the pastor desire but some oil for his lamp, accustomed offerings for his better subsistence, you shall have them as a bulrush in a wet place, so dry that a penny is as easily screwed from them as a new coat from a child, or a sword from a soldier enraged.

XXX.—Charity to the poor to be real, not verbal.

Bedæ, Hist., lib.
iii., cap. 6.

Jam., ii. 16.

Holdsworth's
Serm., Lond., 1630
"Verbis non solvendum est quidquam."
—TER.

WE read in our chronicles of King Oswald, that as he sat at table, when a fair silver dish, full of regal delicacies, was set before him, and he ready to fall to, hearing from his almoner that there were great store of poor at his gates, piteously crying out for some relief, did not fill them with words, as, "God help them!" "God relieve them!" "God comfort them!" &c., but commanded his steward presently to take the dish off the table and distribute the meat, then beat the dish all in pieces, and cast it among them. This was true charity. Words, be they never so adorned, clothe not the naked; be they never so delicate, feed not the hungry; be they never so zealous, warm not him that is starved with cold; be they never so oily, cure not the wounded; be they never so free, set not them free that are bound, visit not the sick or imprisoned.

XXXI.—Distractions will prove destructions.

BEFORE the destruction of the Holy City and the Temple, Josephus writeth of a man troubled in mind, that ran about the city, crying, "Woe to the city! woe to the temple! woe to the priests! woe to the people!" and last of all, "Woe to myself!" at which words he was slain on the walls by a stone out of a sling. Let us take away but one letter, turning WO into O, and his prophecy may prove our admonition: "O that the world, O that this nation in the world, O that this great city of the nation, O that both city and country, would yet be wise, and lay it to their hearts, that our distractions will prove our destructions; that a kingdom divided within itself cannot long stand!"

In Lib. de Belle Jud.

Featly, Clavis Myrica.

"Divide et impera."—MACHIAV.
Mark iii. 24.

XXXII.—Love for the most part is but complimentary.

THE naturalists observe that the females of birds oftentimes lay eggs without cocks; but they are ova subventanea (eggs filled with wind), unfit to be hatched. Such is the issue of most men's love nowadays; it bringeth forth partus subventaneos (windy brats), good words, large promises, and happy wishes, but no deeds—little or no performance at all.

Plinius, Ulysses Adrovand.
Ornitholog. Aureus Montes.

XXXIII.—A great folly not to provide for heaven.

It is a thing that the Emperor Caligula is laughed at in all stories. There was a mighty navy provided, well manned and victualled, and every one expected that the whole country of Greece should have been invaded; and so it might have been: but the emperor had another design in hand, and employed his soldiers to gather a company of cockle-shells and pebble-stones, and so returned home again. Just such another voyage doth almost every man make here in this world, were the particulars but truly cast up. God hath given us so much time, it may be twenty, thirty, or forty years; it may be but a day or two more. In this time He hath furnished us with that which may be a means to conquer heaven itself. Now, if we lay out this little only about wife, or children, or to purchase a little wealth, is not this to spend money for that which is not bread? to labour for that which satisfieth not? Is not this the greatest folly that may be?

Sueton., Hist. X. philinus.

House of Mourning.
"Discite in hoc mundo supra mundum esse," &c.—
AMBROSE, Lib. de Virg.

XXXIV.—No personal security to be had in time of public danger.

CICERO, in his time, laughed at the folly of those men qui amissâ republicâ piscinas suas fore salvas sperare videntur (who seemed to conceive such a windy hope that their fish-ponds and places of pleasure should be safe when the commonwealth was lost). And we may well mourn over the security of most men in our times, such as look for personal safety in the midst of public danger; that take more care for their trifling fardels than the preservation of the ship they go in. But let such know for certain, that if the public suffer either in Church or State, no man's private pleasure or profit can stand firm unto him; no man's, whatsoever he be.

Lib. i., epist. 15, ad Atticum.

Preface to the Bp. of Winchester, Sermon.

"Res tua tunc agitur," &c.

XXXV.—Governors, as they are qualified, are a curse or a blessing to any people.

JOSEPHUS reporteth, that Solomon, being but twelve years of age when he first began to govern, the people listening to that sentence which he gave at his first sitting in judgment, touching the two women that contested about their child, "Dividatur æqualiter!" (Let the child

In Lib. Antig.

1 Kings iii. 26.

Cuspinianus.

Christ. Fomsecæ.

"Deſerant reges plectuntur Achivi."

be cut in twain !), " many laughed at it, deeming it to be a childish sentence ; but afterwards, weighing the discreet course that he had taken in justifying the truth, without any further proof or testimonies, they then cried out, "De cælo elapsus ! (The king is sent us down from heaven !)" But on the other side, there was one Phocas, a most cruel emperor of Constantinople, whereupon a religious monk, in a corner of his cell, thus complaineth unto God, "Cur fecisti cum imperatorem ? (Why didst Thou make him emperor ?)" Who had no sooner made his moan, but was answered with a voice from heaven, "Non inveni pejorem (I could not find a worse)." And certainly nothing can more manifest the love of God unto a people or nation, than in having given them wise and religious governors : and there cannot be a more plain argument of His wrathful displeasure, than to cast a wicked ruler over the people ; for, as God is pleased with a people, He gives them governors accordingly.

XXXVI.—Tyranny, oppression, murder, &c., are not long lived.

Plutarch, in Cæsar.
Diogen. Laert., in Vitis."Sine cæde et sanguine pauci descendunt reges et sicca morte tyranni."— Juv.
Ps. lv. 23.

THALES MILESIS, the prime wise man of Greece, being demanded what he had observed to be of most difficulty in the world, answered, "Tyrannum senem (To see a tyrant live to be an old man)." Thus, if cruelty and oppression, sacrilege and profaneness, murder and manslaughter, promise to themselves long life, it is a wonder, and more than God hath warranted ; for sanguinarij non dimidiabunt dies suos (bloodthirsty men shall not live out half their days).

XXXVII.—God's children must have God's qualities.

Ammian. Marcellin.

Featly's Sermon.

"Et quæ non fecimus ipsi vix ea nostra voco."

THE Roman censors took such a distaste at the son of Africanus, for his debauched life, that they took a ring off his finger, in which the image of his father was engraven ; because he so much degenerated from his father's excellent parts, they would not suffer him to wear his father's picture in a ring, whose image he bare not in his mind. Neither will God suffer any to bear His name, and be accounted His sons, who bear not His image, who resemble not His attributes in their virtues, His simplicity in their sincerity, His immutability in their constancy, His purity in their chastity, His goodness in their charity, His justice in their integrity, &c.

XXXVIII.—The devout soul will admit of none but Christ.

Xen., Cyropæd.,
lib. iii.

Featly, ut antea.

"Si Christum discis, satis est si cæterâ nescis."

WHEN Cyrus took the king of Armenia and his son Tigranes and their wives and children prisoners, and upon their humble submission, beyond all hope, gave them their liberty and their lives, in their return home, as they all fell a-commending Cyrus, some for his personage, some for his puissance, some for his clemency, Tigranes asked his wife, "What thinkest thou of Cyrus ? is he not a comely and a proper man, of a majestic presence ? " "Truly," said she, "I know not what manner of man he is ; I never looked on him." "Why," quoth he, "where were thy eyes all the while ? Upon whom didst thou look ? " "I fixed my eyes," saith she, "all the while upon him (meaning her husband) who, in my hearing, offered to Cyrus to lay down his life for my ransom." And thus, if any question the devout soul, whether she be not enamoured with the beauty of cherubim, seraphim, angels, and saints, with the pomp and splendour of that heavenly court, her answer will be that of Tigranes' wife, that she never did so much as cast a look upon them, because her eyes were never off Him who not only offered to lay, but did lay, down His life for her, and ransomed her with His own blood. Whom should she have in heaven but Him who hath none on earth but her ?

XXXIX.—The way to greatness is full of danger.

THE panther carries with him a sweet scent, but an ugly face; that enticeth beasts after him, this affrights them: therefore he hideth his head till he have the prey within danger. So is the savour of sovereignty and greatness very sweet, but the ugly face of those means by which it is gotten men see not, and so run into the toil and perish in the pursuit: for, being once embarked in so bad a cause, the farther they wade the deeper they are drowned in the whirlpool of their own errors; the more they weave in the loom of such deceitful plots, the faster they are ensnared in the trap devised for others.

I libii Nat. Hist., lib. viii., cap. 17.

Dallington's Aphorisms.

"Nec enim lex iustior ulla est."
—OVID.

XL.—Not to be afraid of afflictions, because God sends them.

How sick soever a man be with physic, he is not afraid of dying, because he considers the physician in wisdom gave him what now occasioneth his present sickness and distemper. No more should we be dismayed at the bitterness of our cup, if, with Christ, we did but take notice it is the cup that our heavenly Father hath mingled, and hath given us only for our correction, not confusion.

Lud. de Granada, Medit.

"Superanda omnia fortuna ferendone."
—VIRGIL.

XLI.—To be careful of our duty to God and man.

AUGUSTUS, the emperor, hearing that a gentleman of Rome, notwithstanding a great burden of debt wherewith he was oppressed, slept quietly and took his ease, desired to buy the bed that he lodged on. His servants marvelling thereat, he gave them this answer, that it seemed unto him to be some wonderful bed, and worth the buying, whereon a man could sleep that was so deeply engaged. Surely, if we did but consider with ourselves the duty and debt we owe to God, to man, to our country, to our family, to home-born and strangers, especially to the household of faith, it would make us vow with ourselves never to suffer our eyelids to slumber, nor the temples of our heads to take any rest, until we have finished that charge whereunto we are appointed, and perfected the account wherewith we are intrusted.

Macrobi., Sat., lib. ii., cap. 4.

King's Lect. on Jonah.

XLII.—The growth of sin to be prevented.

It is said of the pismires, that to prevent the growing (and so the corrupting) of that corn which they hoard up for their winter store, they bite off both the ends thereof, wherein the generating power of the grain doth consist. Thus, when we have committed any sin, we must pray to God so to order it, that the procreation thereof may be destroyed, and that, by a true and unfeigned sorrow, we may condemn it to a blessed barrenness, that there be no more of the breed.

Mouffet's Insector.

Fuller's Holy State.

XLIII.—More care for the body than the soul condemned.

APELLES, the famous painter of Greece, having observed that one of his scholars had painted Helena set out with much gold and embroidery, said unto him, "O adolescens, quum non possis pingere pulchram, fecisti divitem (Alas! poor young man, when thou couldst not draw her fair, thou hast made her rich)." Thus many do set a fair outside on the body, and utterly neglect the inside of the soul: pamper the body, but starve the soul; trick up the body with gold and silver, whilst the soul is naked of all grace and goodness.

Clem. Alex., Protag., lib. ii., cap. 12.

Jermin., on Prov.

XLIV.—The baseness of ingratitude.Deipnosoph., lib. xiii.Jermin., ut antea.

“Ingratus vir dolium est perforatum.”—LUCIAN.

ATHENÆUS reporteth of Milesius, that having bought a dolphin alive, and letting him go again into the sea, afterward, himself being cast away by shipwreck and ready to perish in the midst of the waters, the dolphin took him, and carried him safe to the shore. But though it be more than probable that the truth hath suffered shipwreck in this narration, yet the application is good :—That it is more than beastly ingratitude for any man to reward evil for good—not to be thankful for a courtesy received.

XLV.—*Every man to speak truth to his neighbour.*Jermin., ut antea.

“Quæ vera sunt, loqui, virum in genuum decet.”

Beph. iv. 25.

IN the body of man one member will not lie to another: the hand will not lie in telling what it toucheth, the tongue will not lie in telling what it tasteth, the eye will not lie in telling what it seeth, but every member is a true witness to another, a true witness to his neighbour. And thus it should be in the body politic of government and society, in the mystical body of the Church and Christianity, that, seeing we are members one with another, every one should speak the truth to his neighbour; and such should be the care of those especially as profess Christianity, as to lose their breath rather than to use their breath in speaking any untruth of another.

XLVI.—A little with God's blessing goes far.

Page 1874, edit. ult.

Plummer's Serm., Lond., 1616.

“Natura paucis contenta. Jovis omnia plena.”—VIRGIL.

Prov. xlii. 25.

IT was a good saying of that poor woman, in the Book of Martyrs, who, being threatened to have but a little bread one day and a little water on the next, replied, “If you take away my meat, God, I hope, will take away my hunger!” If God give but a little, He can make that little serve the turn, and then enough is as good as a feast. Well, then, is thy provision small, thy appetite shall be less. Is there but a little meal in the barrel, a little oil in the cruse, God will make it hold out. Is that little coarse, and none of the finest, “brown bread and the Gospel,” said Mr. Greenham, “is good cheer;” and, indeed, “brown bread and the blessing of God is a rich banquet.” It is not the greatness and daintiness of the fare nor the clothing in soft raiment, but God's good blessing, that doth nourish and strengthen the body of man. God makes bread to be a staff and a stay to satiate the righteous man, when the wicked may have the staff broken to them, but the stay taken away: they eat, and are not satisfied; they drink, but their thirst is nothing at all quenched.

XLVII.—The things of this world a great stop in the way to heaven.

Numb. xxxii.

Downham's Wars, fare,
“Solum non cecum amator.”— RHEMIG, RHET.

As the Reubenites, having taken a liking of the country which was first conquered, because it was commodious to the feeding of their cattle (though it were far from the Temple, where they might have fed their souls), and therefore, to enjoy it, renounced all interest in the Land of Promise;—thus do the worldly Reubenites of our times. They set their hearts and affections upon the earth and earthly vanities, because they are at hand, and fit to feed their sensual and brutish appetites, preferring it before the heavenly Canaan and temple of God's holiness, where their souls might be satisfied with those ravishing joys and transcendent pleasures which are at God's right hand for evermore.

XLVIII.—*The condonation of the injured is a conquest over the injurious.*Platarch, de Coblenda Ira.

THERE is mention made of two famous philosophers falling at variance, Aristippus and Æschines. Aristippus comes to Æschines, “Shall we be friends?” “Yes, with all my heart," says Æschines. "Remember," saith Aristippus, "that though I am your elder, yet I sought for peace." "True," says Æschines; "and for this I will always acknowledge you to be the more worthy man: for I began the strife and you the peace." This was a pagan glass, but may very well serve a great many fiery-spirited Christians to see their blemishes in. How usual it is now for man to say, "I will be revenged upon such or such a one: he hath done me wrong; I will be even with him." And so he may, too; but I'll show him a way how he may be above him. How is that? Forgive him; for by yielding, pardoning, putting up the wrong, he shows power over his passion, over himself, and that is a far greater thing than to have power over another.

Burrough's Heart-Divisions.

"Magnarum virium est, negligere lacudentem."—SENECA, de Mor.

XLIX.—Man always in a dying condition.

Look upon a candle; how it fails before it be well lighted, or is drowned with much moisture, or is puffed out with the wind, or is extinguished by the hand of man, or goeth out of its own accord. So man, if not entombed in his mother's belly, dieth not in the cradle, withereth not growing up, be not conquered when ablest to conquer, but doth hold out till old age; then, die he must. Una via vitæ, shut the door of the womb, and then no entrance into this world; but, being here, moriendi mille figuræ, so many are the passages hence, that there is no stopping of them: so that poor, fragile, weak man is always in a dying condition—he dies daily.

Prior's Serm., 1632.

"Vive memor lethi, hoc quod loquor inde est."—PERSIUS.

1 Cor. xv. 31.

L.—The Devil's aim to strike every man with spiritual blindness.

THE eagle, before he setteth upon the hart, rolleth himself in the sand, and then flyeth at the stag's head, and by fluttering his wings so dustyeth his eyes that he can see nothing, and so striketh him with his talons where he listeth. You may read of an unclean spirit in the Gospel, which "led the possessed man into dry places." Now, the sand and the dust with which this eagle the devil filleth his wings are earthly desires and sensual pleasures, wherewith, after he hath put out the eyes of the carnal man, he dealeth with him at his pleasure. Mercury could not kill Argus till he had cast him into a sleep, and with an enchanted rod closed his eyes; and the devil cannot hurt any man till he have lulled him asleep in security.

Plin., Nat. Hist., lib. x., cap. 20.

Playfer's Serm.

Matt. xii. 43.

Ovid, Metam.

LI.—The obstinate sinner deserving eternity of punishment; and why so?

Two men playing at tables by an inch of candle in the night time, and being very earnest in their game, the candle goeth out, and they perforce give over, who, no doubt, if the light had lasted, would have played all night very willingly. This inch of candle is the time of life allotted to a wicked man, who is resolved to spend it all in sinful pleasures and pastimes; and if it would last perpetually, he would never leave his play: and, therefore, since he would sin eternally (though, by reason the light of his life goeth out, he cannot), he deserveth eternal punishment.

Inchius, de Quat Nocivitate.

"Si nunquam moreretur," &c.—BERN., Ep. 252.

LII.—Civil dissension attended by uncivil destruction.

It is said of the cranes, that when they fall out amongst themselves, the fight is so fearful and fierce, that they beat down one another, and so are taken as they fight. This shows the fruits of civil dissensions, the case of such as will divide one against another, till they become a prey to the public enemy; whereof the Apostle giveth warning: "If ye bite and devour one another, take heed lest ye be consumed one of another."

Aristot., Hist. Animalium.

Gai. v. 15.

LIII.—A poor child of God comforted with the hopes of Heaven.

Sueton., in Vita Cl. Nera.

Walf., Soul's Ornament, 1616.

"Magna tamen spes est in bonitate Dei." — OVID., Epist.

Theodoret., Hist., lib. vi., cap. 22.

It was a comfortable speech which the emperor used to Galba in his childhood and minority, when he took him by the chin, and said, "Tu, Galba, quandoque imperium degustabis (Thou, Galba, shalt one day sit upon a throne)." Thus it cheereth the saints of God, how little, how mean soever in the eyes of the world, that they shall one day reign with Christ, and be installed with Him, and receive, as it were, stallum in choro et vocem in capitulo (a seat in the choir and a voice in the chapter) of that blessed temple which is above, whilst the whole world shall cry with those, "Vicit Deus et Christus ejus! (The Lord and His Christ hath got the victory, the Lord and His saints do reign for evermore)."

LIV.—God's choice of eminent persons to be exemplary to all others.

Rp. Williams' Serm., 1628.

Gen. xxii. 12.

Numb. xii. 3.

Ps. lxxxviii. 21.

WHEN God is disposed to hang up a picture in His Church, to be well observed of all that shall come after, that the people which shall be born may praise the Lord, He doth it not by limning and painting, but by the art of cutting and embroidery. For the painter deals but in colours, ordinary colours, which, according to the strength of his imagination, he tempers and lays out to the view of the eye; but the embroiderer, he deals in more costly matter, takes the cloth of gold and silver, which he mangles into a thousand pieces, bits, and fragments, to frame and set out his curious imagery. So Almighty God, being to adorn His church, not with blocks and stones, but with some rare pictures of Christian virtues, works not these in ordinary colours, men of low degree; but in gold and silver, men of eminency, princes, and nobles, and great estates. Abraham, a great, rich, and mighty man, a patriarch of his country, was first tempted in his son, and then set up for an example of obedience. Moses, another prince and potentate, was first afflicted in Egypt, and then erected in the Church for an image of meekness. David, a king, first persecuted by Saul, and then accounted a statue of uprightness. Job, the greatest man in all the East, was—and many others since him have been—pulled in pieces with a thousand miseries; but in the latter end shall be blessed up, as patterns of patience and princely resolution. These are such as God first mangles, and cuts into bits and pieces, with crosses, calamities, and deep temptations; but afterwards, when He finds them suppld and humbled with sorrow and repentance, He makes up again into most heavenly and angelical forms and images, to be looked on by us in the Church militant, and to look upon Him in the Church triumphant.

LV.—The Church's enemies are in God's hands.

Cartari, Inagines de Dei de Antichi.

THE story sets out Neptune in a statue, holding those two terrors of the sea, Scylla and Charybdis, in chains, with this inscription, as if calling to the ships:—

"Pergite securæ per freta nostra rates."

"Ships, securely sail on Through our wat'ry ocean."

Job xli. 2.

2. xxxvii. 29.

"Ad cuius tonitrua contremiscunt," &c.—TERTUL., ad Scapulam, cap. 28.

And let all drooping spirits lift up themselves in this assurance, that God holdeth the Church's enemies in chains, having His hook in their nose and His bridle in their lips; so that when they seem to be beyond and above all bounds and limits whatsoever, even then, if He do but utter His voice, in token of His commanding power, it is enough to make their chariot wheels drive heavy, and to crush them into atoms.

LVI.—A singular saint is a precious saint.

As the morning star in the midst of the clouds, and as the moon when it is at full ; as the flower of the roses in the spring of the year, and as the lilies by the springs of waters ; as the branches of the frankincense in the time of summer, and as a vessel of massy gold, set with all manner of precious stones, and as the fat that is taken from the peace-offering ;—so is one Enoch, that walketh with God when others walk from Him ; one Rahab, in Jericho ; one Elias, that boweth not his knee to Baal ; one David, in Mesech ; one Esther, in Shushan ; one Judith, in Bethulia ; one Joseph, in the Sanhedrim of the Jews ; one Gamaliel, in the council of the Pharisees ; one innocent and righteous man, in the midst of a crooked and froward generation.

Klug's Lat. or Jew's.

"De tot modo milibus unus."—OVID.

LVII.—The glory of God is to be the aim of all our actions.

A FRIEND gives me a ring, I will wear it for his sake ; a book, I will use it for his sake ; a jewel, I will keep it for his sake : that is, so as may best express my love and report his goodness. And were we truly thankful to our God, we would then use all His tokens for His sake, do all things to His glory ; we would eat our meat to Him, wear our clothes to Him, spend our strength for Him, live to Him, sleep to Him, die for Him, &c. Thus we should do. But, alas ! we use His blessings as Jehu did Jehoram's messengers, David Goliath's sword ; we turn them against their Master, and fight against heaven with that health, wit, wealth, friends, means, and mercies, that we have from thence received.

Harris's Mesuliah's Rectory.

1 Cor. x. 31.

2 Kings ix. 12.

1 Sam. xxi. 9.

LVIII.—God's infinite power in the resurrection of the body.

IN Queen Mary's days, the body of Peter Martyr's wife was, by the charity of that time, taken out of her grave and buried in a dunghill, in detestation of that great scholar, her husband, some time Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford ; but when the tide was once turned, and that Queen Elizabeth of happy memory swayed the sceptre of this state, her bones were reduced to their place, and there mingled with the bones of St. Frideswide, to this intent, that if ever there should come an alteration of religion in England again (which God forbid !), then they should not be able to discern the ashes of the one from the other. Thus death hath mixed and blended the bodies of men, women, and children with the flesh of beasts, birds, and serpents ; hath tossed, typed, and turned their ashes both into air and water, to puzzle, if possible, the God of heaven and earth to find them again : but all in vain. He can call for a finger out of the gorge of an eagle, for a leg out of the belly of a lion, for a whole man out of the body of a fish. If the devil, or thy corrupt reason, shall suggest that this is impossible, make no other answer but this : "God is omnipotent, God is infinite."

Acts and Monuments, p. 1st.

"Tibi absit quod ad resuscitanda corpora," &c.—AUGUSTIN., de Civitate Dei, lib. xxii.

Fuller's Serm. Lond., 1647.

Gen. xvii. 1.

LIX.—Fears of the loss of Gospel light more at home than from abroad.

POPE SILVESTER, when he was bid to beware of Jerusalem, for that whensoever he should come thither he should surely die, he thereupon flattered himself that he should then live long enough, for he was sure that he should never travel thither ; little thinking that there was a church in Rome of that name, into which he had no sooner set his foot but he met with his evil genius, as Brutus did at Philippi, and suddenly ended his wretched days. Now, it is not Rome in Italy which we so much need to fear, but Rome in England ; not Amsterdam in Holland, but Amsterdam in England—the popish faction on one side, and the schismatical party on the other side ; both of them fireballs of dissension in the State and of schism in the Church, to set all in a combustion.

Bapt. Platina., in Vita.

Featly's Serm.

"A dangerous fire that begins in the bedstraw."—CAN., Pref. to Reply against Fisher.

LX.—Zeal and knowledge must go hand-in-hand together.

Ovil., Metam.,
lib. ii.

PHAETON, in the poet, takes upon him to drive the chariot of the sun, but through his inconsiderate rashness sets the world in a combustion. What a horse is without a rider, or a hot-spurred rider without an eye, or a ship in a high wind and swelling sail without a rudder, such is zeal without knowledge. Knowledge is the eye of the rider, that chooseth the best way; the bridle in the hand, to moderate the pace; the rudder in the ship, whereby it is steered safely. St. Bernard hits full on this point. Discretion without zeal is slow-paced, and zeal without discretion is strong-headed; let, therefore, zeal spur on discretion, and discretion rein in zeal.

"Importabilia abs-que scientia est zelus," &c.—Serm.
xlix, in Cant.

LXI.—Not so much the quantity, as the quality of devotion, acceptable to God.

1 Sam. xv. 1.

It is said of Saul, duobus annis regnavit (that he reigned two years over Israel), when notwithstanding, according to the computation of men, he reigned twenty; but the Scripture reckons only upon the days of grace, not counting those at all which either went before or followed after. A musician is commended non tam multum, sed tam bene (not that he played so long, but that he played so well). And thus it is not the days of our life, but the goodness of our life; not the length of our prayers, but the fervency of our prayers; not the measure of our profession, but the sincerity of our profession,—that is acceptable unto God Almighty.

Shute's Serm.,
Lond., 1623.

LXII.—The deceitfulness of riches.

Jaldor Pelasot., in Epist.

HE that sees a flock of birds sitting on his ground cannot make himself any assurance that therefore they are his own, and that he may take them at his pleasure. Thus he that hath riches, and thinks himself fully possessed of them, may be deceived, and soon deprived of them. A small spark of fire may set them flying; a thief may steal them; an unfaithful servant may embezzle them; a soldier, a wreck at sea, a bad debtor at land,—there's a hundred ways to set them packing. They have wings, and hop from branch to branch, from tree to tree, from one man to another—seldom to him that is the true owner of them.

Davenport's Serm.,
Lond., 1617.

LXIII.—Glory is to be given to God only; and why so?

Myncing Schol., in Institut., lib. iii.

THAT workman should do ill who, having built a house with another man's purse, should go about to set up his own arms upon the front thereof. And in Justinian's Law it was decreed, "That no workman should set up his name within the body of that building which he made out of another man's cost." Thus Christ sets us all at work; it is He that bids us to fast, and pray, and hear, and give alms, &c. But who is at the cost of all this? Whose are all these good works? Surely God's. Man's poverty is so great, that he cannot reach a good thought, much less a good deed. All the materials are from God. The building is His; it is His purse that paid for it. Give but therefore the glory and the honour thereof unto God, and take all the profit to thyself.

Fonseca's Quadr., Serm.

"Jovis omnia plena,"—VIRGIL.

LXIV.—God must be loved for Himself only.

You shall have a man scrape and crouch, and keep ado with a man he never saw or knew before—one that he is ready, it may be, when his back is turned, to curse; but yet he will do this for his alms, for his gain, to make a prey, a use of him some way or other. This man loves his alms, loves his prey, loveth his bounty ; but all this is no argument of love to the man. Thus, for a man to make towards God, and to seem to own Him, and to be one of the generation of those that seek His face ; to address himself in outward conformity, and many other things, by which another may, if he have no other ground, judge charitably of him ; yet all this is nothing, except a man may discern something that may give him a test that his spirit doth uprightly and sincerely seek God ; that he loveth God for God Himself ; that he loveth grace for grace itself ; he loveth the commandments of God because they are God's commandments, &c. And thus it is that our love, our desire after God, must be carried sincerely, not for any by and base respects whatsoever.

Funeral serm.

"Deus propter scripturam diligendus est."—AMBRÓS.

LXV.—Every motion towards God is not a true motion towards God.

THERE be many things that move, and yet their motion is not an argument of life. A windmill, when the wind serveth, moveth, and moveth very nimbly too ; yet this cannot be said to be a living creature. No ; it moveth only by an external cause, by an artificial contrivance. It is so framed that when the wind sitteth in such or such a corner it will move ; and so, having but an external motor and cause to move, and no inward principle, no soul, within it to move it, it is an argument that it is no living creature. So it is also if a man see another man move, and move very fast, in those things which of themselves are the ways of God : you shall see him move as fast to hear a sermon as his neighbour doth ; is as forward and hasty to thrust himself and bid himself a guest to the Lord's Table (when God hath not bid him) as any. Now the question is, what principle sets him a-work ? If it be an inward principle of life, out of a sincere affection and love to God and His ordinances, that carrieth him to this, it argueth that man hath some life of grace ; but if it be some wind that bloweth on him—the wind of state, the wind of law, the wind of danger, of penalty, the wind of fashion or custom—to do as his neighbours do ; if these or the like be the things that draw him thither, this is no argument of life at all : it is a cheap thing, it is a counterfeit and dead piece of service.

Day's Fun. Serm., 1619.

"In omnibus rebus principia sunt diligenter consideranda."—FR. GUICHARD, lib. i.

LXVI.—God is not to be provoked to anger.

THE gods of the Gentiles were senseless stocks and stones, not able to apprehend, much less to revenge, an injury done unto them. Well, therefore, might the philosopher be bold with Hercules, to put him to his thirteenth labour, in seething of his dinner, and Martial with Priapus, in threatening him to throw him into the fire if he looked not well to his trees. A child may play at the hole of a dead asp, and a silly woman may strike a dead lion ; but who dare play with a living serpent ? Who dare take a roaring lion by the beard ? Let Christians, then, take heed how they provoke the living God ; for He is a consuming fire, and with the breath of His mouth He is able to throw down the whole frame of nature and destroy all creatures from the face of the earth.

Featly's Clavis.

Isa. xi. 8.

Heb. xii. 29.

LXVII.—Religion and unity the only supporters of Church and State.

IT is not possible that those things which are knit together by a bond should hold fast together after the bond itself is broken ; nor can a sinew hold steady the joint if it be sprained, or broken, or cut asunder. Religion is the bond of all society, the strongest sinew of church or commonwealth. God forbid there should be any rupture, any-sprain in this sinew ! The like of unity : pluck, if you can, a beam from the body of the sun, it will then have no light ; break a branch from the tree, it will bear no fruit ; sever a river from the spring, it will be soon dried up; cut a member from the body, it soon dieth; cast a pumice stone into the water, and, though it be never so big, while it remains entire and the parts whole together it will swim above water, but break it once into pieces, and then every piece of it will sink to the very bottom. Thus both church and commonwealth, which are supported and, as it were, held up by religion and unity, peace and concord, are ruined and destroyed by discord, dissension, schism, and faction. "O tam bonum quam jucundum!" How happy are such a people, such a nation, such a church, such a state, as live together in peace and unity!

Featly, ut antea.

Cyprian, de Simplici. Prælat.

"Fulcrum imperiorum est servare religionem et unitatem." — LIPS., in Præfat. ad Policret.

LXVIII.—Peace with men will make our peace with God.

Cicero, de Arusp. Respon.

Featly's Serm.

WHEN, upon news of earthquakes, and other prodigious signs, the soothsayers foretold great calamities that were to befall the state of Rome, unless the wrath of the gods were suddenly appeased, the orator determineth the point most divinely: "Faciles sunt deorum ira, &c. (God will be easily reconciled to us, if we be reconciled one to another)." And most true it is we cannot be one with God so long as we are one against another. When we are at peace one with another, then God will be at peace with us; and if God be at peace with us, all creatures shall be in league with us, so that neither devil nor man, nor anything else, shall have any power to hurt us.

LXIX.—The great folly of too late repentance in anything.

■ B. D. Sarum.

Spotswood's Hist. of Church of Scotland, in Epist. to the Reader.

"Sædè sapiunt Phrygiæ," — ERASM., Adag.

Prov. xxii. 3.

It was a sad confession that, by the testimony of a reverend ear-witness,* dropped from the mouth of a very considerable person in Scotland, viz., "That it was true he, with the rest of his nation, had buried episcopacy and their ancient monarchy in one and the same grave; but upon the sad consequences of it they would be content to tear up the very earth of that grave with their teeth, so that they might but raise both of them up again." And such is the precipitate folly and madness of many that are at this day to be found in the midst of us, who act ill at the first, and then, to their great grief, consider what they have so acted; such as have, and do still, run headlong upon one mischievous design or other, and then, Phrygian-like, repent when it is too late, wishing that undone which is done; whereas one day they will find, to their great loss, that the safest course had been, with prudent Prometheus, to have foreseen a danger and shunned it, than, with foolish Epimætheus, in the want of due consideration, to go on, and be deservedly punished.

LXX.—The Church robbed of her maintenance, upon pretence of reformation.

Justin., Hist., lib. li.

Fonseca's Serm. Quadragesimal.

Rudyard's Speech.

Sibald's Serm., 1638.

DIONYSIUS the tyrant, entering into a temple of idols, took away from the chiefest amongst them a cloak of gold, and being demanded why he did it, his answer was, "This cloak is too heavy for the summer, and too cold for winter." Taking likewise a golden beard from Æsculapius, he said, that his father Apollo having no beard, there was no reason his son should wear any. But this was but a mask for his covetousness. And thus it is with some in these days: they will strip the Church of her maintenance, to keep the clergy from laziness, and they tell us that the king's daughter is all glorious within; so as they may pocket up her raiments of needlework and fine gold, it is no matter how she is without. They profess encouragements to the ministers of the Gospel, and in the meantime pare off a great deal of their necessary maintenance. But let them know that it is scandalous maintenance that makes a scandalous minister, and that a beggarly clergy is always the sign of a bankrupt religion.

LXXI.—Time to be well used.

MANY sitting up so long at play are necessitated to go to bed darkling. This our living in this world is a kind of playing or gaming, whose bed is eternity. Let us, then, study to give over this play in some good time, and not stay at it till the very snuffing and topping of the candle go out, lest darkness overtake us, and we take up our lodging in hell to all eternity.

Fonseca, ut antea.

LXXII.—Christ and the good Christian are companions inseparable.

It was the pride of Seneca, and he boasted much, ubicunque ago, Demetrium circumfero (that wheresoever he went he bare Demetrius with him). Oh that we could but say the like of God: Ubicunque ago, Deum circumfero (Wheresoever I go I bear Christ Jesus with me)—not in a material crucifix, or a visible picture of Him, wrought in gold or framed in silver, but the sweet remembrance of my blessed Saviour, that is ever with me; the print of His love; the example of His virtue; the image of His goodness; the record of His mercy; all the miracles that He wrought for my conversion, all the miseries that He endured for my liberty, all the indignities that He sustained for my salvation; the power of His death, the triumphs of His cross, the glory of His rising, the comfort of His appearing, is that which I lay as camphire between my breasts, that which I hug with all my soul. “Wheresoever I go, whatsoever I do, Christ is still with me,” saith the devout soul, “as the lot of mine inheritance, as the crown of my felicity.”

Epist. ii.

Bangrave's Serm.,
Weston., 1624.

LXXIII.—How the Spirit is said to be quenched in ourselves and in others.

“Quench not the Spirit” (1 Thess. v. 19). “Nec in te, nec in alio,” saith Aquinas. Quench it not in yourself, by forbearing to hear the Word preached; quench it not in others, by discouraging them that do preach; for so St. Chrysostom understands the place, taking an example from the lamp that burnt by him whilst he was preaching. “You may quench,” says he, “this lamp by putting in water, and you may quench it by taking out the oil; so a man may quench the Spirit in himself, if he smother it or suffocate it with worldly pleasures and profits.” And he may quench it in others, if he withdraw the favour or the maintenance which keeps the preacher in a careful discharge of his duty.

Com. in 1^o Thess.

Donne's Serm.,
Lond., 1627.

LXXIV.—To be careful in the choice of a wife.

It was the advice of the late Earl of Salisbury to his son, that as, in a project of war, to be foiled once by the enemy, it would be very hard to recruit, so in the choice of a wife, to err but once is to be undone for ever; and the rather because, as in a lottery, there may be a hundred blanks drawn before one prize—many a bad wife made choice of, before one that may become a fit helper is so much as thought on.

In his Book of Precepts.
“Uxor bona chara supellex.”

LXXV.—Contemplation and action are requisite for every good Christian.

NOAH is commanded to make a window in the top of the ark and a door in the side of it: a window is for the eye to look out at, a door is for the whole body to go out. And he that will ever be a good Christian must not only make a window for contemplation, as Daniel did, at which he prayed thrice a day; but a door for action, as Abraham did, at which he sat once a day. At the window of contemplation he must meditate with a very good heart, to keep the Word; at the door of action he must go out, to bring forth fruit with patience.

Gen. vi. 16.

Stiles's Serm.
Dan. vi. 10.
Gen. xviii. 1.

LXXVI.—*No quietness in the soul till it come to Christ.*Playfer's Serm.

NICAULA, the queen of Sheba, could never be quiet in her own country till she came to Solomon; but when she saw his glory and heard his wisdom, then her heart failed her: she had enough, she could desire to see and hear no more. So the soul of a true Christian can never be quiet in the strange country of this world, till it come to Christ the true Solomon, the King and Prince of peace eternal.

LXXVII.—*The true Christian takes no comfort in this world.*Hellingshed's Chron.

EDWARD III., having the king of Scots and the French king his prisoners here in England both together at one time, held royal justs in Smithfield; the just being ended, he feasted both the kings sumptuously at supper. After supper, perceiving the French king to be sad and pensive, he desired him to be merry as others were. To whom the French king answered, "Quomodo cantabimus cantica in terra aliena?" (How shall we sing songs in a strange land?) If the French king, after all this princely pastime and stately entertainment, took it so heavily to heart that he was kept prisoner out of his own country, great, then, must needs be the mourning of every good Christian for his captivity here in this world, that he is forced to sojourn in Mesek and live in the tents of Kedar—that he must make his abode here below—especially seeing that he neither hath such welcome in the world as the French king had in England; neither yet is England so far from France as heaven (the place of his desires) is from them both.

LXXVIII.—*Man's nature is altogether sinful.*Stanhurst, de Re- *bis Hybern.*Playfer's Serm.

"Unicuique dedit vidium natura creato."—PROPERT.,
lib. ii.

Jam. iii. 2.

THE Irish history tells us that the city of Waterford gives this posy in her arms, "Intacta manet," because, since it was first conquered by Henry II., it was never yet attainted, no, not so much as touched with treason. It is said also, that the Isle of Arran, in that country, hath such a pure air, that it was never yet infected with the plague. It cannot be said thus of the nature of man, that it is either so clear from treason as that city, or that it is so free from infection as that island is; for our very reason is treason, our best affection is no better than infection, if it be well sifted in the sight of God. "In many things we sin all."

LXXIX.—*The law of God a perfect law.*Gillingham's Serm., Lond., 1647.

Ps. xix. 7.

THERE is a saying, "New lords, new laws." Good lords make good laws, tyrants make cruel laws, and fools make absurd laws. Inerrability is not tied to the chair of the best law-giver; councils, though œcumenical, may, and have erred. That law which was suitable to former times is repealed in these, and these may not hereafter be approved in those that follow. But the law of God is a perfect law, ever in force, unalterable; so full, that it needeth not to be eked out by any traditions or human inventions whatsoever—which to do were in effect no more than to add supernumerary limbs to a complete body.

LXXX.—*The guilt of innocent blood crying to heaven for vengeance.*Guilliam, de Felicit Success. Phil. II.

It is reported of Philip II., king of Spain, that besieging the town of St. Quintin, and being to make a breach, he was forced, with his cannon, to batter down a small chapel on the wall, dedicated to St. Lawrence, in reparation to which saint he afterwards built that famous chapel in the Escorial in Spain, for workmanship one of the wonders of the world.

Most sure it is that many churches and chapels of the God of St. Lawrence have been laid waste by the late wars of Christendom; and which is more (and more to be lamented), many living temples of the Holy Ghost, Christian people of all conditions, of both sexes, have been causelessly and cruelly destroyed. But how shall the nations ever be able to make recompense? what compensation can there be for such effusions of Christian Protestant blood? God of His infinite goodness forgive that debt, which they of themselves are no way able to satisfy.

Fuller's Good Thoughts in Bad Times.

LXXXI.—To joy in the light of the Gospel.

PROCOPIUS reports, that near to the pole, where the night endures many months together, the inhabitants in the end of such a long night, when the sun begins to appear, get up to the tops of the mountains, striving who should have the first sight of that desired creature; and so, no sooner do they see it, but they deck themselves in their best apparel and, with mutual embraces of joy, congratulate each other, saying, "Ecce Sol!" (Behold the sun, the sun appeareth!) How, then, should we rejoice in the happy light of the Gospel? How should we live and love together, when, after such a long Egyptian night of popery and superstition, the Sun of righteousness is risen unto us? It was once light only in Goshen, and all Egypt dark besides; in Jewry only was God known. But now, Ecce Sol! light is come into the world: lux mundi, non lux modii, the sun of the Gospel is so full, that it is but opening the casements of our hearts, and it flows in upon us. Let us rejoice and be glad thereat!

Arcana, Hist.

Boys' Serm.

Exod. ix. 26.

Ps. lxxvi. 1.

LXXXII.—Censurers condemned.

HENRY VII., in derision of star-gazers, asked one (who had before prophesied of his death) this question: "What shall betide me this Christmas?" The cunning man forsooth answered he could not tell. "What then, I pray thee," quoth the king, "shall become of thee?" To this he answered likewise, that he knew not. "Well then," said the king, "I am more learned in thy science than thyself; for I know that thou shalt be committed to prison, and there lie fast all this Christmas, for a juggling companion." What this silly man could not tell by the influence of the stars, as concerning the bodies of men, there is an hypocritical generation of censurers of others, but justiciaries to themselves, that can tell what will become of the souls of themselves and others: This man is a poor carnal man, that man is a precious saint; one man is damned already, another man is in heaven. As for themselves, they know their place in heaven as perfectly as their pew in the church, which they have a key to. But the blessed Spirit of God hath long since branded this wicked censorious generation, and checks them plainly: "Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? to his own master he standeth or falleth!" And so shalt thou.

Boys, ut antea.

"Sunt aliqui qui de omnibus male judicant," &c.—GREG., Moral., lib. vi.

Rom. xiv. 4.

LXXXIII.—Grace in the heart cannot be smothered.

TAKE a river: let it be dammed and stopped up, yet if the course of it be natural, if the vent and stream of it be to go downward, at length it will overbear, and ride triumphantly over. Or let water that is sweet be made brackish by the coming in of salt water; yet, if it naturally be sweet, at the length it will work it out. So it is with every man. Look what the constant stream of his disposition is, look what the frame of it is; that which is most natural and inward to a man, though it may be dammed up and stopped in such a course for a while, yet it will break through all at the last; and though there be some brackish, some sinful dispositions that may break in upon a man, yet he, by the grace of God, will wear them out, because his natural disposition, the frame of his heart, runs another way.

Preston's Covenant.

"Expellat furcâ licet, usque recurret."

LXXXIV.—Impossible but that a true Christian will be a thankful Christian.

Granatens., Dum peccatum.

IF a man, being wearied through a tedious and long journey, should rest himself at the foot or bottom of some tower or castle, and should be exceedingly-tormented at the same time with hunger and thirst, and that one in that tower or castle should reach unto him as much meat and drink as he desired, could he possibly contain himself but that he must needs look up to see who it is that thus relieved his necessity? So it is not possible but that a true Christian, that lives daily upon the alms-basket of God's providence, should be a thankful Christian, and cast up his eyes to heaven, that he may see who it is that thus liberally furnisheth him in the time of his so great extremity.

"In omnibus gratias Deo benefactori."
—IRENÆUS, lib. iv.

LXXXV.—A factious-spirited man unfit for the work of the ministry.

Socrates, Hist., lib. v., cap. 20.

MARTIANUS, Bishop of the Novatians at Constantinople, having ordained Sabbatius, a Jew, priest; and finding him afterward to be a turbulent man, "Utinam super spinas," &c., saith he. ("Oh, would to God I had laid my hands on briars, rather than on such a man's head.") And it is to be feared that many now in these days have just cause to beshrew their fingers for ordaining them, whom they have no sooner put into the ministry, but they become the ringleaders of faction and schism, against that very authority which ordained them.

"Procul hinc, procul ite nocentes."
—STATIUS.

LXXXVI.—Bitter spirits no gracious spirits.

Nat. Hist., lib. ix., cap. 39.

Burrough's Heart-Divisions.

PLINY tells of Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, that in her wanton bravery at a supper made for Marcus Antonius, she dissolved a pearl in vinegar, and drank it off and prepared another, both which were valued near five thousand pounds. But oh, the many precious pearls of patience, humility, love, brotherly kindness, &c., worth many thousands of gold and silver, that are dissolved by the vinegar-sourness of men's spirits, in these sad distracted times, in these sharp dissensions that are amongst us!

LXXXVII.—We must not be careless hearers of the Word.

Gataker's Gain of Callings.

"Debet totus festinus dies expendi in operibus sanctis."
—GROTHED, in Decalogue.

As market-folk, returning from the market, will be talking of their markets as they go by the way, and be casting up of their penny-worths when they come home, reckon what they have taken and what they have laid out, and how much they have gotten; so should we, after we have heard the Word publicly, confer privately of it with others, at least meditate on it by ourselves, and be sure to take an account of ourselves, how we have profited that day by the Word that hath been spoken to us, and also by other religious exercises that have been used of us. And as the market-man counteth that but an ill market-day that he hath not gained somewhat more or less, so may we well account it an ill Sabbath day to us whereon we have not profited somewhat, whereon we have not increased our knowledge or been bettered in our affection, whereon we have not been either informed in judgment or reformed in practice, whereon we have added nothing to our talent.

LXXXVIII.—Protestant religion the only comfortable religion to die in.

* Steph. Gardiner, in Epist. to B. Lake's Works.

As an eminent prelate of the Church of Rome* said of the doctrine of justification by faith only, that it was a good supper-doctrine, though not so good to breakfast on, so it must be acknowledged of our reformed religion in general, that although it be not so plausible and pleasant a religion to live in as some other may be, yet it is the only comfortable religion to die in, as being that which settles a man upon the true Rock, and gives a sure footing to his faith, when all the superstitious devices of man's brain do like sand fail and moulder away.

LXXXIX.—God brings good out of evil for His people's good.

ROBERT HOLGATE, who was sometime Archbishop of Canterbury, because he could not peaceably enjoy his small living in Lincolnshire, in regard of the litigiousness of a neighbouring knight, coming to London to right himself, he came into the favour of King Henry VIII., and so got by degrees the archbishopric of York. He thought he got well by the quarrelling of this wrangling knight. So let every man say of that strife and contention, that disorder and confusion, that it is felix contentio, et felix confusio (a happy contention, a happy disorder), when the strifes of men shall put him upon those providences and duties which shall be so blessed unto him as to forward his getting into the favour of the Most High God, and the enjoyment of peace, and to the admiring of His free grace, who hath brought him into so great a good from so great an evil.

Godwin, de Præiudiciis Angl.

Burrough's Heart-Divisions.

XC.—The world like a fisherman's net.

THE world is not unfily compared to a fishing-net, the end of the world to the drawing up of the nets. While the nets are down, there is nothing said to be caught; for the nets may break and the fish escape: but at the end of the world, when the nets are drawn up, it will then evidently appear what every man hath caught, and then those that have fished for riches, or gain, sovereignty, and power over their brethren, for the honours and preferments of this world, may say with Peter, "Domine, tota hac nocte laboravimus, &c. (Lord, all this night have we laboured, and caught nothing at all)." They dreamt of riches, and honours, and power; but being now awake, they find nothing in their hands at all. But those that have here fished for godliness, for peace, for the honour of God, may say, "Domine, in verbo tuo retia dimisimus, &c. (Lord, at Thy word we have let down our nets, and have caught; yea, we have caught abundantly):" we have fished for godliness, and have gotten life eternal; for grace, and we have gotten glory; for goodness, and we have gotten God Himself, who is the fountain of all goodness and glory.

Matt. xiii. 47.

Gataker's Gain of Godliness.

Luke v. 5.

August., in Ps. lxxvi. 5.

Rom. ii. 7.

XCI.—God and His graces go together.

WHEN the king removes, the court and all the carriages follow after, and when they are gone, the hangings are taken down; nothing is left behind but bare walls, dust, and rubbish. So, if God removes from a man or a nation, where He kept His court, His graces will not stay behind; and if they be gone, farewell peace, farewell comfort: down goes the hangings of all prosperity, nothing is left behind but confusion and disorder.

Staughton's Serm.

XCII.—A government of the tongue required.

SOCRATES, the ecclesiastical historiographer, reports a story of one Pambo, a plain ignorant man, who came to a learned man and desired him to teach him some one psalm or other. He began to read unto him Psalm xxxix., "Dixi, custodiam, &c. (I said, I will look to my ways, that I offend not with my tongue)." Having passed this first verse, Pambo shut the book and took his leave, saying that he would go learn that point first. When he had absented himself for the space of some months he was demanded by his reader when he would go forward. He answered that he had not yet learned his old lesson; and he gave the very same answer to one that asked the like question forty-nine years after. Such a hard thing it is to rule this unruly member of the tongue, that it must be kept in with a bit and a bridle, bolts and bars. It was David's glory, and it is our shame. It is now held to be a piece of religion to be offensive with the tongue, to slander, revile, and backbite their neighbours; nay, such a sinful liberty have men taken to themselves, as to speak evil of authority, to throw dirt in the face of supreme power, forgetting that of St. James, "He that seemeth to be religious, and refraineth not his tongue, that man's religion is in vain."

Hist. Tripart., lib. viii., cap. 1.
Marul., lib. iv., cap. 6.

Lake on Pr. li.
Ps. xxxii.
Ps. xli., & lvii.
"Digito compesce labellum."

Jam. i. 26.

XCIII.—Forgetting of injuries past is necessary upon a making of peace.

THRASYBULUS feared there would be exceeding heart-burnings amongst the Athenians; that those who had been banished would be revenged on those they judged the causes of it, and the other would be enraged against them: therefore Thrasybulus got the people to join with him in a law, which they called amnestia, that all former wrongs should be forgotten, and that they should live lovingly and peaceably henceforward one with another, as if such breaches had never been amongst them. Thus, when God shall restore peace to a kingdom or state, and set all to right, the addition of such an amnestia (an act of oblivion) will be very necessary, not to rip up old things, but that there be a line of forgetfulness drawn over them; otherwise such will be that extreme bitter exasperation and deadly rage of men's hearts one against another, that whatsoever peace shall be concluded, if it be not made exceeding sure, the pacification is like to be but the foundation of greater evils to come.

Val. Max., lib. iv.,
cap. i.
Sigonius, de Rebus Atheniens.

Cicero, in Philip.

Burrough's Heart-Division,
"Ne malorum me-mineris." — VAL.
MAX.

XCIV.—The silent Christian is the sound Christian.

WHAT a noise do the poor souls make in the streets of London when they cry their commodities! Each telleth what he hath, and would have all hearers take notice of it; and yet (God wot) it is but poor stuff they make such an outcry about. You cannot hear any of the rich penny-fathers talk of the money-bags that they have in their chests, or what treasures of rich wares the merchant hath in his warehouse; altum silentium (not a word of that). Every man rather desires to hide his wealth, and when he is urged is ready to dissemble his ability. No otherwise is it in the true spiritual riches. He that is full of true saving grace and good works affects not to make show of it to the world, but rests sweetly in the comforts of a good conscience and the silent applause of God's Spirit witnessing with his own; while, on the contrary, a venditation of our own worth, or parts, or merits, argues a miserable indigence in them all.

Hall's Occasion, Meditat.

*Quædam melius laudantur silentio quam oratione." —
PLUTARCH.

XCV.—A total deprivation of grace in the heart of man is deplorable.

THE taking back of any good thing doth much amplify the deprivation; but how much more doth it amplify that nothing is left behind? Though the harvest be carried away, yet if there be some gleanings behind; though a tree be cut down, yet if there be a root left in the ground; though the sun go down, yet if it be twilight;—those small remainders of greater goods are no small refreshings to a loser. It doth a man good to keep some monuments of his better estate, especially when they are pledges of some sparkle of goodwill towards us, continuing in Him upon whose just displeasure we forfeited all. Thus, as

Lake, on Pr. li.

God in favour gives the Holy Spirit, so in displeasure doth he take Him away; and we cannot guess better at the measure of His displeasure than by the measure of the deprivation. If He take it but in part, then He tempers mercy with judgment; but if He leave no sparkles of grace that may be kindled again, if there be such a rout made that there is no hopes of rallying, then we become Lo-ruhamah (Hos. i.), we are clean shut out of the bowels of His compassion.

"Miserum est fuisse felicem."

XCVI.—God is the only object of His children's delight.

He that truly loveth his friend transporteth himself often to the place where he was wont to see his friend; he delighteth in reading his letters, and in handling the gages and monuments that he hath left behind him. How grateful is the sight of anything that presents unto him the memorial of his absent friend! And thus the child of God, to testify his love to Him, transporteth himself often to the place where he may find God in His sanctuary, amongst His saints. He delights in reading His letters (the Scriptures), he delights in eating those holy monuments and pledges (the Sacraments), which He hath left behind Him, as tokens of His goodwill, until He come again.

Th. de Trugillo, Theaur. Concinnat.

"Ante omnia in omnibus Deus est."

XCVII.—A peaceable disposition is a God-like disposition.

By the laws of England noblemen have this privilege, that none of them can be bound to the peace, because it is supposed that a noble disposition will never be engaged in brawls and contentions. It is supposed that the peace is always bound to them, and that of their own accord they will be always careful to preserve it. It is the base bramble that rends and tears what is next unto it. Gentleness, mercy, goodness, love, tenderness of other's sufferings, are the greatest ornaments of a noble spirit; and where it is sanctified the grace of God shines bright in such a heart.

Magna Charta Anglie.

XCVIII.—Christ's victory over Satan.

WHEN Mahomet, the second of that name, besieged Belgrade, in Servia, one of the captains at last got upon the wall of the city, with his colours displayed. A noble Bohemian espying this, ran to the captain, and clasping him fast about his middle, asked one Capistranus, standing beneath, whether it would be any danger of damnation to his soul if he should cast himself down headlong with that dog (so he termed the Turkish captain), to be slain with him. Capistranus answered that it was no danger at all to his soul. The Bohemian forthwith tumbled himself down, with the Turk in his arms, and so, by his own death only, saved the life of all the city. Such an exploit as this Christ plays upon the devil. The devil, like the great Turk, besieged not only one city, but even all mankind. Christ alone, like this noble Bohemian, encountered with him; and seeing the case was so, that this dog, the devil, could not be killed stark dead, except Christ died also, therefore He made no reckoning of His own life, but gave Himself to death for us, that He only dying for all the people, by His death our deadly enemy might for ever be destroyed.

Zeigler, de Illust. Viri Germ., cap. ix.

P. Jovii, Hist.

Playfer's Servn.

XCIX.—Propriety in God is the only comfort.

EVERY man naturally loves that which is his own, and if the thing be good, it doth him the more good to look upon it. Let a man walk in a fair meadow, it pleaseth him well; but it will please him much more if it be his own. His eyes will be more curious in prying into every part, and everything will please him the better. So it is in a corn-field, in an orchard, in a house; if they be ours the more contentedly do they affect us, for this word meum is suavissima amoris illecebra (it is as good as an amatory portion). So then, if God the Lord be lovely, how much more lovely should He be in our eyes, if He be our Lord God, and doth appropriate that infinite good that He hath unto us? And who would not joy to be owner of that God which is independent? He is what heart can desire, and who can but rejoice in having Him, in having of whom we can want nothing?

Holdsworth's Ser., I ond., 1627.

C.—Killing of men heretofore made ordinary.

Onuphr. Panvin.,
De Ludi Circens.

THE Romans at the first used to set wild beasts upon the stage to kill one another; and after this they came to be delighted to see gladiators and fencers kill one another; and thirdly, they were much affected to see men cast unto the wild beasts, to be devoured and torn in pieces: so that, from the sight of killing of beasts, they delighted to see men killed. And was not this our case? By swearing and lying, we came at last to killing. Thus were we broken out, and blood touched bloods—bloods in the plural. He that hath killed one careth not to kill a hundred. A dog's neck was formerly cut off with more reluctancy than the precious life of man was taken from him. Killing of men was but sporting, like that of the young men at the pool of Gibeon. Fools make a sport of sin, and so did men of the crying sin of murder. But if the Sword had thus played Rex any longer it would have been bitterness in the end, which God, in the greatness of His mercy, hath of late years prevented.

Hos. iv. 2.
Weemse's Portraiture.

"Homicidarum
condicio fit deplora-rata," &c.

Plutarch, de Legibus.
2 Sam. ii. 26.

CI.—Reverence to be used in the service of God.

Lib. vi.

VALERIUS MAXIMUS tells a story of a young nobleman that attended upon Alexander while he was sacrificing. This nobleman held his censer for incense, and in the holding of it there fell a coal of fire upon his flesh, and burnt it so as the very scent of it was in the nostrils of all that were about him; and because he would not disturb Alexander in his service, he resolutely did not stir to put off the fire from him, but held still the censer. If heathens made such ado in sacrificing to their idol gods, that they would mind it so as no disturbance must be made, whatsoever they endured, what care should we then have of ourselves when we come to worship the high God? Oh that we could mind the duties of God's worship as matters of high concernment, as things of greatest consequence, that so we might learn to sanctify the name of our God in the performance of duty more than ever we have done!

Burrough's Heart-Divisions.

"Templa petas supplex," &c.

CII.—The condition of temporizers.

Plin. Hist. Nat.,
lib. vii., cap. 38.

It is observable that the hedgehog hath two holes in his siege, one towards the south, another towards the north. Now, when the southern wind blows he stops up that hole, and turns him northward; and then when the north wind blows he stops up that hole likewise, and turns himself southward again. Such urchins, such hedgehogs, are all time-servers: they do all things for the time, but nothing for the truth; they believe for a time, as long as the warm sun shines on them, but as soon as any storm of persecution ariseth, by and by they have a starting hole to hide themselves in; they turn faces about, and change their religion with the time.

Playfor's Serm.

"Tempora mutantur et nos mutamur," &c.

CIII.—God doth not only deliver, but also comfort His children.

THE eagle doth sometimes carry her young ones only from a dangerous to a safer nest ; sometimes she rouseth them out of their sloth, and directs them where they may find their prey. Even so dealeth God with His children : He freeth them from danger, and bringeth them to comfort. He did not only bear the Israelites on the eagle's wings of protection, which showed a deliverance from evil, but He brought them to Himself, which showed a bestowing of good.

Aldrovand., Ornitholog.

Lake, on Exod. xix.

CIV.—How a man is said to pray continually.

THOUGH in the old law the priest did not continually offer sacrifices unto the Lord, yet fire was continually burning upon the altar, and never went out. So, though we do not continually offer to God the calves of our lips, yet the fire of devotion and spiritual fervency must continually be burning in our hearts, and never go out. And this is the true meaning of the apostle's exhortation, "Pray continually ;" not pray continually with the tongue, as though that should never lie still, but pray continually, meaning with that part which doth indeed never lie still, except we be still, and that's the heart.

Lev. vi. 12.
Baker, on the Lord's Prayer.

1 Thess. v. 17.

CV.—A bad reformation of a Church is the deformation of the Church.

It was the complaint of the Emperor Adrian, when he lay a-dying, " Many physicians have destroyed the emperor," meaning that their contrary conceits and different directions had hastened his death, and cut him off before his time. Just thus there are many censurers and correctors of our not sick, but sound religion, approved by the Sacred Scriptures, and attended by the blood of many faithful martyrs. There are so many reformers and rectifiers, of all ages, sexes, and degrees, of all professions and trades, that take upon them to order our Church according to the crooked line of their own several imaginations, that they have almost reduced all things in it into a chaos and confusion, and so spoiled and defaced one of the most complete Churches for doctrine and discipline, decency and order, now extant in the Christian world.

Xyphilin., in Adriano.

Woodnoth's New Descant on Old Records.

CVI.—Carnal pleasure to be changed into spiritual pleasure.

It is reported of one Leonides, a captain, who, perceiving his soldiers left their watch upon the city walls, and did nothing all the day long but quaff and tipple in ale-houses near adjoining, commanded that the ale-houses should be removed from that place where they stood, and be set up close by the walls, that, seeing the soldiers would never keep out of them, at the least they might watch as well as drink in them. So, because we itch after delight and pleasure, we must needs have, and we cannot be kept from it. God hath appointed that we should take delight enough, and yet serve Him never a whit the less ; for it is no part of God's meaning, when we enter into His sweet service, that we should be debarred of all delight, but only that we should change the cause of our delight, delight of the service of sin, into a delight in the service of God. Isaac must not be sacrificed, but the ram ; all rammish and rank delight of the world, not Isaac—i. e., all spiritual laughter, all ghostly joys, all heavenly delight and pleasure.

Cælius, lib. xix., cap. 6.
Ælian, Varior. Hist., lib. iii., cap. 14.

Playfer's Serm.

"Deo servire libertas est."
Hieron., in Eplis.
ad Simplicianum.

CVII.—The manifestation of God in several respects.

THE sun doth manifest itself first by day-light, and that is common to all who dwell in the same horizon unto which the sun is risen. Some have more than day-light ; they have also the shining light of the sun, which is not in all places where day-light is. Finally, the sun is manifest in the heavens in his full strength, for the body is present there, which none can endure but the stars, which become glorious bodies by that special presence of the sun amongst them. In like manner God, in whom all things live and move and have their being, doth manifest Himself unto some by the works of His general providence, of which St. Paul speaks, "God left not Himself without witness," &c. This manifestation of God is like the day-light; it is common to all, it is a universal grace—"The eyes of all things look up unto Thee," &c. There is a second manifestation, and that is more particular but to some only; it is like the sunshine, it is that manifestation which God vouchsafeth to His Church, of which Isaiah speaketh, "Arise, shine, for thy light is come," &c.; for, in comparison of the Church, the rest of the world sitteth in darkness and in the shadow of death. The third and last manifestation is that which God maketh of Himself in heaven to the angels and saints, the clearest and fullest whereof a creature is capable; and those which partake this presence of God become thereby glorious saints, more glorious than the stars, which receive their resplendent lustre from the aspect which they have to the sun's body: so that it seems there are those who are in better case than we are, and there are those who are in worse, and therefore we must thank God for our present advancement, and remember that we make forward unto that nearness to God which is reserved for us in the heavens.

Lake, on Exod. xix.

Acts xiv. 17.

Ps. cxlv. 15.

Isa. lx. 1.

"Sorte tua contentus abi."

CVIII.—The seven sacraments of the Papists not of Divine institution.

Matt. xiv. 17.

Boyl's Petill,

WHEN Christ feasted that great multitude with five loaves and two fishes, it is observed that the five loaves were of the baker's making and the two fishes of God's making. The papists stiffly maintain seven sacraments in their Church—viz., baptism, the eucharist, matrimony, orders, penance, confirmation, and extreme unction: but most sure it is, that the two first only are of God's making; in the other five appears the knavery of the baker. They are of the Pope's making and not of God's.

CIX.—Christian liberty abused by the sectarian party.

Herodot. Hist., lib. iii.

Woodnoth's New Search on Old Records.

"Quod liceat necinus adhuc, et cuncta licere, credimus."—AUSON.

CAMBYSES demanding of his counsellors whether he might not marry his sister by the law of the land, they answered that they found no law that allowed a brother to marry a sister, but one that permitted the King of the Persians to do as he list. Thus our proud, peevish, sectarian libertines, impatient of government, a rebellious and obstinate people, cannot in all the Scripture find any sound or seeming proof for their foul rebellions against lawful authority; neither can their false prophets, their chief counsellors, find out any such places for them; but therefore they use, in a wrong sense, so to enlarge and amplify the great benefit of our Christian liberty, the which, indeed, is a freedom from all hellish, slavish fear, but not from a holy and son-like fear—a freedom from the curse, but not from the obedience; from the damnatory, but not from the preceptory part of the law—that they have now made simple people, little seen in heavenly matters, believe that the reins lie loose upon every Christian's neck, and they left to their own disposal, that there is a liberty purchased for Christians, a quidlibet audendi, to do what every man liketh, and to live under no obedience to governors, whether ecclesiastical or civil.

CX.—How to take pleasure safely.

Claudius Viexmont.

HE that handles a hedgehog takes him by the heel and not by the head, otherwise he may chance to beshrew his fingers; for, though it seem to be but a poor silly creature, not likely to do any great harm, yet it is full of bristles or prickles, whereby it may annoy a man very much. Thus must we take pleasures, not by the head, but by the heel, considering not the beginning, but the ending of them, for they may seem to be little, or nothing, dangerous at the first, yet afterwards, as with bristles or prickles, they will pierce through the very conscience with pains intolerable.

"Nocet emptā dolore voluptas."

CXI.—The secrets of God's counsels not to be pryed into.

THE Israelites' charge is, they must not presume to go up to the mount. And, indeed, a boundary were no boundary if it might be passed. A man knows by his ground that an enclosure is no enclosure if it may be common; but how much more must this be conceived of the enclosure of God, that ground which He hath fenced unto Himself for a sanctuary? We must take heed, then, of profaning the sanctuary of God, and venturing in sacred things, further than He giveth leave. Curiosity in this kind hath been the mother of heresies, when men have been busily witty in searching into, rather than believing of, that profound article of the creed concerning God the Father. Man, that is not able to understand his own nature (David confesseth such knowledge is too wonderful for him), dreameth that he can comprehend the nature of God; others have lost themselves whilst they have dived into the mysteries of the Incarnation, who are not able to understand their own regeneration. Thus they busy themselves, as some have done, to know where Lazarus's soul was when his body lay three days in the grave, and, in the meantime, care not what becomes of their own souls; so that, what with the curious cur (why?) of some and quomodo (how?) of others, there have been manifold passing the bounds, climbing the mount, and intrusions upon God and the things of God. There hath been a great deal of foolish knowledge in the world, prying into God's ark, inquiring into things not revealed; so that, as there needs a spur unto good and saving knowledge, so a bridle to restrain and keep men in from that knowledge which is curious and presumptuous; and blessed is that discretion which maketh wise to sobriety.

Lake's Sermon on Exod. xix.

Ps. cxxxix. 6.

"Quia Deus occulta esse voluit non sunt scrutanda."

Prosper., de Vicit Gentium.

"Tuā quod nihil refert percentari de sinas."—TER.

Rom. xii.

CXII.—Ministers to be wise master-builders.

HE that hath an house to build will not admit of every workman that offereth his help or that is commended by others, or will labour cheapest; but he will be sure to have the most experienced, the most able workman. Thus it was when the tabernacle of God was to be built, they took not tag and rag from amongst the refuse of the congregation, but such as were filled with the Spirit of God, in wisdom, in understanding, in knowledge, and in all workmanship. And shall we then choose or commend to the ministry, to the spiritual building of the house of God, every cobbler and bungler, insufficient, illiterate persons, either Jeroboam's priests, that were of the lowest of the people, or such as Eli's sons, who were the lewdest of the people.

Atterso, on Philistines.

1 Kings xii. 31.
"Qui ordinant indignos eadem subiacent pennis."
Chrysost., de Dignit. Sacerdot.

CXIII.—Parity in the Church or State not to be admitted.

LYCURGUS being importuned to establish a popular estate amongst the Lacedemonians, that so the least and the meanest, and most unfit to rule, might bear like sway with the greatest and wisest, fitly answered that he who most desired it should begin it first at home, in his own house, presuming that in a private house or family parity would never be liked. And thus there have been* some, both in Church and commonwealth, that so earnestly longed for equality in the one, and parity in the other, that they would no longer dispute for it, but fell to fight for it; and since they could not bring it in with their tongues, they would therefore take help of their hands. But it were to be wished, that all so minded would Plutarch, Moral.

Woodnoth ut antea.

* The Levelling Party.

"Ordine servato, mundus servatur."
—LUCAN.

Can. vi. 4.
Rom. xiii.

learn some wit from Lycurgus in their anger, and first weigh in judgment, by the poise of wisdom, in the balance of indifferency, hanging upon the beam and rule of right, the inconvenience of pulling down all officers and setting up community of rule in an army, and then consider whether the like equal masterdom may be justly put upon the Church, which is an army with banners, or such a level flatted upon the face of the commonwealth, which is to consist of governors and governed.

CXIV.—The true Christian's hopes of Heaven.

* Founder of the great Library at Oxon.

Playfer's Serm.

Job xix. 9.
"Alii flammis exusti, alii ferro perempti," &c.—EUSEB., Hist., lib. viii., cap. 11, 12.
Heb. xi.

"Credula vitam spes fovet, et melius cras fore semper ait."

"Manet altera (cælo)."
Rev. ii. 10.
2 Tim. iv. 8.
1 Cor. ix. 15.

SIR THOMAS BODLEY,* that great advancer of learning, did give for his arms three crowns, with this posy, "Quarta perennis erit," as if he should have said, "These three crowns which I bear in my coat are but the difference of my house and gentry; but 'Quarta perennis erit,' the fourth crown, which I look for in heaven, shall be everlasting and immortal. That fourth, though it be but one crown, yet shall be worth all those three crowns; yea, three thousand more than such as those are: the fourth shall be eternal." Thus it is that the men of this world may abound in such things as may make them seem more excellent than their neighbours, may be crowned with rosebuds, with outward pomp and splendour; but this crown, if not taken off their heads by violence, will fall of itself by mortality, and then there's an end of all their hopes and honours both together. Now, the state of many of the dearest of God's children here in this life is not usually so eminent and illustrious: they wander up and down in sheep-skins and goat-skins, are made a by-word, a laughing-stock, the drunkard's song; and, instead of roses, they are crowned with thorns, and, for the testimony of a good conscience, many times with martyrdom. Yet here's their comfort, that there is a crown of life, of righteousness, immortal, incorruptible, laid up for them in the highest heavens, which God the righteous Judge will set upon their heads in that day when all their enemies shall be clothed in shame and confusion of face for ever.

CXV.—What true repentance is.

Lake's Sermon on Luke iii.

"Scelerum si bene pœnitet," &c.—
HOR.

SIN is an aversion from God and conversion to the world; repentance, therefore, must shake off the world and embrace God. Nazianzen sets it forth in a very fit resemblance, comparing the soul to a pair of writing tables, out of which must be washed whatsoever was written with sin, and, instead thereof, must be entered the writing of grace. Both these are necessary in true repentance. God hath dedicated both parts in His own repentance, for, as when He repenteth of the evil intended against us, He doth not only give over to hate us, but also He doth embrace us with love. Even so, when we repent of our sins against God, we must not only cease for to hate Him, but begin to love Him also.

CXVI.—Content a great blessing of God.

To status.

Burrough's Heart-Divisions,
Exod. xvi. 20.

ONE observes concerning manna, when the people were contented with the allowance that God gave them, then it was very good; but when they would not be content with God's allowance, but would be gathering more, then, says the text, "there were worms in it." So, when we are content with our conditions, and that which God disposeth of us to be in, there's a blessing in it; but if we must needs be reaching out for more than God hath allotted, or to keep it longer than God would have us to have it, then there will be worms in it, a canker to eat it, a moth to fret it—nothing at all that is good.

CXVII.—Not to envy each others gifts or preferment.

It is said of one Pelaretus, a Lacedemonian, that standing for a place of credit, to be one of the three hundred, which was a degree of honour at Sparta, and missing it, though a man highly deserving, yet he was so far from complaining or grudging or grieving thereat, that when others marvelled at his contentment and inquired of his reason, he told them he rejoiced at the happiness of that commonwealth that it had three hundred men more worthy to govern than himself. But how many are there, in these times of clearer judgment, wherein it is apparently known that true godliness teacheth every man contentment who move in that orb where God hath placed them, and in that portion that God hath given them? As sore eyes are offended at clear lights, so they fret at the brightness of other men's fortunes, virtues, and prosperity, and envy other men's wealth or honour. How many rage and storm like Æolus, not that three hundred, nor three, but some one eminent person, is preferred before them!

Plut., Apophthegm.

"Alterius rebus non macrescit opimis,

Woodnoth, *ut
ante.*
"Invidie, quid suspiras? Proprium ne malum, an alienum bonum?"—BASIL.

CXVIII.—Riches have wings.

It is a term amongst falconers, that if a hawk fly high "she lessens." "Oh, she lessens!" saith the falconer; but if she soar yet higher, then he cries out, "Oh, she vanisheth! she vanisheth!" And it is now found to be true, by sad and woeful experience, that riches are upon the wing, and have of late, by one means or other, taken such a flight out of many men's purses, that they have lessened and lessened every day more and more, and are now at present, by the continuance of time, even as good as quite vanished.

Fuller's Serm.,
Lond., 1647.

CXIX.—Rulers and governors are the supporters of a commonwealth.

THERE is a generation of men that are murmurers and mutineers, such as speak evil of authority and do withdraw their necks from obedience, upon this ground, that superiors live by the sweat of the inferiors' brows, being themselves devoid of care. Their quarrel is like that in the apologue. The outward members of the body fell out against the stomach: they complained of his laziness and their own painfulness, and therefore conspired to starve him, and ease themselves: they even discovered their folly, for soon after their hands began to faint, and the legs to falter, and the whole body to pine; then, and not till then, they perceived that the stomach, which they condemned as lazy, laboured for them all, and that they were beholden to the labour of the stomach that themselves had any strength to labour. So it is in the body politic. Though the state of the prince or ruler be supported by the commons, yet the spring of the commonwealth is the providence of the prince; and soon will the streams dry if that fountain be dammed up.

Plutarch, in Carle-lar.
Val. Max., lib. viii.,
cap. 9.

Menenius Agrippa.

Lake's Serm., on
Isa. ix.

"Non populus causa gubernatoris, sed gubernator," &c.—PLATO apud Foliat.

CXX.—The Devil, a deceiver, deceived by Christ.

A FISHERMAN, when he casts his angle into the river, doth not throw the hook in bare, naked, and uncovered, for then he knows the fish will never bite, and therefore he hides the hook within a worm, or some other bait, and so the fish, biting at the worm, is caught by the hook. Thus Christ, speaking of Himself, saith, "Ego vermis et non homo." He, coming to perform the great work of our redemption, did cover and hide His Godhead within the worm of His human nature. The grand water serpent, Leviathan, the devil, thinking to swallow the worm of His humanity, was caught upon the hook of His divinity. This hook stuck in his jaws, and tore him very sore. By thinking to destroy Christ, he destroyed his own kingdom and lost his own power for ever.

Andrew's Serm.,
Lond., 1616.

Ps. xxii. 6.

Greg. Nyssen, Ora t.
cap. 23.
Job. xli. 1.

CXXI.—A young raw minister is blameworthy.

Laert. Diogen., in Vita.

Frasm., in Adag. ex Suida.
Woodnoth, ut antea.

"Quis homo est
tanta confidentia ut sacerdotium," &c.
—PLAUT., Rud.

"Barbarus has segetes!" —VIRGIL.

PYTHAGORAS bound all those whom he received into his school to five years' silence, that they might not fly nor be chirping on every hedge, before they were fledged; that as soon as ever they crept from the shell they might not aspire to the housetop; that their tongues might not run before their wits; that they might hear sufficiently before they spake boldly. And so strong was his αὐτός ἔφα, so much did his word prevail with them, that faithfully and constantly they obeyed his commandments. Many tutors nowadays, though wiser and better than Pythagoras, yet, seeing their young ones too forward to make wing, cannot possibly beat them back into the nest, cannot keep their pupils within the limits of learners five years, no, nor four years, till they have taken some degree in schools; but they must needs, in all haste, take upon them the sacred profession of God's Word; and not only some thin, obscure, ignorant roguel, some parishes of the country, but Jerusalem and the chief cities, the greatest congregations, and most knowing people, must take notice of their ripe and rare intelligence, in their own, though raw in other men's, opinions. Being drunken with pride, they delight to be seen in the most public assemblies, as there are some that must needs show themselves in the market or fair, being drunken with wine or some meaner liquor.

CXXII.—The blessed Trinity co-operate in the righteous man's prayer.

Alphons. ab Avendano, in Matt. v.

Rom. viii. 34.

If a great king should encourage a poor man in his suit, and say unto him, "Alas! poor man, I perceive thy distress; do but draw up thy petition, and I will give thee a satisfactory answer," this would be a ground of great hope; but if he shall say, "Go to my secretary, and bid him draw it up thus and thus, and in this manner," would not this be a matter of greater comfort? Yea; but if he shall say to the prince, his son, standing by him, "Do you present this poor man's petition into my hands," what unspeakable comfort must this needs be! And just thus God dealeth with His children: God heareth our prayers, the blessed Spirit draweth them up, and Jesus Christ, the Son of God, presenteth them to His Father. Without all doubt, great is the comfort of that poor soul that can, by prayer, have two or three walks a day upon this Mount Tabor, and, with holy Moses, converse with God in three Persons, on the Horeb of fervent prayer; for then, with Jacob, he sees the sweet vision of angels ascending and descending, climbing up and down that sacred ladder, which stands betwixt heaven and earth. At the top of it is the Father, the whole length of it is in the Son, and the Spirit doth firmly fasten it thereunto.

CXXIII.—Christ's government is a peaceable government.

Annal., lib. iii.
Xyphilin. Hist.

Lake's Sermon on Jas. ix.

"Divus Nerva," saith Tacitus, "duas res olim insatiabiles conjunxit, imperium et libertatem." He spake with the most, that ascribed so much to Nerva, as that he should join two such inconvertible things as government and liberty: the one calling for subjection, the other intending nothing but disorder. But it may be truly said of Christ, that His kingdom is a kingdom of peace; His service, perfect freedom; that where He reigns there is peace and free liberty for every subject; so sweetly, so freely, so comfortably, are all things carried where the sceptre of Christ is set up in the hearts of men.

CXXIV.—Alms given to the poor are the giver's gain.

Relation di Betero.

THEIR ordinary form of begging in Italy is not after the manner of our English, "I pray you bestow something on a poor man," &c., but "Fate ben per voi (Do good for your own sakes)." So those that are courteous and tender-hearted towards others, ἐαυτοῖς χαρίζονται, they gratify themselves, saith the mouth of Truth. The Lord that fed five thousand could always have fed Himself and His disciples, but He would be relieved by the hands of women, that so their charity towards Him might be an occasion of benefit to themselves. And so it is with us. We pleasure not the poor so much by our giving as we profit ourselves by their receiving.

Tatevil's Enneas, Ephes. iv. 32.
Matt. xiv. 15.

John iv. 7.

CXXV.—Officers to be honest in their places.

ISOCRATES, an Athenian orator, in his counsel to Demonicus, a young gentleman like to be called to a great place, saith unto him thus, Ἐκ τῶν κοινῶν ἐπιμελειῶν ἀπαλλαττοῦν, &c., that he should depart from a place or office conferred upon him, μὴ πλουσιώτερος ἀλλ' ἐνδόξοτερος, not more rich, but more honourable, than when he first undertook it. The instruction given by this heathen may shame many Christians. Some officers in these days regard not with what dishonour or dishonesty they keep or leave their places, so they may be rich; never fear, though they tread their wine out of other men's grapes, reap their corn out of other men's fields, so they may store their own houses with provision. So they may make their children great and turn them into gallants, they take no care, make no scruple, though they turn their own souls into hell.

In Orat. ad Demonicum.

Woodnoth, ut antea.

"Quocunque modo rem."
"Per fas et nefas."

CXXVI.—Prosperity of wicked men destructive.

It is said of the locusts that came out of the bottomless pit, that they were like unto horses, and on their heads were, as it were, crowns of gold, and their faces were, as it were, faces of men, and their hair, as the hair of a woman, and their teeth were, as it were, the teeth of lions, &c. Here are quasi horses, quasi crowns of gold, quasi faces of men, &c. Just such are all the comforts and prosperity of wicked men: their gold and their silver but, as it were, gold and silver, their prosperity and plenty but, as it were, prosperity and plenty, their victories and success but, as it were, victories and success. But when the blessed evangelist comes to set down a description of the locusts' tails, he doth not say there were, as it were, stings in their tails, but in plain, downright, positive terms, there were stings in their tails—real, true, not imaginary, stings. And such is the evil that attends upon the thriving and prosperous estate of wicked men, there is a sting in the tail of it, such as is not quasi, but realiter—what it seems to be.

Faucci's Serm.,
Lond., 1646.

Rev. ix.

"Prospera hujus mundi asperitatem habent veram," &c.
—AUG., Ep. xxxvi.

CXXVII.—No peace to the wicked.

"There is no peace unto the wicked, saith my God." The prophet compares them to the sea, still raging and foaming, casting out their own shame; and Solomon unto vanity adds vexation of spirit. It may be seen in the particular case of all wicked men, that surely they have no rest—no rest ab intra; they never can light on that which doth sistere appetitum, which makes them range in their desires, in their endeavours, never finding where to settle. And ab extra, too, they are unquiet, for the whirlwind of God scatters them like chaff, and like a flood it drives them down the stream. And, indeed, how should they be quiet, that are compared to the sea, which, when there is no storm, cannot stand still, but hath its flux and reflux? And no wonder; for it is the subject of the moon, than which nothing is more changeable—a fit emblem of the world, upon which whosoever dependeth cannot be stable, when the world itself is so unsteadfast. And such is a wicked man too—unstable, uncertain, disquieted, distracted, in all his ways.

Isa. lvii. 21.

Lake's Serm., on
Jin. ix.

"De vitio rotantur in vitium."— GREG., in Psalm penit.

CXXVIII.—Rulers' actions exemplary.

Hardy's Serm. at Westminster.

"Regis ad exemplum," &c.

If the mountains overflow with waters, the valleys are the better; and if the head be full of ill humours, the whole body fares the worse. The actions of rulers are, most commonly, rules for the people's actions, and their example passeth as current as their coin. If a peasant meet luxury in a scarlet robe, he dares be such, having so fair a cloak for it. The common people are like tempered wax, easily receiving impressions from the seals of great men's vices: they care not to sin by prescription, and damn themselves with authority. And it is the unhappy privilege of greatness to warrant by example others' as well as its own sins, whilst the unadvised vulgar take up crimes on trust and perish by credit.

CXXIX.—Peace of the Church precious.

Ambrose, Epist., tom. 5.

Woodnoth, ut antea.

"Quocunque modo rem."

ST. AMBROSE writeth, that Theodosius the emperor, when he died, had a greater care of the Church than of his sickness: his life was not dear unto him, so the Church might flourish after his death, so peace might be within her walls, and prosperity within her palaces. Such ought to be the care of every good Christian, to pray for the peace, to act for the peace, to contend for the peace of the Church. But so it is, that if men may enjoy health and obtain plenty for the back and belly, wax rich and great, and live like emperors, no matter which way religion turneth, no matter how the Church fareth, either for the future or the present; how it goeth with the Church they respect little, so themselves and their families may go on; nay, which is yet a worse symptom, and bewrayeth the great power of Satan over them, what scruple at all do they make to pill, and spoil and rob the Church, so as they may enrich themselves and their families thereby?

CXXX.—Public men to have public spirit.

Plutarch, in Vita et in Apophthegm.

"Sudandum est iis qui magistratum gerunt," &c.—CIC., pro Scith.

PLUTARCH recordeth an excellent speech of Pelopidas when going out of his house to the wars. His wife came to take her leave of him, and, with tears in her eyes, prays him to look to himself. "Oh, my good wife," said he, "it is for private soldiers to be careful of themselves, not for those in public place: they must have an eye to save other men's lives." Such a spirit becomes every man in public place. Flesh and blood will be apt to prompt a man that it is good to sleep in a whole skin—why should a man hazard himself, and bring himself into danger? But let such know, that men in public places are to have public spirit, and to take notice, that though there be more danger by standing in the gap than getting behind the hedge, yet it is best to be where God looks for them to be.

CXXXI.—Every man to be employed in his calling.

Luke's Serm. on Isa., ix.

1 Pet. iv. 10.

No creature, though destitute of reason, but keepeth his course—they let us see in their working whereto they were ordained: the sun giveth his light, the fire his heat, the water moistness, the earth beareth fruit. In all creatures may be read this lesson, "Deus et natura nihil faciunt frustra." And if creatures void of reason do so, much more should those that are endued with reason not wrap up their talent in a napkin, and hide it; but, as St. Peter adviseth, "Every one as he hath received the gift, so he must dispose it."

CXXXII.—Death strips us of all outward things.

SALADIN, a Turkish emperor, he that first of that nation conquered Jerusalem, lying at the point of death after many glorious victories, commanded that a white sheet should be borne before him to his grave upon the point of a spear, with this proclamation, "These are the rich spoils which Saladin carrieth away with him of all his triumphs and victories. Of all the riches and realms that he had, now nothing at all is left but this sheet." Why, then, should we desire so much after other men's goods, and seek to get them by hook and by crook? Why should we devour houses, even widows' houses? Why should we encroach upon other men's fields, and seek unlawfully to join land to land, calling the lands after our own names, entailing them upon children's children, to make (as the lawyers speak) a perpetuity, when, at last, if we could conquer ever so much, rake and scrape up all that we can reach, we must come to the pit with Saladin, and carry nothing away with us but a shrouding mantle?

Coccus Sabellic, En., lib. ix., 5.

Bergomensis, lib. xii.
Platina, in Celestin.
30.
Woodnoth, ut antea.

"Omnia mors æquat."—CLAU-DIAN.

CXXXIII.—Selfishness condemned.

THERE is a story of a fool, who, being left in a chamber and the door locked when he was asleep, after he awoke and found the door fast, and all the people gone, he cried out at the window, "Oh, myself, myself! oh, myself!" Such fools have we now amongst us in these self-seeking days. Nothing but self is in men's thoughts, in their hearts, and all their endeavours; self-ends, self-policy, like that of Israel, an empty vine, that brings forth fruit to herself. All seek their own, not the things of God; and it were just with God to leave such men to themselves hereafter, that look so much to themselves here in this world.

Marshal's Serm.,
London, 1644.

Hos. x. 1.
Phil. ii. 27.

CXXXIV.—To bless God for the peace of conscience.

WHEN the Romans, by conquest, might have given law to the Grecians at Corinth, in the solemn time of the Isthmian games, their general, by an herald, unexpectedly proclaimed freedom to all the cities of Greece. The proclamation at first did so amaze the Grecians, that they did not believe it to be true; but when it was proclaimed the second time, they gave such a shout, that the very birds flying in the air were astonished therewith, and fell dead to the ground. But, if you will have a better story, take that of the Jews, who, when at first they heard of Cyrus's proclamation, and that the Lord thereby had turned the captivity of Sion, they confess that, at the first hearing of it, they were like men that dreamt; but afterwards their mouths were filled with laughter, and their tongues with singing. Now, the peace that the Grecians and the Jews had was but the peace of a people, or a nation, and a great blessing of God too. But how much more reason is there that our affections should be strained to the highest pitch of joy and thanks, when we hear of the proclamation of the peace of conscience?—that peace, which is not of our bodies, but of our souls; not of our earthly, but of our heavenly estate—a peace that shall be begun here and shall endure for ever hereafter; such a peace as will make God at peace with us, reconcile us to ourselves, and make us at concord with all the world.

Livius, in Hist.

Ps. cxxvi.

Lake's Serm., on Hag. i.

CXXXV.—A foreign enemy to be prevented.

FABIUS MAXIMUS kept aloof from the Carthaginian army, upon a high hill, till he saw that Hannibal had worsted Minutius in the plain; but then he falleth upon him, and routs Livii Det. iii., lib.

12.

"Nihil vel parvum hostile à tergo sit relinquendum."—
Nat. Com., lib. xvi.

Featly's Serm.

all his troops: whereupon Hannibal uttered that memorable speech, "I ever feared that the cloud which hovered so long on the hills would, in the end, pour down and give us a sad shower." The case is ours: we are together by the ears on the plain, as to the matter of judgment especially; but Fabius is upon the hill. There is a considerable party upon the mountains, a foreign enemy that hath an eye upon our divisions, and, if not prevented, may, in all likelihood, by the reason of our sins, be the destruction of us.

CXXXVI.—Husbands to bear with the wife's infirmity.

Shute, Hagar and Sarah.

Rom. xv.

Exod. iv. 25.

1 Kings xxi.

1 Pet. iii. 7.

PRECIOUS things, whereof we make account, the weaker they be, the more tenderly and charily they are to be handled, as china dishes and crystal glasses, and the like. Of all parts of the body, the eye is most tenderly used and touched. Now, what things, what persons are more precious than a wife? and yet withal a weak vessel, and therefore to be borne withal. As the husband is the stronger, so he must bear with the infirmities of the weak. The language of Zipporah was not so rough to Moses as his was smooth to her; Ahab replies not to the upbraiding words of Jezebel; and they that do otherwise may look big, and stand upon their headship and authority, but the wisdom that should be in such heads, as to dwell with their wives according to knowledge, is much to be questioned. And certainly, this is not to bear with the weaker vessel, but rather to crush and shatter what they should but tenderly touch.

CXXXVII.—The time of repentance not to be deferred.

Preston's Covenant of God with Man.

"Tolle moras:
semper nocuit differre," &c.—LUCAN.

THE chariot-wheels when they run, the second runs near the first all the day long, but never overtakes it. In a clock the second minute follows the first, but never reacheth it. So it is with all cunctators in religion, such as defer the time of repentance, as the doing of it now and now, and to-morrow and to-morrow. Now, these little distances deceive us and delude us: we think to do it in a short time, and by reason of the nearness and vicinity of the time we think we shall do it easily, that we can take hold of that time. But it is not so: we are served just as grasshoppers and butterflies deceive children when they think to lay their hand upon them; they hop a little further and a little further, so that at last they take them not at all. And thus do we cozen ourselves. We lose our life, we lose our opportunity of grace, thinking that we may take it when we please.

CXXXVIII.—Satan's endeavour to hinder the hearing of God's Word.

Featly's Clavis Mystica.

MARK the jailors, they often suffer their prisoners to have their hands and feet free; neither are they in any fear that they will make an escape, so long as the prison doors are sure locked and fast barred. Thus dealeth Satan with those men that he holdeth in his captivity: he letteth them sometimes have their hands at liberty to reach out an alms to the poor, and sometimes their feet at liberty to go to church, to hear the Word preached; but he will be sure to keep their ears, which are the gates and doors of their soul, so fast made up, that they shall hear nothing to their comfort; and if they do, it shall be to little purpose.

CXXXIX.—The minister's authority should be as much looked on as his sufficiency.

Two things are considerable in a minister: his sufficiency and his authority. The people listen much to his sufficiency, but take little heed to his authority; and therefore come they to church rather to judge than to be judged, forgetting that many may be as skilful but none can be so powerful in binding and loosing as is the minister. A judge or a justice of peace may have less law in him than a private man, but he hath much more power, and they that appear before him regard his acts according to his power: so should it be in the Church. But men fear the magistrates that are under earthly kings, because the pains which they inflict are corporal; our hands, our feet, feel their manacles and fetters. And did but our souls as truly feel, as indeed they should, the pastor's binding and loosing of them, we would make more account of those offices than we do. And it were good we did so, for they so bind as that they can loose again; but if we neglect them, when our Lord and Master cometh He will command all contemners so to be bound hand and foot that they shall never be loosed again.

Lake's Serm. on Haggai ii.

"Sententia excommunicationis pastoris metuenda est."
—GREG., in Regist.

CXL.—Self-praises condemned.

CATO the elder had those commendations given him by consent which none in his time was thought fit to deserve (except it were one), to be optimus orator, optimus senator, et optimus imperator (a most singular orator, a most singular statesman, and a most singular general). And yet this so singular a man was so much given to boast himself, that his veriest friends were ashamed of him. And there was Tully, too, a man so excellently qualified that none but a Tully—that is, one admirably eloquent—was sufficient to speak his worth; and yet that is not unremembered by them, who were willing to conceal a blemish in him, that his speech, which flowed from him as sweet as the honey, he made to taste as bitter as wormwood many times by the interlacing of his own praises. But these were such as saw God only by the dim light of nature, therefore the more excusable. What, then, shall become of them that know their Master's will? such as by the sunshine of the Gospel cannot but discern that "he who is the greatest ought to account himself as the least;" that "it is not for the wise man to glory in his wisdom, nor the strong man to glory in his strength, nor the rich man to glory in his riches; but for him that glorieth, to glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth God, who is the giver of all things;" yet expiscari famam are never in the right cue till, mountebank-like, they are exposing themselves in their own worth upon every stage. Surely such a wise man will prove a fool, such a strong man will turn his back, such a rich man will scratch a beggar by the head, when God shall call for an account of their stewardship, and reckon with them for what they have received.

Plinii Hist.

Plutarch, in Apophtegm.
Id., in Cicerone.

Fulgous, lib. viii., cap. 15.

Smith's Serm.

Luke ix. 48.

Jer. ix. 23.

"Hoc faciunt stulti quos gloria vexat inanis."

CXLI.—Complaint of the want of faith is an argument of true faith.

THERE is mention made of a melancholy person who was so strongly possessed, that he complained he had no head, nor could be otherwise persuaded than by that course which Philotimus, a learned physician, took with him, when he caused to be made a cap of lead, very weighty and heavy, and the same to be put upon his head, that, feeling the weight thereof upon his head, he might be persuaded he had a head. Thus it is with weak Christians: their complaint of the want of faith is an argument of the being of their faith, wherein, like this melancholic, they think they want that which indeed they have. And the same cure would do well with them that was fitted for him; lay upon them no other burden but Treatise of Melancholy, p. 215.

Negus's Treatise of Obedienc.

the weight of their own burden, the burden of holy sorrow and grief, and doubtful despair for their wanting of faith (as themselves do deem), which is so weighty, as they are like to sink under it; yet that being laid upon the head of their faith, they may be asked whether they feel any such weight, and are pressed under the heavy burden of the same, which, if they be, let them never doubt more but that they have faith, and their faith hath both head and heart too; that hath life in it which moveth the sense, and causeth that feeling, and worketh that holy grief and sorrow so to complain, the whole soul being quickened thereby throughout, and all the graces of God's Spirit that are therein.

CXLII.—Conversion of heathens to be endeavoured.

THERE lies a great guilt upon Christian states, and this amongst the rest, that they have not been careful to bring them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death to the knowledge of Jesus Christ. Much travelling there is to the Indies, East and West; but wherefore? Some go to possess themselves of the lands of the infidels, but most for commerce, and by commerce to grow richer by their goods. But where is the prince or state that pitieth their souls, and without any worldly respect endeavours the gaining of them unto God? Some show there is that way, but a very poor one; it is but παρέργον, an accessory to our worldly desire: ἐργον it is not; it is not our primary intention: whereas Christ's method is, primum querite, &c. If the apostles and apostolic men had affected our salvation no more, we might have continued till this day, such as sometimes we were, barbarous subjects to the prince of darkness.

CXLIII.—Want of love is the cause of all our sorrows.

ST. PAUL prayed that the Philippians' love might abound more and more; and he exhorted also the Hebrews, "Let brotherly love continue." But in these uncharitable days of ours, the exhortation may be cast into a new mould, Let brotherly love begin; for, were it but begun, there could not be so many quarrels, so many sects, so many factions, so many broils, such envy, hatred, and malice, as is at this day to be found amongst us.

CXLIV.—Uncertainty of the multitude.

NONE ever more faithful in God's house than Moses, none deeper in God's Book, none more graced with miracles, none more careful of the people's good, and none more honoured by the people than himself was, yet, if the people be but once distressed and straitened in their provisions, they will put down Moses and set up a new governor. How did the people at the first entertain Paul? Even as an angel of light, and were ready to pull out their eyes and to give them to him to do him good; but after they had once hearkened to seducers, then was St. Paul no longer a father to them, but an enemy; and instead of plucking out their own eyes to do him good, they seemed forward enough to pluck out St. Paul's eyes, to do their false apostles a pleasure. Nay, had not Christ Himself an hosanna one day and a crucifige on the next? Hence it is that nothing is more uncertain than the minds of that bellua multorum capitum, the multitude: constant in nothing but inconstancy, you cannot tell where to have them; nothing more uncertain than their hearts and minds, you cannot tell when you have them; nothing more ungrateful, or a worse esteemer of men's deserts, you cannot make any account of recompense from them—humorous, clamorous, unrespective, unconstant, giddy-headed, &c., have always been the proper adjuncts of the people.

Luke's Sermon, on I Kings viii. 37

Matt. vi. 33.

Phil. i. 9.

Heb. xiii. 1.
Fealty's Sermon.

Smith's Sermon, on John vi.

Exod. xvii.

Gal. iv. 15.

Gal. iv. 16.

John xli. 13.

"Neurum modo,
mas modo, vulgus.
Scinditur incertum studia in contraria vulgus."—
VIRGIL.

CXLV.—Profession without practice not acceptable.

PHARNACES sent a crown to Cæsar, at the same time he rebelled against him; but Cæsar returned the crown and this message back, "Faciât imperata priûs, &c. (Let him return to his obedience first, and then I will accept the crown by way of recognisance)." Thus God will not be crowned with our bare profession, except we crown that with a suitable conversation.

Plutarch, in Pompeio.

Staughton's Sermon.

CXLVI.—Man's being is from God.

ABEN EZRA, a learned rabbi of the Jews, hath a witty conceit of the Hebrew names that signify man and woman (ish and ishah). "They have in them," saith he, "some letters that are part of the name of God (Jehovah), which, if you take away, there will remain no other letters than those that make up the word which signifies fire." The moral of the conceit is, that their subsistence is in God, and they will both come to ruin if they be severed from Him. St. Paul maketh this good. It were to be wished that we did all learn of Him whence to take, and how to make the estimate of our being; we should not then so much overvalue our nothing, and undervalue that which can make us something, as commonly we do.

Plantavit, Florileg. Rabbin.

Phil. iii.

Lake's Sermon, on Esau's.

CXLVII.—The doctrine of free grace abused by licentious libertines.

THE philosopher observed, that of three of the best things in the world, through the wickedness of men, three of the worst things proceeded and grew:

1. Of Virtue—Envy.
2. Of Truth—Hatred.
3. Of Familiarity—Contempt.

But we that are Christians may add a fourth, viz., of the doctrine of Free Justification—Carnal Liberty. The catholic doctrine of justification by faith alone is the true nectar of our souls, so called ἀπὸ τοῦ κτείνειν, because it keepeth from death; yet, fit nectar acetum, this sweetest wine in the spouse's flagons proves no better than vinegar, or rather poison, in their stomachs, who turn free grace into wantonness, and Christian liberty into all licentiousness.

Combesii Enchiridion.
Featly's Clavis Myst.

CXLVIII.—The soul's slighting of Christ offering mercies deplorable.

HERODOTUS, in his Urania, makes mention of Themistocles coming upon the men of Andros for a round sum of money, and to that purpose said unto them that he had brought two goddesses unto them, Persuasion and Necessity. The men of Andros answered him that they had likewise two great goddesses with them, which did forbid them to give him any money; and those were Poverty and Impossibility. Thus Christ, He comes unto the sons of men with an invitation and a compellation—an invitation, "Venite ad me, &c. (Come unto me, all ye that are weary and laden, &c.);" a compellation, "Compelle intrare, &c. (Compel them to enter, &c.)." But what return doth the soul make? She bolts up the door of the heart, denies entrance, and either demurs with those builders in Haggai, "Nondum venit tempus (It is time enough yet to serve the Lord)," or else makes answer with a flat "Nolumus hunc regnare (We will not have this man to reign over us)."

Lib. viii.

Smith's Sermon, on 2 Kings vi.
Matt. xi. 28.
Luke xiv. 23.

Luke xix. 14.

CXLIX.—*God's goodness satisfied with man's thankfulness.*Plutarch, in Vita.Suidas, *Hist.*Staughton's Serm.

"De omni bono apparenti à nobis referantur Deo laudes."—BERNARD.
Ps. cvii.

THEMISTOCLES, when he entered into the Olympic games, and all the Grecians cast their eyes upon him and pointed at him, and whispered one to another, "This is Themistocles, that delivered Greece from Xerxes and the barbarous Persians—this is Themistocles!" all which he having taken notice of, said, "This day I must confess I am abundantly recompensed for all the pain that ever I took for Greece." Thus God looks for no other reward but this. He loads us with benefits; He gives all the commodities of the world to the sons only this royalty to Himself; He calls for no other tribute but that we should attribute all of men, reserving unto Him, give Him the glory, with a "Non nobis, Domine, non nobis." And therefore it is that the Psalmist repeats it very often, and very pathetically, "O that men would therefore praise the Lord for His goodness, and for His wondrous works that He hath done for the children of men!"

CL.—*The rulers' sins hasten the ruin of a state.*Lake's Serm. on Ecce.

Resum German.
Scriptores.

JUDGES and magistrates are the physicians of the state, and sins are the diseases of it. What skills it whether a gangrene begin at the head or the heel, seeing both ways it will kill, if the part that is diseased be not cut off; except this be the difference, that the head being nearer the heart, a gangrene in the head will kill sooner than that which is in the heel. Even so will the sins of great ones overthrow a state sooner than those of the meaner sort; therefore wise was that advice of Sigismund the emperor, when, upon a motion to reform the Church, one said, "Let us begin at the minorities." "Nay, rather," saith the emperor, "let us begin at the majorities; for if the great ones be good, the meaner cannot be easily ill; but be the mean ones never so good, the great will be nothing the better."

CLI.—*No man a loser by giving himself up to God.*Diog. Laertius, in Vita.

Donne's Serm.,
Lond., 1626.

ÆSCHINES, perceiving every one give Socrates something for a present, said unto him, "Because I have nothing else to give, I will give thee myself." "Do so," saith Socrates, "and I will give thee back again to thyself better than when I received thee." "So," says God, "if thou wilt give thyself to Me in thy prayers, in thy praises, in thy affections, and in all thy actions, I will give thyself back so much mended, that thou shalt receive thyself and Me too—thyself in a holy liberty, to walk in the world in a calling; Myself in giving a blessing upon all the works of thy calling, and imprinting in thee a holy desire to do all things to My glory."

CLII.—Excellency of the Robe of Justice.

Eman. Meteranus, in Hist. Belgica.

Smith's Serm.

Job xxix.

John i.

THERE is a story of a certain old woman in the Low Countries, that she, being near her end, required her keeper, of all loves, and in any case, to put upon her the cowl of a friar minorite when she should be ready to give up the ghost, which she had prepared for that purpose. "And," said she, "if death happen to come so suddenly that thou canst not put the whole cowl upon me, yet fail not at the least to put one of my arms into it, that by virtue thereof three parts of my sins may be forgiven me, and the fourth expiated in purgatory." Thus Meteranus, of the old wife's persuasion touching the virtue of the friar's cowl, which persuasion superstition bred, covetousness tendered, and folly entertained. It cannot be said so of the virtue of the robe of justice, of equity, and square dealing, whether distributive or commutative, private or public (though all very good), that they should have power to forgive sins. No; "the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sins."

But this may be boldly said, that it is an excellent robe and a diadem, such a one that yieldeth a sweet savour unto the nostrils of God, as Esau's garment upon Jacob's back did to Isaac their father. Of all the garments you can put on, after faith and love, there is none to be compared to it. Courtiers may have soft clothing; a garment of needlework is only for the queen's wearing; garments of divers colours are suitable for kings' daughters; and there was a Babylonish garment which Achan purloined to his destruction; Herod's glittering apparel, mentioned by Josephus; garments of gold and silver, at which Dionysius jested that they were too cold in the winter and too heavy in the summer; perfumed garments, such as were the undoing of Muliasses, king of Tunis, as Paulus Jovius relateth. These were for some persons, but not for others; for some certain times, but not for all. But justice is a robe for all sorts of men to put on, for all times of the year; sweet without fulsomeness, precious without burdensomeness, safe without dangerousness, indifferent to all degrees, to all persons—common, equal, glorious, full of majesty, and full of good works.

Gen. xxvii. 27.

Matt. xi. 8.

Ps. xlv. 14.

2 Sam. xlii. 18.

Josh vii. 21.

In Lib. Antiquit., lib. vii., cap. 8.

"Iustitia tutamen patriæ, cura languorum, solatium pauperum," &c. — CYPRIAN.

CLIII.—Miracles, why ceased.

A GARDENER, when he transplanteth a tree out of one ground into another, before the tree takes root he sets stays to it, he poureth water at the root of it daily; but when it once taketh root he ceaseth to water it any more, and pulleth away the stays that he set to uphold it, and suffereth it to grow with the ordinary influence of the heavens. So the Lord, in planting of religion, put to the help of miracles as helps to stay it; but when it was once confirmed and fastened, and had taken deep rooting, he took away such helps, so that, as St. Augustine hath it, qui expectat miraculum, miraculum est (he that looketh for a miracle is a miracle himself), for if the death of Christ with his work faith, all the miracles in the world will not do it.

Weems' Portrait.

"Ecclesiæ authoritas miraculis inchoata, vetustate formata." — AUG.

CLIV.—Other men's harms to be our arms.

WHEN the lion was sick all the beasts of the field went to visit him; only the fox stayed behind, and would not go unto him. Being asked the reason, he answered, "I find the track of many going in, but of none coming out; and I am not so desperate as to cast myself wilfully away, when I may sleep in a whole skin." Thus, other men's punishments ought to be our instructions; nocumenta, documenta (their harms, our arms). And that man is a fool whom other men's harms cannot make to beware. The footsteps of the angels that fell may mind us of pride, the ashes of Sodom tell us of our filthiness, Absalom's hanging by the hair forewarn us of rebellion, &c.

Fonseca, Quadrages. Serm.

"Vestigia nulla retrosum."
"Iustitia aliena, disciplina nostra."

CLV.—Encompassed by death on all sides.

IN the beginning of every almanack there is usually the picture of a naked man, miserably beset on all sides: the Ram pusheth at the head, the Bull goreth the neck, the Lion teareth the heart, the Scorpion stings the privy parts, another shoots at the thighs, &c. Every man living is but an emblem of that lifeless anatomy. One dies of an apoplexy in the head, another of a struma in the neck, a third of a squinancy in the throat, a fourth of a cough and consumption of the lungs, others of obstructions, inflammations, pleurisies, gouts, dropsies, &c., and "him that escapeth the sword of Hazael, him doth Jehu slay: and him that escapeth the sword of Jehu, doth Elisha slay." Let but God arm the least of all His creatures against the strongest man, it is present death and dissolution.

Prior's Serm., Occaser, 1626.

"Moriendi taille figuræ."

1 Kings xix. 17.

CLVI.—*A rich man had rather part with God than his gold.*Westfield's Serm., Bristol, 1644.

Matt. xix. 21.

Heb. xi. 25.

TAKE a narrow-mouthed bottle, it will receive the wine or beer that is, poured into it without any noise at all; but if you turn the bottle upside down, the bottom upward, it will not let anything out but with a great deal of bubbling and rumbling. Thus it is with every worldly man: he would quietly, and without any noise or reluctance (if possible), suck in the graces of God's Spirit into his heart; but tell him that the bottle must first be emptied, that "he must sell all that he hath, and give to the poor," durus est hic sermo (this is a hard saying), how doth he murmur and repine at this, choosing with that profane wretch rather to have his part in Paris than in Paradise—"the pleasures of sin for a season here in this world, rather than the pleasures which are at God's right hand for evermore."

CLVII.—*How sin is made the prevention of sin.*Lightfoot's Serm., Uttorchester, 1642.

WHEN children begin to go they use to be so well conceited of the strength of their legs that they need not any help of their nurse. To let them see their folly the nurse will leave them to themselves, that so, smarting by a fall, they may better be brought to find what need they have of their nurse. The best of us all are but babes in grace, yet do we think that we can stand of ourselves; yea, and run the ways of God too. Now, God doth refute us by our own experience, and by this mistress of fools makes us better known to ourselves; but though He leave us for a time yet doth He not forsake us for ever, no more than a nurse doth the weakling child. She maketh use of one fall to keep the child from many, and God doth make use of our sinning to make us see how prone we are to sin, and so prevent us for the future.

CLVIII.—*An ungracious son not worthy to be his father's heir.*Fonseca's Serm., Quadragesimal.

DID the goldsmith but know beforehand that his refining of silver would turn to dross, he would rather break his bellows and crucibles in a thousand pieces than once offer to set himself about such an unprofitable piece of service. And if many a father did but know that his son would prove a spendthrift devil, he would sooner fire all he had than leave one penny behind him.

CLIX.—*Young scholars to mind their books.*Plinius, *in Ep.*Paul Merula, in Vita Fran. Junii.
"At tu, dum prium foret tibi temporis actus,"—TRIBUL.

It is reported of Dr. Andrew Willet, the voluminous Atlas of learning, that at the age of fourteen years, or thereabouts, his father sent him to the University of Cambridge, where he applied himself so seriously to his studies that in a short time he had not only gained a good measure of knowledge in the learned tongues, but likewise in the arts and all necessary literature; so that it might well be said of him, as Pliny said of Trajan, Docendi tempore discendi nihil habuit (he had nothing of those things to learn when he was to teach them to others). What a shame is it, then, for those that dishonour that Athenian life with Doric manners!—that like to the father of Francis Junius, to whom his grandfather writing, when he was at the university, was wont thus to superscribe his letters, "Dionysio dilecto filio, misso ad studendum (To my beloved son Dionysius, sent to study)," when, as it seems, he did nothing less than that which he was sent about. So many young scholars spend that time which should be at their books aut male, aut nihil, aut aliud agendo (either doing wickedly, or that which they should not do, or else nothing at all), that their tutors are enforced to dismiss them with a "Pol, ego operam et oleum perdidi (I have laboured in vain, I have spent my strength in vain)."

CLX.—The life of faith the happy life.

WHEN Elisha demanded of the Shunammite what he should do for her, or whether there were anything to be spoken for her to the king or the captain of the host, she answered, "I dwell among my people." She lived in peace and quietness; she had no cause to make any complaint against any of her neighbours; she was not driven to make any suit to the king or the captain; she troubled not others, and others troubled not her. And this she accounted a happy life; and so it was. But what, then, is the happy estate and condition of the faithful? Surely a thousand times greater. They are at peace with heaven and earth, with men and angels, with themselves and all others, with life and death; there is nothing that is able to dismay them, nothing able to hurt them.

2 Kings iv. 13

Attersol, on Philon.

CLXI.—Shortness of time will not admit of long discourse.

THEY that have a long journey to make, and but a short time allowed them, must make but short baits by the way, and cannot stand to take every acquaintance by the hand that they meet; and they that are to paint or print, or any ways delineate a pitched field, within the compass of a sheet or two of paper, can make but few soldiers whole or complete, but are fain to set down, for the most part, their heads only, or their helmets. So he that hath many things to speak unto, within a small compass of time, must contract himself, and be contented to touch only the heads of the greatest part of them; and as for long discourses, he must waive them.

Smith's Serm. on Jer. ix.

"Non tam multum, sed tam bene."

CLXII.—Curiosity in the hearing of God's Word condemned.

MANY men take no pleasure in flowers, or care any further for them than to look upon them, to smell them, and have them in their hands; but the bees draw from them both honey and wax, and the skilful apothecary maketh many medicines of them against divers and sundry diseases. Thus, many hear sermons only for their pleasure, for the elegance of the style, delicacy of the words, smoothness of the language, and gracefulness of the delivery: this is but to make a nosegay to smell for a while, and cast it anon after into a corner—to hear the Word gladly, but in time of temptation to fall away.

Fonseca's Serm. Quadrages.

CLXIII.—Ambition proves its own ruin.

THE poisonous aconite, so much desired of the panther, is purposely hung up by the hunters in vessels above their reach, whereof they are so greedy as they never leave leaping and straining thereat till they burst and kill themselves, and so are taken. Thus do men that aim at honour and greatness too high for their reach, and too great oftentimes for their merit; for an ambitious heart, overgrown with this rank aconite, neither admits the beams of grace to mollify its hardness nor the bounds of nature to restrain the swelling, but is unnaturally carried to ruin those of his own gang that are living, and to blemish the honourable fame of those that are departed. Surely, ambitious tyrants may bear themselves up for a time, but in the end they shall find that though Divine Justice hath leaden feet, she hath iron hands; though slow in coming, yet she strikes home.

Plin., Nat. Hist., lib. viii., cap. 27.

Dallington's Aphorisms.

"Omnia recta et honesta negligunt, dummodo potentiam consequantur."
—CICERO.

CLXIV.—To be content in the present condition.

THEY that are not contented with their present condition are fitly compared to little children that are gotten upon a hill, and they look a good way off and see another hill, and they think if they were on the top of that then they were able to touch the clouds with their Burrough's Heart's Content.

"Semper avarus regit."

fingers; but when they are on the top of that hill, alas! then they are as far from the clouds as before. So it is with many that think if they were in such a condition then they should have contentment; and it may be so that they get into that condition, yet they are as far from contentment as before, not considering that in the very lowest of conditions they may for the present be serviceable to the counsel of God, that hath thus put them into it.

CLXV.—A godly Christian is a constant Christian.

Funeral Sermons.

AFFECTIONS to God must be constant. The air, you know, is light, and yet we call it not a lightsome body, because it is lighted by the presence of another; and when that body is removed, it is dark, for the air is dark in the night, when the sun is absent, as it is light when the sun is present. Those only we call lightsome bodies whose light is originated and rooted in themselves. So they are not godly persons that may have some injections of godly thoughts and godly affections cast into them, and be in them for a spurt and a brunt, and for a little flash, like a flash of lightning in the air, and so gone; but it must be rooted and grounded in a man, so as that it will continue—continue so as that the exercise of graces and duties towards God should be frequent and quotidian—daily to have converse and communion with God, to walk with Him and talk with Him, to approve ourselves to Him, to set ourselves in His presence, to make a constant trade with Him, to be His daysman, to work by the day with Him, and withal to hold out to the end.

ISA. XXVI.

"Nec tædia cepti ulla mei capiam," &c.—OVID.

CLXVI.—An impatient condition is a discontented condition.

Downham's *Christ.
Warfare*.

"Impatiens est homo mutabilis ener-vis."

Paschal, de Virt. et Vitiis.

WEAK and sickly bodies agree well with no air, and are not much bettered by their often removes and changes of place, because they carry about them their distempered humours, which are the causes of their disease. So he who is sick of impatiency and peevish discontent agreeth well with no condition, but picketh quarrels as well against his prosperity as adversity, and is well, as we say, neither full nor fasting; but, like those who are sick of a fever, bitter and sweet taste both alike, loathing the very sight of wholesome nourishment, because his humour maketh everything to relish of his aguish condition.

CLXVII.—God all in all.

Plutarch, in Aephthegm.

Holdsworth's Ser., Camb., 1642.

KING PORUS, when Alexander asked him, being then his prisoner, how he would be used, answered in one word, Βασιλικός—that is, like a king. Alexander again replying, "Do you desire nothing else?" "No," saith he; "all things are in βασιλικός, in this one word like a king." Whereupon Alexander restored him again. But this hath not always been the happiness of kings and princes. Yet, however, he that hath God hath all things, because God is all things. Take a pen and write down riches, honours, preferments—they are but as so many cyphers, they signify nothing; but write down God alone, and He will them raise to thousands and hundreds of thousands. Then it is that a Christian is truly happy, when he can find himself and all things in his God.

CLXVIII.—If the soul be safe all is safe.

Diodorus, lib. xvii.

If the vessel be saved, though the wares be spoiled with the sea-water or cast over shipboard, yet we may arrive at the haven and there be in safety. If the field be gotten by us (as Alexander told Parmenio), our baggage and horses will be recovered again with advantage. If a tree be sound at the root there is hope that it will sprout out, notwithstanding it should be lopped and shred never so much ; but if it be rotten at the root, fare it well. In like manner, if the soul be safe, if it live by faith in the Son of God, if it fight the good fight of faith and win the field, all other losses are not to be reckoned of ; we are more than gainers, more than conquerors. But if the soul perish (and it will perish except it be fed with the Word of the Gospel, and it will make shipwreck if Christ sit not at the stern, and it will be overcome if Christ be not the Captain, Saviour, and Deliverer), then all the world is gone with us ; it had been better with us we had never been born.

Smith's Serm. on Job vi.
"Bonum animum pietuous et omnibus bonis."

CLXIX.—Though a weak Christian, yet a true Christian.

HE is a scholar in the school that beginneth at Christ's-cross-row, and he is entered into the college that readeth but Seton's logic, and he is a member of the family that was bound apprentice but yesterday. Thus, if thou be a penitent, though not in fullness of perfection ; if thou believe, though not with the fullest measure of believing ; if thou obey, though not in the highest degree of obedience,—be comforted in thy weak beginnings, and resolve to proceed, and know that thou art already entered into the covenant of grace, and shalt enjoy that which Christ hath promised, freedom from damnation—"Thou shalt never see death."

House of Mourning.

"Fit surculus arbor."

John viii. 57.

CLXX.—A cheap religion is the worldling's religion.

A MERCHANT, being about to buy a parcel of wines, doth taste them, and thereupon approves them, wisheth them stowed in his own cellar ; yet, when he understands the price he must give for them, leaves them unbought, and goes his way. Such were those hypocrites (Luke viii. 13), and such are many amongst us at this day. A glorious Christ they would have by all means, but a crucified Christ is not for their turn : hearing what excellent things are prepared for God's faithful ones, they are much taken with the taste and relish of them ; but when they understand of the price that is set upon them, that they must deny themselves and their worldly lusts, forsake the world and the vanities thereof, mortify the flesh, &c., they leave them as being too dear, and rather be without them than come to so high a price.

Downham's Christ, Warfare.

"Religio proba ante res humanas habenda."—LUTHERUS, Sir. ii. 12.

Rom. viii. 13.

CLXXI.—The godly man's afflictions not destructive, but corrective.

As David gave charge to his soldiers, that by no means they should kill Absalom his son, though he sent them with a full commission against Absalom to stay his unnatural rebellion, to reduce him to his former obedience, so God, when He sends His judgments out into the world, He forbids them, and, as it were, lays a prohibition on crosses and afflictions, that they shall not destroy His children : they shall have a corrective, but no destructive power ; they shall serve to purge out their corruptions, but they shall not destroy their graces.

2 Sam. xviii. 5.

Coplan's Serm. of Virgins.

"Post afflictiones vita bonis tranquillior."—NAZ.

CLXXII.—Grace, not greatness, maketh magistrates glorious.

THERE was a great king, Antigonus by name, that, turning and winding his diadem, said to them that stood by, that if a man knew what a deal of care and trouble were lapped up and lodged in it, he would not account it worth the taking up. And there was a pope, by name Adrian the Sixth—not the worst pope—that confessed to his friends that he lived a happier life when he was a poor schoolmaster in Louvain than since he was advanced to that high see. Such or the like expressions were made by Henry IV. of England, lying on his death-bed, upon occasion of his son's removal of the crown out of his sight :

Plutarch, Apophthegm.
"Nemo foret qui te," &c.
Platina, in Vita.

Smith's Serm. on Job xxix.

P. Machy, in Asaph-1072.
2 Cor. i. 12.
Acts xx. 26.

all which signify thus much, that it is not the high place nor the great state that maketh a magistrate happy; it is not his standing on the higher ground that makes him glorious; but when, with Pericles, in Plutarch, he can say that he never caused any to wear a mourning gown, and with St. Paul, "This is our rejoicing, even the testimony of our conscience," and "that they are pure from the blood of all men," i. e., from shedding innocent blood.

CLXXIII.—To make good use of good men while we have them.

House of Mourning.

"Actum est de Repub."

WHEN any man borrows a book, he is diligent in the perusal of it, and taketh notes out of it, because he cannot tell how soon the owner may have occasion to use it himself. As for his own books, he lets them lie by, presuming to use them at his pleasure. Thus God raiseth up a good ruler, a good magistrate, a good minister: such as are eminent for wisdom, exemplary in life. These He sets up in a kingdom, in a county, in a parish or neighbourhood, as lights to walk by. How, then, should we improve such opportunities, and walk by the light while we have it! For the sun of such examples will set, and it is then night in such a kingdom, such a county, such a township, such a family, when a good governor, a good magistrate, a good minister, a good friend, parent, or master, is by death removed.

CLXXIV.—Discord ill beseems the disciples of Christ.

Lamprid., in Hist.

Thorough's Heart-Divisions.

ALEXANDER SEVERUS, seeing two Christians contending one with another, commanded them that they should not take the name of Christians any longer upon them; "for," says he, "you dishonour your Master, Christ, whose disciples you profess to be." Most sure it is that divisions, whether of Church or state, foreign or domestic, are very dishonourable to Christ. And were it that they darkened our names only, it were not so much; but that which darkens up the glory of Christ should go something near us.

CLXXV.—The soul's comfortable union with Christ.

Aulus Gellius, lib. x., cap. 18.

Weems' Portrait.

ARTEMISIA, queen of Caria, showed an act of wonderful passionate love toward her husband, Mausolus; for, death having taken him away, she, not knowing how to pull the thorns of sorrow out of her soul, caused his body to be reduced to ashes and mingled them in her drink, meaning to make her body a living tomb, wherein the relics of her husband might rest, from whom she could not endure to live separated. Thus the true child of God, when there is anything that may seem to preserve the memory of God in his soul, how doth he embrace the very invention of it! He becomes a true Mausolean tomb indeed; he hath a comfortable and true conjunction with Christ, eating His flesh and drinking His blood: and these two can never be separated again.

CLXXVI.—False doctrine is treason against God.

Abbot on Jonah.

Gal. i. 8.

As he is a traitor to his prince who taketh upon him to coin moneys out of a base metal—yea, although in the stamp he putteth for a show the image of the prince—so he that shall broach any doctrine that cometh not from God, whatsoever he say for it, or what gloss soever he set on it, he is a traitor unto God; yea, in truth, a cursed traitor, though he were an angel from heaven.

CLXXVII.—How the soul lives in Christ only.

It is commonly known that the branches have all their sap from the root of the tree ; it is that which makes them flourish and grow ; but if you cut them off from the root, they wither presently. So it is with the spirit, with the soul of man ; if God do but a little withdraw Himself, let sin but make a separation betwixt God and the soul, it is like a withered branch, it hath nothing of itself to revive itself, because it is divided from the root, which is Christ. At the least, it is with the soul as it is with a tree in the dead of winter : when the sap remains in the root, though it remain in union with the root, yet the moisture is got into the root itself and doth not now infuse itself into the branches. Yet withal it is confessed that the servant of God which is once united to Christ shall never be separated ; the union is now, and always shall be : but, nevertheless, the sap and comfort of the spirit may remain in the Head, our life may be hid in Christ, and may not appear in us at all, and we are then in that estate as if we were branches cut off ; so that whatever light and comfort and strength of spirit we have it is from Christ, and by the influence and working of His gracious Spirit.

Greg. Naz., Cont. Evang.

CLXXVIII.—Division amongst Christians is the disgrace of Christians.

ONE Bidulph, in the relation of his travels to Jerusalem, reporteth that the Turks were wont to wonder much at our Englishmen for pinking and cutting their clothes, counting them little better than madmen for making holes in whole cloth, which time of itself would tear too soon. But how foolish and how mad in the eyes of all good Christians do the cuts and rents and slashes that are in men's spirits, the divisions that are amongst us at this day, how uncomely do they render us and the religion that we take upon us to profess !

Burroughs, ut antea.

"Fera regnat Erin-yes."—O'Connell.

CLXXIX.—God's eternity.

MERCHANTS and shopkeepers, to procure a better sale and greater credit to their several stuffs, call them "Sempiternum," "Perpetuana," "Durance," &c. ; but how soon doth the moth fret them, and they are gone—nothing left but the bare name. But God, He is the true eternal Being. All creatures have a lasting, angels have an outlasting, but God hath an everlasting being ; He only is Alpha and Omega, before the beginning and beyond all ending, from everlasting to everlasting, the King, eternal, immortal, &c.

Taylor's Serm.,
Lond., 1626.

1 Tim. i. 17.

CLXXX.—Ill company to be avoided.

WHEN Cerinthus came into the bath, John the Evangelist got out, and called to his fellows that they should come away with haste from the company of that companion, lest the house should fall upon them : he thought that place was guilty which received a man that was guilty, and that the house was in danger which harboured a man obnoxious. Here let them, then, look about them who not only, without all care, do sort themselves with all comers, not fearing the faults of others, but are glad they can meet with such companions. Vices and vicious persons are alike dangerous. He that walketh in the sun shall be tanned, and he that toucheth pitch shall be defiled, and he that associateth himself with the ungodly will soon be tainted with their company.

Euseb., Pamph.
Hist.

Abbot on Yonck.

CLXXXI.—*That it is lawful to praise the dead.*Herodot., in Thalia.Holdsworth's Fun. Sermon, 1626.

"Vetusta judicavit honestum esse ut mortui laudarentur."

Thucyd., lib. II.

It is said of the Ethiopians, that they make sepulchres of glass, for after they have dried the corpse they artificially paint it and set it in a glazed coffin, that all that pass by may see the whole frame and lineaments of the body: and this is commended in them. But surely they deserve better of the dead, and more benefit of the living, who draw the lineaments of their mind, and represent their virtues and graces in a mirror of art and learning; and they are as much to blame on the other side that, out of the purity of their precise zeal, ita præcedunt, so near pare the nails of Romish superstition that they make the fingers bleed; who, out of fear of praying forsooth for the dead, or invoking them, are shy in speaking any word for them, or sending after them their deserved commendations. It is piety to honour God in His saints; it is justice sum cuique tribuere (to give every one his own); it is charity to propose eminent examples of heavenly graces and virtues shining in the dead, for the imitation of the living. And then you cannot praise any so safely as the dead, for you cannot humour them into danger nor melt away yourself into flattery. Such jewels ought not to be locked up in a coffin, as in a cabinet, but to be set out to the view of all men.

CLXXXII.—*Men, though differing in judgment, must not differ in affection.*Botero's Relation.Burrough's Heart-Divisions.

THERE is mention made of two rivers in the East, Save and Danube, that run along in one channel threescore miles together without any noise, and yet they keep themselves apart, the colours of the waters remaining distinct all along. And why should not men go along close together in love, though in some things their judgments and practices be apparently different one from another? "Opinionum varietas, et opinantium unitas non sunt असुतता." Men may go to heaven with the variety of opinions, but with the difference of affection they shall never see God in the face to their comfort.

CLXXXIII.—*A man dead in sin is a senseless man.*Abbot's Serm., Lond., 1651.

"Dormit securus."

If a man be naturally dead, bring a candle into the room, set it on the table, he sees it not; let the sun shine in his face, he perceives not the beauty nor feels the warmth thereof; offer him rich presents, he receives them not: he hath not an eye to see them, nor a heart to desire them, nor a hand to reach out unto them. Thus it is with one that is spiritually dead: let the sunshine of the Gospel put out never so clear, he sees it not, because he is in darkness; though he live under plentiful means and rich dispensations, yet he is blind and sottish; offer unto him the rich pearls of the Gospel, those rich treasures of grace in Christ Jesus, yet he hath no heart to them, no hand of faith to lay hold upon them. So blind, so sottish is he, so stupid and senseless, that though these rich treasures, these graces, these pearls of the Gospel, be conveyed unto him in earthen vessels, in a plain and familiar manner, yet he doth not, he cannot apprehend them. Judgments do not affright him, and mercies do not allure him.

CLXXXIV.—*Antinomians compared to thieves.*Weems's Divine Exercise.

"Qui male agit, edit lucem."

THIEVES, when they come to rob and steal, the first thing that they do is to put out the candle, that they may pilfer the more securely. Thus the Antinomians, that they may cry up their idol of Christian liberty with more ease, and vent their doctrines of pleasing damnation more freely, set themselves against the law, and would banish it out of the Church; and thus carnal and profane men, too, labour to abolish it, that they may sin the more securely, and with greater liberty.

CLXXXV.—Not to censure others, but look to ourselves.

SOCRATES, at a banquet, falling at odds with one of his familiars, and openly rebuking him, Plato could not hold, but said unto him, "How much better had this been spoken privately." "And had you not done better to have told me so privately?" quoth Socrates. Plato could see Socrates' fault of unseasonable reprehension, but his own he could not perceive: Thus, look but amongst such as call themselves Holy Brethren, but, indeed, rank Protestants, devout dissemblers, and you shall find that they are not half so forward in examining themselves as in finding fault with others; and they are not half so curious in their own as they are captious and cruel over other men's lives. They can readily accuse others of blackness and spiritual deformities, saying, "They are wicked;" "He is naught;" "They are antichristian, rotten-hearted," &c.; "Such a one hath a pope in his belly;" when at the same time they have but little, God knows, of Christ in their hearts. They can gaze at the mote in their brother's eye, but care not for pulling out the beam that is in their own. They cannot bear with a few infirmities of their brethren—no, not of their fathers—but their own foul enormities they can easily conceal and continue.

Diog. Laert., *
Vita Socrati.

Woodnoth, ut
antea.

"Judicet ille de al terius errore, qui non habet in seipso quod condemnet."
—AMEROS, in
Matt. v.

CLXXXVI.—The least of sins to be prevented.

By the want of one nail the iron shoe is lost; and the shoe being lost, the horse falleth; and the horse falling, the rider perisheth. Such are the dangers that he incurreth that neglecteth small things: the neglect of the lesser maketh way but for the greater evil; and he that setteth light by small things falleth by little and little.

Lud. Granat., Dux Pecati.
"Coercenda cri minis infantia ne juvenescat aug mentis."—CASSIO DORUS, Eclui, xxix.

CLXXXVII.—One God and Three Persons demonstrated.

THE light of the sun, the light of the moon, and the light of the air, for nature and substance, are one and the same light, and yet they are three distinct lights: the light of the sun being of itself, and from none; the light of the moon from the sun; and the light of the air from them both. So the Divine nature is one, and the Persons three, subsisting, after a divers manner, in one and the same nature.

Stiles' Serm., 1629.

CLXXXVIII.—God knows His own people, however distressed.

TAMAR may so disguise herself, walk in an unaccustomed path, so as Judah may not know her; Isaac, through the dimness of his sight, may bless Jacob and pass Esau; tract of time may make Joseph forget, or be forgotten of, his brethren; Solomon may doubt to whom of right the child belongeth; and Christ may come to His own, and not be received: but the Lord knoweth who are His, and His eye is always over them. Time, place, speech, or apparel cannot obscure or darken His eye or ear. He can discern Daniel in the den; Job, though never so much changed, on the dunghill. Let Jonah be lodged in the whale's belly, Peter be put into close prison, or Lazarus be wrapped in rags, or Abel rolled in blood, yet can He call them by name, and send His angels to comfort them. Ignorance and forgetfulness may cause love and knowledge to be estranged in the creature, but the Lord is not incident to either, for His eye, as His essence, is everywhere: He knoweth all things.

Barlow's *Good Man's
Refuge*, 1616.
Gen. xxxviii.,
xxvii., xlv.
1 Kings iii.

"Obscurum nihil Deo potest esse."—
CICERO, *de Nat.
Deorum.*

Ps. cxxxix. 1, 2.

CLXXXIX.—For the abuse of a thing, the use is not to be taken away.

LYCURGUS, saith Plutarch, was not so well advised when, seeing the Lacedemonians drink too much and fall to drunkenness, and so to further sin, he commanded to cut down

In Lib. de Audi endis Potiti.

Woodworth, ut
ante.

their vines, and would not suffer any to grow in that commonwealth. It had been better, saith he, to have digged wells near to the vines, and so to have allayed and assuaged the strength and liquorishness of wine with water. Thus it is that, certainly, if our founts, if our communion tables, pulpits, seats, temples, have been abused, in time of popery, with a multitude of superstitious ceremonies and needless innovations,—what! shall we therefore use them no more? Rather let us use them no more so. What! shall we therefore give them over? That were extreme folly. Rather let us use them better. Christ did not condemn Moses' chair for the life of a pharisee, but preached where they had preached, though they were notorious hypocrites, though He denounced so many woes against them as against none more; yea, though the Temple in His time had become a den of thieves, yet then and there sent He up devout and holy prayers to heaven.

"Propter abusum non tollendus est usus."

CXC.—Get but God, and get all.

Staughton's Serm.

As Noah, when the deluge of waters had defaced the earth and blotted the great book of nature, had a copy of every kind of creature in that famous library of the ark, out of which all were reprinted to the world, so he that hath God hath the original copy of all blessings, out of which, if all were perished, all might easily be renewed. Let friends and goods and life and all forsake us, yet let but the light of God's countenance shine upon us, and that shall be life and friends and goods and all unto us.

"Habentem omnia habet."—AUG.

CXCI.—Afflictions the ready way to heaven.

Shute's Serm.,
London, 1624.

A MAN taking his journey into a far country, and inquiring for the way, is told that there are many plain ways, but the straight and right way is by woods and hills and mountains and great dangers; that there are many bears and lions in the way; much difficulty is upon the road thither. Now, when he is travelling, and finds such and such things in the way, such mountains and hills of opposition, such flats and valleys of danger, he concludeth that he is in the right way thither. And so the child of God that is going to the kingdom of Heaven: though there be many ways to walk in, yet he knows that there is but one right way, which is very straight and narrow, full of trouble, full of sorrow and persecution, full of all manner of crosses and afflictions; and when in this life he is persecuted for God and a good cause, whether in body or in mind, it argueth plainly that he is in the right way to salvation.

"Per varios casus, per tot discrimina rerum, tendimus in cœlum."—Acts
xiv. 22.

CXCII.—To be provident for days of trial.

Barlow's Good Man's
Refuge, 1616.

MEN in policy prepare cloaks for the wet, provision for winter, a staff for old age, a scrip for the journey; they'll be sure to lay up something for a rainy day, or a bank of money to fly to when occasion serveth. Thus it should be with all true Christians: they should be always striving for more and more assurance of God's favour, to be sure of a stock going in the Lord's affection, to get some persuasion of God's love, whereby they may be able to stand in the evil day, in the saddest of times, in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment.

CXCIII.—A good man is the prop and stay of his country.

Horat., in Epist.

Shute's Serm., 1625.

It was the poet's vain and groundless conceit of Hector, that so long as he lived Troy could not be destroyed, terming him the immovable and inexpugnable pillar of Troy. But well it may be said of a faithful man, that he is a mighty stay and strength, a main defender and upholder of the place where he liveth ; for whose sake, for whose presence and prayers, out of the Lord's abundant kindness to all His, even the wicked are often within the shadow of God's protection, and spared.

CXCIV.—It is peace that sets up religion.

ANTIGONUS told the sophister he came out of season when he presented a treatise of justice to him, that was at that very time besieging a city : he could not hear the voice of the laws for the noise of drums. And so the laws of God, the comfortable voice of the Gospel, cannot be heard in times of war and hostility. "Religio docenda, non coercenda." Fire and faggot are but sad reformers. It is peace that is the good Joseph, the best nurse to religion. When the Church had peace and rest, then, and not till then, it multiplied.

Plutarch, in Eumenice.

Staughton's Serm.

Acts ix. 31.

CXCV.—Children to be brought up in the fear of God.

PARENTS are very careful to prefer their children to great places and noblemen's houses, and to that end they give them gentle breeding, which is well done of them ; but if they would indeed be good parents to their children, they should first endeavour to get rooms for them in the kingdom of heaven. But how shall this preferment be had ? God hath an upper and a lower house, His Church and the kingdom of heaven. The Church is His house of grace, heaven is His house of glory. Now, if thou wouldst bring thy child to a place in the house of glory, then thou art first of all to get him a place in the house of grace, bringing him up so in the fear of God that both in life and conversation he may show himself to be a member of the Church ; and then assure thyself that after this life he shall be removed to the second house, which is the house of glory, and there for ever be a freeman in the kingdom of heaven. In thus doing thou shalt not leave him an orphan when thou diest, for he shall have God for his Father, Christ for his Brother, and the Holy Ghost his Comforter, to all eternity.

Perkins, on Creed.

"Aded à teneris consuescere multum est."—VIRGIL., Georg. lib. ii.

CXCVI.—Heavenly principles tend heavenward.

FIRE, which here we kindle, and is engendered on the earth, it being no earthly, but a heavenly body, hath, ab origine, an aptness and inclination, carrying it towards the sphere of fire, which is the proper place thereof. So, from what time a man, by God's calling, is begotten to be a heavenly creature here on the earth, he hath produced in him an inclination which doth make him move Godward : being heavenly-principled, he tends heavenward. Never did poor exile so much long to smell the smoke of his native country as he breathes and pants after the kingdom of heaven.

Bayne's Counterbans to Covetousness.

"Sursum corda,"

CXCVII.—Satan suiting himself to all humours.

It is observable, that a huntsman or forester goeth usually in green, suitable to the leaves of the trees and the grass of the forest, so that by this means the most observant in all the herd never so much as distrusteth him till the arrow stick in his sides. And thus the devil shapes himself to the fashions of all men. If he meet with a proud man, or a prodigal man, then he makes himself a flatterer ; if a covetous man, then he comes with a reward in his hand. He hath an apple for Eve, a grape for Noah, a change of raiment for Gehazi, a bag for Judas. He can dish out his meat for all palates ; he hath a last to fit every shoe ; he hath something to please all conditions, to suit with all dispositions whatsoever.

Jenkin, on Jude.

"Ut saxis adhærens polyplus pro loco mutatur."—SENECA, in Epist.

CXCVIII.—Love the bond of perfection.

Staughton's Serm.

As the primum mobile in the heavens sets all the other spheres a-going which move and make music, as the Pythagoreans thought, in God's bosom—as ens, in logic, communicates his being to the ten predicaments—so is love to the ten commandments, in which they live and move and have their being. Love is the end, the scope at which they all aim, the perfection in which they rest, the tribute which they exact; it is the bond of perfection, or perfection of bonds—the most perfect bond, that ties all graces to us.

“Dilectio radix est omnium bonorum.”
—AUG.

CXCIX.—Forgiveness of others *an argument of God's forgiveness of us.*Perkins, on the Lord's Prayer.

TAKE a piece of wax and put to a seal, it leaveth an impression or mark like itself in the wax, which, when a man looks on, he doth certainly know that there hath been a seal, the print whereof is left behind. Even so it is in every one that hath a readiness to forgive others, by which a Christian may know easily that God hath sealed to him the forgiveness of his sins in his very heart. Let men, therefore, but look into their hearts, whether they have any affection, any inclinations to forgive others, for that is, as it were, the print in their hearts of God's mercy towards them in forgiving them.

“Neque dignus est venia, qui nemini dat veniam.”—SE-NECA.

CC.—Popular government popular confusion.

“Amicus omnium, amicus nullorum.”
—TULLIUS, de Amicitia.

Dallington's
Aphorisms.

It was said of old, “He that is a friend to all is a true friend to none; and that which hath many heads hath no head at all.” Such is that many-headed monster the multitude, which hath neither head for brains nor brains for government. And as in a medicine, if there be not a due proportion of the simples in the mixture, there is a mischief for a remedy, not a remedy for a mischief. So in a popular state, where the people are agreed, and where there is no equal temperature and counterpoise of supreme power against the strong ingredient of the multitude, which is always hot in the highest degree, there must needs be disorder and a way open to all confusion.

CCI.—Satan's restless, incessant employment.

Livius, lib. xxlii.

Plutarch, *in Martello.*Woodnoth, *ut
antea.*

It was Hannibal's saying of Marcellus, that he had to do with him who could never be quiet, neither conqueror nor conquered; but conqueror, he would pursue his victories, and conquered, labour to recover his loss. But much rather may a man say the like of Satan, that great ramping lion, the arch-envier of our peace and happiness, who is the most wrathful and the most watchful enemy; who is never idle, but ever employed in sowing cockles amongst the Lord's good corn; who, though we stoutly resist him and overcome him for a while, yet will he never rest nor give over, but will be tempting again—yea, will not cease to tempt us again and again, with the same temptations, hoping at length to win our consent and so give us the foil in the conclusion.

CCII.—Spiritual desertions *no distractions to the child of God.*Lud. Vives in Augustin. de Civit. Dei.

It was a barbarous act of that nation who imprisoned, condemned, executed, and ripped up an ass, to recover the moon out of him, which they suspected he had swallowed, because they saw him drink at the water when the moon appeared by reflection, and immediately upon that being wrapped up into a cloud they missed her. And thus do simple men that think the grace of God is extinct quite when some cloud of sin robs them of the comfortable light of it. How are they frightened, as the ancients were, with these eclipses, and are much distracted in the midst of such spiritual deserts! Yet the knowing experimental Christian is nothing troubled thereat, but expects the return with patience.

Staughton's Serm.

CCIII.—Every impenitent sinner is his own tormentor.

If a malefactor, for his punishment, should be appointed every day to carry a stick of wood to a heap, to burn him twenty years after, it must needs be an exceeding great punishment and misery. And this is the case of every sinner who, neglecting repentance from day to day, doth thereby employ himself in heaping up the coals of God's wrath, to burn his soul in hell when the day of death comes. It is no other but a treasuring up of wrath against the day of death.

Perkins' Treat. of Repentance.

Rom. ii. 5.

CCIV.—There is no dependence for great men upon popularity.

ICARUS, in the poet, being furnished with wings by the art of his father Dædalus, could not content himself in a lower sphere, but he must needs be soaring so high, that the sun melting the wax wherewith his wings were fastened, he fell down headlong to his own destruction. These two wings of Icarus, thus joined on with wax, are just like popular and military dependence in noblemen to make them great: they will help for a while to make them so, and mount them aloft in the thoughts of men, and then fail them at the very height. It is therefore safer to stand upon two feet than fly with two wings; the two feet of Justice, communicative and distributive: for great men shall grow greater, if they but advance merit and relieve wrongs.

Ovidii Metam.

Dallington's Aphorisms.

CCV.—The resolved Christian.

WHEN Charles IX. of France propounded to that famous Prince of Condé this threefold choice—either mass, or death, or perpetual imprisonment, the most Christian worthy made this answer: "God assisting me, I will not choose the mass; the other two I refer to the king's determination: yet so, as I hope, God, in whose hands the heart of the king is, by His gracious providence, will provide and dispose of these also." Thus should it be with every Christian, to be a resolved Christian, to suffer any hardship for Christ: not to do as the men of the world do, that, so as they may avoid death and imprisonment, care not how they rise upon other men's ruins; so they may eat of the fat and drink of the sweet, so they may swallow down the good things of the land, and clothe with the softest of wool. Impose what religion you will, either mass or Mahomedanism, what government you will in Church or state, you shall find them servile enough. The good centurion never kept such obedient, ready, and resolute servants: they will fit you every way, fashion and put forward themselves for any employment.

Jean de Serres, Hist. de France.

Wootnoth, ut antea.
"Tu ne cede malis
sed contra audentior ito."—VIRG.,
Æneid, 6.

CCVI.—Sin trampleth on Christ.

WHEN Pompey could not keep his soldiers in the camp by persuasion, he cast himself all along in the narrow passage that led out of it, and then bid them, "Go if you will, but you shall first trample upon your general;" and this overcame them. So it is that every sin makes God's head ache, as the Rabbins were wont to tell their scholars, to scare them: nay more, we cannot go to commit sin, but we must trample upon the precious blood of Christ Jesus; for our sins crucify Him rather than Pilate, crown Him with thorns rather than the soldiers.

Plutarch, in Vita.

Staughton's Serm.

CCVII.—The happiness of good government.

Herodotus, lib. ix.

THERE was a law amongst the Persians, that when their governor was dead there should be ἀνομία πέντε ἡμερῶν (a lawlessness for five days after), that every man should do what he list. Now, for those five days, there was such killing and robbing, and such destroying one another, that, by the time the five days were over, they were glad of government again. So that any kind of government is better than no government. But happy is that people, bona si sua norint, that live under a good government, where justice flows from the Supreme as head, and is conveyed by subordinate ministers unto the people.

Burgess' Serm.,
Lond., 1646.

CCVIII.—Faith is the fountain of all graces.

Lucianus, in Scythia.

WHEN Toxaris saw his countryman Anacharsis in Athens, he said unto him, "I will at once show thee all the wonders of Greece: viso Solone vidisti omnia (in seeing Solon thou seest all)—even Athens itself, and the whole glory of the Greeks." Tell me, Christian, hast thou faith and assured trust in the Lord? Then thou hast more than all the wonders of Greece, upon the point all the wonderful gifts of grace; for faith is a mother-virtue from which all others spring, and without faith all the best of our actions are no better than sin.

Boys' Postill.

Rom. xiv. 23.

CCIX.—Hypocrites, in their saying well but doing ill, reproved.

JULIUS CÆSAR, in his Commentaries, writeth of the French soldiers, that in the beginning of the battle, at the first onset, they were more than men, but at the second, or before the end, less than women. They would talk bravely and come on courageously, but at length give off cowardly. Such are the hypocritical Hotspurs of our times, who have God's Word swimming in their heads, but not shining in their lives; such as set up the temple with one hand and pull it down with the other; like scribbling school-boys, that what they write with the forefinger they blur with the hind finger; who, if words may be received, their pay is gallant, but, if deeds be required, their money is not current; who in professing and protesting are more than Protestants, but in practising and performing and persevering less than Papists.

Woodnoth, ut
antea."Qui curiosi simullant, et bacchanalia vivunt,"—JUV.CCX.—Zeal in God's service made the world's derision.

DOGS seldom bark at a man that ambles a softly fair pace, but if he once set spurs to his horse and fall a-galloping—though his errand be of importance, and to the court, perhaps—then they bark and fly at him. And thus they do at the moon, not so much because she shines, for that they always see, but because, by reason of the clouds hurried under by the winds, she seems to run faster than ordinary. And thus, if any man do but pluck up his spirit in God's service, and run the ways of His commandments, it is Jehu's furious march presently; and he shall meet with many a scoff by the way that runneth with more speed than ordinary.

Staughton's Serm.

CCXI.—The great danger of sacrilege.

IT is no Christian, but a right heathenish trick to demolish holy places, or, through sloth and covetousness, to suffer them to fall. Nay, the very heathens would never do that to the temples of their false gods that we Christians do to the house of the true God, for they hated and fled from all sacrilegious persons. Were the Church leprous, we could do no more than pluck out the stones, as they did, in the old Law, in a leprous house; nay, they would not even in such a house pluck out all the stones, as they do in churches, but only such as were leprous. Well, let such know that, next to the injury done against the temple of man's body, there can be no greater injury than that which is done against the body of the temple; and one day all such sacrilegious, irreligious, profane persons may chance to feel that whip upon their conscience which some time Celsus felt, who, after the robbing and profaning of many churches, hearing one day that place of Isaiah read, "Woe unto them that join house to house, that lay field to field, till there be no place that they may be placed alone in the midst of the earth," cried out immediately, "Vae mihi et filiis meis (Woe, then, be to me and my children for ever)!"

Ps. lxxix.

Plutarch, in Timoleone, Liv. xiv. 40.

Shute's Serm., 1624.

Isa. v. 8.

Greg. Turonens. lib. iv., cap. 24.

CCXII.—The hypocrite's inconstancy.

It is reported of the she-wolf, that she hath a yearly defect in procreation, for at the first she beareth five young ones, the second time but four, the third time but three, the fourth time but two, the fifth time but one, and then afterwards remaineth barren. Thus hypocrites, forgetting the solemn vow they made to God in baptism, as also those principles of religion wherein they seemed expert to their catechisers, as they grow upward in age they grow downward in grace—with Demas embracing this present world, and with Hymenæus and Alexander making shipwreck of a good conscience, verifying the by-word, "Young saints, old devils."

Plinius Hist. Nat.

Boys' Psall.

1 Tim. i. 19.

CCXIII.—The laughter of the wicked is but from the teeth outwards.

It is said of Paulus Emilius, that having put away his wife Papinia, without any cause, as it seemed to others, stretched forth his foot and said, "You see a new and neat shoe, but where this shoe wringeth me, not you, but I alone know;" meaning that there were many secret jars happening between the married which others could not possibly perceive. And certainly the most wicked men, the greatest enemies to God and His Gospel, the most traitorous and rebellious of a people or nation, may be so jocund and merry, and show such magnanimity in their faces, that none can imagine by any outward circumstance but that they are truly cheerful and courageous in their hearts; and yet in the midst of all their mirth and greatest delights, even in the very ruff of all their bravery, they have secret heart-burnings and grievous vexations, what God and themselves only know. The Lord hath spoken it twice, and therefore it must needs be plain and peremptory, that there is no peace to the wicked. Their looks may be sometimes lively, but their hearts are always heavy.

Plutarch, in Vita ejus.

Woodnoth, ut antes.

"Non intus et in tute."

Isa. xlvi. 22.

CCXIV.—God's omnipotency.

AMONGST all the gods of the heathens, Jupiter was in the greatest esteem, as the father and king of gods, and was called Jupiter, quasi juvenis pater (a helping father); yet, as the poets feign, he wept when he could not set Sarpedon at liberty: such was the imbecility and impotency of this master-god of the heathen. But the hand of our God is never shortened that it cannot help; He is ever able to relieve us, always ready to deliver us—"Amongst all the gods there is none like unto Him; none can do like unto His works: He is God omnipotent."

Homer. Ovid.

Hume's Exposit. on Ps. xxvi.

Ps. lxxxvi. 8.

CCXV.—Prayers and tears are the weapons of the Church.

THE Romans in a great distress were put so hard to it, that they were fain to take the weapons out of the temples of their gods to fight with them; and so they overcame. And Calamy's Serm.

"Pierres et Leri-mre," &c.
Ps. cxxiv. 8.

this ought to be the course of every good Christian, in times of public distress, to fly to the weapons of the Church, prayers and tears. The Spartans' walls were their spears, the Christian's walls are his prayers. His help standeth in the name of the Lord, who hath made both heaven and earth.

CCXVI.—The gradation of faith.

Boys' Path.

THE heart of every believer is like a vessel with a narrow neck, which, being cast into the sea, is not filled at the first easily, but by reason of the strait passage receiveth water drop by drop. Thus God giveth unto us even a sea of mercy, but the same on our part is apprehended and received by little and little: we go from strength to strength, from grace to grace, and from one degree of virtue to another, praying always as the blessed apostles: "O Lord, increase our faith, that, from weakness of faith and slender assurance, we may grow to firmness of the one and fullness of the other."

CCXVII.—The Christian's humiliation the Christian's exaltation.

Cassian, Lect. Antiq., lib. xiii., cap. 4.

Smith's Serm on
i Pet.
Bucholcerus.

"Fato parvus in oculis tulis ut sis magnus in oculis Dei," &c.
—TUDOR, in Sy-monim.

ARCHIMEDES and Willigis, two men famous in their generations—the one was exalted to be king of Sicily, being but a potter's son; the other, to be archbishop of Mentz (a Prince Elector in Germany), being but a wheeler's son. They both acknowledged God's providence and work in their advancement, and were so far from being ashamed of their low birth and parentage, that the one would not be served with any other plate than earthen, to show how nobly he was descended; the other gave in his coat-of-arms three wheels, with this motto, or rather memento, written in his bed-chamber in great letters, "Willigis, Willigis, recole unde veneris (O Willigis, remember from whence thou cam'st)." This, indeed, is the way to become high, to be exalted before God and wise men, to be lowly in our own eyes, to confess that we are worms and not men, that we are sinful men and not saints, that we are unworthy the least of God's mercies, and that it is of His mercy only that we are not consumed; that what we are and we have is all received, what we have received we have corrupted and made worse, and what we have corrupted we ought to be called to an account for, and so to be cast out as unprofitable servants.

CCXVIII.—The works of God in the creation of the world are to and beyond admiration.

Cassian Rodogius,
lib. ii., cap. 17.

Hume's, Exposit., on
Ps. cxxvi.

Ps. ciii.
Job ix. 9.
Ps. cxxx. 25.

ARCHIMEDES was much commended amongst the heathen for his skill and contriving the motions of the sun, moon, and planets, with the course of the heavens and celestial spheres in his horology; Archites was much extolled for causing a dove of wood to hang in the air; Apelles and Zeuxis, an excellent pair of painters, whose pencils were to admiration, the one for deceiving the beholders with a counterfeit fly, and the other the birds with lively painted grapes. Oh, but when with David we shall consider the heavens, with Job lift up our eyes to contemplate the celestial spheres, with Solomon observe the nature of flies and pismires, that the earth should hang in the air, that the sea should be confined within a wall of sand, &c., we cannot but stand amazed and wonder at that wisdom and power by which all these were created and are still governed.

CCXIX.—Self-examination required.

Dionen, Laetian, in P'ris

It is reported of Plato, that when he did walk in the streets, if he saw any disordered in speech, disguised in drink, or otherwise out of frame, he would say to himself, "Num ego talīs (Am I such a one as this is, such a drunkard, such a rebel to God and man, &c.)?" So must every good Christian say, "Num ego talis (am I such a one as this is)? such and such." And as the apostles asked Christ, "Master, is it I?" so must every one look into his heart to see how things stand betwixt God and his own soul, and say, "Am not I the man that ought to be ashamed for the many sins that I have committed against my God? Am not I the man that have done thus and thus?" &c.

Calamy's Serm.

CCXX.—Riches without content yield no comfort.

A MAN diseased in body can have little joy of his wealth, be it never so much. A golden crown cannot cure the headache, nor a velvet slipper give ease of the gout, nor a purple robe fray away a burning fever. A sick man is alike sick wheresoever you lay him, on a bed of gold or on a pad of straw, with a silk quilt or a sorry rag on him. So no more can riches, gold or silver, land and livings, had a man much more than ever any man had, minister unto him much joy—yea, or any true or sound joy at all—where the mind is distract and discontent. Without contentment there is no joy of aught; there is no profit, no pleasure, in anything.

Gatake's Gain of Godliness.

CCXXI.—A great comfort to have a faithful counsellor.

IF Jacob had not heard there was corn in Egypt, in what a sad condition had he and his family been when all his provision was consumed in Canaan? If Joseph had not met with a man that told him where his brethren kept their sheep, he would have been sent to them by his father, he might as well have been devoured of a wild beast, as he was falsely reported to be. It is a great blessing to meet with a faithful counsellor when a man is out of his way. When a man is at a stand in his religion, what he may hold and what he may let go, what he may embrace and what he may abhor—when he is puzzled and cannot tell which way to turn him, whether to the right hand or to the left—then to find such a faithful counsellor as Jehoshaphat did in Micaiah touching war and peace, such an interpreter as the eunuch did in Philip touching the interpretation of some hard place in Scripture, &c., this must needs be as sweet and as welcome as a shower of rain in the time of drought; nay, as bread is to the hungry and drink to the thirsty soul.

Smith's Serm. on Jer. vi.

1 Kings xxii.

Acts viii. 30.

CCXXII.—The grace of God above all riches.

SOCRATES was wont to say that he had rather love Δαρεῖον φίλον ἢ τὸ δαρεικόν (the king's countenance than his coin) a good look from him rather than his gold. Thus a Christian thinks himself richer when he is able to say "God is mine," than if he had the treasures of both Indies. One smile from God is better than all the treasures of the world. If the sun be wanting, it will be night for all the stars; and if the light of God's countenance be wanting, if He frown upon us, a man may sit in the shadow of death for all the glisten of worldly contentments.

Diogen. Laertius.

Staughton's Serm.

"Non amo divitias, non opus," &c.

CCXXIII.—The just man's joy is more inward than outward.

VALERIUS CORDUS, in his dispensatory, observeth that those which prescribe rules of choice of simples advise to take herbs in the spring, flowers in summer, fruits in autumn, but roots in winter. And why roots for the most part at that time? Surely, because sap is then gone down, it is most in the root when it is least in the stock : and so it is oft-times with the joy of God's children ; it is most rife many times with them inwardly in the heart when least show appeareth outwardly in the life, their mirth is most many times when it is least seen ; it is an inward rejoicing.

CCXXIV.—A godly man desires not to be rich but in God's way.

Cataker's Gain of Godliness.

Gen. xiv. 23.

Nehem. xiii. 16.

Matt. iv. 9.

ABRAHAM, when the king of Sodom offered him some part of his spoils, refused to take so much as a shoe-latchet of him, that the king of Sodom might not say another day that he had made Abraham rich ; that men might not say that Abraham had been made rich, not by God's blessing, but by the king's means, and that he might thank the king of Sodom for what he had. So a godly man will not gain, or desire to gain, so much as a shoe-string or a shoe-thread by profaning the Sabbath, with the Sidonian merchants, by fraud or deceit, by oppression or extortion, by biting usury, the devil's brokery, by rifling and plundering, or by any other unlawful or indirect means, that the devil may not one day say that he hath made him rich, as he said sometimes to our Saviour, "Omnia hæc tibi dabo (All these will I give thee, &c.)."

CCXXV.—Riches oft-times prove pernicious to the owners thereof.

Plutarch, in Sylla.

Smith's Serm. on
John vi.

"Grave quid prodest pondus mihi divitiæ auri?"—TIT-BUL.

QUINTUS AURELIUS, in the days of Sylla (that Sylla of Rome), had a fair grange that lay commodious to some great one, for love whereof he was attainted, and killed amongst them that were put to death. Upon he cried out, when he saw his name in the paper, "Fundus Albanus me perdidit, alas! it is my land that I have at Alba, and not any offence that I have done is the cause of my death." And is not this the case of many a man amongst us? have not many a man suffered for his means' sake? It is a common saying, that when any man is in trouble his means will hang him. Who were they that heretofore were robbed and plundered? Were they not the ablest and the richest of the land? Did you ever hear of a poor malignant? It was the heinousness of the wealth, not the heinousness of the fact, that hath undone many a good family. So pernicious prove riches many times to the owners thereof.

CCXXVI.—The security of a good conscience.

Staughton's Serm.

"Hic murus æheneus esto, nil con-scire sibi," &c.—VIRGIL.

THOUGH the world should rattle about his ears, a man may sit merry that sits at the feast of a good conscience ; nay, the child of God, by the virtue of this, in the midst of the waves of affliction, is as secure as that child which in a shipwreck was upon a plank with his mother, till she awaked him, securely sleeping, and then, with his pretty countenance sweetly smiling, by-and-by sportingly asking a stroke to beat the naughty waves, and at last, when they continued boisterous for all that, sharply chiding them, as if they had been his playfellows. O the innocency! O the comfort of peace! O the tranquillity of a spotless mind! O the serenity! No Spanish sky so clear as a good conscience!

CCXXVII.—Not to mourn for losses, because all is made up in Christ.

NECA tells a courtier that had lost his son, "Fas tibi non est, salvo Cæsare, de fortuna" &c. That he had no cause to mourn, either for that or aught else ; so long as his sign was in safety and he in favour with his sovereign, he had all things in him, and should be unthankful to his good fortune if he were not cheerful both in heart and look, so long as things stood so with him as they did. How much better may it be said to every true Christian, let his wants and his crosses be never so great, his afflictions never so pressing, his necessities never so biting, that he hath little cause to mourn for them; so long as he is in grace and favour with God, he hath all things in Him, and so long therefore he is happy and wants nothing else beside Him.

Gataker's Tr. of the Test.

CCXXVIII.—An ill tongue never speaks well of any one.

It is commonly known that scarabs and flies swarm to the galled part of a poor pack-horse, and there sit feeding upon that worst part of his flesh, not once meddling with the other sound part of his skin. Even thus do malicious tongues of detractors. If a man have any infirmity in his person or actions, that they will be sure to gather unto and dwell upon; whereas his commendable parts and well-deservings are passed by without mention, without regard. And what do they get by it? It must needs be a filthy creature that is always feeding on stinking carrion.

Hall's Occasional Meditations.

"Lingua mali pars pessima servi."—JUVENAL, Sat. ii.

CCXXIX.—It is the glory of a Christian to pass by offences and injuries.

ONE Vitus Theodorus, a German divine, sends to advise with Melancthon what he should do, when Osiander preached against him. Melancthon writes to him, and beseeches him, for the love of God, yea, chargeth him, that he should not answer Osiander again, but that he should hold his peace and make as if he heard nothing. Vitus Theodorus writes back again that this was hard to do, yet he would obey. And thus must every good Christian do: he must not be too hasty to oppose oppositions, not be like those salamanders that are never well but when they are in the fire of contention, but go on patiently in a constant way, resolving to bear what he meets with—rather to suffer a hundred wrongs than return one; and then God, at length, will make his righteousness break forth as light: for it is the only valour to remit a wrong, and the greatest applause that a man might hurt and would not.

Melch. Adamus, in Vita.

Burrough's Heart-Divisions.

"Optimus ille, qui ferre novit injurias plurimas."

CCXXX.—Little sins, if not prevented, bring on greater, to the ruin of the soul.

THIEVES, when they go to rob a house, if they cannot force the doors, or that the wall is so strong they cannot break through, then they bring little boys along with them, and these they put in at the windows, who are no sooner in, but they unbolt the doors and let in the whole company of thieves. And thus Satan, when by greater sins he cannot tell how to enter the soul, then he puts on and makes way by lesser, which, insensibly having got entrance, set open the doors of the eyes and the doors of the ears, then comes in the whole rabble: there they take up their quarters, there, like unruly soldiers, they rule, domineer, and do what they list, to the ruin of the soul so possessed.

Alsop's Serm., Lond., 1650.

"Ex parva scintilla fit magnum incendium."

CCXXXI.—The sense of sin is an entrance to the state of grace.

It is a sure sign that a man is awaked out of his sleep when he discovereth and seeth the error of his dream, and a sure sign of health when a man is able to tell his disease. In the drawing up of water out of a deep well, as long as the bucket is under water we feel not the weight of it, but so soon as it cometh above water it beginneth to hang heavy on the hand. When a man diveth under water he feeleth no weight of the water, though there Senec., Epist. v.

"Somnia sunt, vigilantis est," &c.

Arist., de Colo., lib. iv., cap. 16.

"Elementa in suo loco gravia non sunt."

August., de Vera Relig., cap. 14.

Prov. x. 23.

be many tons of it over his head; whereas half a tubful of the same water, taken out of the river and set upon the same man's head, would be very burdensome unto him, and make him soon grow weary of it. In like manner, so long as a man is over head and ears in sin, he is not sensible of the weight of sin, it is not troublesome unto him; but when he beginneth once to come out of that state of sin wherein he lay and lived before, then beginneth sin to hang heavy on him, and he to feel the heavy weight of it. So, so long as sin is in the will, the proper seat of sin, a man feeleth no weight of it, but, like a fool, it is a sport and pastime unto him to do evil. And it is therefore a good sign that sin is removed out of his seat, out of his chair of state, when it becomes ponderous and burdensome to us, as the elements do when they are out of their natural place.

CCXXXII.—An ill-lived minister is a scandal to the Gospel.

Hall's Occasional Meditat.

A CRACKED bell makes a very harsh sound in every ear: the metal is good enough, and it may be was once well-tuned; it is the rift that makes it so unpleasantly jarring. Just thus is a scandalous and an ill-lived preacher: his calling is honourable, his noise is heard far enough, but (O the sad but!) the flaw which is noted in his life mars his doctrine and offends those ears which else would take pleasure in his teaching. It is possible that such a one, even by that discordant noise, may ring in others into the triumphant Church of Heaven, whilst there is no remedy for himself but the fire, either for his reforming or judgment.

CCXXXIII.—Every Christian ought to be an ingenuous Christian.

Burrough's Heart Diction.

We read, Matt. iv., Christ had a great dispute with the devil, in which He had him at great advantage, in his quotation of Scripture, verse 6: "He shall give His angels charge concerning thee, and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone." This was quoted out of the 91st Psalm, verse 11, and there it is, "He shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways.". Yet Christ did not catch this advantage, He did not so much as upbraid him for leaving out that passage, which He might justly have done, but He answers to the thing. Yea, Christ might have taken a further advantage against the devil, for the words following in the psalm are a prophecy of Christ, destroying the power of the devil: "Thou shalt tread upon the lion and the adder; the young lion and the adder shall thou tread under thy feet." But Christ did not take advantage of this, and upbraid him with it: He had enough against him in the thing itself. How unseemly, then, is it for men, when they are seeking out for truth, to peddle about words, to catch at phrases, to lie at the catch for advantages, and to get hold of expressions. It is for Christians to be ingenuous, to be plain one to another; for it is a sign that men have less advantage of the matter when they seek so much after expressions and pass by the meaning. Sure it is, if God should catch at advantages with them, the most pregnant and ripe-witted would never be able to abide it.

CCXXXIV.—Philosophy to be subservient to Divinity.

Menoch., *de Repub.
Heb.*

Staughton's Serm.

THE Jews read the Book of Esther in their synagogues because they account it canonical Scripture; but, before they read it, they let it fall to the ground, because they do not find the name of God once mentioned in it, as their Rabbins have observed. So for the moral treatises of philosophers: we must read them, because they speak of virtue and happiness, and are good handmaids to piety and devotion; but we must let them fall to the ground before we read them: they must be subservient to the Scripture, they must be read with reference to Scripture, because they do not give glory to God.

CCXXXV.—Impossible for a man to know all his sins.

IT is with the children of men as with the housewife that, having diligently swept her house and cast the dust out of doors, can see nothing amiss, not so much as a speck or dust in it; whereas, if the sun do but a little shine in, through some cranny in the wall or some broken quarrel in the window, she may soon see the whole house swim and swarm with innumerable motes of dust, floating to and fro in the air, which, for dimness of light or sight before, she was not able to discern. Even so it is with many that are careful of their ways, so that little may be seen amiss that might require either reformation or amendment; yet, when they shall come to look more intently into God's law, a little beam of light, reflecting upon their souls from it, will discover unto them such an innumerable company, as well of corruptions in their hearts as of errors and oversights in their lives, that it shall make them, as men amazed, cry out, "Lord, what earthly man doth know the errors of his life?"

Outaker's Joy of the Just.

"At sole per fenestras illucente radios atomorum," &c.

Spincus, de Instit. Christi.

Ps. xix. 12.

CCXXXVI.—Children to be well principled.

EVERY thing must be taken in its time. Let a bladder alone till it be dry, and all the wind in the world cannot fill it—no, not so much as raise it up; whereas, being new and moist, the least breath enlargeth it. It is no otherwise in ages and dispositions. Inform a child in precepts of learning and virtue, whilst years makes him capable, how pliable he yieldeth, how happily is he replenished with knowledge and goodness; but let him alone, till time and ill example have hardened him, till he be settled in a habit of evil, and contracted and clung together with sensual delights, he becomes utterly indocible. Sooner may such a plant bow than break, such a bladder be broken than extended.

Hall's Occasional Meditat.

"Tenaciter hærent quæcunque à primis nascentes hausimus annis,"—PALING.

CCXXXVII.—God must be served like Himself.

THERE are some of the heathen that worship the sun for a god, and they would offer to the sun somewhat suitable; and therefore, because they did so much admire the swiftness of the motion of the sun, they would not offer a snail, but a flying horse—a horse with wings. Now, a horse is one of the swiftest creatures, and one of the strongest to continue in motion for a long time together; then, having added wings to the horse, they conceived he was suitable to be a sacrifice for the sun. So when we come to God, to worship Him, to sanctify Him, to call upon His name, we must not bring the bare calves of our lips, but the fervency of our hearts; we must behave ourselves so as to give Him the glory that is fit for such a God to have. God is a spirit, and He must be worshipped in spirit and in truth; not a civil only, but a divine worship also, proportionable in some measure even to the nature of God Himself.

Pierli Hiereoglyphica.

Burrough's Gospel Worship.

"Hic tibi præcipiæ sit purâ mente colendus,"—CATO.

CCXXXVIII.—The difference betwixt a carnal and a spiritual man in point of knowledge.

TAKE a blind man, set him in a clear night, with his face towards the moon when it shines, when all the stars are sparkling round about, yet he sees nothing of the brightness of the one or twinkling of the other, only some glimmerings; or he perceives some kind of reflex upon him, whereby he concludes that the moon is up and that the stars show themselves. But then take a quick-sighted man, with a perspective glass in his hand, and he discovers all: he walks all over the sky, from star to star, from one constellation to another; he is able to give account of all. Thus, take a man in his pure naturals, set him in the midst of the ordinances, let the administrations be never so pure, the dispensations never so clear, he sees nothing of God but, as it were, through chinks and crannies of nature—some glimpse and glimmer

Th. de Trugillo, Thesaur. Concionat.

"Mirum non est cœcum non iudicare de coioribus,"—

Junius, in 1 Cor. ii. 14.

only of divine light. Oh, but the child of God, having the perspective glasses of the Old and New Testaments in his hand, especially that of the New Testament—a very clear-sighted glass—he walks from star to star, from one attribute of God to another ; he discovers stars of the first magnitude, as faith and hope and charity ; nothing in order to salvation is hid from his eyes.

CCXXXIX.—Christians ought to be loving one to another.

Pigot's Serm.,
Lond., 1643.

METHINKS Philadelphia, the name of one of the seven golden candlesticks (Rev. i.), is a very proper fitting name for a church, which signifies brotherly love ; and every congregation ought to be, in a good sense, the family of love. Breaches and divisions, distractions and heart-burnings, may happen in other kingdoms which are without God in the world and strangers to the covenant of grace ; yet let Jerusalem, the Church of God, be always like a city which is at unity within itself.

Ps. cxxli. 3.

CCXL.—Discord in Church or commonwealth prejudicial.

Hall's Occasional Medit.

"En quo discordia cives."

"Perduxit miseros."—VIRGIL.

Laud, in Ep. Ded. of Reply to Fisher.

In the ringing of bells, whilst every one keeps his due time and order, what a sweet and harmonious sound they make ! all the neighbour-villages are cheered with the sound of them ; but when once they jar and check each other, either jangling together or striking preposterously, how harsh and displeasing is that noise ! So that as we testify our public rejoicings by an orderly and well-tuned peal, when we would signify the town is on fire we ring the bells backward, in a confused manner. It is just thus in Church and commonwealth : when every one knows his station and keeps his due rank, there is a melodious concert of comfort and contentment ; but when either states or persons will be clashing with each other, the discord is grievous and extremely prejudicial. And such a confusion either notifieth a fire already kindled or portendeth it ; and that of all others must be a dangerous fire that begins in the bed-straw. Popular states may ring the changes with safety, but monarchical government requires a constant and regular course of rule and inferiority, government and subjection, which cannot be violated without a sensible discontent and danger. And so in the Church : take away discipline, and the doctrine will not be long after.

CCXLI.—Sin to be renounced as the cause of Christ's death.

Alphons. ab Avendano, in Ps. cxix.

SUPPOSE a man should come to a table and there is a knife laid at his trencher, and it should be told him, "This is the knife that cut the throat of your child, or your father ;" if he could now use that knife as any other knife would not one say, "Surely there was but little love either to the father or to the child." So, when there is a temptation to any sin, this is the knife that cut the throat of Christ, that pierced His sides, that was the cause of His sufferings, that made Christ to be a curse. Now, wilt thou not look on that as a cursed thing that made Christ to be a curse ? Oh, with what detestation should a man or woman fling away such a knife ! and with the like detestation it is required that a man should renounce sin ; for that, and that only, was the cause of the death of Christ.

CCXLII.—Ministers not to be afraid of the faces of men.

Strutarch, Apebthegn.
Livius, lib. xiv.

POPILIUS, a Roman ambassador sent to Antiochus the Great, having delivered his message, and the king deferring his answer and demurring on it, drew a circle round about him with his wand, and conjured him to determine and resolve whether he would have peace or war before he went a foot out of the circle, which wondrous resolution and confidence caused him presently to define peace. And do we not see how bold every petty constable will bear himself upon the higher power?—"I charge you in the king's name," Stoughton's Sermon. &c. And why, then, should God's ambassadors only be afraid, like children of shadows and bugbears? Courage and resolution become them best;—their commission is large and will bear them out, and the penalty great if they faint in the execution. "Fear not their faces," saith the Lord to Jeremiah, "lest I destroy thee." Jer. i. 8, 17.

CCXLIII.—The creature moves not but in and by God.

THE creature can do nothing but as it is commanded by God: it is the vanity of the creature that it can do nothing of itself, except there be an influence from God. As, for example, take the hand: it moves because there is an imperceptible influence from the will that stirs it. So the creature moving, and giving comfort unto us, it is God's will it should do it; and so it is applied to this or that action. The artificer using a hatchet to make a stool or the like, there is an influence from his art that guides his hand to the work. So the creature's working is by a secret concurrence from God, doing thus or thus: whether it be this way or that way, all is from God. Preston's Treatise.

"Est Deus in nobis; agitante calescimus illo."

CCXLIV.—The schismatic's abuse of Scripture.

IT is reported of one Procrustes, a notorious thievish innkeeper, who, when any travellers came to lodge at his house, would make his guest's stature equal with his bed, either by stretching them out to the length of it if they were too short, or by cutting some part off them if they were too long. He would not fit his bed to his guests, but his guests to his bed. Nothing more common shall we find amongst heretics and schismatics than either with false senses to stretch and enlarge, or with loud lies to mince and mangle the Sacred Scriptures, that so they may frame them to their likings and make them serve their own turns at all essays. They will either suppress the words or else not express the sense, they will either blot out or else blemish the Scriptures, rather than they will abolish or any whit alter their own fancies. Of their own opinion and writings they will not abide the least amendment, but of the Holy Word of God they care not what havoc they make. Plutarch, in Romulo.

Woodnoth, ut mactat.

CCXLV.—A fearful minister is a soul-murdering minister.

MAURITIUS the emperor said of Phocas, who conspired against him, having inquired of his disposition and hearing that he was fearful, "Si timidus est, homicida est," said he. So it may be said in this case: the cowardice of the ministry is cruelty—he that fears the faces of men is a murderer of the souls of men. Stoughton's Sermon.

CCXLVI.—Sins in men regenerate and unregenerate—the difference.

REGENERATE men sin, yet the peace is not broke betwixt God and them, because their minds never yielded to sin. As it is betwixt princes, if they are at peace: though pirates of either nation rob the other's subjects, yet it breaks not the peace, it being done without the will of the king. So it is with sin in God's children: it breaks not the peace betwixt God and them, because it is but a rebel, and they agree not to it. There is a difference betwixt entertaining of sins as thieves and robbers and as guests and strangers: wicked men entertain sin as a guest, the godly man as a robber; the one invites it as a friend and acquaintance, the other throws it off as a rebellious traitor.

Preston's Self-Denial.

"Et quæ non fecimus ipsi, vix ea nostra vocæ."

CCXLVII.—Immediate addresses unto God by prayer find acceptance.

Fleet's Observat.

2 Sam. xviii. 23.

CUSHI and Ahimaaz ran a race who should first bring tidings of victory to David. Ahimaaz, though last setting forth, came first to his journey's end—not that he had the fleetest feet, but the better brains to choose the way of the most advantage; for the text saith, "So Ahimaaz ran by the way of the plain, and overwent Cush." Prayers made to God by saints fetch a needless compass about—that is but a rough and uneven way: the way of the plain, or the plain way, both shortest and surest, is, "Call upon Me in the day of trouble." Such prayer, though starting last, comes to the mark first.

CCXLVIII.—Sacrilege never thrives.Gallii Noces A- *frica.*Erasm, *Anglia.*Woodnoth, ut an- tea."Die mihi rusa virum.

CÆPIO, a Roman consul, with his soldiers, robbed the wealthy temple of Toulouse, a city of Narbonne, in France, near the Pyrenees mountains; but of those that had a share of any of those goods not one ever prospered. It was so generally observed, that it occasioned a proverb. If any man, by what means soever decayed, were fallen into poverty, they would say of him, "Aurum habet Tholosanum (He hath some of the gold of Toulouse)." The endowments of all other churches (whereof many have been plundered of rich chalices and other utensils in sacrilegious times) are like the gold of Toulouse, that brought ruin to the plunderers and their families. If any man thriveth with them that holdeth them by a wrong tenure, he hath better luck than any such malefactor before him. How many sacrilegious persons have utterly ruined themselves, as it is easy to find in many monuments of learning—how a canker hath eaten their estates, as a gangrene did their consciences. But see the chronicle, search the histories of sundry nations, both ancient and modern, and find me out but one church-robber here that hath thrived past the third generation.

CCXLIX.—A seeming religion no saving religion.Shute's Serm., 1630.

WANDERING empirics may say much in tables and pictures to persuade credulous people to become their patients, but their ostentation is far from apprehension of skill, when they come to effect their cures. How many ships have suffered shipwreck for all their glorious names of the Triumph, the Safe-guard, the Good-speed, the Swift-sure, Bona-venture, &c. ! So how many souls have been swallowed up with the fair hopes of men's feigned religions!—such as have at that very time the devil in their hearts, when they seem to have nothing but God at their tongues' end.

CCL.—The vanity of needless and intricate questions.Fuller's Holy State.

CAMDEN, in his history of the life of Queen Elizabeth, relateth how Captain Martin Frobisher fetched from the farthest northern parts a ship's lading of (as he thought) mineral stones, which afterwards were cast out to mend the highways. Thus are they served, and miss their hopes, who, long seeking to extract hidden mysteries out of nice questions, leave them off at last as altogether useless and unnecessary.

CCLI.—The life of man subject to all sorts of calamity.King's Lectures on Job.

JONAH's condition was but bad at the best, to be rocked and tossed to and fro in a dangerous ship, the bones whereof ached with the violence of every surge that assailed it; the anchors, cables, or rudders, either thrown away or torn in pieces; having more friendship preferred him than he had hap to make use of; and at length to be cast into the sea, a merciless and implacable sea, roaring for his life more than ever the lion roared for his prey, the bottom thereof seeming as low to him as the bottomless pit, and no hope left to escape either by ship or by boat, no tabula naufragii, no plank or piece of board appearing, whereby to recover the land; besides all these, to make the measure of his sorrows up to the brim, the burning of God's anger against his sins, like a river of brimstone. This is the case of us all in the whole course of our lives: as Hezekiah sang in his song, "From day to night Thou wilt make an end of me." We are tumbled and tossed in a vessel as frail as Jonah's ship was, which every stream of calamity is ready to dash in pieces, every disease is able to fillip on one side or other; where neither anchor nor rudder is left, neither head nor hand nor stomach is in case to give any comfort; where, though we have the kindness of wife and friends, the duty of children, the advice of physicians, we cannot use their service; where we have a grave before us, greedy to receive and never to return us, till the worms and creepers of the earth have devoured us: but if the anger of God, for our sins, accompany all these, it will be a woeful adventure for that man when the sins of his soul and the end of his life shall come so near together as the trespass of Jonah and his casting out of the ship.

Isa. xxxviii. 12.

"Nil sine magno vita labore dedit mortalibus." — HORAT.

CCLII.—Sacrilege cursed with a curse.

It was usual in former times, when anything was given to the endowment of the Church, it was done with a curse against all such as should ever presume to alienate or take it away. Whether man's curse shall take hold on such Church-robbers is wholly in the disposition of God, and a secret; but sure it is that God Himself hath openly cursed all those, how many or how great soever they be, that rob Him of tithes and offerings—yea, cursed them with a curse, redoubling the words, not without great cause, but emphatically to signify that they shall be cursed with a strange curse—such a curse, such a signal curse, that he that hears of it his ears shall tingle and his knees smite one the other.

Ang. Roch., Dis-
sert. Vat.

Woodnoth, us
ant.

Mal. iii. 8.

CCLIII.—God the proper object of man's memory.

SENECA writeth of himself that he had a very flourishing memory, being able to recite by heart two thousand names in the same order they were first digested. Portius Latro wrote that in his mind which others did in note-books. He was a man so cunning in history, that, if you had named a captain unto him, he would have run through all his acts presently. A singular gift from God! But, as Tully, comparing Lucullus and Hortensius together, both being of a vast memory, yet he preferreth Lucullus before Hortensius, because he remembered matter, this but words. Thus certainly, as the object about which memory is conversant is more principal, so the gift more commendable: and the most excellent object of all others, either for the memory to account or for any part of the soul to conceive, is God the Lord; for he that remembereth the Lord as the Lord hath remembered him, that nameth his blessings by their names as God the stars, and calleth them to mind in that number and order that God hath bestowed them upon him, if not to remember them in particular, which are more than the hairs of his head, yet to take their view in gross, and to fold them up in a general sum with David, "What shall I render to the Lord for all His benefits?"—though he forget his own and his father's house, though the wife of his bosom and the fruit of his loins; yea, though his memory be so treacherous unto him that he forget to eat his bread—it is no matter: he remembereth all in all, and his memory hath done him service enough in reaching this object, God the Lord.

Justus Lipsius, in Vita.

In Lib. de Claris Oratoribus.

King, on Jerem.

Ps. cxvii. 12.

"Meminiſſe Juva-bit."

CCLIV.—Careless Churchmen condemned.

In Lib. Fin. de Ben. et Mal.

Fuller's Holy State.

TULLY charged some dissolute people for being such sluggards, that they never saw the sun rising or setting : as being always up after the one and a-bed before the other. So some negligent people never hear prayers in the church begun or sermon ended ; the confession being past before they come, and the blessing not come before they are passed away.

CCLV.—The precious life of man to be preserved.

Theodore's, Ub. v.,
cap. 20.

Weems' Portraiture.

"Vacuas cordis habete manus.

THERE arose a sedition at Antioch for that Theodosius the emperor exacted a new kind of tribute upon the people ; in that commotion, the people broke down the image of the empress Placilla, who was lately dead ; the emperor, in a great rage, sent his forces against the city to sack it. When the herald declared so much to the citizens, one Macedonius, a monk, endued with heavenly knowledge and wisdom, played a prudential part, sending unto the herald an answer to this effect : " Tell the emperor these words : that he is not only an emperor, but a man also ; and therefore, let him not look only upon his empire, but upon himself also ; for he, being a man, commands those also who are men. Let him not, then, use men so barbarously, who are made to the image of God. He is angry, and that justly, that the brazen image of his wife was thus contumeliously used, and shall not the King of Heaven be angry to see His glorious image in cruelty handled ? Oh, what a difference is there betwixt the reasonable soul and the brazen image ! We, for this image, are able to set up a hundred ; but he is not able, for all his power, to set up one hair of these men if he kill them." These words being told the emperor, he suppressed his anger and drew off his forces. This monk, like another Moses, stood in the gap, and preserved the people. Happy had this angry age been if it had had such another ! Had but the generation of men formerly sprung up, with serious consideration, laid their hands more upon their hearts and less upon their swords, they would not have been so ready to break down the image of God in man, nor sheathe their swords in each other's bowels, as they have done.

CCLVI.—The Church's complaint for want of maintenance.

Ephr. Udali.
"Noli me tangere,"
Gen. xlii. 36.

As the old patriarch Jacob said of his children, when Benjamin was sent for by Joseph into Egypt, "Ye have bereaved me of my children : Joseph is not, and Simeon is not, and ye will take Benjamin also : all these things are against me," so may the poor Church of England complain, and say, "Ye have taken away my tithe and my glebe, and many other profits are not ; and now ye will take away the rest of my revenue. All these things," may the poor despised Church of England say, "are against me ;" unless, putting up that prayer of the patriarch, she prevail in it with God : "Now God Almighty give me favour in the eyes of the men, that they may send back that that is taken away already, and let that alone that yet remaineth." CCLVII.—Ministers and magistrates to be diligent in their places.

Godwin, in Vita.

King's Lecture on Jonah.

THOMAS à BECKET, some time Archbishop of Canterbury, an evil man, and in an evil cause, but with words not impertinent to his place had he well applied them, answered one who advised him to deal more moderately with the king, "Clavum teneo, et ad somnum me vocas (Sit I at the stern, and would you have me to sleep) ?" Thus it must be with ministers and magistrates : the one is not to keep silence, but to lift up his voice like a trumpet ; the other is not to bear the sword in vain. And why ? Because the one steereth the rudder of the Church, the other sitteth at the helm of state ; both of them, jure divino, having their warrants immediately from God so to do.

CCLVIII.—To bless God for our memories.

STAUPITIUS, tutor to Martin Luther, and a godly man, in a vain ostentation of his memory, repeated Christ's genealogy by heart in his sermon; but being about the captivity of Babylon, "I see," saith he, "God resisteth the proud," and so betook himself to his book again. Let no man, therefore, abuse his memory to be sin's register, nor make advantage thereof for wickedness, but let men be thankful to God for the continuance of their memories, whereas some proud people have been visited with such oblivion that they have forgotten their own names.

Melch. Adamus, in Vita.

Matt. i.

Fuller's Holy State.

CCLIX.—Christ is the true Christian's all in all.

"Do you ask me where be my jewels? My jewels are my husband and his triumphs," said Phocion's wife. "Do you ask me where be my ornaments? My ornaments are my two sons, brought up in virtue and learning," said the mother of the Gracchi. "Do you ask me where be my treasures? My treasures are my friends," said Constantius, the father of Constantine. But ask a child of God where be his jewels, his treasures, his ornaments, his comfort, his delight, and the joy of his soul, he will answer with that martyr, "None but Christ, none but Christ; Christ is all in all unto me."

Plutarch, in Phocione.

Smith's Sermon on Ps. ii. Col. iii. 17

CCLX.—Blessings turned into curses.

WHAT Tully reporteth amongst his wonders in nature, that in one country, in agro Nar-niensi siccitate tulum fieri, imbre pulverem (drought causeth dirt, and rain raiseth dust), may be truly applied unto us, that abundance of grace hath brought forth in us abundance of sin; and as sin took occasion by the law to wax more sinful, so iniquity hath never been more rife amongst us but through the ripeness of the Gospel. So far is it that we are become true Israelites, with Nathaniel, or but half—nay, almost—Christians, with Agrippa, that we are rather downright atheists—no Christians at all.

Ex Plinio, lib. xxxi., cap. 4.

King's Lecture on Jonab.

CCLXI.—Young ministers to be well principled.

THE natural history marketh that the whelps of the lions who have the sharpest paws do so prick the matrix of the dam that they are whelped the sooner, and so never come to a full strength and vigour. So fareth it with young men who, in confidence of their parts, hasten out of the universities before they be furnished with any gifts or abilities at all. Therefore, as Christ bade his disciples stay at Jerusalem till the Holy Ghost came down, so let them stay at Jericho till their beards be grown, till they be well principled, and enabled for the great work of the ministry.

Plinius.

Wicems' Pertraiture.

Luke xxiv. 49.

CCLXII.—Many seem to be willing, yet are loth to die.

A GENTLEMAN made choice of a fair stone and, intending the same for his grave-stone, caused it to be pitched up in a field a pretty distance off, and used often to shoot at it for his exercise. "Yea, but," said a wag that stood by, "you would be loth to hit the mark." Thus, many men build their tombs, prepare their coffins, make them Death's-head rings, with memento mori on them, yet never think of death, and are very unwilling to die, embracing this present world with the greater greediness.

Fuller's Holy State.

CCLXIII.—A minister to be able and well furnished.

Marchantii Hortus
Pastorum.
Josh. x. 16.

CALEB said to his men, "I will bestow my daughter upon one of you; but he that will have her must first win Kirjath-Sepher," i. e., a city of books—he must quit himself like a man; he must fight valiantly. And, certainly, he that will be one of God's priests, an ambassador of Christ, a true minister of the Word and sacraments, must not be such a one that runs before he is sent—that hath a great deal of zeal, but no knowledge at all to guide it—but one that is called of God, that hath lain long before Kirjath-Sepher, that hath stayed some time at the university, and cometh thence full fraught with good learning. Such a one, and such a one only, is a fit match for Caleb's daughter—fit to be a dispenser of God's Word and sacraments.

CCCLXIV.—Dangerous to be seduced by false teachers.

Lib. de Animal.

Willet, on Levit.

Matt. x. 17.

ARISTOTLE writeth of a certain bird called capri-mulgus (a goat-sucker), which useth to come flying on the goats, and suck them, and upon that the milk drieth up and the goat grows blind. So it befalls them who suffer themselves to be seduced by heretical and false teachers: their judgment is ever after corrupted and blinded, and, as it is said in the Gospel, "If the blind lead the blind, both fall into the ditch."

CCLXV.—Tongue-prayer not the only prayer.

Baker's Disquisition on Ps. li.

"Non chordis musica sed cor."

It is said that David praised God upon an instrument of ten strings, and he would never have told how many strings there were but that without doubt He made use of them all. God hath given all of us bodies, as it were instruments of many strings, and can we think it music good enough to strike but one string, to call upon Him with our tongues only? No, no; when the still sound of the heart by holy thoughts, and the shrill sound of the tongue by holy words, and the loud sound of the hands by pious works, do all join together that is God's concert, and the only music wherewith He is affected.

CCLXVI.—The way to have our will is to be subject to God's will.

Puller's Holy State.

It is reported of a gentleman travelling in a misty morning, that asked a shepherd (such men being greatly skilled in the physiognomy of the heavens) what weather it would be: "It will be," said the shepherd, "what weather pleaseth me;" and being courteously requested to express his meaning, "Sir," saith he, "it shall be what weather pleaseth God, and what weather pleaseth God pleaseth me." Thus a contented mind maketh men to have what they think fitting themselves; for, moulding their will into God's will, they are sure to have their will.

CCLXVII.—The excellency of good government.

Crinit's Sermon, on Job xxxix.

It hath been questioned and argued whether it were better to live under a tyrannous government, where every suspicion is made a crime, every crime capital, or under an anarchy, where every one may do what he list. And it hath been long since overruled that it is much better to live under a state, sub quo nihil liceat, quàm sub quo omnia (a bad government rather than none). So then, if the worst kind of government be a kind of blessing in comparison, what, then, is it to be under an able Christian ruler?—one that doth govern with counsel and rule with wisdom; and under such judges and magistracy that do not take themselves to be absolute, the supreme authority, but confess themselves to be dependent, that they are ὁπ' ἐξουσίαν, like the centurion in the Gospel, and to give an account, not only to him that is Judge of quick and dead, but also to the higher powers on earth, if they should chance to forget themselves? Matt. viii. 9.

CCLXVIII.—We must learn to live well before we desire to die.

As old Chremes in the comedy told Clitipho, his son, a young man without discretion, who, because he could not wring from his father ten pounds to bestow upon his sweetheart, had no other speech in his mouth but "Emori cupio (I desire to die; I would I were dead)!" But what says the old man? "First, I pray you, know what it is to live, and when you have learned that, then, if you be a-weary of your life, speak on." Thus they that are so hasty to pronounce the sentence of death against themselves, that wish themselves in their graves, out of the world, must first know what belongeth to the life of a Christian—why it was given them by the Lord of life, to what end He made them living souls, what duties and service He requireth at their hands: by that time these things are rightly considered they will be of another mind. Terence.

"Pride, quæso, discite quid sit vivere." King's Lect. on Jonab.

CCLXIX.—A negligent Christian no true Christian.

If a man should bind his son apprentice to some science or occupation, and when he had served his time should have to seek his trade, and be never a whit the more his craft's-master in the ending of his years than he was at the beginning, he would think he had lost his time, and complain of the injury of the master or the carelessness of the servant. Or, if a father should put his son to school, and he always should continue on the lowest form, and never get higher, we should judge either great negligence in the master or in the scholar. Behold, such apprentices or such scholars are most of us! The Church of God is the school of Christ, and the best place to learn the science of all sciences. Now, if we have many of us lived long therein, some of us twenty, some thirty, some forty, some fifty years, &c., and some longer, and we no wiser than a child of seven, were it not a great shame for us? What! no forwarder in religion than so? O disgrace! And may we not be condemned of great negligence in the matters of our salvation?

Attersoll, on Philom.

"Quid est, quod ex tanta turbâ discentium." &c.,—HUGO, lib. iii. Didac.

CCLXX.—Hypocrisy may pass for a time undiscovered.

MAUD, mother to King Henry II., being besieged in Winchester Castle, counterfeited herself to be dead, and so was carried out in a coffin, whereby she escaped. Another time, being besieged at Oxford, anno 1141, in a cold winter, with wearing white apparel she got away in the snow undiscovered. Thus some hypocrites, by dissembling mortification, that they are dead to the world, and by professing a snow-like purity in their conversations, may pass away a while undiscovered, but time will come that their vizards shall be pulled off their faces: they may go for a while muffled up in their cloaks of pretended sanctity and zeal for the public good, but all will be revealed at the last—if not here, hereafter.

Camden's Britan.

Paris's Hist.

Fuller's Holy State.

"Tandem apparbit utrum lupus sit in pelle ovina." &c.,—AUG., in Matt. vii.

CCLXXI.—Though the graces of godly parents cannot avail for bad children, yet their good example may prevail with them.

It was a custom amongst the Indians, after the death of any worthy man, to inscribe his name and his act upon the doors of his house, for the ennobling of his issue. So it was ever esteemed no mean blessing to be well-descended, to be born of noble Christian parents.

Philostrati, Statuæ.

Charon's Trois Feuilles.

And though thy father's goodness shall avail thee little if thou be'st not good thyself, "Nihil mihi conducit martyr pater, si male vixerò," said Origen (What if my father, for the testimony of a good conscience, gave his body to be burnt?—it shall do me no good if I live wickedly). Yet for all that, it availeth much to make a man good, there being no way more expeditious of instruction to good life than by the knowledge of things past and of the worthy acts of true Christian parents; their histories being our instruction, and their honours our incitements to goodness.

CCLXXII.—To look upon every day as the day of death.

Atterbull, or Philom.
Luke xii. 19.

THE rich man in the Gospel was a bad accountant when he set down a false sum to his soul, saying, "Thou hast much goods laid up for many years:" he sets down years for days—nay, years for hours—like the deceitful tradesman that sets down pounds for shillings. Thus many men that would seem to be cunning in the practice of this faculty are out of their reckonings and much deceived: they busy themselves in addition and multiplication, and dream of many years that they are to live, whereas they should be careful to practise subtraction and diminution, and know that every day—nay, every hour, every moment—calleth off a part of their lives.

P.S. in Vita And.
Willelmi.

CCLXXIII.—A contented Christian is a courageous Christian.

Aldrovandini, Orni- tholog., lib. iii.

It is reported of the eagle, that whereas all other birds make a noise when they are hungry, he is never heard to make any noise at all though he be very hungry indeed: and it is from the magnitude of his spirit that whatsoever befalls it, yet it is not always whining and repining as other fowls will do when they want their food; it is because it is above hunger and above thirst. So it is an argument of a gracious magnitude of spirit, that whatsoever befalls it, yet it is not always whining and complaining so as others are, but goes on still in its way and course, and blesses God, and keeps in a constant tenour whatsoever thing befalls it; such things as cause others to be dejected and fretted and vexed and takes away all the comfort of their lives, make no alteration at all in their spirits.

Burrough's Christ.
Content.

CCLXXIV.—Many are the troubles of the righteous.

Boys' Psall.

If they were many, and not troubles, then, as it is in the proverb, "the more the merrier;" or if they were troubles, and not many, then the fewer the better cheer. But it hath so pleased the almighty God to couple them both together, many and troubles—in nature, of troubles; in number, many—that "through many tribulations we might enter into the kingdom of heaven."

CCLXXV.—Hospitality commendable.

P.S. in Vita, præ- fecti a Symoni Paphumi.

It is reported of Mr. Thomas Willet, a grave divine, and father of the indefatigable Dr. Andrew Willet, who also in his younger years was sub-almoner unto that reverend prelate, Dr. Cox, eleemosynary and schoolmaster unto King Edward VI., then England's young Josiah, that, having two benefices, Barley, in Hertfordshire, and Thurkiston, in Leicestershire, a living of good value, where, having provided a sufficient curate for the place, once or twice a year he came, and spent the means amongst them, relieving some way or other every one of them—the better sort of them by hospitality and entertainment, the poorer by his alms,—all of them by his prayers; remembering the apostle's exhortation, "to be given to hospitality," and fearing, as Jerome said of himself, "ne Maria cum Josephum locum in diversorio non inveniat (lest Mary and Joseph should want room in the inn)."

1 Tim. iii. 2.

Jerome, in Epist.
Rufino.

or Jesus Himself, excluded, might say another day, "I was a stranger, and ye took me not in," he refused no guest that came. A happy man, in making himself so happy a precedent of piety and pity to succeeding times! But where is the charity, the hospitality, the tenderness of bowels, the largeness of heart, in these straight-laced times of ours? Here is fasting and prayer amongst us, but where are the alms that must go along with them? It was not the prayers of Cornelius alone, but the prayers and alms of Cornelius together, that went up into the presence of God. Let but a despised member of Christ (not to speak of common mendicants) whose wants are smothered up in a modest silence, whose looks and clothes and all speak for relief,—let, I say, but such a one appear, what is the answer? "I have not for you!"—and I think so too, not a heart to do any good—"God bless you! God comfort you! Be warmed, be filled!"—and yet give them nothing. This is the charity of these uncharitable times. And, indeed, if men could but eat precepts and drink good counsel, they would soon find hospitality in abundance.

Acts x.

James ii. 16.

CCLXXVI.—A covetous man good for nothing till death.

It is a common saying that a swine is good for nothing whilst he is alive: not good to bear or carry, as the horse; nor to draw, as the ox; nor to clothe, as the sheep; nor to give milk, as the cow; nor to keep the house, as the dog; but ad solam mortem nutritur (fed only to the slaughter). So a covetous rich man, just like a hog, doth no good with his riches whilst he liveth, but when he is dead his riches come to be disposed of. "The riches of a sinner are laid up for the just."

Willst, on Levit.

Job xxvii. 17.

CCLXXVII.—Others' harms to be our arms.

THE Lacedemonians were wont to make their servants drunk, and then to show them to their children, that they then beholding their frantic fits and apish behaviour, once seeing, might ever shun that beastly vice. Our sins have made this land, which formerly was our faithful servant, drunk with blood; it is to be hoped that our children, seeing the miserable fruits and effects thereof, will grow so wise and wary by their father's folly, as for ever to take heed how they engage themselves in such a civil war again.

Justin., Hist.

Fuller's Serm., 1644.

CCLXXVIII.—The vanity and danger of late repentance.

It is an exorbitant course, while the ship is sound, the tackling sure, the pilot well, the sailors strong, the gale favourable, the sea calm, to lie idle at road, carding, dicing, drinking, burning seasonable weather, and when the ship leaks, the pilot is sick, the mariners faint, the storm boisterous, and the sea tumultuous, then to launch forth and hoist up sail for a voyage into far countries. And yet such is even the skill of evening-repenters, who, though in the morning of youth and soundness of health, and perfect use of reason, they cannot resolve to weigh the anchor and cut the cable that withdraws them from seeking Christ; nevertheless, they feed themselves with a strong persuasion that when their wits are distracted, their senses astonished, all the powers of the mind and parts of the body distempered, then, forsooth, they think to leap into heaven with a "Lord, have mercy upon me!" in their mouths, to become saints at their death, however they have demeaned themselves like devils all their life before.

Boyd's Psall.

"Sed medicina paratur, cum mala per longas convaluere moras."—OVID.

CCLXXIX.—The saints' knowledge of one another in heaven.

P. S. in Vita, ut antist.

Gen. ii. 23.

MRS. WILLET made a query unto her husband, Dr. Willet, then lying on his death-bed, touching the mutual knowledge that the saints in glory have one of another. Such another question being proposed to Luther a little before his death, he resolves her with the words of Luther (unto which Chemnitius and many others do subscribe), that as Adam in the estate of innocency, when God first presented Eve unto him, whom he had never seen before, asked not whence she came, but said, "This is bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh," even so the saints of God in heaven, beatifically illuminated with knowledge beyond Adam's in his first condition, shall know not only those whom here they knew not, but even those whom before they never saw.

CCLXXX.—Satan tempteth by degrees.

Aristot., Hist. Animal., lib. v."Vires acquirit sundo,"

John xviii.

It is observed of the crocodile, that he cometh of an egg no bigger than a goose-egg, yet he groweth till he be fifteen cubits long—Pliny says thirty; he is also long-lived, and—which is much—increaseth as long as he liveth. This setteth forth the manner of the increasing of Satan's kingdom, and how cunningly he disposeth of his temptations. First he beginneth with small matters, and so by degrees to greater; from thought to consent, from consent to action, from action to custom, from custom to a habit of sin. Judas is first inured to theft, and trained up in another false trick, as in repining at the box of ointment poured on Christ; at the length he is brought to betray his Master. Thus was the gradation of Peter's sin: first lying, then cursing, after swearing, &c.

CCLXXXI.—National judgments call for national repentance.

Fuller's Serm., 1642.

■ Chron. xiv. 17.

SUPPOSE that the sea should break forth in this land—as such a thing might soon come to pass, were not the waters thereof countermanded by God's prerogative royal—it is not the endeavour of a private man can stop it. What if he goes with a faggot on his back, and a mattock on his shoulder, and a spade in his hand? His desire is more commendable than his discretion, it being more likely the sea should swallow him than he stop the mouth of it. No; the whole country must come in: children must bring earth in their hats, women in their aprons, men with hand-barrows, wheel-barrows, carts, cars, wains, waggons,—all must work, lest all be destroyed. So when a general deluge and inundation of God's anger seizeth upon a whole kingdom, when He breaks in upon a nation like the breaking forth of waters, it cannot be stopped by the private endeavours of some few, but it must be an universal work, by a general repentance—all must raise banks to bound it. Till this be done, no hope of peace, no hope of reconciliation at all.

CCLXXXII.—How Christ's sufferings are made ours.

Boys' Postill.

As the burgess of a town or corporation, sitting in the parliament house, beareth the person of that whole town or place, and what he saith the whole town saith, and what is done to him is done to the whole town, even so Christ upon the cross stood in our place, and bare our persons, and whatsoever He suffered we suffered, and when He died all died with Him—all the faithful died in Him, and, as He is risen again, so the faithful are risen in Him.

CCLXXXIII.—A worldly-minded man speaketh of nothing but worldly things.

WHEN a clock within is disordered, and the wheels out of frame, the hammer and bell must needs give an uncertain sound; so, when our hearts are inwardly disordered and corrupted with worldliness and profaneness, our speech outwardly accordeth with them. The doorkeeper said unto Peter, "Thou art surely a Galilean: thy speech bewrayeth thee;" and whosoever he be that hath his mind taken up and chiefly delighted with the world's music hath his tongue also tuned to the same key, and taketh his joy and comfort in speaking of nothing else but the world and worldly things. If the world be in his heart, it will break out at the lips: a worldly-minded man speaketh of nothing but worldly things.

Downham's Christ. Warfare.

CCLXXXIV.—Censurers not to be regarded.

LANQUET, in his Chronicle, relateth that in Friesland there was a fantastical prophet, named David George, who, calling himself God's nephew, said heaven was empty, and that he was sent to choose the children of God—that the great work of election was left unto his disposal, to appoint such as he thought fit to be saved. Thus in our time there be many such prophets, electing and damning whom they please, deifying this man and devilifying that man; but sure it is, they have no more authority to make devils than the pope hath to make saints. As, then, a number of his saints are in hell, so, questionless, many of their devils are glorious saints in heaven.

Page 320.

Boys' Positill.

CCLXXXV.—The certainty of God's will and purpose.

THE wheels in a watch or a clock move contrary one to another, some one way, some another, yet all serve the intent of the workman, to show the time, or to make the clock to strike. So in the world, the providence of God may seem to run cross to His promises; one man takes this way, another runs that way; good men go one way, wicked men another; yet all in conclusion accomplish the will and centre in the purpose of God, the great Creator of all things.

Sibbs' Serm., 1632.

CCLXXXVI.—A wicked man believes not there is a hell till he be in it.

TOSTATUS observeth, out of Pliny, that the mole, after he hath long lived under ground, beginneth to see when he dieth: "Oculus incipit aperire moriendo, quos clausos habuit vivendo (he beginneth to open his eyes in dying, which he always had shut whilst he lived)." This is the true state of a wicked earthly-minded man: he neither seeth heaven nor thinketh of hell. Tell him that the wicked shall be turned into hell, and all that forget God, it is but as brutum fulmen (a mere scarecrow); he feareth not God nor man all his lifetime, till he approacheth to judgment, and then too soon he beginneth to feel that which he could not be brought to believe.

Willst, on Levit., qu. xcii.

Ps. ix. 17.

CCLXXXVII.—The world's dangerous allurements.

THERE is a kind of serpent, called by the Greeks συντάλη, which, when she cannot overtake the fleeing passengers, doth with her beautiful colours so amaze them, that they have no power to pass away till she hath stung them. So doth the counterfeit beauty and bravery of the world inveigle and bewitch those who behold it with over-partial eyes, that they stand astonished till it have stung them with carnal concupiscence and doting love, so as they have neither will nor power to set one foot towards their heavenly country.

Downham's Christ. Warfare.

CCLXXXVIII.—*The excellency of the Scripture in its fullness.*Boya's Psall.

MEN talk much of the philosopher's stone, that it turns copper into gold; of cornucopia, that it had all things necessary for food in it; of panacea, the herb, that it was good for all diseases; of catholicon, the drug, that it is instead of all purges; of Vulcan's armour, that it was full proof against all thrusts and blows, &c. Well, that which they did attribute vainly to these things for bodily good, we may with full measure attribute justly to the Scripture in a spiritual manner. It is not a herb, but a tree, or rather a complete paradise of trees, of life, which bring forth fruit every month, and the fruit thereof is for meat and the leaves for medicine—in a word, it is a panacea of wholesome food against fenowed traditions; a physician's shop of preservatives against poisoned heresies; a pandect of profitable laws against rebellious spirits; a treasury of most costly jewels against beggarly rudiments.

Rev. xxii. 2.

"Schola celestis, cruditio vitalis."—
CANTODOR., in Pi.
XV.

CCLXXXIX.—*The fullness of God.*Sibbs' Serm., 1629.

LAND-FLOODS make a great noise, swell high, but are suddenly in again, whereas the spring or well-head continueth full without augmentation or diminution: such are the things of the world; such are all creature helps; how do they flourish for a while, but are soon gone! But God, He is the Well-head, puteus inexhaustibilis (never to be drawn dry), the eternal Spring that feeds all other streams. In Him, and in Him only, are the rivers of pleasures for evermore.

CCXC.—The blessing of God is to be eyed more than our own endeavours.

Burges, Of Justifi- cation,
Hab. i. 16.

It is Seneca's observation, that the husbandmen in Egypt never look up to heaven for rain in the time of drought, but look after the overflowing of the banks of Nile to be the only cause of their plenty. And such are they that sacrifice to their own nets and drag, that look upon their own endeavours, attribute all success to their own projects, and in the meantime never so much as cast up an eye unto God, the Author of all, in whom they live, by whom they move, and from whom they have their being.

CCXCI.—Sacrilege condemned by the example of Cyrus.

Hall's Contempt, Zerub. Ezia.

CYRUS, having relieved the Jews from their captivity in Babylon, doth not dismiss them with an empty grace, but with a royal bounty. What a mountain of plate was then removed from Babylon to Jerusalem! No fewer than five thousand and four hundred vessels of gold and silver. Certainly, this great monarch wanted not wit to think, "It is a rich booty that I find in the temples of Babylon! Having vanquished their gods, I may well challenge their spoil. How seasonably doth it now fall into my hands to reward my soldiers! How pat doth it come to settle my new empire! What if this treasure came from Jerusalem, the property is altered; the very place, according to the conceit of the Jews, hath profaned it. The true God, I have heard, is curious; neither will abide those vessels which have been polluted with idolatrous uses. It shall be enough if I loose the bonds of this miserable people. If I give liberty, let the next give wealth. They will think themselves happy with bare walls in their native country. To what purpose should I pamper their penury with a sudden store?" But the princely heart of Cyrus, though a heathen, would admit of no such base, sacrilegious thoughts. Those vessels that he found stamped with God's mark he will return to the owner; neither his own occasions nor their abuse shall be any colour of their detention. Oh, Cyrus, Cyrus! how many close-handed, gripple-minded Christians shall at once be choked in judgment, with the example of thy just munificence ! Thou restoredst that which is now ordinarily purloined. The lands, the treasures, the utensils of the Church are now rifled and devoured ; but there is a woe to those houses that are stored with the spoils of God's temple, and a woe to those fingers that are tainted with holy treasures.

"Quis enim læsus impune putaret esse Dicos?"—TUCAN.

CCXCII.—The minister's blessing after sermon to be attended.

It is reported of Dr. Lake, Bishop of Bath and Wells, that whether it were so that himself preached or not, after the sermon done and the psalm sung, as the manner is, standing up in his episcopal seat, he gave the benediction to the people, after the example of the high priest (Numb. vi. 23), which thing as he performed like himself—i. e., in a most grave and father-like manner—so any man that had but seen with what attentive and devout gestures all the people received it, what apparent comfort they took in it, and how careful every particular man was not to depart the church without it, could not but conclude that there was quædam vis et efficacia (a secret virtue) in the prayers and blessings as of the natural so of spiritual parents, which, as they are never the worse for giving, so those that have relation to them are much the better for receiving. And it is not for nought that the apostle saith, "The lesser useth to be blessed of the greater." Much, then, are they to be blamed that rush out of the church, leaving such a blessing behind them. They think all is done when the sermon is done ; nor is the sermon done till they have practised what they have heard ; and the only way so to do is to attend the blessing of the minister, as a good preparative thereunto, which no doubt will procure God's blessing thereupon, and then all is completed. Again, if grace after meat be required, surely grace after the Word heard is much more necessary ; and if "Much good do it you !" be good manners after a dinner, surely "Much good do it us !" "Much good do it my soul !" is more than a compliment after a sermon.

In Preface to his Works.

Flac. Illiric., Clavis Scriptæ, in Verba Benedicere.

Heb. vii. 7.

Croke's Sermon,
Bath, 1612.

CCXCIII.—A rich fool described.

A GREAT man, lying on his death-bed, sent first for his physician to advise with him about the recovery of his health. No means were left untried, but all in vain ; the physician gave him up for a dead man. Then he sends for his lawyer : much time was spent with him in making his will : there he settles his estate on friends and kindred, strives to make the inheritance of his land sure to his heir, and in the interim neglects his own in heaven. Yet, however, if it be but for formality's sake, he will not seem to be utterly careless in that point ; and therefore, in the last place, he sends for the physician of his soul, to consult about his spiritual estate, even then, when he was hardly capable of any advice at all. His fool standing by, and having observed all that passed, desired his master to give him the staff that he used to walk withal. He gives it to him, but on condition that he should give it back again to the next he met with that was a verier fool than himself. "Nay, then," said the fool, "here, master, take the staff again, for a verier fool than thou art I shall never meet again, that didst first send for a physician to strengthen thy body, then for a lawyer to make thy will, and in the last place for the priest to comfort thy poor soul, which should have been the first work of all." And such fools are they that ravel out their precious time tormented with the cares of the world, that lade themselves with thick clay, such as sing requiems to their souls, that put the evil day far from them with a nondum venit tempus (till it come to the last pinch), that the last sand is dropping in the glass and their souls, except God be more merciful, into the pit of hell for ever.

Adam's Sermon,
Lond., 1617.

'Læc, bibere, lude,
post mortem nulla
voluptas."

CCXCIV.—Not to continue angry.

Two Grecian bishops, being fallen out about some difference in point of judgment, parted asunder in great anger; but the elder of them (for so the wiser is to be accounted) sent unto his colleague a message, only in these words, "Sol ad occasum (The sun is about to go down)." The other no sooner heard it but he reflected on that of the apostle, "Let not the sun go down upon your wrath," and so they were both friends again. How doth this amity of theirs condemn the enmity that is amongst many of us at this time! As that deadly feud of the Scots, who entailed their lands on posterity conditionally that they should fight against the party that had offended, and never entertain any the least pacification; and such wrangling lawsuits as that of the two noble families Barclay and Lisle, which began in the reign of Edward IV. and continued to the first year of King James, full seven score years. It cannot be denied but that a man may, with good qualifications, go to law for his own; but the length of time in the suit, when the grandchild shall hardly end that which the grandfather began, may draw on a great suspicion in the want of charitable affection.

Eph. iv. 26.

Fuller's Sermon, 1627.

CCXCV.—The only comfort of a Christian is his propriety in God.

THE conceit of propriety hardens a man against many inconveniences and addeth much to his pleasure. The mother abides many painful throes, many unquiet thoughts, many unpleasant savours of her child, upon this thought, "It is my own." The indulgent father magnifies that in his own son which he would scarce like in a stranger. And why? Because he is his own. The want of this to God-ward makes us so subject to discontentment and cools our delight in God, because we think of Him aloof off, as One in whom we are not interested. Could we but think, "It is my God that cheereth me with His presence and blessings whilst I prosper; my God that afflicteth me in love when I am dejected; it is my Saviour that sits at the right hand of my God in heaven; my angels stand in His presence;" it could not be but that God's favour would be sweeter, His chastisements more easy, His benefits more effectual unto us.

Hall's Contempl., ut antea.

CCXCVI.—Ministers and physicians, of all men, not to be covetous.

LUD. VIVES, that worthy learned man, doth wonder at some physicians that they could possibly be covetous and greedy upon the world, inasmuch as, both in their speculative study and their practical ministrations, they behold every day how fickle a thing life is, how soon the breath is gone, how the strongest die in a moment, and the youngest fall on the sudden, and so, by consequence, that the use of riches is uncertain, and that all worldly things are transitory. And it were to be wished that many physicians of the soul were not sick of the same disease. They know that all flesh is grass, and the grace of it but a flower; that our breath is but a vapour and our life but as a bubble. They speak much of mortality, and preach other men's funeral sermons, yet, in the midst of their studies of condemning the world they are in love with the world, and look too much after mammon.

Lib. de Tradend. Discip.

Abbot's Lectures on Jonab.
Isa. xl. 6.

Jam. iv. 14.

CCXCVII.—The loss of grace made good again in Christ only.

EPIPHANUS maketh mention of those that travel by the deserts of Syria, where are nothing but miserable marshes and sands, destitute of all commodities—nothing to be had for love or money. If it so happen that their fire go out by the way, then they light it again at the heat of the sun, by the means of a burning-glass or some other device that they have. And thus, in the wilderness of this world, if any man have suffered the sparks of divine grace to die in him, the fire of zeal to go out in his heart, there is no means under the sun to enliven those dead sparks, to kindle that extinguished fire again, but at the Sun of righteousness, that Fountain of Light, Jesus Christ.

Lib. de Anchorat.

Moulin's Comment
cants.

CCXCVIII.—To love our enemies and do them good.

It was wont to be said of Archbishop Cranmer, if you would be sure to have Cranmer do you a good turn, you must do him some ill one; for though he loved to do good to all, yet especially he would watch for opportunity to do good to such as had wronged him. O that there were but a few such leading men of such sweet spirits amongst us, how great a blessing of peace might we enjoy! Did we but rejoice in any opportunity in doing any office of love to those who differ from us—yea, to those who have wronged us—things would be in a better posture than they are.

Fox's Act and Monuments.

Burrough's Heart-
Divisions.

CCXCIX.—Plain preaching is profitable.

In the building of Solomon's temple there was no noise heard, either of axes or hammers; all the stones were prepared, squared, and fitted in the quarry. And thus the minister, in the building up of the mystical body of Christ, should make all the noise in his study: there he must turn his books and beat his brains; but when it comes to church-work, to the pulpit, then it must be in plainness, not with intricacy and tying of knots, but with all easiness that may be. It is confessed that painted glass in churches is more glorious, but plain glass is more perspicuous: oratory may tickle the brain, but plain doctrine will sooner inform the judgment; that sermon hath most learning in it that hath most plainness. Hence it is that a great scholar was wont to say, "Lord, give me learning enough that I may preach plain enough." For people are very apt to admire that they understand not, but to preach plainly is that which is required.

Shute's Serm.,
Lond., 1627.
1 Kings vi. 7.

Staughton's Serm.,
Lond., 1637.

Lake's Bath.

1 Cor. xiv. 25.

CCC.—The very approaches of afflictions torment the wicked.

PLUTARCH telleth that it is the quality of tigers, that if drums or tabors sound about them, they will grow mad, and then they tear their own flesh and rend themselves in pieces. And it is so with the unbelieving reprobate, with all wicked men: if they do but hear the noise of afflictions, the very sound of sorrows approaching, how do they fret and fume and torment themselves!—nay, by cursing and swearing, how do they rend the body of Christ from top to toe in pieces!

Lib. de Superstitiis.

CCCI.—Malice and envy not fit guests for God's table.

ST. AUGUSTINE could not endure any at his table that would show any malice against others in backbitings or detractings, and had therefore two lines written on his table, to be as it were monitors to such as sat thereat, that, in such cases, the table was not for them:—

Posidon, de Vita.

"Quisquis amat dictis absentem rodere famam, Hanc mensam vetitam noverit esse sibi."

Thus Englished—

"He that doth love an absent friend to jeer,
May hence depart; no room is for him here."

Dyke's Worthy Communicant.

And how much less will the Lord endure any at His table that come thither with malice and hatred against their brethren? If love be required at our own tables, how much more will God require it in those that come to His table. When one man's heart swells with envy against another, when a second is filled with malice and hatred, this is not to eat the Lord's Supper, but to eat one another; this is not to sit at the Lord's table, but to be a guest at the table of devils.

CCCII.—Preparation to religious duties must be free from worldly distractions.

Nanton's Fragment, Regalia.

Burrough's Gospel-Worship.

It was said of Sir William Cecil, some time Lord Treasurer of England, that when he went to bed, he would throw off his gown and say, "Lie there, Lord Treasurer!" as bidding adieu to all state affairs, that he might the more quietly repose himself. So, when we go to any religious duty, whether hearing or praying, coming to the Lord's table, or in any other religious addresses whatsoever, we should say, "Lie by, world; lie by, all secular cares, all household affairs, all pleasures, all traffic, all thoughts of gain! Lie by, all; adieu, all!" We must now be as those that have nothing to do with the world for the time; we must separate our hearts from all common uses, that our hearts may be wholly for our God.

CCCIII.—Dangerous to interpose with a divided people.

"In vita per incuriam."

* Rich. Sibbs, D.D.

Burrough's Heart-Divisions.

It was once said to Luther, when he was about interesting himself in seeking reformation of those bad times, "Abi in cellam, et dic, miserere nostri (O Luther, rather get you into your cell and say, Lord have mercy upon us)." And another* being once asked why he did not write his judgment about the controversy of the time, answered, "Cui usui reipublicæ? cui bono mihi (To what purpose? it would not help the cause, but much hazard him that should meddle)." And most true it is he that meddles with the divisions of the times may expect to be divided himself; to have his name, his reputation cut asunder, and thrown this way and that way. It hath ever been an unthankful work to meddle with a divided people: a man may with as much safety put his hands into a nest of hornets as to interpose in the midst of such wild and unruly divisions as are now amongst us.

CCCIV.—A good man is bettered by afflictions.

Plutarch, de Tranquillitate.

Abbot's Lect. on Jonah.

THE bee is observed to suck out honey from the thyme, a most hard and dry herb: so the good and faithful-minded man sucketh knowledge and obedience from the bitter potion of adversity and the cross, and turneth all to the best. The scouring and rubbing which fret others make him shine the brighter; the weight which crusheth others makes him, like the palm-tree, grow the better; the hammer which knocks others all in pieces makes him the broader and the larger—"in incude et malleo dilatantur (they are made broader on the anvil, and with the hammer);" although it be with the hammer, yet, dilatantur, they are made to grow the wider.

CCCV.—The trial of faith is the enlargement of faith.

Gratiat., Dux Procaturn.

"Talis est natura fidei," &c.—CHRYSOST., in Matt. xiii.

EXAMINATION and trial of a good scholar hurts him not, either in his learning or in his credit; nay, it advanceth him much in both: his very examination rubs up his learning, puts much upon him, and sends him away with the approbation of others. And thus in the trial of faith there is an exercise of faith; faith examined and tried proves a faith strengthened and increased. Some things sometimes prove the worse and suffer loss by trial, but the more faith is tried, the more faith is enlarged.

CCCVI.—Unprofitable hearers of the Word described.

A MARINER, when he takes his leave of his friends on the shore, sees them a while, but when he is sailed a little further, then they are quite out of sight, and he sees only the houses; then sailing a little further, he sees nothing but steeples, and such high places; but then, sailing a little further, nihil est nisi pontus et aer (he sees nothing but air and water)." So it is with too, too many unprofitable hearers of the Word: it may be that, when they are gone home from the church, there are some things fresh in memory, but on the next day they have lost some; but there are some other things that do yet present themselves before them, and then they lose more and more, till they have lost the sight of all;—no more of the Word appears than as if they had heard nothing at all.

Burrough's Gospel.
Workif.

"Multi vocem predicationis audiunt, sed post vocem vacui recedunt."—
GREG., Moral.

CCCVII.—All divisions are against nature.

PHILOSOPHERS say "Non datur vacuum (there cannot be vacuity in the world);" the world could not stand, but would be dissolved, if every part were not filled, because nature subsists by being one. If there were the least vacuity, then all things would not be joined in one; there would not be a contiguity of one part with another. This is the reason why water will ascend, when the air is drawn out of a pipe, to fill it. This is to prevent division in nature. Oh that we had but so much naturalness in us, that when we see there is like to be any breach of union, we would be willing to lay down our self-ends, our self-interests, and to venture ourselves to be anything in the world, but sin, that so we may still be joining, still uniting, and not rending from each other!

Oviedo, Ariagua.

Whitaker's Sermon,
Weston, 1646.

CCCVIII.—The hell of a guilty conscience.

PHILO JUDÆUS telleth that Flaccus played all the parts of cruelty that he could devise against the Jews, for their religion's sake; but afterward, when the doom of Caligula fell upon him and he was banished to Andros, an island near Greece, he was so tormented with the memory of his bloody iniquities and a fear of suffering for them, that if he saw any man walking softly near to him, he would say to himself, "This man is devising to work my destruction;" if he saw any go hastily, "Surely it is not for nothing; he maketh speed to kill me." If any man spake him fair, he suspected that he would cozen him, and sought to entrap him; if any talked roughly to him, then he thought that he contemned him; if meat were given to him in any plentiful sort, "This is but to fat me as a sheep or an ox, to be slaughtered." Thus his sin did lie upon him, and ever remind him that some vengeance was to follow from God or man, or both. And this is the case of all wilful, bloody, presumptuous sinners, that though there be some strugglings and wrestlings to the contrary, yet their hearts and consciences are greater than themselves, and will put them in mind that nothing but destruction waiteth on them. If they walk abroad, sonus excitat omnis suspensum (they are afraid of every leaf that wags); if they stay at home, nothing but horror attends them: in the day they are struck with variety of sad apprehensions, and in the night they are tormented with fearful dreams and strange apparitions. Such and so great is the hell of a guilty conscience.

"Sonus excitat omnis suspensum."—
VIRGIL.

Abbot's Lect. on Jonah.

"Nihil est miserius, quam hominis animus conscius."—
PLAUT.

CCCIX.—Love of God's children is a sincere love.

THE son of a poor man, that hath not a penny to give or leave him, yields his father obedience as cheerfully as the son of a rich man, that looks for a great inheritance. It is, indeed, love to the father, not wages from the father, that is the ground of a good child's

De Trugillo, Tbbsaur. Cœdemat.

"Oderunt peccare boni virtutis amore," obedience. If there were no heaven, God's children would obey Him, and though there were no hell, yet would they do their duty, so powerfully doth the love of the Father constrain them.

CCCX.—Ministers to be men of merciful dispositions.

Nanton's *Frag.
Regalia.*

Prov. xii. 10.

Woodnoth's New Descent on Old Records.

THE Lord Ellesmere, some time Lord Chancellor of England, a great lover of mercy, was heard to profess that if he had been a preacher this should have been his text: "A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast." A merciful man and a merciful text well met. But oh, the prophetic incendiaries of the late fearful, unnatural civil war! How far were they from this sweetness of disposition!—how far from thoughts and bowels of mercy!—how far from a desire to preach mercy!—when it was a common course with them, by viperine glosses, to eat out the bowels of a merciful text; when nothing was more usual amongst them than to allege the words of the Scripture against the meaning—than to wrong and wring the Scripture till it bled again, but they would misconstrue and misapply it one way or other, to stir and incite men to such actions as little became the profession of the Gospel.

CCCXI.—Election known by sanctification.

Negat. Of Obedience.

IF any man would know whether the sun shineth or not, let him go no further, but look upon the ground to see the reflection of the sunbeams from thence, and not upon the body of the sun, which will but the more dazzle his sight. The pattern is known by the picture, the cause by the effect. Let no man, then, soar aloft to know whether he be elected or not, but let him gather the knowledge of his election from the effectualness of his calling and sanctification of his life, the true and proper effects of a lively faith stamping the image of God's election in his soul.

CCCXII.—Men commonly are loth to die, though seemingly willing thereto.

De Sena et Morie.

Abbot's Lect. on Jonah.

"Nulli hominum fidus est amicus tu-mulo,"—EURIPID.

It is but Æsop's fable, but the moral of it is true: a poor desolate old man, returning home from the wood with a burthen of sticks on his back, threw them down, and, in remembrance of the misery which he sustained, called often for Death to come unto him, as if he would live no longer. But when Death came to him in earnest and asked him what he should do, the old man presently changed his mind, and said that his request unto him was that he would help him up with his wood. This most commonly is our case: we would find some other business to set Death about if he should come to us, when vainly we have wished for him; we dismiss him with a nondum venit tempus,—bid him call to-morrow, we are not yet at leisure. How do men vainly wish for death, and how mercifully doth the Eternal deal with them! who oftentimes, in His love, denieth that which they so earnestly desire, and which, if they should presently enjoy, they would prove of all men most miserable; for being removed hence, it is to be feared the accounts betwixt God and their own souls would fall short of what they should be.

CCCXIII.—A special sacrament-duty to bless God for Christ's death.

Tamul. Judæorum.

THE Jews, in the celebration of the Passover, did sing the 113th Psalm, with the five following psalms, which they called "The Great Hallelujah," and it was always after that cup of wine which they called "paculum hymni," or "laudationis" (the cup of praise). And thus it should be with us: at all times, upon all occasions, in all places, we should sing hallelujahs to God, and praise His holy name; but at the sacrament, in that eucharistical action, we should sing a great hallelujah. No time but we should bless God for the work of our redemption, but at the sacrament we should have our hearts greatly enlarged, in a more special manner to bless God for the benefit of Christ's death and the sweet comforts that we receive thereby in the use of the sacrament.

Dykes' Worthy Communicant.

CCCXIV.—Not lawful to fight for religion.

WHEN Mahomet was about to establish his abominable superstition, wherein he had mingled the laws and doctrines of heathens, of Jews, false Christians, and heretics, with the illusions and inventions of his own brain, he gave it forth for a main principle how God at the first, in His love to mankind, sent Moses, after him Jesus Christ, who were both of them endued with power to work miracles; but men gave small heed to them; therefore He determined to send Mahomet, a man without miracles, a warrior with a sword in his hand, that whom miracles had not moved weapons might compel. Thus they may derive their authority, perhaps, by a long descent from Mahomet's pretended charter, but most sure it is they can find no syllable of allowance in the great assured sacred charter of God's Word, who seek to set up religion by the sword. Fire and faggots are but sad reformers. The Church, therefore, was wont to be gathered by the mouths of ministers, not by the swords of soldiers. It was well said of one, "Let religion sink to hell, rather than we should call to the devil for help to support it."

Pomp. Lætus, de Exortu Mahom.

"Flectere si nequeo superos, Acheronta movebo."

Fuller.

CCCXV.—The weight of sin to be seriously poised.

PORTERS and carriers, when they are called to carry a burthen on their shoulders, first they look diligently upon it, then they poise and lift it up, to try whether they be able to undergo it and whether they shall have strength to carry it when it is once on their backs; and thus should every man do that, for a little pleasure, hath enthralled himself to carry the burthen of sin. He should first prove and assay what a weight sin is, what a burthen the punishment of sin is, which he must bear or sink under it; and by this means he shall soon find himself at a loss, "For a wounded spirit who can bear it?"

Granatens, Dux Peccatorum.

Prov. xviii, 14.

CCCXVI.—Licentious libertines impatient of government.

THERE was some time in Gaunt, as divers of the magistrates were sitting on a bench in the streets, a beggar who, passing along, craved their alms, and complained that he had a secret disease lying in his bones and running all over his body which he might not, for shame, discover unto them. They, moved with pity, gave him each of them somewhat, and he departed. One more curious than the rest bade his man follow him and learn, if he could, what that secret disease should be; who, coming to him, and seeing nothing outwardly upon him, but well to look at: "Forsooth," quoth the beggar, "that which pains me you see not; I have a disease lying in my bones and in all my parts, so that I cannot work. Some call it sloth and some others call it idleness." Now, there is a sort of men that have a disease which holds them much like this of the beggar's;—they cannot endure to be subject. To have looked at them formerly, you could have discerned little or nothing, for they were close; but there crept over all their body, through every joint, and was settled in their marrow, and is now broke out at their mouths, a lordly humour, that they cannot obey nor understand themselves to be any longer subjects than they please themselves.

Phil. Cameracensis.

White's Serm., Lond., 1610.

"Quincta licere creditur,"—AUSON.

CCCXVII.—Preaching tradesmen, preaching soldiers, &c., not sent of God.

Niceph., Hist., lib. xvi., cap. 18.

Wicems's Exercit.

Noster Attica, lib. v., cap. 4.

THERE is a relation how Zeno the emperor tempted God in the choice of a Church-man, by laying a blank paper on the altar, that God might write in the paper the name of him who should be bishop of Constantinople. But one Flavitus, that was otherwise scholar enough, corrupting the sexton with a considerable sum of money, caused him to write in his name, and so obtained the bishopric. And are there not many amongst us clero-laics, preaching tradesmen, preaching soldiers, &c.? Such there are, but certainly not sent of God, not written down in the book of God's approbation, but are crept in by the corruption of the time, and have boldly thrown themselves into the work of the ministry, and are many of them the only men admired for gifts: of whom it may be said, as some time Aulus Gellius did of one Vendidius Bassus—

*"Concurrile omnes augures, aruspices,
Portentum inusitatum conflatum est recens;
Nam mulos qui fricabat, Consul factus est."*

2 Kings vi. 25.

But, blessed be God! there is yet no such a famine in this our Samaria, that an ass's head should be valued at fourscore pieces of silver.

CCCXVIII.—Scholars not to be unthankful to the university that bred them.

JEllan., Variar. Hist., lib. iv.
Woodnoth's New Descant on Old Records.

ARISTOTLE, having gotten great learning from Plato, by whom he was taught no less than ten years, afterwards became a great enemy unto him, and by all means sought his discredit—a course clean contrary to all moral rules, and even common humanity; the which unthankfulness caused Plato to call him mule, the property of which is, that when they have filled themselves with their mother's milk, they beat their dams with their heels for a recompense. And well may our universities, the nurseries of God's vineyard, the seminaries of Christian learning, and fountains of holy religion—yea, the eyes, the light, the salt, the seasoning of the whole land—take it very unkindly that some of them whom they have not only taught, but maintained with all necessities, some ten years, some more, should now be found their greatest opposers. This may be an Aristotelian, a heathenish, but surely no Christian requital. Such unworthy disciples, dissemblers, may be men in countenance, but in condition mules.

CCCXIX.—Sin rooted in the heart hardly to be plucked up.

Granat., Dux Pectorum.

"Animus sceleribus asuetus, vix ab eis divelli potest."—ISTDOR., in Soliloquiis.

HE that driveth a nail into a post fasteneth it at the first stroke that he maketh with his hammer, but more firmly at the second stroke, but so fast at the third that it can hardly be pulled out again; and the oftener that he knocketh it the faster it sticketh, and is pulled out with the greater difficulty. So in every one of our wicked actions which we do, sin is driven deeper into our souls, as it were with the great hammer of God's anger. The nail is sin; inclination to sin fastens it, delight in sin enters it further, custom drives it further, and habit sets it home to the head; and there it sticketh so fast, that nothing in the world can be found out, but only the mercies of God in Christ Jesus, by which it may be haled and pulled out again.

CCCXX.—Good works are not the cause of, but the way to happiness.

White, ut antea.

If the king freely, without desert of mine, and at the mediation of another, give me a place about him, and never so much right unto it, yet I am bound, if I will enjoy it, to come unto him and do the things that the place requireth. And if he give me a tree growing in his forest, this his gift ties me to be at cost to cut it down and bring it home, if I will have it. And when I have done all this, I cannot brag that by my coming and service I merited this place, or by my cost in cutting down and carrying home the tree made myself worthy of the tree, as the Jesuits speak of their works. But only the deed is the way that leads to the fruition of that which is freely given. There cannot be produced a place in all the Scripture, nor a sentence in all the Fathers, which extends our works any further, or makes them exceed the latitude of a mere condition or way whereby to walk to that which not themselves, but the blood of Christ hath deserved.

"Opera bona non causa sed via regnandi."—BERNARD.

CCCXXI.—A true Christian, the more he is afflicted and troubled the better he thriveth.

PLINY, in his "Natural History," writeth of certain trees growing in the Red Sea, which, being beat upon by the waves, stand like a rock immovable; yea, sometimes, pleno æstu operiuntur (in a full sea they are quite covered over with waters); and it appears, by many arguments, that they are bettered by the roughness of the waters. Even so a Christian, planted by faith in the red sea of Christ's blood, resisteth all the waves of temptation; afflictions are but as so many pressing-irons to better obedience: the more he is beat upon, yea, and overwhelmed also, with the billows of distress and trouble, the better he thriveth, and the more he flourisheth in spiritual graces.

Lib. xii., cap. 9.

Sir Hen. Wootton, in a Letter to Sir Rich. Baker, then in prison, 1628.

CCCXXII.—Troubles not to be so much questioned how we came unto them as how to get out of them.

St. AUGUSTINE tells of a man, that being fallen into a pit, one passing by falls a-questioning of him what he made there, and how he came in. "Oh," says the poor man, "ask me not how I came in, but help me, and tell me how I may come out." So let us not inquire how we came into such perplexed times, how into the pit of popular confusion: one says that the late king, another that the parliament, a third the army, is the cause of all our trouble, that they have put us in. But who is it that takes care how to get out? who is it that smites upon his thigh with his hand and concludes that his sin hath caused all this sorrow, that his iniquity hath raked up the ashes of these hot distempers? Could but men do this, then they might cheerfully look up unto him who hath got the advantage of upper ground, who can and is willing to draw them out of the deeps of their distress and deliver them.

Whitaker's Serm, We tm., 1646.

"Ille ego qui feci," &c.—VIRGIL.

CCCXXIII.—The good of adversity and the ill of prosperity.

THE naturalists observe well that the north wind is more healthful, though the south be more pleasant: the south, with his warmth, raiseth vapours which breed putrefaction and cause diseases; the north, with his cold, drieth those vapours up, purging the blood and quickening the spirits. Thus adversity is unpleasant, but it keepeth us watchful against sin and careful to do our duties; whereas prosperity doth flatteringly lull us asleep. It never goes worse with men spiritually than when they find themselves corporally best at ease. Hezekiah was better upon his sick-bed than when he was showing of his treasures to the ambassadors of the king of Babylon. How wicked the Sodomites were, we read; but Ezekiel tells us the cause was fullness of bread. It was a wise policy, then, of Epaminondas to stand sentinel himself when the citizens were at their bacchanals; and surely, when we have the world at will, it is good providence then to look most to our ways.

Pliny.

Lake, on Ps. li.

"Si fortuna ridet caveto tolli," &c.

Isa. xxxix.

Gen. xviii.
Ezek. xvi.
Diodorus, lib. xv.

CCCXXIV.—*The great danger of malicious turbulent spirits.*Dallington's Aphorisms."Vindicta nullum relinquit facinus."
—SENECA.

It is one of Hippocrates' aphorisms, that long festered ulcers are beyond the possibility of cure, especially in hydropic bodies, where the humours are rank and venomous. Such is the condition of all turbulent and tumultuous spirits: exulcerate with the corrosive of many supposed wrongs, and impatient in delay of their revenge, they are so far transported from reason or accepting the supple oil of reconciliation, that they enter into resolutions of desperate consequence, and vent the poison of their malice, by the pipes of their treasonable practices, into every vein of their native country, to the great hazard of her health and public safety.

CCCXXV.—*Heaven the best inheritance.*Featly's Serm.
1622.Winton's Serm.
1612.

ALL the thoughts of worldly men are employed, all their care is taken up, all their time bestowed, all their means spent, in purchasing or some way procuring unto themselves (as they call it) a fortune, an estate of land of inheritance, or lease for term of years or life; all which are yet subject to a thousand calamities. Let us, then, rather look after heaven, and labour for the state of grace, which is past all hazard, being assured unto us by the handwriting of God and the seal of His blessed Spirit—an estate, not for term of years, but for eternity; an estate that is subject neither to the corruption of tinearum forensium (Westminster Hall moths), nor tinearum urbanarum (bankrupt debtors), nor tinearum militarium (plundering thieves and robbers), but such as cannot be spoiled by hostile invasion, nor wrung from us by power, nor won by law, nor mortgaged by debt, nor impaired by public calamity, nor changed by kings and parliaments, nor violated by death itself.

CCCXXVI.—*A sinful man is a senseless man.*De Trugillo, *Thesaur. Concinnat.*Greg., *de Cura
Pastor. Part 3.*

Prov. xxiii. 35.

TAKE a dead man, and put fire to his flesh, pinch him with pincers, prick him with needles, he feels it not; scourge him, and he cries not; shout in his ear, he hears not; threaten him or speak him fair, he regards not, he answers not. This is the condition of one that is spiritually dead in sin: let the judgments of God and terrors of the law be laid home to his conscience, let the flames of hell-fire flash in his soul, he regards it not; he is sermon-proof and judgment-proof. He hears of judgments abroad and sees judgments on others, nay, let judgments come home to his own doors, yet he thinks all is well. Like Solomon's fool, he outstands all reproof. Let the minister hit him never so home, "They have stricken me," says he, "but I was not sick; they have beaten me, but they might as well have beaten the air." Such and so deplorable is the sad condition of every senseless sinner.

CCCXXVII.—*Revenge, above all other passions, is of a growing nature.*Plin., Hist. Nat.
lib. viii., cap. 25.Dallington's Aphorisms.

ALL plants and other creatures have their growth and increase to a period, and then their diminution and decay, except only the crocodile, who groweth bigger and bigger even to death. So have all passions and perturbations in man's mind, their intentions and remissions, increase and decrease, except only malicious revenge; for this, the longer it lasteth, the stronger it waxeth still, even when the malign humours of avarice and ambition are settled or spent. Hence it is that such fiery spirits as these have always proved apter for innovation than administration, for desolation than reformation, and dangerous to the state where they live.

CCCXXVIII.—Saving grace and seeming grace much resemble one another.

EXPERIENCE showeth that Irish and Cornish stones, and many other false gems, have such a lustre in them, and so sparkle like true jewels, that a cunning lapidary, if he be not careful, may be cheated with them. Such are the enlightening graces which shine in hypocrites: they so nearly resemble the true sanctifying and saving graces of the elect, that the eye of spiritual wisdom itself may mistake them if it be not single and look narrowly into them. Peter's true tears of repentance may be taken for Esau's tears of discontent and revenge; the temporary faith of Simon Magus may seem as good as that of justifying faith in Zacchæus; a seared conscience hardly to be discovered, such as the possessed man had, from a secured conscience, such as St. Paul's was; a sudden exaltation of the spirit, such as the Jews' was, from true joy in the Holy Ghost, such as David's was.

Featly's Clavis Mystica.

"Sic parvis componere magna."

Matt. xxvi. 75.
Heb. xiii. 17.
Acts viii. 13.
Luke xix. 9.
Acts xxiv. 16.

John v.
Ps. liv. 7.

CCCXXIX.—Prosperity divides, affliction unites, the hearts of Christians.

WE read in Scripture of the manna, that God gave His people: such was the nature of it, that the heat of the sun melted it. You will say, "How could it then endure the heat of the oven?"—for they baked it in the oven; yet so it was of a strange kind of nature, that it could bear the heat of the oven and not the heat of the sun. Even of such kind of temper are our hearts: the heat of the sun of prosperity dissolves us, causes us to run one from another, to divide one from another: but the heat of the fiery furnace of affliction bakes us, brings us, and settles us together: it makes us to be one, it takes away our rawness, it consumes many of our ill humours, and so composes our spirits into one.

Burrough's Heart-Divisions.

"Sequitur fortunæ lumina vulgus."—
OVID.

CCCXXX.—Neutrality in religion enmity of religion.

THE sons of God—that is, those that did love God—fell in love with the daughters of men—that is, their own lusts. What issue had they? Giants (θεομάχοι), such as fought against God. The Samaritans worshipped both the God of Israel and the Assyrian idols, and they were the most deadly enemies of Jerusalem. Never have you seen a heretic—that is, a person that professeth partly the truth and partly error—but he turned a bloody persecutor of the truth. And he that loveth God and the world, out of his love to the world, will do the greatest dishonour he can unto God. Two loves, if one be good and the other bad, cannot stand together. "No man can serve two masters," as Christ tells us; "if he love the one he will hate the other."

Gen. vi. 2.

Lake, On Matt. xxii.

"Cruentas leges ore dictant," &c.—
AMBROS.

Luke xvi. 13.

CCCXXXI.—The direful effects of war.

PLINY, in his "Natural History," writeth, that the nature of the basilisk is to kill all trees and shrubs it breathes upon, and to scorch and burn all herbs and grass it passeth over. Such are the dismal effects of war; for, be the title never so clear, the cause never so just, yet the means are not without fire and sword, nor the end without honour and bloodshed—nulla salus bello. Peace, therefore, is to be preferred, so it be not with blemish of the prince's horror or prejudice of the public good.

Lib. viii., cap. 21.

GROTIUS, de Jure Belli ac Pacis.

"Pax optima rerum."—SIL. ITAL.

CCCXXXII.—God accepts the will for the deed.

A PILOT, as Quintilian observes, cannot be denied his lawful plea: "Dum clavum rectum tenet." Though the ship be cast away he is not to make satisfaction, so long as he held the stern right and guided it by the compass. In like manner, though our actions and good intentions miscarry in the event, we are not to be blamed if we steered our course according to the Word of God; though the bark be cast away, as St. Paul's was, yet the lives of all in it shall be safe. It is very true that the ship, even at the port, may be driven back again, may meet with many brushes and knocks when it was thought to be most safe. The dearest child of God may be, at the gates of death, so distracted that not one word of sense or reason may appear; yet all, no doubt, is very well. It is the fever that rageth, the disease that speaketh idly, not the party; and therefore, "ut ante delirium, ita ad judicium," said a learned man. God measureth our actions not by the obliquity of them, but by the rectitude of the heart, and will not lay them to our charge.

Declamat., lib. iii.

Featly's Serm.

"In magnis, et voluisse sat est."— PROPERT.

CCCXXXIII.—Not the assurance only, but the joy of salvation, gives content.

Lake's Serm., on Ps.
li.

It is often day when the sun doth not shine, and though thick clouds breathed from the air make a sad face of the sky, as if it were night, yet we cannot say the sun is gone down. This is many men's condition in the state of salvation: the sun is with them, they are children of the day, yet have they no joy of their salvation; their sun doth not shine, they have no clear day. Hence it is that assurance of salvation will not content the soul, except it may have the joy of salvation also. This was that which made David cry out, "Restore me to the joy of Thy salvation!"

"Lætitiâ Jecu ut
verit."—JER.
Ps. li.

CCCXXXIV.—To take heed whom we trust.

Melch. Adamus, in Pittâ.

BUCHOLCERUS gives a parcel of witty counsel to his friend Huebnerus, who, being to go to court to teach the prince elector's children, at their parting, "I will give you one profitable rule," says he, "that shall serve for all your whole life." He, listening what it should be: "I commend," says he, "unto you the faith of the devils." At which Huebnerus wondering: "Take heed," says he, "how you trust any at the court; believe their promises but warily, with fear," &c. The like must we do; not believe all that is spoken, not confide in all that make a show of friendship. There is abundance of outside love in the world; many complimentary promises, but little or no performance at all.

"Cave multos, si singulos nontimes."— Burrough's Heart-Divisions.

CCCXXXV.—The poisonous nature of ambition.

Dallington's
Aphorisms

As poison is of such force that it corrupteth both blood and spirits, besieging, seizing, and infecting the heart with the venomous contagion thereof, quite altering the complexion and condition of the man that hath drunk it; so the pestiferous desire of sovereignty, though it seize on a mind of mild and mansuete (gentle) disposition, yet it is of such forcible operation as it not only altereth man's nature, but maketh man unnatural.

"Regnandi dâra cupido, quid non?"

CCCXXXVI.—How to recover spiritual sight.

Tob. vi. 8.

Featly's Clavis Mytilæ.

"Sperne volupta-tes," &c.—HOK, Print. ii.

THE angel bade Tobias to unbowel the fish and to take out the gall, as being useful in medicine, and a special means to recover his eyesight. The story is apocryphal, but the application is canonical and agreeable to the doctrine of the inspired Scriptures. If we unbowel worldly pleasures and carnal delights, and take out the gall of them—that is, seriously think upon the bitterness of them, the bitterness which they leave behind them—it will prove a sovereign remedy against our spiritual blindness.

CCCXXXVII.—The minister's repetition in sermons warrantable.

As Moses added a Deuteronomy to the former books of the Law, though he repeated but the same things ; and the evangelists added Gospel upon Gospel of the same argument ; and the apostles added Epistles to Epistles, not much varying their doctrine ;—so it must not grieve the minister to write and speak the same things to the people, and for them it is a sure thing, as the apostle teacheth.

Lake, in Exod. xix.

"Decies repetitio placebunt."

CCCXXXVIII.—Windy knowledge and windy doctrine go together.

As extreme windy stomachs do not only hinder digestion by interposition with the wholesome meat and relaxation of the mouth of the stomach, which ought to shut itself so close about the meat that not so much as the least vacuity may be left, but also either by ill digestion fill the body with crudities, obstructions, and consequently putrefactions, or else, because wind is so stirring, make ejaculation and a sudden regurgitation of all that is received ;—so, in like manner, windy knowledge above wholesome sobriety makes such an interposition and relaxation of the mind that it cannot digest wholesome doctrine, but fills itself with all manner of raw humours and unstable opinions, which breed such obstructions in the mind that it falls into divers sicknesses, and can keep nothing that is good and savoury ; but presently, being received by the pride and self-conceit that it hath in itself, casts it up again, and so, by a continual casting, breeds that weakness, that so much leaven of evil doctrine is soaked into the very films of the soul that it causes that disease which physicians call corruptio ad aciditatem, which sets an eager and sharp appetite in the mind, that it hungers continually to be fed with new opinions, and so at length rottenness and putrefaction are bred therein, and consequently death and destruction.

Yates' Arraignment of Creature.

"Scientia inflat." I Cor. viii. 5.

"Vera scientia afficit non extollit."—GREG.

CCCXXXIX.—God is to have the glory of all things.

As bright-shining and golden vessels do not retain, do not engross the beams of the sun which they receive, but return them back and double them by reflection, thus the sons of men, having from the Sun of righteousness the bright beams of His grace and virtue, not only to warm their hearts, but also to shine out in their words and actions, are to reflect them back again, with all praise and glory due unto them, seeing that from Him alone they have received them.

Downham's Christ, Warfare.

πάντες δόξα θίψ

CCCXL.—Not to be reconciled to God before we sleep very dangerous.

THAT man which dares go to bed with a conscience charged with the guilt of one enormous sin is much more desperate than he that dares lie unarmed with seven armed men that are his deadly foes, for a sinner is less sure of his life than the other. What a sad thing it is to sleep securely on the brink of hell ! to go to bed drunk over night and find himself awake in hell the next morning ! He that inures not himself daily to reconcile himself unto God makes a comfortless end for the most part, and is snatched hence before he hath a thought of making his peace with his Maker.

Lake's Sermon, on Luke iii.

CCCXLI.—No such thing as independency in this life.

TRIMETHIUS, in his catalogue of ecclesiastical writers, mentioneth what Occam, the famous schoolman, said upon occasion unto Lewis the emperor : "Domine imperator, defende

In Vita Occami.

"Auxilium ab omnibus petendum est, etiam ab infimis."
—SALLUST.

Rom. xii. 4.

me gladio, et ego te defendam calamo;" here was the emperor's sword and Occam's pen standing in need of one another. This shows there is no man absolutely independent in this world, nor ever shall be, so long as he hath any dependency here below. The head cannot say to the foot, "I have no need of thee." The master cannot be without his man, nor the landlord without his tenants, nor the king without his subjects. He that taketh place before all in some things must be content to give place and come behind others in some things else.

CCCXLII.—The remembrance of sins past the only way to prevent sins to come.

Plinii Hist. Nat.,
lib. xii., cap. 27.

Featly's Clavis Mystica.

Ps. li.

In the country of Arabia, where almost all trees are savoury, and frankincense and myrrh are even as common firewood, styrax is sold at a dear rate, though it be a wood of unpleasant smell, because experience proveth it to be a perfect remedy to recover their smell who before had lost it. We all of us have lived in the pleasures of sin, have our senses stuffed and debilitated, if not overcome; and the best remedy against this malady will be the smelling of styrax, the unsavoury and displeasing smell of our former corruptions. Thus David's sin was ever before him, and St. Augustine (as Possidonius noteth), a little before his death, caused the penitential psalms to be written about his bed, which he still looking upon, out of a bitter remembrance of his sins, continually wept, giving not over long before he died. This practice will work repentance not to be repented of.

CCCXLIII.—The not returning thanks unto God for grace received is the ready way to be graceless.

Downham's Christ. Warfare.

"Quid habes quod non accepisti?"

RIVERS receiving their fullness from the ocean pay their tribute by returning their streams unto it back again, which homage, if they should deny to yield, their swelling waters would bear down their own banks, and drown the country. So we, receiving from the infinite Ocean of all goodness whatsoever fullness we have of grace and virtue, the praises and glory due unto them are, by humble acknowledgment and thanksgiving, to return to Him that gave them. But if we shall wax unthankful, and refuse to pay the tribute due, and show our rebellion against our great Lord by encroaching upon His right, thinking to grow rich by robbing of Him, and keeping of all to our own use, these gifts, thus retained, will make us but to swell with pride, and, breaking down the banks of modesty and humility, will not only empty us of all grace and goodness, but make all our good parts we have hurtful and pernicious. And thus it is that the not giving unto God that which is God's, the not returning praise to God for grace received, is the ready way to be graceless.

CCCXLIV.—Crosses and afflictions not to be slighted.

In Lib. Animal.

Featly's Clavis Mystica.

Bernard, de Patience.

TACITUS reporteth that though the amber ring amongst the Romans was of no use, nor any value, yet, after the emperor had begun to wear it, it began to be in great esteem; it was the only fashion amongst them. So, methinks, our Lord and Saviour Christ Jesus hath borne His cross, and was borne upon it; we should make better reckoning of crosses than many of us do. How nice and tenderly have many of us been brought up, that we can hardly endure to see the sight of our sweet Saviour's cross? We stick to sip of that cup which was holy David's diet-drink, and Job and Jeremiah took it all off. Are we better than these holy men? nay, are we too good to pledge our Saviour in the cup of His passion? "Nos suspiramus in cruciatibus, ille expiravit in cruce (Do we breathe out some sighs in our crosses? He sighed out His last breath in torments upon the cross)." It certainly, then, behoveth every Christian to take up his cross and follow Him.

CCCXLV.—In death there is no difference of persons.

As in chess-play, so long as the game is in playing, all the men stand in their order and are respected according to their places : first the king, then the queen, then the bishops, after them the knights, and last of all the common soldiers ; but when once the game is ended, and the table taken away, then they are all confusedly tumbled into a bag, and haply the king is lowest and the pawn upmost. Even so it is with us in this life : the world is a huge theatre or stage, wherein some play the parts of kings, others of bishops, some lords, many knights, others yeomen. But when the Lord shall come with His angels to judge the world, all are alike, no difference betwixt the king and the peasant, the courtier and the clown ; and if great men and mean persons are in the same sin, pares culpæ, pares pænæ (they shall be sharers in the same punishment).

Hour of Mourning.

"Omnia mors æquat." — CLAUDIAN.

CCCXLVI.—Every man to follow his own trade.

It is observable what answer Robert Grossthead, bishop of Lincoln, gave unto one that solicited him on the behalf of a poor kinsman of his, that he would prefer him ; but being informed that he was an husbandman, "Then," said he, "if his plough be broken, I will repair it ; or, rather than fail, bestow a new one upon him, whereby he may go on his course ; but to dignify him as to make him forsake his calling and trade, wherein he was brought up, I mean not to do." And indeed, when the members of the body are out of their proper places, what readiness is in them to do any work or service ? So when a man is out of his own calling, in any society, it is as if a member were out of joint in the body ; there is no pleasure in it. Every man is to be suited to his genius too, to be planted according to the natural bent of his mind. For a man to make his son a tradesman if he be fit for learning, or to apply him to learning when he is cut out for a tradesman, to send him to the court when he is fitter for the cart, this is as much as if he should apply his toes to feeling and not his fingers, and should walk on his hands and not on his feet, which is never like to do well in the conclusion.

Godwin, de Præ-sulibus Angliæ.
"Tractent fabrilia fabri."

Paule, in Vita Whitingi, Cent.

CCCXLVII.—God the proper Agent in all things.

THE scribe is more properly said to write than the pen, and he that maketh and keepeth the clock is more properly said to make it go and strike than the wheels and poises that hang upon it, and every workman to effect his work rather than the tools which he useth as his instruments. So the Lord, who is the chief agent and mover in all actions, may more fitly and properly be said to effect and bring to pass all things which are done in the earth than any inferior or subordinate causes, as meat to nourish us, clothes to keep us warm, the sun to lighten us, friends to provide for us, &c., seeing they are but His tools and instruments, as they are ruled and guided by the power and providence of so heavenly a workman.

Downham's Christ.
Warfare.

CCCXLVIII. — Afflictions, crosses, &c., a surer way to heaven than pleasures.

PASSENGERS that have been told that their way to such a place lieth over a steep hill, or down a craggy rock, or through a moorish fen, or dirty vale, if they suddenly fall into some pleasant meadow, enamelled with beautiful flowers, or a goodly corn field, or a fair champaign country, look about them, and bethinking themselves where they are, say, "Surely we are come out of the way ; we see no hills, nor rocks, nor moors, nor fens : this is too good to be the right way." So in the course of our life, which is but a pilgrimage on earth : when we pass through fields of corn or gardens of flowers, and enjoy all cxix.

Alphons, ab Aven-dano, Com. in P. l.

Acts xiv. 22.

worldly pleasures and contentments; when the wind sets in such a corner as blows riches, honours, and preferments upon us;—let us then cast with ourselves, “Surely this is not the way the Scripture directeth us unto; here are not the temptations nor the tribulations that we must pass through: we see little or no footing of the saints of God in this road, but only the print of Dives’ feet: somewhere we have missed our way; let us search and find where we went out of it.” It is very true that God hath the blessings of this life and that which is to come in store for His children; when He seeth it good for them, they may go to heaven this way; but, certainly, afflictions and troubles are surer arguments of God’s love, and a readier way to heaven than the other.

“Hacitur ad astra.”

CCCXLIX.—Desperate devils.

Boys’ Postill.

As a forlorn desperate rebel, out of all hope of pardon, standeth upon his guard, raiseth a faction, and maintains a party against his sovereign lord and master, so the devil, past all grace and goodness, in despite of God, laboureth to set up a kingdom of his own—the kingdom of darkness against the kingdom of light, the kingdom of Anti-Christ against the kingdom of Christ. He knows himself to be damned already, and therefore thinks himself most happy when he can make another unhappy.

CCCL.—Forgetfulness of injuries commendable.

Plutarch, *Alexand.*Paule, in Vita
Whitgifti.

THEMISTOCLES, when a famous artist undertook to teach him the art of memory, made answer, “Mallem oblivisci doceres (I had rather thou wouldst read some lectures of oblivion to me, that thou wouldst teach me to forget, for I remember many things too well).” This is just our case. Oh, for a blessed amnestia to forgive and forget wrongs done unto us! Were our memories as strong as our sins, were we as retentive of God’s favours as we are of injuries which affront us, there would be no need at all to scrub up our memories, but rather an act of oblivion to suppress our passion, that works too strongly upon the least apprehension of a wrong, though but intended.

CCCLI.—How God is said to be angry with His children.

Downham’s Christ, Warfare.

As children, with their faults, provoke their parents to anger, and move them to turn their fatherly smiles into bitter frowns, and the fruits of their love into effects of hatred in outward show—as, namely, severe countenances, sharp reproofs, and rigorous chastisements—and in respect of these outward signs and effects of their anger they are usually said to be out of favour, and in their father’s displeasure, however, in truth, at the same time, they entirely love them, and use all this wholesome severity, not because they hate, but because they would reform them;—so God’s children, when, by their sins, they do offend Him and provoke His anger against them, are said to be out of His favour, not that God doth ever change His heavenly affections, or purposeth utterly to reject them, but because He changeth the effects of His love into the effects of hatred in outward show, as when inwardly He suffereth them to be terrified with horrors of conscience and with the apprehension of His anger and displeasure, and outwardly whippeth and scourgeth them with temporary afflictions: all which He doth not with hatred to their persons, for He never hateth them whom He hath once loved in Christ; but for the hatred of their sins and love of the sinner, whom by this means He bringeth, by the rough and unpleasant way of repentance, unto the eternal pleasures of His kingdom.

CCCLII.—The very thoughts of former pleasures add to present sorrows.

THE soldiers of Hannibal were much effeminated by the pleasures they had at Capua, insomuch that corpus assuetum tunicis, lorica onus non fert, &c.; their bodies, being used to soft raiment, could not bear the weight of a helmet; the head, wrapped in silk night caps, could not endure an iron head-piece; and the hard hilt hurt the soft hand. Sound trees are not blown down with the wind, but the root rather fastened thereby; but corrupt trees, eaten with worms, engendered of superfluous moisture, are therefore thrown down by the least blast, because they had no strength to resist. Res adversæ non frangunt, quos prospera non corruperant (the cause of our so great distemper in our afflictions we owe to the delights of our prosperity); why else do losses of goods so vex us, but because we trust in uncertain riches? Why is disgrace a courtier's hell, but because he deemed the favour of his prince and places of honourable employment his heaven? Thus it is that the very thought of our former pleasures add to present sorrows; miserum est fuisse (there's the grief). We are therefore astonished at our fall, because, with David, in the height of our worldly felicity, we said, "We shall never be moved."

Jerome, Epist. ad Heliodorum.

Seneca, de Tran-quill. Anim.

Featly's Serm.

Ps. xxx. 6.

CCCLIII.—Prayers to be made for all men.

PHILO the Jew, discoursing of Aaron's ephod, which he put on when he went to pray, saith it was μίμημα τοῦ ὅλου, a representation of the whole world, having in it all colours, to represent the conditions of all states, of all people whatsoever. This was Aaron's practice: and, to speak truth, we err more grossly in nothing than in bearing malice, and wiping men's names and conditions out of our prayers, as if our private affections were the calendar of every man's salvation, when no man can rend himself from his brother, but he must rend himself from Christ, who is the root whereon he and his brother do both grow together.

White's Serm.,
Lond., 1616.

CCCLIV.—The prayers of sin-regarding sinners are not heard of God.

THERE is no man in his right wits would come as a suitor to his prince and bring his accuser with him, who is ready to testify and prove to his face his treason and rebellion; much less would any present himself before so great a majesty, to make petition for some benefit, after he had killed his sovereign's only son and heir, having still in his hand the bloody weapon wherewith he committed that horrid act; there is no adulteress so shamefully impudent as to desire pardon of her jealous husband, having her lover still in her arms, with whom she hath often had wanton dalliance in times past, and is resolved to have the like for the time to come. If any be so mad, so shameless, to make suits in this odious manner, they are sure to be repulsed, and find wrath and vengeance where they look for grace and mercy. But thus do they behave themselves towards God who, remaining polluted with their sins, do offer up their prayers unto Him, for they bring their accusers, even their defiled consciences and crying sins, which continually accuse and condemn them and call for that due judgment and punishment which they have deserved—they bring the weapon into God's presence, even their sins, whereby they have crucified and slain the only Son of God, and they present themselves into God's presence to sue for grace, embracing still, with ardent affection, the world and worldly vanities, with whom they have often committed spiritual whoredom, with a purpose to continue still in their former uncleanness. And therefore, let not such fondly imagine that God will hear them and grant their suits, but rather expect, in His terrible wrath, He will take vengeance on them and turn their temporary afflictions into hellish torments and everlasting punishment.

Downham's Christ.
Warfare.

"Quæ non missa
Deo vacuis in nubibus haerent."— AUSON.

CCCLV.—Temporal pleasures a great hindrance to spiritual joys.

Acontii Stratagem,
Sat. i. ind.

"O amatores mundi, cujus rei gratia militatis," &c.—
AUG., Lib. Confes.

ARISTOTLE maketh mention of a parcel of ground in Sicily that sends forth such a strong smell of fragrant flowers to all the fields and leazows (pastures) thereabout, that no hound can hunt there, the scent is so confounded with the smell of those flowers. It is a thing considerable in this licentious age of ours, whether the sweet pleasures and profits of the world have not wrought the like effect in our souls, whether they have not taken away all scent, and sense too, of heavenly joys, whether they hinder us not in our spiritual chase; if not, we may take the greater joy and comfort in them, because it is an argument of true happiness not to be overcome of earthly delights, not to be corrupted with temporal happiness.

CCCLVI.—A drunkard hardly to be reclaimed.

Boys Works.

"In lucem semper Acerra bibit."— MARTIAL, lib. i.,
Ep. 29.

A GENTLEMAN, hearing that his son at the university was given to dicing, answered, that want of money would, happily, make him leave that fault. Afterward, understanding that he was given to whoring, said, that either marriage or old age would one day cure that folly. But when he was informed of his wine-bibbing: "Out upon the villain!" saith the father; "I will surely disinherit him, for that fault will increase with his years. A gamester will continue so long as his purse lasts; an adulterer so long as his loins last; but a drunkard so long as his lungs and his life last."

CCCLVII.—Riches without grace yield no true comfort.

White, ut antea.

AT a funeral dinner there are many guests and great cheer, but all à mort; no mirth, because he is dead that should make it. So in the state of riches there are many friends, but little true comfort; there is great plenty, and much abundance of outward things, but no security of mind, if they be not well used. And why? Because that is wanting that should give it—the hope of salvation and assurance of the world to come.

CCCLVIII.—Submission to the wisdom of God as concerning outward worldly things.

Downham's Christ, Warfare.

LOOK upon a child; he taketh no care for himself, but resteth contented with that provision and allowance which his loving father alloteth to him, because he knoweth that his father's discretion exceedeth his; and if, being sick, we be content to receive upon the physician's bare word, not only those things which we affect, but even bitter pills and unpleasing potions, which we loathe and abhor, because we know his skill, exceeding ours, he is much better able to direct us for the recovery of our health. Then, how much rather should we lay aside care, and rely upon the allowance of our heavenly Father! How much rather should we trust this spiritual Physician, whose skill and faithfulness never failed! We, in our foolish appetite, desire worldly honours, but He, in His wisdom, denieth them, because He knoweth they are but windy meats, which would not nourish our souls, but puff us up with pride. We affect worldly riches, but He withholdeth them, because He well seeth they would be a means to make us poor in grace. We dote upon carnal pleasures, but He keepeth them from us, because He knoweth our liquorish and greedy appetite would easily surfeit of them, and so lose our spiritual strength and health, if not our bodily also; and therefore, why should not we be contented to want those things which, if they would not bring more hurt than good, more loss than profit, our heavenly Father and wise Physician would not have denied them to us?

CCCLIX.—Magistrates and ministers not to be too forward for dignity, preferment, &c.

JACOB saw in his vision angels ascending upon a ladder to heaven. What? Angels go by steps into heaven? One would think that, being spirits, they might easily mount thither and back again in an instant. Surely it is not without a mystery, showing that magistrates and ministers, who are in the Scripture styled angels, are not suddenly to leap or hastily to climb up to places of preferment, but ascend by degrees, when God setteth a ladder for them to go up by.

Gen. xxviii. 12.

Featly's Clavis Mystica.

CCCLX.—True grace is diffusive.

THOSE that are planted in the Church must not conceal the grace they have received, no more than a tree doth its sap. We glory in the discovery of rich metals and precious stones which nature hath buried in the sea. We suffer nothing of this great world to lie hid; we labour to bring it forth, to behold, to show it. So should we deal with the gifts and graces of the Spirit, which God hath treasured up in this little world of ours. True grace is diffusive; no tree can more strive to send forth fruit than it will to show itself in good works.

Scalabonii Moral. in Passionem Christi.

"Bonum sui diffusivum."

CCCLXI.—True grace is accompanied with humility.

THE wisest of all the philosophers made this profession: "Hoc scio, quod nihil scio" (This I know, that I know nothing)." Origen, the most learned of all the Greek fathers, made this confession: "Ignorantiam meam non ignoro" (I am not ignorant of my own ignorance)." And the most judicious of all the Latin fathers was the humblest, for in his heat of contention with Jerome he acknowledgeth him his better: "Hieronymus presbyter, Augustino episcopo major est" (Though the dignity of a bishop exceed that of a priest, yet priest Jerome is a greater than Bishop Augustine)." David, the best of kings, was freest from pride: "Lord," saith he, "I am not high-minded." Theodosius, the noblest of all the Roman emperors, his motto was: "Malo membrum esse Ecclesie quam caput imperii" (It was greater honour to him to be a member of the Church than the head of the empire)." And St. Paul, though nothing inferior to the chief of the apostles, yet was least in his own eyes. Thus it was that, like the sun in the zenith, they showed least when they were at the highest; like vessels, they made the least sound when they were fullest; or like the deepest waters, they ran most silent. In the weighing of gold the lightest pieces rise up, but the weighty bear down the scale. And surely they are but light that are lifted up with a self-conceit, but shallow waters that make a noise, but empty vessels that make a sound. And such are all they that are wise in their own conceits, such as think they can dispute de omni scibili (that they move in a circle of knowledge), when, as God knoweth, they know little or nothing at all.

Shute's Serm., Lond., 1629.

Ps. cxxxi. 1.

1 Cor. xv. 9.

"Esto parvus in oculis tuis ut sis magnus in oculis Dei."—ISIDOR., in Synonym.

CCCLXII.—Riches are snares.

IT is written of one of Euripides' tragedies, that it was so acted by the players, as to make such an impression in the beholders, that they went all home in a frenzy, in a strange passion, pronouncing iambics, and grew into such a vein of tragedy-playing, pacing and acting in the streets as they went, with the lovely words of Perseus to his Andromeda, that it was long ere this distemper could be assuaged again. This tragedy made the spectators no madder than in our times we have seen worldly greatness and riches do to many men who have gone to the theatre sober enough, but when wealth and riches and greatness

White's Serm., Lond., 1616.

"Aurum materia laborum, periculum possidentium," &c.—AUG., de Verb. Dom.

and places of preferment have presented themselves on the stage unto them, and with their lovely aspect a little enchanted them, there hath been nothing with them but madness and presumption.

CCCLXIII.—Worldly things dispensed by God in wisdom.

Downham's Christ, Warfare.

"Non omnis fert omnia tellus."

THERE is no wise physician gives the same physic to all patients, or in the same proportion, but he fitteth it in quantity and quality to every one's need, giving to one a pill to purge him, to another a cordial to restore him; one must be lanced, another must be healed; one must have sauce to quicken his appetite, another must fast it out and be cured by abstinence. And thus the Lord, in wisdom, dealeth with the sons of men: He giveth that allowance to every one which He knows most requisite for him, respecting the persons of none, but doing good unto all, as their state and condition doth require. One man is bettered by liberty, another by restraint; one, being ingenuous by nature, is made better by benefits; another, of a more servile disposition, becomes worse, and is only mended with threats and punishments; one man is fit to be rich, another to be poor; one for the court, another for the cart. Thus every one hath his portion, every one his station, allotted by God in His wisdom and goodness.

CCCLXIV.—The sinner's estate miserable.

Lake's Serm. on Pr. II.

WHEN we see beggars (lazars), one without limbs, another so sick that he seems to be without life; one even starved with hunger, another bereft of his senses; when we see men any way afflicted, we pity them, and confess them to be miserable. But, O si adspici possint laniatus! had we but eyes to see the spiritual wounds and sores, the wants and the woes of adulterers, drunkards, murderers, blasphemers, or any other wicked livers, we would conclude them to be much more miserable than any others whatsoever.

CCCLXV.—Relapses in sin dangerous.

Alphons. ab Averdano, Com. in Matt.

Heb. vi. 4.

WE find in Scripture many desperately sick, yet cured the first time by our Saviour, but where do we read in all the Scripture, where in all the Gospel, of any blind man's eyes twice enlightened? of any deaf ears twice opened? of any tied tongue twice loosened? of any possessed with devils twice dispossessed? of any dead twice raised? No doubt but that Christ could have done it, but we read not that ever He did it—the reason, that we should be most careful to avoid relapses into former sins, the recovery whereof is very uncertain, always difficult, and in some cases, as the apostle teacheth, impossible.

CCCLXVI.—Scripture knowledge the only necessary knowledge.

Weems's Portraiture.

"Omnes scientiam atque doctrinam sacra Scriptura transcendit."
—GREG., in Moral.

THE philosopher being asked what was the cause that philosophers attended at the gates of rich men and rich men attended not at the gates of philosophers, he answered, "Because philosophers knew what they stood in need of, but the rich knew not that they had need of philosophy." So, did but men know how much they stood in need of spiritual knowledge, to lead them to their Creator, they would tread oftener upon the threshold of the sanctuary; they would be more diligent in searching the Scriptures; more laborious, digging as it were for silver; and they would be more chary, too, of those earthen vessels by which such excellent treasure is conveyed to them.

CCCLXVII.—Pleasures of the world counterfeit pleasures.

It is observed by the mythologists that Pleasure went on one occasion to bathe herself, and, having stripped off her clothes, laid them on the water-side; but Sorrow, having hid herself in the covert as unseen, steals the clothes away, puts them on, and so departs. Hence it comes to pass that multitudes in the world are at a great loss; they run and ride, court, and woo pleasure, which they have no sooner obtained but they perceive their error and acknowledge their mistake. It is nothing else but Sorrow in Pleasure's clothes. The pleasures of the world are bitter-sweets at the best. God only is true happiness (fons et origo boni); at His right hand are true pleasures for evermore.

Alen's Serm.,
Lond., 1649.

"Nulla est sincera
voluptas."

CCCLXVIII.—God's husbandry.

God is compared to a husbandman; all the world is His farm. Now, you know that a good farmer that hath any parcels of ground overgrown with briars and thorns taketh great comfort to see them grubbed up, and the ground made good pasture or arable. Even so God, who would have all men saved and come to the knowledge of His truth, is well pleased with those that are instruments thereof—such as plough up the fallow ground of their hearts, such as fit them to receive the seed of the Word; and they can never please Him better than when they are employed in such husbandry.

Lake's Serm.,
Pr., li.

CCCLXIX.—Heresies and moral vices to be timely avoided.

ST. AUGUSTINE had woeful experience, as himself confesseth, of his many years sticking in the heresies of the Manichees, and thence was that complaint of his: "Had I but," saith he, "slipped only in the error of the Manichees, and soon got out, my case had been less fearful and dangerous; but novem ferme anni sunt quibus ego in illo limo, &c. (God knows that almost for nine years I wallowed in that mud; the more I strove to get out the faster I stuck in)." Heresies and moral vices are like quagmires: we may slightly pass over them without any danger, but the longer we stand upon them the deeper we sink; and if we be not drowned over head and ears in them, yet we escape not without much mire and dirt. If, then, we cannot be so happy as to keep out of the walk of the ungodly, yet let us be sure not to stand in the way of sinners, much less sit in the seat of the scornful. If we cannot be so clean as we desire, at least let us not, with Moab, settle upon the lees of our corruption.

Confess., lib. iii.,
cap. ii.

Featly's Serm.
Ps. i.
Jer xlvi. 11.

CCCLXX.—Custom in sin makes content in sin.

WHEN Ulysses, in his travels, had left his men with Circe, that witch, she changed them all into divers sorts of beasts—as into dogs, swine, lions, bears, elephants, &c. Ulysses, when he returned, complained that Circe had done him wrong in turning his men into beasts. Circe replied that the benefit of speech was left unto them all, and so he might demand of them whether they would be changed into men again. He began first with the hog, and demanded of him whether he would be a man again or not. He answered that he was more contented with that sort of life than ever he was before; for when he was a man he was troubled with a thousand cares, and one cross came in the neck of another, and one grief followed another; but now he had no care but to fill his belly, and so lie down and sleep. And so he demanded of all the rest, but they refused to turn men again, until he came to the elephant, who in his first estate had been a philosopher. He demanded of him whether he would be a man again; yea, that he would with all his heart, because Homerus.

Weems's Per-trature.

"Laqueo tenet am-bitiosi consuetudo mali."—Juv. Sat., 7.

he knew what was the difference betwixt a man and a beast. Thus beastly creatures, given over to their sensual appetites, transformed and changed by Satan into beasts, in their hearts they desire never to return to a better state, but to live still in their swinish pleasures and to follow their sinful appetites. But those who have the spirit of grace in their hearts and are fallen into some heinous sin, having tasted of both the estates, like the elephant, they cannot be quiet till they are at their first estate again.

CCCLXXI.—Repentance is to be universal.

"Speculi exempl."

Alsop's Serm.,
 Lond., 1640.

THERE is a story of a devout man who had, amongst many other virtues, the gift of healing, unto whom divers made resort for cure. Amongst the rest one Chromatius, being sick, sent for him. Being come, he told him of his sickness, and desired that he might have the benefit of cure as others had before him. "I cannot do it," said the holy man, "till thou hast beaten all the idols and images in thy house to pieces." "Oh, that shall be done," said Chromatius; "here, take my keys, and where you find any images, let them be defaced;" which was done accordingly. To prayer went the holy man, but no cure was done. "Oh," saith Chromatius, "I am as sick as ever—very weak and sick." "It cannot be otherwise," replied the holy man; "nor can I help it. There is one idol yet in your house undiscovered, and that must be defaced too." "True," says Chromatius, "it is so indeed; it is all of beaten gold; it cost two hundred pounds. I would fain have saved it. But here, take my keys again, you shall find it fast locked in my chest; break it also in pieces!" which being done, the holy man prayed, and Chromatius was healed. Thus ends the story, but here begins the moral of it: the case is ours; we are all of us spiritually sick, full of wounds and putrified sores. The spiritual physician tells us that if we look for any amendment, it must be by the amendment of our lives. He prescribes repentance of our sins. That we are willing to do in part, but not in whole; we would fain keep one Delilah, one darling beloved sin: but it must not be; there must not be one sin unrepented of. We must repent as well for our Achans as our Absaloms, our Rimmons as our Mammons, our Davids as our Goliaths, our covert as well as open sins, our loved as loathed lusts, our heart abominations as well as loathed scandals, our babe-iniquities as well as giant-provocations. Our repentance must be universal.

CCCLXXII.—In the loving our neighbour we love God.

Lake's Serm., on Matt., xxii.

"Per amorem Dei gignitur amor proximi," &c.—
 GREG., Moral. vii.

LIGHT is the only object of our eye, for our eye was made to see the light; but light is not only in the body of the sun or moon or stars, but by beams it doth insinuate itself into all these lower creatures, and presents itself in that great variety of colours wherewith this lower world is beautified. In seeing them we see the light, and delighting in them we take pleasure in the light, from whom they have their gracefulness. Even so God is the proper object of our love, and His goodness must draw our abilities unto it, and it is able to satisfy them to the full, though they to the full can never possibly apprehend it. So that out of the nature of God we need not seek for any other object of our love. But because God is pleased to communicate Himself unto His creatures, and frame the reasonable part of them according to His image, He would have our love to attend this communicating of Himself, and be bestowed on them whom He doth so grace. And this our so loving of others, our neighbours, ourselves, detracts nothing from that all which is due to God, because we do it by His direction, and our love doth still reflect upon Him, and in loving them we love and admire Him also.

CCCLXXIII.—A graceless sinner will continue to be a sinner still.

THE scolopendra, having devoured the bait, when she feeleth the hook to prick her, casteth up all that is in her belly till she have got up the hook, but as soon as that is out of her bowels she suppeth all that up which before she had cast from her. How excellently hath nature, in the property of this fish, set before our eyes the sad condition of a graceless sinner, who, after he hath devoured Satan's morsels, feeling the hook of his conscience, and being pricked with some remorse, rids the stomach of his soul by confession, and never leaveth fasting and praying and sighing and sobbing till the hook be out and the wound of conscience healed with the balm of Gilead; but that being done, resorbet interiora omnia (he returneth to his former vomit), and greedily gourmandiseth the bait which before he had vomited up. Being void of true grace, he resolves to be a sinner still.

Plinij Hist. Nat., lib. ix., cap. 43.

Featly's Serm.

CCCLXXIV.—God's blessing upon the means doth all.

A MAN is in a deep consumption; he adviseth with the physician; the physician bids him take so much water and heat it, then take such and such herbs and put in it, and make a decoction thereof. The patient taketh water and drinketh it, but he leaveth out the herbs, and dieth of the consumption. Thus the blessing of God in the use of means, whether it be in physic or in meat and drink, or in any transactions of men whatsoever, is like the herbs to be put into the water; if it be left out, all is in vain. This is that staff of bread. All the power to nourish and feed cometh immediately from God alone.

Weems's Portrait.

Deut. xxviii.
Matt. iv. 4.

CCCLXXV.—Condescension is the great man's glory.

OUR English chronicle hath a notable passage between the king of England and the king of Wales, who, after a hot dispute by the sword, appointed a treaty of peace at the river Severn. After some discourse inclining to a reconciliation, the competitors for sovereignty became co-rivals in humility. The English king forced his horse into the river to offer his first embraces to his brother of Wales. The Welsh blood being overcome with this admired condescension, he alighted from his horse and swam the stream to meet his co-rival, with these words: "Vicit humanitas in tua justitiam meam, Rex invictissime (Thy goodness hath overcome me)!" Surely it is the glory of man to pass by offences. In great men it is greatest glory, and it will one day be found the choicest diamond in the diadem of greatness to manage power by a self-denying spirit of meekness and humility, and that if he must needs shoot at his brother—as who can always shun the occasion?—to shoot as Jonathan did at David, either short or past, that wheresoever he hits he may not hurt, because he may not seem to cut off the hope of reconciliation or build his safety on the neck of his brother's ruin.

Baker's Collect. of Hist. Eng.

Fathers' Serm., Westm., 1646

Tuteville's Essay

CCCLXXVI.—A true Christian is to be a true picture of Christ.

IF a man profess himself to be a painter, and take upon him to make the picture of a king, and misshape him, doth he not deserve just blame? Yes, surely, for he occasioneth strangers to think meanly of the king's person, because of his ill-favoured portraiture. Thus Christianity is nothing else but an imitation of the Divine nature, a reducing of a man's self to the image of God, in which he was created to righteousness and true holiness. Then shall a Christian escape punishment, whose life is to be a visible representation of Christ, if infidels and enemies of all goodness blaspheme Him while they judge of Him according to his counterfeit? He shall not; wherefore "faciamus de terra cælum," saith St. Chrysostom, (let us represent heaven in earth), so live that men may say God is in us of a truth, and our light so shine before men here on earth, that they may glorify God which is in heaven.

Lake's Serm., m Exod. xlix.

1 Cor. ii. 5.

Matt. v. 16.

CCCLXXVII.—The temporiser described.

THE cunning artisan in Macrobius, about the time of the civil war between Antony and Augustus Cæsar, had two crows, and with great labour and industry he taught one of them to say, "Salve Antoni Imperator (God save Emperor Antony)!" and the other, "Salve Auguste Imperator (All hail, my liege Augustus)!" So that, however the world went, he had always one bird for the conqueror. So the Romanists: if the reformed religion prevail, their bird's note is "Ave Christe, spes unica;" but if Popery be like to get the upper hand, they have a bird then that can sing "Ave Maria, regina cæli." And there is a double-faced Janus-like generation too, that, as occasion serves, can sing "Vive le roi!" and at another time that which is clean contrary; their opinions and their tenets, like the ancient tragedian buskin, indifferently fitting either foot, passable as well at Rome as Geneva; as the heliotrope turneth always to the sun, so their opinions and practice in matters of religion to the prevailing faction in state.

White's Serm.,
 Lond., 1546.

CCCLXXVIII.—Afflictions to be looked on as coming from God only.

A MAN, when he would drink of the water of the river, he drinketh not of it near the sea, where it is brackish, but he goes up to the fountain, where it is sweet and pleasant. So, if we will ever find comfort in our afflictions, we must learn to take them out of God's hand, to pass by the instrument and look up to the Agent; for in the second causes we shall find much malice and hatred, but in God much mercy and goodness. And thus did Job when the Chaldeans robbed him; thus David when Shimei cursed him; thus Joseph when his brethren maligned him; and thus that kingly picture of patience when he was even worried to death by his own enraged people.

Goddard's Serm.,
 Lond., 1649.

Job i. 21.

2 Sam. xvi. 11.
 Gen. xlv. 8.

Charles I.

CCCLXXIX.—Ceremonials and circumstantial of religion not to be much contended for.

TULLY, in the first book of his "Offices," hath a story how the Nolans and the Neapolitans had a controversy about a piece of ground which lay between their several countries, and Fabius Leo, being invited to determine the difference, gave unto them the exterior limits of the ground adjoining their respective countries, and reserved for the state of Rome all the land which lay in the midst betwixt the two confines. And let us be well advised that whilst, with the dog in the fable, we snap at the shadow, we lose not the substance; whilst we do most unhappily contend about the confines, the very outsides of our liberties and privileges, about ceremonies and circumstances of religion, our good friends of Rome do not come in and give us as much sensual liberty as we can desire, but take away from us also the saving truths of the Gospel, and that purity of ordinances and administrations which lie betwixt us in medio, on both sides so much contended for.

Fathers Serm.,
 Westm., 1646.

CCCLXXX.—Why God delivered the law with such majestic ceremonies.

MORTAL princes come not to great assemblies, as to parliament, to the throne of judgment, to the ratifying of leagues, but μετὰ πολλῆς φαντασίας (with a great deal of pomp). If ever, it is then that they show their royalty, they make it appear that they are neither beggarly nor contemptible, nor unable to revenge themselves; they make show of their glory and their power. For the vulgar, who have no judgment of true morality, are held in from disrespect to their governors by these ceremonies, and the attention of their ears is kept in waking by such amazing of their eyes; and discreet policy doth by this means make them obedient beyond their understanding. God takes the same course, and when He was to deliver the law unto Moses He showed not Himself but with much ceremonious majesty unto His people.

Lake's Serm. on Exod. xix.

Acts xxv. 3.

"Ceremoniæ licet negligenter beutur, tamen homines sua umbra," &c.—
 THROVERUS.

CCCLXXXI.—The danger of division.

It was agreed upon by both armies of the Romans and the Albans, for the sparing of much bloodshed, to put the trial of all to the issue of a battle betwixt six brethren, three on the one side, the sons of Curatius, and three on the other side, the sons of Horatius. While the Curatii were united, though they were all three sorely wounded, they killed two of the Horatii. The third remaining, though not hurt at all, yet not finding himself able to make his party good against all three, begins to take to his heels; and when he saw them follow him slowly one after another as they were able, by reason of their heavy armour and sore wounds, he falls upon them one after the other, and slays them all three. Thus it is the cunning sleight of the devil to divide us one from another, that he may prevail against us as Horatius did against the Curatii. It is with us as in the Church of Corinth: one saith, "I am of Paul," another, "I am of Apollos," another, "I am of Cephas;" so in our Church, one saith, "I am of Luther," another, "I am of Calvin," another, "I am of Zuingleius;" one is Episcopal, another Presbyterian, a third Independent,—all carnal, all in combustion, as if Christ were divided or the reformed religion deformed.

Livii Hist., Dec. 1, lib. 1.

Feally's Sermon.

1 Cor. i. 12.

"Scinditur incertum studia in contraria vulgus," &c.

CCCLXXXII.—Fears and jealousies, their danger.

EZEKIEL, in one of his visions, saw an image or idol of jealousy set up at the north gate of the temple. What he saw then in a vision is clearly apparent in our eyes. Not one, but many idols of jealousy are in all places of the nation set up, and worshipped too. What else mean those fears and jealousies that are now so rife amongst us? Here is no trust, no credit given to the speeches or actions of one another; and hence it is that we are engaged thus one against the other. This is far from that godly jealousy wherewith St. Paul was jealous over his Corinthians, and, if not speedily amended, God, that is a jealous God, will not suffer such fears and jealousies to be long unpunished.

Ezek. viii. 5.

Weems's Portrait.

"Omnia timens, omnia suspicans," &c.—CHRYSTOST., in Matt. xii.

1 Cor. x.

CCCLXXXIII.—Pleasures here in this life are usually attended with pains hereafter.

It is reported of the hedgehog, that he goes to a pile of apples and gathers up as many as he can upon his prickles, and when he comes to his hole he goes in with his prickles, but leaves his apples behind him. Thus, how many are there that have wallowed in the apples of their sweet contentments, which they have pursued with many pricks and gripes of conscience, who, when they shall descend, as shortly they must, to their holes of darkness, must then leave all the sweet apples of their false delights behind them, and shall carry nothing with them but the stings and stripes of a wounded conscience, and will say, as many that have gone before them, "What hath pride profited us? or what hath the pomp of riches brought us? All those things are passed away, like a post that passeth by, but we are tormented, we are consumed in our own wickedness. Now too late we find that pleasures here in this life are attended with pains hereafter."

Marchant, Hortus Pastorum.

Jer. xlix. 16.

"Nocet emp'ia dolore voluptas,"—OVID.

CCCLXXXIV.—Our sanctification is not perfected all at once.

It is the saying of St. Bernard, "Cecidimus super acervum lapidum et in luto." When Adam fell, and when every one of us doth fall, he may be compared unto a man that falleth not only into the mire, but also on a heap of stones; he may quickly be bruised, but not so quickly healed: there is great time spent therein, even the whole time of our life. As there are many reasons why the Church is compared to the moon and Christ to the sun, so one main reason may be the odds between justification and sanctification. Justification maketh Christ's righteousness ours, and it is from the first moment at the full, not capable of any increase; but sanctification is righteousness in us, which, if it have not its wanes, certainly it hath its waxings, and will not be at the full till the day of death.

In Lib. de Cena Domini.

Lake's Sermon, 1619.

CCCLXXXV.—Our whole life to be a life of repentance.

In Lib. Mediat.

Featly's Clavis Myrica.

Epist. vii.

ANSELM, some time Archbishop of Canterbury, whom the Church of Rome hath inserted in the canon of saints (but he ranketh himself among the apocrypha of sinners), recounting with heart's grief and sorrow the whole course of his life, and finding the infancy of sin in the sins of his infancy, the youth and growth of sin in the sins of his growth, and the maturity and ripeness of all sin in the sins of his ripe and perfect age, breaketh forth into this passionate speech: "Quid restat tibi, ô peccator, &c. (What remains for thee, wretched man, but that thou spend the remainder of thy life in bewailing thy whole life)?" And thus we must do, considering that even when we pray against sin we sin in praying; when we have made holy vows against sin our vows, by the breach of them, turn into sin; and upon repentance of sins, many there are that repent of their repentance, and so increase their sin. Hence it is that St. Jerome, in his epistle to Læta, calleth for a continual Lent of discipline, that her whole life should be a life of repentance.

CCCLXXXVI.—The safest way is to trust God with our riches.

Weems's Exerci.

HE that goeth a far journey returneth his money usually by a bill of exchange, and carrieth not his money along with him, only so much as will defray the charges of his journey; and all this for fear of robbing. So the children of God: they lay out their money to the poor, they take God's bill of exchange for it, and then it meets them in the world to come; and there they do not only receive it, but it receives them into everlasting habitations.

CCCLXXXVII.—Fear of the loss of Gospel light.

Ward's Sermon, Ipswich, 1636.

Isa. xxxii. 15.

CAMDEN could not reach the height of his conceit, who bore in his shield a savage of America, with his hand pointing to the sun, and this motto, "Mihi accessu, tibi recessu (In access to me, in recess to thee)." However, this is most sure, the Sun of righteousness hath appeared unto those savages of America, with healing under His wings; they are many of them brought unto civility and are in a fair way to Christianity. "Religion," said one, not many years since, "stands a-tiptoe and looketh westward." Let us all pray unto God that the prophecy in Isaiah be not fulfilled in our days: "The wilderness shall become a fruitful field, and the fruitful field shall become a forest."

CCCLXXXVIII.—The Christian's inside religion and outside must be suitable.

*Valentine's Sermon,
Lond., 1622.*

IN the things of this world how doth every man strive to be suitable to his rank, and is accounted base if he be not so! If of a yeoman he become a gentleman, of a gentleman a knight, as his person is improved so will he improve his port also; yea, the excesses of all men show that every man goeth beyond his rank, in his house, in his fare, in his clothes—building like emperors, clothing like kings, feasting like princes. But in our spiritual estate it is not so: for our house, we can be contented to dwell in sealed houses, when the ark of God is under tents. And who doth endeavour that himself may be a temple fit for the Holy Ghost to dwell in? As for our clothes, they should be royal; our garments should ever be white; the wedding-garment should never be put off. But we are far from this kind of clothing; we do not endeavour to be clothed with the righteousness of the saints. Finally, for our diet, we that are called to the table of the Lord, and should be sustained with angels' food, content ourselves with swine's meat; for what else are filthy lusts? We are called to be the sons of God, yet our eye is very seldom upon our Father to see what beseemeth His sons; we are called to be members of Christ, but little do we care what beseemeth that mystical body: we are rather in name than in deed children of God or members of Christ.

CCCLXXXIX.—Repetition of good things helpful to memory

A BUCKET or tub may, for want of use and standing dry, be so full of slits and rifts, that all the water you take up in it runneth out; yet often dipping it into the well and filling it with water will make it moister than otherwise it would have been, and more retentive. Thus it is with our memories in the things concerning God and the good of our souls: being very brittle and pertuse, that they will hold very little or nothing at all, they are dolia pertusa (all goes through). This must therefore be matter of great necessity to hear often, that the frequent inculcation of the same things may imprint that in our mind by often hearing which others of more happy memories have got at the first.

Gouge's Serm.
Lond., 1644.

CCCXC.—All the creatures are at peace with good men.

EUSEBIUS, in his "Ecclesiastical Story," recordeth that the persecutors took those primitive Christians and set them naked before the lions to be devoured, yet the lions durst not touch them; they stood foaming and roaring before them but hurt them not; and thereupon they were forced to put the skin of wild beasts upon them, and so tear them in pieces. Thus thou that art a wicked man, and hast no part of the image of God to defend thee, no marvel if thy dog bite thee, thy horse brain thee, thy ox gore thee, &c.; but as for thee that art the child of God, and hast the image of thy Creator stamped on thy soul, thou needst not fear the creatures: though thy walk lie by the vale and shadow of death they can offer no violence or harm unto thee (unless it be upon particular dispensation, for thy good and spiritual comfort), because they are reconciled unto thee by God's own promise.

Lib. i., cap. 4.

Wicomb's Per- trillure.

Hos. ii. 18.

CCCXCI.—Impossible to know God perfectly here in this world.

TULLY relateth how Simonides, being asked by Hiero, the king of Sicily, what God was, desired one day to consider of it; and after one day being past, having not yet found it out, desired two days more to consider of it; and after two days, he desired three; and, to conclude, he at length had no other answer to return unto the king but this, that the more he thought upon it, the more he might: for the further he waded in the search thereof, the further he was from the finding of it. And thus Plato: "What God is," saith he, "that I know not; what He is not, that I know." Most certain it is that God only, in regard of Himself, knows Himself, as dwelling in the light inaccessible, whom never man saw, neither can see. Here now the well is not only deep, but we want a bucket to draw withal. God is infinite and never to be comprehended essentially. Oh, then, that we could so much the more long to enjoy Him by how much less we are able to apprehend Him!

Lib. de Nat. Deo
lib. iii.

"De Deo cum dicitur non potest dici."
—HILAR.

1 Tim. vi. 16.

Drexellii Considerat.
de Eternitate.

CCCXCII.—Not only the good, but the bad also, are imitable in things they do well.

1 Thess. v. 2.

Luke xvi. 8.
Matt. x.
Lake's Serm.,
Lond., 1623.

"Virtus vel in heroe laudatur."

It is Christ's own comparison, that His second coming shall be like the stealing in of a thief in the night, "Et quod deceit Christum cur mihi turpe pūtem?"—nay, Christ bids us imitate not only the bad steward in his providence, but the serpent also in his wisdom. St. Paul borroweth sentences out of the heathen poets; St. Augustine made use of a rule of interpreting the Scriptures from Tichonius the Donatist. Truth and goodness, in whomsoever they are, they are God's; and therefore, whether the point be speculative or practical, if it be of this kind, in whomsoever we find it we may follow it, and in following it we follow not men but God. It is too much preciseness to dislike something in our Church because therein we follow the Church of Rome, as if all principles of religion and reason were quite extinguished in them.

CCCXCIII.—Injuries not only to be forgiven, but forgotten also.

Plutarch, de Amore Fraterno.

Caelius Rhodogin,
Lect. Var. 16-19.

"Ne malorum me-minis."—VAL.
MAX.

THE Athenians took one day from the month of May, and erased it out of all their calendars, because on that day Neptune and Minerva fell out with one another; they could not endure any remembrance of that quarrel. And it is Pythagoras's rule, "Ignem gladio ne fodias (Do not stir up the fire that is almost out)." Even so let Christians much more bury those days in silence, and strike them out in their almanacks, in which any bitter contention fell amongst them; and the breach being once made up, and the wound closed, not to rub upon the old sore; and the heat being over, not to rake into the embers or ashes of the fire of that contention lately put out, but to make a blessed amnestia, an absolute act of oblivion upon all injuries forepassed.

CCCXCIV.—Afflictions lead to heaven.

Sermone Discipuli
de Tempore.
Judges i. 15.

1 Cor. xiv. 22.

MERCHANTS do usually show their worst cloths first to their customers, then the best. At the wedding in Cana, the last wine was the best: "Dulcia non meruit qui non gustavit amara;" before the Israelites could reach to Canaan, they must march southward through the dry and barren parts of the mountains. And thus God showeth His children great afflictions and troubles—the south parts, as it were, at the first—before they can reach the land of promise: the way to heaven must be by the gates of heli. Through many tribulations we must enter into the kingdom of heaven.

CCCXCV.—Eternity of punishment in hell.

Lib. iii., cap. 6.

Direxili Cautiones, de Amicitia.

"Nondum tecum in gratiam redii" more, sub quo fine, "Secus" GREG., lib. ix., Moral.

SUETONIUS reports of Tiberius Cæsar, that being petitioned unto by a certain offender to hasten his punishment and to grant him a speedy dispatch, he made him this answer, "Nondum tecum in gratiam redii (Stay, sir; you and I are not friends yet)." Thus it is betwixt Christ and the damned soul: Christ is a most just Judge, no tyrant, no Tiberius; and yet if one of the damned, after a thousand years' burning in hell, should beg and entreat for a speedy death, He would answer after the same manner, "Nondum tecum in gratiam redii (You and I are not yet friends);" if, after thousands and millions of years, the request should be renewed, the answer would continue still the same: "Stay, you and I are not yet friends." So just and right a thing it is that he that would not by repentance accept of mercy when it was offered, should by punishment be tormented and have justice without mercy for ever.

CCCXCVI.—God and His attributes are answerable.

It is well known that the title of "Augustus" hath been given to such Cæsars as did not enlarge, but diminish the empire; of "Pater patriæ" to those that were so far from being fathers that they were plain tyrants; of "Pontifex maximus" given to them which were so far from serving the gods, that they did sacrilegiously canonise themselves for gods; and yet, propter spem, the senate gave them these titles, and by flattery they did amplify in the rest. He that had but a small conquest increased his style as if he had conquered a whole kingdom, as appears in the titles of Germanicus, Illyricus, Britannicus, &c.; nay, the Eastern monarchs were very fond this way, claiming kindred of the gods, of the stars, and what not, which might amplify their majesty. In a word, hope and flattery are the best ground whereupon all worldly men's titles are built, especially great men's, and kings' most of all. But it is not so with the King of Heaven: the truths in Him are answerable to the titles that are given Him, the attributes proportionable—they are not given him propter spem, but rem. He is that which He is called, neither is there in them any flattery—yea, His titles do come short of, they do not exceed, those perfections that are in Him; so that we may not measure the style of God as we do the styles of mortal kings, but conceive rather more than less when we hear them.

Lake & Serm. on Iia. ix.

Cœlius Rhodogin,
Var. Lect.

CCCXCVII.—Prosperity of the wicked is destructive.

"I have seen the wicked," saith David, "in great power, and spreading himself like a green bay-tree." And why like a green bay-tree? Because in the winter, when all other trees—as the vine-tree, fig-tree, apple-tree, &c., which are more profitable trees—are withered and naked, yet the bay continueth as green in the winter as the summer. So fareth it with wicked men: when the children of God, in the storms of persecutions and afflictions and miseries, seem withered and, as it were, dead, yet the wicked all that time flourish, and do appear green in the eyes of the world: they wallow in worldly wealth, but it is for their destruction; they wax fat, but it is for the day of slaughter. It was the case of Hophni and Phinehas: the Lord gave them enough and suffered them to go on and prosper in their wickedness; but what was the reason? Because He would destroy them.

Ps. xxxvii. 15

Tangerlarii Pontif.

1 Sam. II. 25.

CCCXCVIII.—Justifying faith accompanied with good works.

It is evident to all (except others be made keepers of their reason, as now they are of their liberties) that the eye alone seeth in the body, yet the eye which seeth is not alone without the other senses; that the forefinger alone pointeth, yet that finger is not alone on the hand; that the hammer alone striketh on the bell, yet the hammer that striketh is not alone in the clock; that the heat alone in the fire burneth, yet that heat is not alone without light; that the helm alone guideth the ship, and not the tackling, yet the helm is not alone, nor without the tackling; in a compound electuary, rhubarb only purgeth choler, yet the rhubarb is not alone there without other ingredients. Thus we are to conceive that though faith alone doth justify, yet that faith which justifieth is not alone, but joined with charity and good works. St. Bernard's distinction of via regni and causa regnandi cleareth the truth in this point: though good works are not the cause why God crowneth us, yet we must take them in our way to heaven, or else we shall never come there. It is as impious to deny the necessity as to maintain the merit of good works.

Sylvest. de Priorio, Aurea Rosa in Evang.

"Non bowe maclato coelestia numina gaudent, sed quæ præstanda est," &c.
—OVID, Ep.

CCCXCIX.—Talkers, not doers of religion are to be condemned.

It is a custom in Germany, that in the evening, when a candle is first lighted or brought into a room, they say, "Deus det vobis lucem æternam (God grant light eternal)!" and it is Drexellii Considerat.

de Æternitate.

Plautus.

usual in many parts of this kingdom to say, "God grant us the light of heaven!" The custom is good and the words warrantable; but were the light of heaven more in our hearts and less in our tongues, there would be fewer works of darkness in our lives and conversations. We speak of the light of heaven, and wish for the light of heaven, and we talk of new lights to heaven, but all this is like that silly actor in the comedy that cried out, with his finger pointed to the earth and his eye to heaven, "En cælum, ó terra (Heaven is in our mouths, but earth in our hearts)!" We are heteroclitcs in religion; not reals, but nominals in profession.

CCCC.—The endeavours of Christ are for peace.

Lake's Sermon on Exod. ix.

It is too usual with men, the wiser they are, the more to be turbulent and disquieters of the state; and the more power they have, the more to tyrannize and lord it over their fellow-subjects: for such men do seldom suffer themselves to be guided or governed by the counsels and dictates of others, but run headlong of themselves, swayed by a kind of impulsive providence, and so care not but to please their own fancy, no matter whom they displease besides. But it is not so with Christ: He that is wisdom itself, that is wonderful for counsel, mighty for power, bends both His wisdom and His power and His counsel to work peace, that peace which is the portion of His people, the inheritance of His Church, which none can partake of but those that are true members thereof.

CCCCI.—Study of the tongues to be encouraged.

1 Sam. xxv.
Weems's Portraiture.

DAVID made a statute in Israel, that they who tarried by the stuff should part alike with those who went to battle. The professors of the tongues are they who keep the stuff, and they should be as well rewarded as they who go into the field and fight in the ministry.

CCCCII.—The anger or wrath of God best appeased when the sinner appeareth with Christ in his arms.

Diodorus, lib. xi.
Plutarch, in Pitt.

THEMISTOCLES, understanding that King Admetus was highly displeased with him, took up his young son into his arms and treated with the father, holding his darling in his bosom, and thereby appeased the king's wrath. God is at this time offended with us, and hath a controversy with us; there is no better way than to come to Him with Christ in our arms, to present our suits by Him. We have so far provoked the Almighty by our sins, that He may justly fall on us with a back-blow that we never yet dreamt of: and who in heaven or earth can or dare treat for our peace but Christ our Peace-maker? "Ille oculus est per quem Deum videmus, &c.," saith Ambrose. ("He is our eye with which we see God, our hand by which we offer to Him, and our mouth by which we speak unto Him.")

Lib. ii., de Isaac.

CCCCIII.—The vanity of heaping up riches.

O exaltis Curiositas.
de interstitiis.

It is a great deal of care and pains that the spider takes in weaving her web: she runneth much, and often up and down; she fetcheth a compass this way and that way and returneth often to the same point; she spendeth herself in multitudes of fine threads to make herself a round cabinet; she exenterateth herself, and worketh out her own bowels, to make an artificial and curious piece of work, which, when it is made, is apt to be blown away with every puff of wind; she hangeth it up aloft, she fasteneth it to the roof of the house, she strengtheneth it with many a thread, wheeling often round about, not sparing her own bowels, but spending them willingly upon her work; and when she hath done all this—spun Tales of Occasion of Meditat.

her fine threads, weaved them one within another, wrought herself a fine canopy, hanged it aloft, and thinks all is sure—on a sudden, in the twinkling of an eye, with a little sweep of a besom all falls to the ground, and so her labour perisheth. But here is not all. Poor spider ! she is killed, either in her own web, or else she is taken in her own snare, haled to death, and trodden under foot. Thus the silly insect may be truly said either to weave her own winding sheet or to make a snare to hang herself. Just so do many men waste and consume themselves to get preferment, to enjoy pleasures, to heap up riches, and increase them ; and to that end they spend all their wit, and oftentimes the health of their bodies, running up and down, labouring and sweating, carking and caring : and, when they have done all this, they have but weaved the spider's web to catch flies ; yea, oftentimes are caught in their own nets, are made instruments of their own destruction. They take a great deal of pains with little success, to no end or purpose.

"Dives pena non censu,"—RAVEN, in Serm.

CCCCIV.—The way to God is a cross way to the world.

A MAN that walks by a river, if he follow the river against the stream, it will at length bring him to the spring-head from whence it issueth ; but if he go along with the stream, it will draw him on to the salt sea. So he that is cross-grained to the humours of the world, that swims against the stream of sensual delights and pleasures, that well improveth these outward things to God's glory, shall at length be brought to God, the sweet fountain of them all ; but if he sail with the wind and tide, in the abuse of the good creatures of God, they will carry him down like a torrent into the mare mortuum of perdition.

Shute's Serm., Lond., 1620.

CCCCV.—How to know God's dwelling-place, heaven.

WHEN in our travel we chance to cast our eye upon some goodly structure of inestimable value, we presently conceive it to be the palace of a prince ; so when we see the frame of heaven so full of wonders, where stars are but as dust and angels are but servants, where every word is unspeakable and every motion is a miracle, we may safely conclude it to be the dwelling of Him whose name is Wonderful.

Weems's Portraiture.

"Hac iter est Superis," &c.—OVID, Met., lib. 1.

CCCCVI.—The dissolution of all ages past is to be a memento for posterity.

ONE Guerrius, hearing these words read in the Church, out of the Book of Genesis (chap. xv.) : "And all the days that Adam lived were nine hundred and thirty years, and he died ; all the days of Seth were nine hundred and twelve years, and he died ; and all the days of Enos were nine hundred and five years, and he died ; and all the days of Methuselah were nine hundred sixty and nine years, and he died," &c.,—hearing, I say, these words read, the very conceit of death wrought so strongly upon him, and made so deep an impression in his mind, that he retired from the world and gave himself wholly to devotion, that so he might die the death of the godly, and arrive more safely at the haven of felicity, which is nowhere to be found in this world. And thus should we do when we look back to the many ages that are past before us, but thus we do not : like those that go to the Indies, we look not on the many that have been swallowed up by the waves, but on some few that have got by the voyage : we regard not the millions that are dead before us, but have our eyes set on the lesser number that survive with us ; and hence it comes to pass that our passage out of this world is so little minded.

Drexellii Considerat de Eternitate.

CCCCVII.—National knowledge of God no true knowledge.

Elton's Serm., Southwark, 1619.

Look upon a common beggar : he knows the roadway from place to place, can tell you the distance from town to town, nay, more, can inform you of such a nobleman's, such a knight's, such a gentleman's house, though it stands a great way off from the road ; of such a farmer's, and such a yeoman's house, though it be in never so obscure a village, yet all this while hath no settled home, no abiding place of his own. Such is the knowledge of every Christian except a true Christian : he can tell you of the pleasures that are at the right hand of God in the highest heavens, can talk and prate of God, discourse of goodness, but all this while is not good himself, nor can make out unto himself any assurance of interest in those heavenly things which he so much talketh of.

CCCCVIII.—A formal, specious Christian, no true Christian.

Gen. xxix. 31.

Weemo's Par-
trature.

"Herodes devo-tionem promittit sed gladium aluit," &c.—CHRYSTOST.,
in Matt. ii.

RACHEL was very fair, a goodly woman to see too, beautiful to the eye. Oh, but she was barren ; that marred all. So there are many in the world such as make specious shows of religion, such as would seem to be saints. Oh, but they are barren, they are fruitless, sapless, leafless Christians. They would seem to honour God, but not with their substance ; they would seem to be religious, but they will not refrain their tongues ; they would seem to be charitable, but they will not part with a penny : they have all form, but little or no power of godliness ; many goodly blossoms of profession, no real fruits of confession appearing ; outside, specious, not true, not real Christians.

CCCCIX.—Order both in Church and State commanded and commended.

1 Cor. xlv. 33.

Lake's Serm. on Isaiah ix.
1 Cor xii. vii.

"Ordine servato
mundus servatur," &c.—BOETIUS.

God is not the God of confusion, but of order. Confusion is from the devil ; order is from God, especially in the Church, which St. Paul resembles to our body, wherein the parts are fitly disposed and every one keepeth his place. The eye, the hand, the foot—one usurpeth not the function of another. In answerableness whereunto the apostle telleth us, that "all are not prophets, all are not apostles," and exhorts all men, "as God hath called them, so to walk." A good rule for these unruly times, wherein the hands, yea, and the feet too, play rex, and take up the room of the head, and every man thinketh himself fit to be a teacher, both by his pen and tongue, whose place notwithstanding is amongst the learners.

CCCCX.—Security in time of danger condemned.

Plutarch, in Mar- cello.

"Nunc mihi par-ticipes," &c.—VIR-GIL.

It is said of Archimedes, that when Syracuse was taken, all the people being as it were distracted, the soldiers doing all manner of outrage, he was found sitting at home securely, drawing circles with his compass in the dust. And do not we see men nowadays, when there is Hannibal ad portas, a popular sword playing rex within, and a royal sword enraged without, even when the eternal salvation of their souls is in question, handling their dust, and stretching themselves to their farthest compass, set upon the tenter-hooks as it were, and distracted with law-suits, with money matters, and worldly business, that shall profit them nothing at the last. Eternity is a thing they never think on, or else very slenderly for a snatch and away, as dogs are said to lap the Nile, &c.

CCCCXI.—An ungodly life will have an ungodly end.

A PHILOSOPHER asking one which of these two he had rather be, either Cræsus, who was one of the richest but most vicious in the world, or Socrates, who was one of the poorest but most virtuous men in the world, his answer was, that in his life he would be a Cræsus, but in his death a Socrates. So, if many in these days were put to their choice, they would be Dives in their life, but Lazarus in their death; they would, with Balaam, die the death of the righteous, but live the life of the wicked. But that cannot be, for death is a kind of truck or exchange. Here it is that the Israelites make the bricks, and the Egyptians dwell in the houses; but hereafter St. John Baptist's head will become a crown as well as a platter: and he that hath had his consolation, his heaven in this world, shall at the time of death meet with torments and hell in that which is to come.

Fonseca's Serm.
Quadragesimalis.

"Qualis vita finis ita."

CCCCXII.—A child of God is restless till he come to heaven.

Look upon a silly poor country lad coming to be an apprentice in the city; how doth he hone and mourn after his father and mother! How doth he grieve because he is far from his friends and acquaintances! He is never quiet till he hath been at the carrier's to hear from them, and fain would he be with them again, though he be at that time in a very good service, and placed with an honest, loving master. And thus it is with a child of God: though he have a competent measure of grace to support him in this life, and the hope of heaven in that which is to come, yet he is restless till he comes to heaven. He groans and mourns because he is absent from his heavenly Father, and from his friends and acquaintances, the blessed saints and angels.

Taylor's Serm.
London, 1631.

CCCCXIII.—The use of the creatures is conditional.

A TENANT that holdeth land from a lord may not use it otherwise than according to the covenants agreed upon; if he do, the premises are forfeited. Even so it is betwixt God and us; the grant which He maketh to us of His creatures is conditional. We may take convenient food for our sustenance, decent clothes to shroud us from the injury of the weather, and we may bestow our money to supply our own and other folks' necessities. To these ends we may use God's creatures; but we may not riot with our meat and drink. We may not be fantastical in our apparel, neither may we with our wealth grind the faces of the poor. We have no covenant that warrants any of these, and therefore the doing of any of these is a forfeit of the proprietary. And how often might Christ re-enter upon our goods, if He would take advantage of our daily abuses!—nay, He daily doth re-enter, had we but grace to see it. What multitudes of inhabitants hath drunkenness spued out of their possessions! What goodly patrimonies hath pride and oppression brought to nought! It were to be wished that the world did as much take notice of it as almost every place doth give them occasion so to do.

Lake's Serm. ■ Hagget.

CCCCXIV.—Unpreparedness for death very dangerous.

It was a good answer that one Messodamus gave one, inviting him to feast the next day: "My friend," saith he, "why dost thou invite me against to-morrow? I could not for these many years so secure myself that I should live one day, for I am in daily expectation of the time of my departure." And, indeed, no man can be sufficiently armed against death, unless he be ready to entertain it. What rashness and folly is it, then, for a man to lie down in ease upon a feather bed, to sleep securely, snorting and snoring, and all this while to lodge an enemy, a deadly enemy, sin, in his bosom. Sudden deaths are

Guido Bituricensis,

Drexellii Considerat.
de Æternitate.

"Omnem crede diem tibi diluxisse
supremum."

common. How many have we heard of that went well to bed over night, for aught a man could tell, and have been found dead in the morning; and, it is much to be feared, have gone impenitently to bed, it may be dead drunk, and have found themselves awake in hell the next morning! Unpreparedness for death must needs therefore be dangerous.

CCCCXV.—The wisdom of Christ above all earthly wisdom, even to admiration.

Plutarch, in Vita Dionys.

DIONYSIUS the tyrant sent to Plato (that he might come to see him) one of his fairest galleys, with store of dainty provision and well accompanied; and at the haven where he was to land had provided a coach with four horses to be ready to receive him, that he might come in the greater pomp to his palace; and all this honour he was willing to do him, for that he was a wise man. Now, if such men as he shall cause admiration in the world, what admiration, then, must He raise in men's minds who is wisdom itself, and in whom all the treasures of God's wisdom are laid up for evermore?

Fonseca's *Serm.
Quadragesimal.*

CCCCXVI.—Not to be malicious in the exercise of holy duties.

Boys' Postill.

It is said of the serpent that he casts up all his poison before he drinks: it were to be much desired that herein we had so much serpentine wisdom as to disgorge our malice before we pray; to cast up all the bitterness of our spirits before we come to the sacrament of reconciliation.

CCCCXVII.—Special places of Scripture marked with God's special authority.

Lake's Serm. on Hag. ii.

MORTAL princes are not accustomed to sign bills or petitions the contents whereof are trivial matters; many things are done by virtue of their regal authority whereunto their signature is not used. Even so ordinary matters pass in the Word of God without any special urging of His supreme power; but when it comes with a sic dicit Dominus, then the point is of great regard, and, if it be often ingeminated, it giveth us to understand that we must take special notice of every clause of it.

CCCCXVIII.—In all our doings we should have our eye upon eternity.

Allan, *Var. Hist.,
lib. xiv.*

Drexell's *Considerat.
de Eternitate.*

ZEUXIS, the famous painter, was observed to be very slow at his work, and to let no piece of his go abroad into the world to be seen of men till he had turned it over and over, this side and that side, again and again, to see if he could spy any fault in it; and being upon a time asked the reason why he was so curious, why so long in drawing his lines and so slow in the use of his pencil, he made this answer, "I am long in doing what I take in hand, because what I paint I paint for eternity." As for our parts, we write, we read, we sing, we pray, we labour; whatsoever we say, whatsoever we do, whatsoever we think, all is transmitted to eternity, all to be viewed by a most judicious and all-seeing eye, so that no fault can escape, and, being viewed and considered, they are to be committed either to be eternally punished or eternally rewarded. We must labour, therefore, to be perfect; so to live to God that we may live with God; so to live on earth that we may live in heaven; so to live for eternity that we may live to all eternity.

CCCCXIX.—At the time of death to be mindful only of heaven.

CHRIST, perceiving His death to be near at hand, withdrew Himself, and would walk more openly among the Jews; and David, being at the last cast of his life, saith, "Remitte mihi ut refrigerer, &c. (Give me leave, O Lord, to dispose of myself and to render Thee an account of my life, before I go hence and be seen no more)." These are lectures of mortality read to all of us in this world, that when we are about to die we should have nothing else to do but die; we should bid these sublunary things adieu and sequester our thoughts from the world, and retire into ourselves to see how the case stands betwixt God and our own souls.

John xi. 54.

Ps. xxxix. 13.

Leon. de Utrino
Serm.

CCCCXX.—A tongue nimble to evil, slow to goodness, is reprobable.

PLINY, in his "Natural History," maketh mention of a certain people in the Indies, upon the river Ganges, called Astomi, that have no mouth, but do only feed upon the smell of herbs and flowers, &c. The truth of this may be uncertain, but most sure it is that there is such a generation amongst us, that when they should speak well they are like men possessed with a dumb devil, they have no mouth, no lips, no tongue at all; but if it be to blaspheme God and the king, to backbite and slander their neighbour, they have tongue enough and to spare.

Lib. vii., cap. ii.

Goddard's Serms.,
Lond., 1649.

CCCCXXI.—A minister is to distinguish his auditors.

SCHOOLMASTERS range their scholars into forms, and though themselves be never so learned, yet they read unto their several forms no deeper points than they are capable of; if they should do otherwise, however well they might show their learning, they would show no discretion, neither would the scholars be the better for that which they should teach them. Even so ministers must remember to distinguish their auditors; to feed some with milk, some with strong meat, to catechize the youth plainly and briefly, to build up those that are elder and riper in years and judgment with more learning and more full instruction.

Lake's Serm., on
Matt. vii.

"Diligenter adhibe curam eis, quibus te præesse contigerit," &c.—AUG., in Pro.
i.

CCCCXXII.—Hopes of heaven are the good man's encouragement.

SYMPHORIANUS, a Christian young man, after that he was almost scourged to death, as he was dragged to death at Augustodunum, met his mother upon the way. But how? Not tearing the hair from her head, or rending her clothes, or laying open her breasts, or making grievous lamentation, as the manner of foolish women is to do, but carrying herself like an heroic Christian lady, called to her son and said, "Son, my son, I say, remember life eternal! Look up to heaven, lift up thine eye to Him that reigneth there; life is not taken from thee, but exchanged for a better!" At which words of his mother, the young man was so exceedingly animated that he went willingly to execution, and cheerfully laid down his head upon the block and was decollated. This is the case of every man living: we go not so fast as Symphorianus did, we are not yet under the fiery trial, but we are fair for it; we are all going, and we have not far to it. Now, the noble army of martyrs which are gone before us call unto us from heaven, and say, as the Christian and courageous mother said to her son, "Remember life eternal! Look up to heaven; see who is there, the Judge of all the world, that will do righteous things."

Drexellii Considerat.
de Æternitate.

"Spes præmii solatium fit laboris,"— JER., in Ep.

CCCCXXIII.—The brevity of our life may moderate our life.

If a company that are bound out for some long voyage should strive who should be master and who master's mate, and who should have this or that office, they were not too much to be blamed; but when they are almost at home, within sight of land, when they shall begin to strike sail, to tack in all and go ashore, then, if they shall fall a-quarrelling for places, and use all the means they could make, it were a ridiculous thing and folly. So it is with us: time was when the world was in beginning, and then, when a man came into the world by the course of nature, he might well say, "I have a matter of six, or seven, or eight hundred years to go on in my pilgrimage before I shall end my journey," and then if a man should bestow a little time to think with himself, "Well, if I can but live to see myself the father of a thousand children, and so might come to people a country," &c., then, if a man should greet the world, he might be excused. But now, since God hath contracted the time of our age, so that as soon as we begin our voyage we are ready to strike sail presently, that we have but a little time to continue here and a great deal of work to do for hereafter, to stand striving who shall be greatest, who shall rule all, to cry out of afflictions just when we are going ashore, when we have, as it were, one foot in our graves, is extreme folly and madness.

Funeral Serm.

"Orimur morimur."

CCCCXXIV.—Sacramental bread and wine better than ordinary.

Inchinn, Scala Cæli.

THERE is much water in the well or spring-head; it comes to us in leaden pipes or wooden troughs. Now, what is the leaden pipe or wooden trough more than another? Nothing at all; it is the water in the pipe or trough that makes them esteemed above others. It is true they can do no more than others; but if you look upon them in the use—i. e., to convey the water unto us—then they are more excellent than all others whatsoever. So in the sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper: there is water in the one, and bread and wine in the other; yet what is this water, this bread and wine, more than any other? Are not they the same we have at home? Yea. Oh, but if we look upon them as ordained of God, to convey His mercies into our hearts, to seal unto our souls the remission of sins, &c., and that God hath set them aside to that end and purpose, then they are more excellent than any other water, bread, or wine possibly can be.

CCCCXXV.—Our affections to be regulated.

Lake's Serm. on
Ps. lxxv.

HE that rideth a fierce horse, let the horse keep what pace he will, so long as the rider commands him by the bridle, we say he rides strongly; but if the horse get the bit in his mouth and run away, the faster his pace the weaker the rider, because he cannot check him. Our affections are just like that fierce horse, and our reason should be as a strong bridle. Stir they never so much, if reason command, we are strong; but if reason have no power and they run loose, then certainly the more violent they are the more weak we are.

CCCCXXVI.—A contented man no base-spirited man.

Platarch, in Apoph.
thegm.

MARCUS CURIO, when he had bribes sent unto him, to tempt him to be unfaithful to his country, he was sitting at dinner with a dish of turnips, and they came and promised him rewards. "Well," saith he, "that man who can be contented with such fare as I have will not be tempted with your rewards. I thank God I am contented with this fare; and as for rewards, let them be offered to those that cannot be content to dine on a dish of turnips, as I do." The truth of this is apparently seen. The reason why many men do betray their trust, and by indirect means strive to be rich, is because they cannot be contented to be in a low condition; whereas the man that is contented with a hard bed and a bare board is shot free from thousands of temptations that prevail against others, even to the damning of their souls.

Burrough's Christ.
Content.

CCCCXXVII.—The resolved Christian makes his way through all difficulties.

TRAVELLERS that go by sea merely to be sea-sick a little, or in sport, if there arise but a black cloud, they presently give over—their voyage is at an end. They come not to be weather-beaten, to adventure shocks and storms and dangers; they come for pleasure only. But the merchant that is bound upon a voyage, whose trade and employment of life it is, every cloud and gust of wind doth not make him to return back again to shore, and so to lose his voyage, but he drives through all. So it is with one that is not indeed and in earnest travelling towards heaven; he is easily taken off upon a little storm arising: if God do but frown, if there be but ever so small a wrinkle, as I may say, in His brow, all the delight in religion is gone; for it was some other thing he aimed at: it was but for pleasure that he came in here. But a resolved Christian, who is bound for heaven indeed, and his course and the bent of his soul lieth that way, like a ship with full sail, is carried thitherward, storms cannot beat him off; let the wind rise and the rain beat and the seas lift up their voice, he makes his way through all, till he arrive at the haven intended.

Inchlinch, Scala cæli

House of Mourning.

"Per ardua virtus. Itur ad æthereas per magna pericula sedes."—VARINUS.

CCCCXXVIII.—Afflictions add unto the beauty of a true Christian.

Look upon a painted post or sign, whose colour is laid in oil; how the rain beats upon it in stormy weather, that one would think all the colour would be washed off; yet how the water glides away, and leaves it rather more beautiful than before. And thus it is with every child of God: being well varnished and garnished with graces of the Spirit, let the wind of persecution blow and the floods of affliction lift up their voice, they shall never break nor deface, but rather add unto their beauty. Such is the condition of grace that it shines the brighter for scouring, and is most glorious when it is most clouded.

Jenkins's Lect. on Judea, Lond., 1646.

CCCCXXIX.—A good prince no advantage to a bad people.

WE see that though the sun be above the horizon, and so apt to make a glorious day, yet many fogs and mists arising from the earth overcast the sky and intercept the comfortable influence of the light. Even so, though God vouchsafe never so good a prince—a prince under whom the people enjoy abundance of peace and the free passage of the Gospel—such may be their gracelessness that they may be the better for neither of them.

Lud. Carbo, Senatorius Romæ.

CCCCXXX.—Contentment brings in all things on a sudden.

By the art of navigation, with great pains and industry, men can fetch in the silks of Persia, the spices of Egypt, the gold of Ophir, the treasures of the East and West Indies. Oh, but by the art of contentment a man may stay at home and fetch in the comfort of any condition whatsoever; that is, he may have that comfort by contentment that he should have if he had the very things themselves.

Burrough's Christ. Content.

CCCCXXXI.—A godly man is bettered in evil company.

THEY say that lilies or roses, or such like pleasant flowers, if they be planted by garlic or onions, or such like unsavoury things, they do not lose, but rather increase in their former sweetness. So it is with good and godly men when they are planted and, as it were, hemmed in with wicked men; the vileness and odiousness of their wickedness make them loathe wickedness so much the more, and to love godliness, and to bless God who hath kept them that they have not run to the same excess of riot.

Funeral Sermon.

"Ex bono malus vix melioratur," &c.—CHRYSOST., in Matt.

CCCCXXXII.—The wonderful love of a true Christian to Christ Jesus.

"Licet ex collo pendeat," &c.—In Festis, ad Relic-torum.

Featly's Serm.

"Cui portio Deus est," &c.—AM-BROS.

It was a true Christian-like speech of St. Jerome: "If my father should stand before me, my mother should hang upon me, my brethren should press about me, I would break through my brethren, throw down my mother, tread under feet my father, that I might the faster cleave unto Christ Jesus my Saviour." Oh, the surpassing love to Christ that is in a true disciple of Christ! Let money perish and friends fail, the world frown,—yea, life itself vanish—Christ is better than them all. If Christ should say to him, "Take thy fill of sinful delights; eat, drink, and be merry; solace thyself in the midst of all thy abundance; thou shalt not perish, only thou shalt not be with Me!" "Not with Thee, Lord Jesus? Where then? Then farewell, delights; farewell, pomp and plenty; farewell, all! I will follow Thee withersoever Thou goest, for it will certainly be hell where Thou art not."

CCCCXXXIII.—Memory must be active.

Lake's Serm., 1617.

"Memoria rei similis,"—ERASM.

OUR memory is usually a good store-house, but no good steward; it layeth up much, but of itself dispenseth nothing. It needeth some help to make use of its store. The speculative memory doth, and the practical much more. How many there be whose memories are richly stored with excellent rules of life, whereof in their life they make little or no use! Their memory doth not help them when they have occasion to be doing; as if they had never known commandments or creed, they live like infidels or sons of Belial. Wherefore, as the eye of the body needeth the light of the sun to raise and convey the visible species unto it, even so doth the eye of our understanding need the light of the Sun of righteousness to stir up and present unto it the principles of grace, whereof it hath need in the well-ordering of our life. Without this actual grace, our memory will never make use of the habitual.

CCCCXXXIV.—Contentment keeps up the soul in the saddest of conditions.

At sea, let him have never so much provision in his ship, yet if he be from the shore, or in a road where he shall not meet with a ship in which he have never a lantern in his ship, nor anything whereby he can see his way, in a storm, he would be but in a sad condition: he would give a great deal of money for something that may serve instead of it. When a storm riseth in the night, he have no light above board but what is presently puffed out, his condition is lamentable. Thus, many men can keep in the light of comfort so long as it is, but let there come any affliction, any storm upon them, their light is quenched. Then what shall they do? But when the heart is once furnished with grace, as it were the lantern on the decks of the ship, it will keep the soul in light; it will keep up a light in the soul, whatsoever storms or afflictions come into it, and keep out whatsoever may damp the comfort CCCCXXXV.—Worldly blessings do not always make a blessed man.

Herod the tetrarch. Was Jacob rich? So was Laban. Was Solomon an emperor? So was Julian. Was John the Baptist, and preferments, though the blessings of God were poured out upon them that are good; and yet they are likewise cast upon the wicked.

CCCCXXXVI.—A wicked man hardly drawn to examine himself.

It is reported of the elephant how unwilling he is to go into the water, but being forced he puddles it, lest by the clearness of the stream he should discern his own deformity. This is the condition of every wicked man : he is loth to look into himself, and had rather put the candle out at the door than go with it into his house to make any discoveries there. Either he thinks he is so good that he need not examine, or he thinks he is so bad that he is loth to examine himself.

Goodwin's Evang.
Communicant.

CCCCXXXVII.—Pride the complement of all sin.

As Tertullian calleth the commandment that God gave Adam in Paradise matricem omnium præceptorum Dei (the matrix or womb of all the commandments of God), and as Theodoret calleth Moses ωκεανόν τῆς θεολογίας (a very ocean of all divinity), and as some have called Rome epitomen universi (an epitome or abridgment of the whole world), so it may be said of pride, that it is the sum of all naughtiness, and a very sea of it—a complicated sin. There is no sin almost but pride participates with it. It is a kind of idolatry (Hab. i. 16), a kind of drunkenness (Isa. xlviii. 8), a kind of sacrilege (Isa. xxvi. 13), a kind of murder (Hab. ii. 5), &c. Thus, as Aristotle saith out of Theognis, that in justice all virtues are couched συλλήβδην (summarily), so it may be said of pride, that in it all vices are as it were in a bundle lapped up together.

In libro nostra Jud.

In lib. ii., de Rup.

Smith's Serm. on
Jer. lx.

In lib. Eth.

CCCCXXXVIII.—A mere soldier an enemy to peace.

WE read in Plutarch of one Demades, who by profession was a maker of coffins, and who was banished out of the city of Athens for wishing that he might have good trading, that wise state truly interpreting the language of his wish as desiring some epidemical disease, his private profit being inconsistent with the public flourishing of the commonwealth. So those people who are undone and cannot live but by undoing of others, who live by the sword, who, as Demetrius, by this craft get gain, desiring a perpetuity of war for their possession, certainly wish no good either to Church or state where they are, but must needs be state-barrators, to keep the sore always raw betwixt the prince and people.

In Moralium Lib.

Fuller's Holy State.

CCCCXXXIX.—Mortality's memorandum.

ORIGEN, after he had chosen rather facere periculose quàm perpeti turpiter (to burn incense to the heathen gods than to suffer his body to be defiled by a black-moor), and the flower of his chastity, which he had so long preserved, to be some way blasted—at a church in Jerusalem goeth into the pulpit, openeth the Bible at all adventures, intending to preach upon that text which he should first light upon, but falling upon that verse of Psalm l., "But to the wicked, saith God, what hast thou to do to declare my statutes, or that thou shouldest take my covenant in thy mouth?"—which contained his suspension—shutteth his book, speaketh not a word more, but comments upon it with his tears. So, methinks, when any man shall read the text, "Man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets," in which he shall find his capital doom written, he cannot do better than follow that Father's precedent, and shut up not only his book, but his mouth also, and seal up his lips, and comment upon the coherence with distraction, the parts with passion, the notes with sighs, the periods with groans, and the words with tears ; for, alas ! as soon as a man cometh into his short booth in this world, which he saluteth with tears, he goeth to his long home in the next world, and the mourners go about the streets

In Vita, præfixa Operibus.

House of Mourning.

Eccles. xii. 5.

CCCCXL.—Worldly men look after worldly things.

Jean de Serres's *Hist.*Charon, de la Sa-gesse."Mundum mundani quaerunt."

It is storied (told) of Henry IV. of France, asking the Duke of Alva if he had observed the eclipses happening in that year, he answered that he had so much business on earth that he had no leisure to look up to heaven. A sad thing it is for men to be so bent, and their hearts so set on the things of this world, as not to cast up a look to the things that are in heaven; nay, not to regard, though God brings heaven down to them in His Word and sacraments. Yet so it is; most men are of this Spanish general's mind—witness the oxen, the farms, the pleasures, the profits and preferments that men are so fast glued unto, that they have hardly leisure to entertain a thought of any goodness.

CCCCXLI.—Goodness and greatness seldom meet together.

Smith's Serm. on Jer. ix."Virtus et summa potestas non coe-unt."—LUCAN.Bernard, de Consolat., lib. ii.

IN our natural bodies, the more fat there is, the lesser blood in the veins, and consequently the fewer spirits; and so in our fields, abundance of wet breeds abundance of tares, and consequently great scarcity of corn. And is it not so with our souls? The more of God's blessing and wealth, the more weeds of carnality and vanity; and the more rich to the world, the less righteous to God commonly. What meant Apuleius to say that "Ubi uber, ibi tuber," but to signify that pride and arrogance are companions to plenty? And what made Solomon to pray against fullness (Prov. xxx.), but to show that as they must have good brains that will carry much drink, so they must have extraordinary souls that will not be overcome with the world? Goodness and greatness do seldom meet together, as Hasdrubal Hædeus said in Livy: "Rarò simul hominibus bona fortuna bonaque mens datur." Who is the man, except it be one of a thousand, cui præsens felicitas si arrisit, non irrisit, but if the world ran in upon him he would soon outrun it?

CCCCXLII.—Perseverance is the crown of all good actions.

Cyprian, in *Lib. de Simpl. Prælat.*Smith's Serm. on John vi.Gal. iii. 3.
Luke ix. 62.
Matt. xxiv. 13.

WHATSOEVER is before the end, it is a step whereby we climb to the top of salvation; but it is not the uppermost grace, whereby the highest part of the top may be taken hold of. A man may be tumbled down from the ladder as well when he is within a round or two of the top as when he is in the midst, or below the midst; and a man may make shipwreck when he is within ken of land as when he is a thousand miles off. What had it profited Peter to have escaped the first and second watch, if he had stuck at the iron gate, and had not passed through that also? Who maketh account of land-oats that shed before the harvest, or of fruit that falls from the tree before it be ripe? It is not to begin in the spirit and end in the flesh, not a putting of the hand to the plough and looking back, but a constant perseverance to the end, that shall be crowned.

CCCCXLIII.—Prayers of the godly, the unanimity of them.

Conrad, Zuingerus, Exposit., Pariterum.Fuller's Serm., 1642.

WE read of Ptolomeus Philadelphus, king of Egypt, that he caused the Bible to be translated by seventy interpreters, which seventy were severally disposed of in seventy several cells, unknown to each other; and yet they did so well agree in their several translations, that there was no considerable difference betwixt them in rendering the text: an argument that they were actuated by one and the same spirit. Surely, then, it must needs be a great comfort to all good Christians when they shall call to mind—what? Seventy—nay, seventy times seventy—yea, seventy hundred—yea, seventy thousand, which are peaceable in Israel, which on the bended knees of their souls pray daily unto God for peace; and though they know not the faces, i.e., not the names, of one another, have neither seen nor shall see one another till they meet together in heaven, yet they unite their votes and centre their suffrages in the same thing, that God would restore peace and order both in Church and state, and to every particular member therein, that we may yet live to have comfort one of another;—who, no doubt, shall have a comfortable return of their prayers in God's due time.

CCCCXLIV.—The powerful effects of rhetorical elocution.

THE breath of a man hath more force in a trunk, and the wind a louder and sweeter sound in the organ-pipe, than in the open air. So the matter of our speech and theme of our discourse, which is conveyed through figures and forms of art, both sound sweeter to the ear and pierce deeper into the heart. There is in them plus épepyélas and évappyélas (more evidence and more efficacy), they make a fuller expression and deeper impression, than any plain, rough-hewn, long cart-rope speeches or language whatsoever can do.

Ant. de Rampegoli,
Fig. Biblica.

"Eloquii tanta est gloria," &c.—OVI.

CCCCXLV.—A caveat for unworthy communicants.

MR. GREENHAM, in one of his sermons, speaking of non-residents, wisheth that this inscription or motto might be written on their study-doors without and walls within, on all their books they look in, beds they lie on, tables they sit at, &c.: "The price of blood! the price of blood!" The like were to be wished for to all that have been bad communicants, that in great letters it were written on their shop-doors without, walls within, on all their doors, on their day-books and debt-books, and whatsoever objects are before their eyes: "The guilt of blood! the guilt of blood!" Even the guilt of the blood of the Lord Jesus Christ, who died for them.

Goodwin's Evang.
Communicant.

CCCCXLVI.—Every good minister to speak a word in season, opportunely.

EVERY husbandman, as he hath, so he observeth the seasons to sow his seed and his ground to cast his corn into. Some he soweth in the autumn and fall of the leaf, some in the spring and renewing of the year; some in a dry season, some in a wet; some in a moist clay, some in a sandy dry ground. As the Holy Ghost speaketh, "He soweth the filches and the cummin, and casteth in wheat by measure." Thus the spiritual husbandman dealeth with the husbandry of his God. He hath his seed for all seasons, and for all grounds, and all hearts; some for the time of judgment; some for the time of mercy; some for the season of mirth and mourning, as wet and dry seasons; some for the birth and burial, as for the spring and fall; some for them who sorrow in sin; and some for them that rejoice in Jerusalem.

Stock's Sermon.

Isa. xxviii. 25.

"Scriba doctus in regno celorum,"
&c.

Matt. xiii. 52.

Isa. lxi. 3.

CCCCXLVII.—Pardon of sins the only comfort.

A TRAITOR that is condemned to death may have the liberty of the Tower to walk in, and provisions of meat and drink appointed at the State's charges, yet he takes little comfort in either, because his treason is not pardoned and he expects daily to be drawn to execution. Thus a man that hath the advantage of all these outward things, if he want assurance of the pardon of his sins and of God's love in Christ Jesus to his soul, they will be but as miserable comforters to him, and he cannot take any true delight in them.

Wood's Sermon,
Lond., 1629.

CCCCXLVIII.—The difference betwixt sermons preached and sermons printed.

Goodwin, ut antea.

SERMONS preached are, for the most part, as showers of rain that water for the instant; such as may tickle the ear, and warm the affections, and put the soul into a posture of obedience. Hence it is that men are oftentimes sermon-sick, as some are sea-sick, very ill, much troubled for the present, but by-and-by all is well again, as they were. But printed sermons or other discourses are as snow, that lies longer on the earth: they are longer lived; they preach when the author cannot, and—which is more—when he is not. Sights, as they come sooner to the eye than sounds to the ear, so they abide longer. Audible words are more transient, visible works more permanent. The one may make the ear more attentive, but the other the memory more retentive,—both in themselves excelling.

"Vox audita perit."

CCCCXLIX.—Princes and governors to be prudentially qualified.

Smith's Serm. on
Pr. ii.

1 Kings vii.

Exod. xvii.

"Duo sunt quæ ab egregiis principibus expectantur, sanctitas domi, in armis fortitudo," &c.—ARISTOTLE.

"Be wise now, therefore, O kings!" (Ps. ii.) Two kinds of wisdom are required in kings and princes: wisdom or knowledge in God's matters, otherwise called divinity; and wisdom or knowledge in worldly matters, otherwise called prudence or policy. Both are not only like the two pillars that Solomon put in the porch of the temple for ornament, but also for special use, like the hands of Aaron and Hur, which did support the hands of Moses for the discomfiture of the Amalekites. And good reason too; for if they be pious only in God's matters, and be not otherwise prudent, then they are fitter for the commonweal of Plato than for the corrupt estate of Romulus, for the cloister than for the court. Again, if they be prudent or politic only, and be not pious, then they are fitter to be kings of Babel, where dwelleth confusion, than of Jerusalem, where God's glory is seen, and more rightly to be called the children of this world, which goeth to nought and perisheth, than the children of God, who love truth in the inwards, and care for none but for such as worship Him from a pure heart with a good conscience.

CCCCCL.—A sad thing to lose both soul and body at one and the same time.

Citat. 2 Thucyd.
Hist.

Sedgwood's Serm., Westminster.

DUDITHIUS relates a sad story of one Bochna, a woman that had but two sons, and whilst she was walking with the one towards the river she heard the other crying out, and hasting back she found a knife sticking in his side, which killed him immediately. Then she made haste to the other child, but he in her absence was fallen into the river and drowned: both lost at once! This is our case. Every one of us hath two children—a soul and a body; a life temporal, a life eternal. What a heavy loss would it be to lose both these at once! Yet such is the sad condition of many, that whilst they busy themselves to catch at the shadow, and to set up a rest for their souls here in this world, they lose both shadow and substance—soul and body—the rest of their souls here and the true souls of their eternal rest hereafter, both together.

CCCCCLI.—A good magistrate or minister is the support of the place where he lives.

Stock, ut antea.

MEN are used to fence and defend, to keep watch and ward over their corn-fields whilst the corn and fruits are in them unreaped, ungathered; but when the corn is in and safe in the barn, then is open-tide, as they say: they lay all open, throw in the fence, and let in beasts of all kinds; nay, sometimes they set fire on the stubble. Thus, every zealous magistrate, every godly minister, every good Christian, is, as it were, a fence, a hedge to that place, that parish, where they live; and when they are once plucked up, when they are taken away by death or otherwise removed, that kingdom, that place, that parish, lies open to all manner of ruin and destruction.

"Reipub. fulcrum princeps bonus."—ARISTOT.

CCCCCLII.—The certainty of faith.

IN the midst of a tumultuous sea the nodes of the compass remain immovable, because they govern themselves not according to the winds, but according to the influence of the heavens. And so the faith of the faithful remaineth firm amongst the rude agitations and distracted variations of the world, because it governeth itself not according to the instability of the affairs of this world, but according to the promises of God, which are from all eternity.

DuMoulin's Combat, Christian.

CCCCCLIII.—The danger of unworthy communicating.

IT is reported of Mr. Bolton, a famous divine, and minister of Kettering, in Northamptonshire, that calling for his children on his death-bed, after some speech to them, he concludes thus: "And I hope there is none of you will dare to meet me at Christ's tribunal in an unregenerate state," intimating the great and inevitable danger that must needs attend such a condition. And it were to be wished that none would dare to meet at the Lord's table in a sinful state; which, if they do, and will, with unhumbled and unhallowed hearts, come unto that tent, and, as Sisera (Judges iv. 19), take the milk and the butter, the bread and the wine, let them know that there is a nail and a hammer for them—they eat and drink their own damnation.

Goodwin's Evang. Communicant.

CCCCCLIV.—A minister to be careful in the delivery of God's message.

EARTHLY kings and magistrates are offended, and good reason too, if their subjects or servants shall do from them, or in their names, such messages as they send not; or if their ambassadors, being limited by advertisements what they shall do, and what they shall not do, should negotiate to the contrary. Then should all ministers of Jesus Christ, whose ambassadors they are, be careful in a very high degree that they deliver the whole counsel of God, that they speak nothing but what they have in commission, otherwise they shall offend a Lord of more dreadful majesty, who is more jealous of His glory, and more able to punish, than any earthly kings or magistrates whatsoever.

Abbot's Lect. on Jonah.

CCCCCLV.—Graces lost in the soul are to be made up only in Christ.

THE virgin vestals of the pagans (from whence proceeded those many cloisters of nuns at this day) had a continual fire, which, if it happened by any mischance to go out, they might not give it light again but only from the sun. Thus our natural clearness and purity of life being quite extinguished by the sin of Adam, there is no means under heaven to renew it. We cannot kindle it again but at the Sun of righteousness, Christ Jesus our Lord, to whom belongeth that which is said in Psalm xxxvi. 9, "The fountain of life is in Thee," &c.

Salis., Introduc. à la Vie Devote.

CCCCCLVI.—God's special love to His children.

LOOK upon the sun how it casts light and heat upon all the world in its general course! how it shineth upon the good and the bad with an equal influence! but let its beams be but concentred in a burning-glass, then it sets fire on the object only, and passeth by all others. And thus God in the creation looketh upon all His works with a general love. Erant omnia valde bona (they pleased Him very well). Oh, but when He is pleased to cast the beams of His love, and cause them to shine upon His elect through Christ, then it is that their hearts burn within them, then it is that their affections are inflamed; whereas others are but as it were a little warmed, have a little shine of common graces cast upon them.

Holdsworth's Serm. Lond., 1625.

CCCCLVII.—The strength of a true Christian's love to Christ.

Speed's Chron. of Eng.

In our "English Chronicles" we read of the rare affection of Eleanor, the wife of Edward I. The king, having gotten a wound by a poisoned dagger, she sets her mouth to the wound to suck out the poison, venturing her own life to preserve her husband's.

Goodwin, ut antea.

Such is the strength of a true Christian's love to Christ, that were it to suck poison out of Christ's wounds it would be contented so to do; as when Christ, His Church, His cause, His people are smitten and wounded by the poisonous tongues of blasphemers, the railing

Heb. xi. 26.

tongues of licentious libertines, the hellish fiery tongues of a rebellious generation, and a good Christian is willing to draw it all upon himself, to take it off from Christ, and that

Ps. lxi. 9.

Christ may have the glory, he careth not what he undergoeth.

CCCCLVIII.—Self-trial smooths the way to all other trials.

Fox's Acts and Mon. Jer. xii. 5.

BILNEY, a martyr in Queen Mary's days, tried his finger by himself in the candle before he tried his whole body in the fire at the stake. "If thou hast run with the foolman," saith God, by the mouth of the prophet, "and they have wearied thee, then how canst thou match thyself with horses?" How shall our faith abide the fiery trial by others if it have never been put to the fiery trial by ourselves? How shall that faith try a match with horsemen, smile at torments, stare a disguised death in the face, that never yet tried a match with footmen, that never tried itself in private, that never struggled with natural corruptions? Surely self-trial will pave the way smooth to all other trials; and that man will never abide to be tried at a bar or stake that is loth to be tried in his closet or his chamber.

Dyke's Worthy Communicat.

CCCCCLIX.—Adversity seeks God.

Agathias's Hist. lib. v.

It is reported that when, on a time, the city of Constantinople was shaken with a terrible earthquake, many houses were overthrown, and with the fall many people perished. The whole city was hereupon so amazed, and every one so remembered to think on God, that they fell to their public devotions: the churches were packed full with people; all men for awhile were much amended; justice commutative and distributive both advanced; the poor relieved, justice exalted, laws executed, no fraud in bargaining; it was become a very holy place; but when God held His hand from punishing, they held their hearts from praying; when His wrath ceased, their religion ceased also. And was it not alike in the civil wars of France? After the putting forth of that act or edict (January, 1561, and in the second and third years of those wars), such as were of the religion—then groaning under the heavy cross of poverty, oppression, and war—how devout were they towards God! very careful in their ways, glad to hear any preach the Word, and glad to receive the sacrament any way. But when the third peace was concluded, which seemed a very sound peace, and the rod was now thought to be removed afar off, such carelessness and security overgrew the hearts of all—and in the Protestants there was so cold a zeal, tanta erat religiosorum tediousa curiositas, &c., and that within less than two years—that a sermon plainly made with good grounds of divinity was not thought to be worth the hearing, unless it were piced with eloquence or flourished over with courtly expressions. Nomine mutato de nobis fabula. The case is ours: witness that Marian persecution, when so many of the dear children of God mounted, like Elias, to heaven in fiery chariots. What prayers were made within the land and without! and what coldness benumbed some hot ones of that time not long after! Call to mind that miraculous year of 1588. How did the piety of our land exceed at that time! Young and old then came together into the courts of the Lord. Sabbaths were then sanctified—week-days well spent. How did the people flock to church! It might have been written in golden letters over every church-door in the land "Cor unum, via una," such was the unity, such was the uniformity of their devotions at that time; but with the cold of the winter their devotions grew cold too, and many months had not passed but, as in few things some were the better, so in many things they were a great deal worse. To come yet downwards (anno 1625), to omit others, the chief city of our kingdom, being struck with the plague of pestilence, seemed no other than a dreadful dungeon to her own—a very Golgotha to others. What then? The king commands a Nineveh-like humiliation. With what eagerness were those fasts devoured! What loud cries did beat on all sides of the gates of heaven! and with what unexpected, inconceivable mercies were they answered! Suddenly those many thousands were brought down to one poor unit—not a number. Then was all the fasting and mourning turned into joy and laughter. To come yet lower to this very year, this very day. How hath the sword devoured! and whilst it did so, how did the people unite and associate! but when it seemed to be but a little sheathed, what remissness, what divisions were found amongst us! It is so, and it is not well that it is so. It is a reproach to some, no penny no paternoster. It is a shame to us —no plague no paternoster, no punishment no prayer.

Jean de Serre's Hist. de France.

"Fidem secunda poscunt, adversa exiunt.—SENEC.

Abbot's Serm.,
1624.

Hall's Serm., 1625.

CCCCLX.—Carnal and spiritual men, their difference in doing good.

AN organ or any other wind instrument maketh no music till there be breath put into it; but a stringed instrument, as the lute or viol, yieldeth a pleasant sound even with the touch of a finger. And thus a carnal man, that is dead in sins and trespasses, must have a new life breathed into him by the blessed Spirit of God before he be able to set forth the praises of his Maker; whereas one that is spiritualised, one that is furnished with the graces of the Spirit, doth good, and receiveth good upon the least touch of the Spirit, and is a trumpet of God's glory upon the least occasion that can possibly be offered.

De Priorio, Aurea Rota in Evang.

CCCCLXI.—Faith makes us partakers of every good thing in God's ordinances.

Look but on a conduit that is full of water: now, a man that would fill his vessel must bring it to the conduit, set it near the cock; but yet that is not enough. If that be all and he do no more, he may go home again with an empty vessel; and therefore he that would fill his vessel, when he hath brought it to the conduit and set it under the cock, he must also turn the cock, and then the water runs forth and fills his vessel. So Christ is the conduit of all grace and goodness, the fountain of living waters; he that would be spiritually filled must come to Him. His ordinances, the Word and sacraments, are the cocks of this conduit; so that a man that would be filled must not only go to Christ, but to Christ in His ordinances: and that is not enough neither—when He is come to them He must turn them. But how must that be done? "The well is deep, and I have no bucket to draw; the cock is hard locked, and I cannot tell how to unlock it," saith the weak-believing soul. What of all this? Thou hast faith, a true faith, though a weak faith. Now that faith, actuated and

Dyke's Worthy Communicant.

"Fides lumen est anime, ostium vitæ," &c.—
CHRYS., in Symb.

working upon the ordinances, turns the cock, and then the efficacies and virtues of Christ flow forth. Then it is that we are filled with the Holy Ghost, that with joy we draw waters out of the wells of our salvation.

Isa. xii. 1.

CCCCCLXII.—Forgiveness of one another commanded and commended.

Melch. Adamus, in Vita.

Goodwin, ut antea.

WHEN Luther had woefully wronged and reviled Calvin, "Well," said Calvin, "etiamsi Lutherus millies me diabolus vocet," &c. (Let Luther hate me, and call me devil a thousand times, yet I will love him and acknowledge him to be a precious servant of God)." This was an excellent temper of Calvin; and truly such a frame of spirit, such a sweet composure of the soul, as to forgive and forget, to pass by offences, to leave all to God, not to answer wrath with wrath, not to study revenge, not to be mindful of injuries received, is all along the Scripture commanded, by God Himself commended, and by every good Christian to be carefully practised.

CCCCCLXIII.—Good means, how to be used.

Bosquieri, Ara Cæli.

Hab. i. 16.

As a pilot that guides the ship hath his hand upon the rudder and his eye on the star that directs him at one and the same time, so should every man be diligent in the use of all lawful means, industrious in his calling; but withal he must have a care that he do not sacrifice to his net, and burn incense to his own drag; that he do not attribute too much to his own endeavours, but look up to God, the Giver of all good things, and wait upon Him for a blessing.

CCCCCLXIV.—God, by afflictions, drives us to heaven.

Plutarch, in Pelopida.

Abbot's Lect. on Jonah.

PLUTARCH, in his "Pelopidas," telleth that Antigonus had a soldier, who being vexed with an ill disease, and thereby so weary of his life, that he was always one of the foremost in service, one so ready as no man more in the whole company, the general, much liking this, cast such an affection to the valour of the man, that, to his great expense, he caused him to be cured who lately held himself incurable; but then, looking that his soldier should be forward as before, he found him to draw back, never offering to come within danger. Asking the reason, the soldier makes answer that now he had somewhat to lose, and that was a healthful and sound body, with which he should grieve to part; but before, when he was in misery, he had thought his case should have been very happy if he might have been dead and buried. Thus the wisdom of God doth foresee that in us which Antigonus found but afterwards in his soldier: that we who, in anguish and persecution, do desire the company of the elect in heaven, and with St. Paul to be dissolved and to be with Christ, would lie grovelling in prosperity as if tied and glued to the world, and therefore is it that in His love He whips us sometimes, that we may seek unto Him and sue to be in heaven with Himself.

CCCCCLXV.—A sermon preached many years before may be the means of salvation many years after.

Dyke, ut antea.

John x. 41, 42.

It is recorded how that many resorted unto Christ, and said, "John did no miracle, but all things that John spake of this man were true; and they believed on Him there." John, it seems, had preached of Christ before, yet they did not thereupon believe in Christ when he preached. John was dead and gone, but now, when Christ comes amongst them, they upon John's former sermons, preached unto them some while since, do now believe. John was dead, but his word was not dead; that now works while he lies in his grave. Thus many a man hears the Word and minds it, but at present it hath no work at all. It is possible that seven years, twenty years after it may fall a-working; a sermon preached seven years before may be the means of a man's conversion seven years after.

"Dolor hic tibi proderit olim."—OVID.

CCCCCLXVI.—The danger of conventicles.

CUNNING thieves, when they can draw a traveller out of the common roadway into some bye-path, then it is that they rob him; deceitful tradesmen will be sure of a false light to put off their bad wares by; and in dark cellars there may soon be water mixed with wine. Thus the ordinances of God are never more perverted, and the doctrine of the Gospel by seducers never more corrupted, than when they can draw silly men and women out of the open places of ordinary recourse into their close corners and lone houses: there it is that they vend their counterfeit wares, and there it is, too, that they mix their wine with worm-wood, set false glosses upon the truth of God's Word; there it is that they make Scripture speak not what God intends, but what they in their wild fancies imagine. But that there would be such as should cry up Christ in a corner, Christ Himself foretold it: "Behold, he is in the secret chamber."

Goodwin's Evang. Communicant.

Matt. xxiv. 26.

CCCCCLXVII.—The whole armour of God to be put on.

It is reported, by the poets, of Achilles, the Grecian captain, that his mother, being warned by the oracle, dipped him, being a child, in the river Styx, to prevent any danger that might ensue by reason of the Trojan war; but Paris, his inveterate enemy, understanding also by the oracle that he was impenetrable all over his body, except the heel or small of his leg, which his mother held by when she dipped him, took his advantage, shot him in the heel, and killed him. Thus every man is or ought to be armed cap-à-pie with panoplia, that whole armour of God, for the devil will be sure to hit the least part that he finds unarmed. If it be the eye, he will dart in at that casement by the presentation of one lewd object or other; if it be the ear, he will force that door open by bad counsel; if the tongue, that shall be made a world of mischief; if the feet, they shall be swift to shed blood, &c.

Ovidii Metam.

Scalabonii Moral. in Passionem Christi. Eph. vi. 13.

CCCCCLXVIII.—God slow to anger.

It is observed in men, that they are long in making anything, but very quick in marring of it. A house built in a year may be plucked down in a month, and sooner; a castle which hath been long in setting up, by mining and powder may be blown up in a moment; a city which many generations have but brought to its beauty, is in a little time brought to ruin: only God is quick in making, but pauseth upon destroying. He cometh not but step by step, step after step, and when He should strike He stayeth and turneth and looketh away. The sun, moon, and stars had but one day for their creation, but man had a hundred and twenty years before the coming of the flood to his destruction. And Jerusalem was warned by the Scriptures before the appearance of Christ, by John Baptist afterwards, by our Saviour personally: and when they had killed that just One, yet forty years passed before it was quite destroyed. Six days made the world, but almost six thousand years have been afforded to it before the end overtake it.

Abbot's Lect. on Jonah.

CCCCCLXIX.—Harmony of the Scriptures.

WHEN a man is drawing water out of a well (it is Epiphanius's observation) with two vessels of different metal, the water at the first seemeth to be of a different colour; but when he draweth up the vessels nearer to him, the diversity of colours vanish, and the water appeareth to be of one and the same colour; and when he tasteth them, they have one and the same relish. Thus, although at the first sight there may seem to be some contradictions in the Scriptures, yet when we look nearer and nearer into them, and compare one place with another, we shall find no contrariety in them, no repugnancy at all, but a perfect harmony and full consent of one place with another: as the patriarchs, relating to the promises made to Abraham before the Law; the prophets, grounding themselves upon Moses under the Law; and the faith of the Church, relying upon the doctrine of the apostles under the Gospel—all of them agreeing in one, nothing at all contradictory.

In Lib. de Anchoratu.

Weems's Exercitation.

CCCCCLXX.—Reformation pretended, deformation intended.

Diog. Laert., de Vit. Philosopharum, lib. xc.

Goodwin's Evangelium, Compendium.

THE poet Aratus made this answer to one that asked him how he might have Homer's "Poems" free from corruption and faults: "Get," saith he, "an old copy not reformed;" and he gives this reason, that curious wits, labouring to amend things well done, commonly quite mar them, or at least make them worse. Thus have the innovators of our times done: they have cried out for reformation, reformation both in Church and state; but behold a deformation! They will not inquire for the good old way, they will not write by any primitive copy; the reformation must be in their own way. And thus have they wrought the same mischief here which the turbulent orators of Lacedemonia did in that commonwealth so wisely settled by Lycurgus's laws, which, whilst they took upon them to amend, they miserably defaced and deformed.

CCCCCLXXI.—Prayers not prevailing at present with God, how to be regulated.

Shute's Serm., Lond., 1627.

ANGLERS, when they have long waited and perceive that nothing doth as much as nibble at the bait, do not impatiently throw away the rod or break the hook and line, but pull up and look upon the bait, and so throw it in again. Thus should every good Christian do. Though he hath fished all night and caught nothing, though he hath been much in prayers unto God, yet, after long expectation, not a syllable of comfort appearing, no return made at all, let him not break off his prayers, but look to his prayers, that they be not mingled with corruptions, that they be not bare of grace, naked of faith, void of love, &c., and so mend them, and no doubt but Christ will appear at a time he thinks not of, with such a gracious answer as shall abundantly satisfy his longing expectation.

CCCCCLXXII.—The great danger of security in times of danger.

Antiquitates, lib. xliii.

Abbot's Test., in Jerem.

DIODORUS SICULUS writeth, that in Ethiopia there is a people of that quality, that they are not at all moved with the speech of them who sail by them, or with the sight of strangers approaching to them, but, only looking upon the earth, they use to stand immovable, as if their senses took knowledge of no man. "If any," saith he, "should strike them with a drawn sword, they fly not, but bear the blows; neither is any of them moved with the wounds or hurts of another, but oftentimes they behold their wives and children slain before their faces without any reluctancy at all." An insensible sort of people surely they are, if any such there be, which hardly can be believed! Yet, are not we the same? Many years last past, the sword hath been glutted with eating of flesh and drinking of German blood, and what the sword left famine seized on. Which of us were then affected with those things, or remembered Joseph in those his sad afflictions? Who did think that his part was in that tragedy, his share in that bargain, or that ever that cup should come to him to taste of? But so it is, that we, who were then idle spectators, are now made sad actors; we that were like so many Gallios, as it were—men caring not for those things, as men unconcerned—are now encompassed on all sides and ripe for destruction, if God in mercy prevent not.

CCCCCLXXIII.—Promises of the Gospel are the poor man's supporter.

THE fisherman's net is so framed, that there are leaden weights to make it sink at the bottom, and corks to make it swim on the top; and thus it is that the leaden, heavy weight of poverty and worldly crosses keep the poor man down, and make him ready to sink under the burden, were it not for the comfortable promises of the Gospel, that buoy up his confidence and make him swim and hold up his head above all opposition whatsoever.

Preston's Serm., 1626.

CCCCCLXXIV.—Rash, inconsiderate preaching condemned.

It is said of Archbishop Whitgift, that though he preached often, yet he never durst adventure into the pulpit but he first wrote his notes in Latin, and afterwards kept them by him during his life: and he would say himself, "That whosoever took that pains before his preaching, the older he waxed the better he would discharge that duty; but he, if he trusted to his memory only, his preaching in time would become prattling." What shall we, then, say to those that rush into the pulpit without any preparation at all, that presume upon a dabitur in illa hora, so that quicquid in buccam (out comes that which lies uppermost)? Whether sense or nonsense, all is one, running like a horse with an empty cart over hedge and ditch, till the hour-glass stops them. It was the complaint of Saint Jerome, of such shallow brains, in his comment on Ecclesiastes ix. 11, "Nam videas in Ecclesia imperitissimos quosque florere, &c." You may see how, in the Church, the most ignorant are the most esteemed; and, because they have profited in boldness of front and volubility of tongue, they are accounted the only preachers of the time; and, to speak the truth, impudence and ignorance are the only qualifications of such preachers.

Sir Geo. Paul, in Vita.

CCCCCLXXV.—It is man, not God, that changeth.

THE sun hath but one simple act of shining, yet do we not see that it doth unite clay and straw, dissolve ice and water? It hardens clay and melteth wax, it makes the flowers to smell sweetly and a dead corpse to scent loathsomely; the hot fire to be colder, and the cold water hotter; cures one man with its heat, yet therewith kills another. What is the reason? The cause is in the several objects, and their divers dispositions and constitutions, and not in the sun's act of shining, which is one and the same thing. Or if a looking-glass be set in the window, will it not represent to the eye diversity of objects? If thou go to it in decent and seemly apparel, shalt thou not see the like figure? if dejected and in coarse raiment, will it not offer to thy view the same equal proportion? Do but stretch thyself, bend thy brow, and run against it, will it not resemble the like person and actions? Where now is the change? shall we conclude in the glass? No; for it is neither altered from the place nor in the nature. Thus the change of love and affection is not in God, but in respect of the object about which it is exercised. If one day God seem to love us, another day to hate us, there is alteration within us first, not any in the Lord: we shall be sure to find a change, but it must when we do change our ways, for God never changes. Such as we are to ourselves, such will He be to us: if we run stubbornly against Him, He will walk stubbornly against us; with the froward, He will be froward, but with the meek He will show Himself meekly—yet one and the same God still, in whom there is not the least shadow of change imaginable.

Barlow's God Man's Refuge.

Ps. cxviii. 25.

CCCCCLXXVI.—Adversity, rather than prosperity, is the preserver of piety.

Drexellii Cancer Laurent.

PLUTARCH, in his Book of "Conjugal Precepts," maketh use of that known parable, how the sun and the wind were at variance whether of them should put a man beside the cloak which he had upon his back : while the wind blew he held it the harder, but the sun, with the strength of his beams, made him throw it away from him. And ice, we know, that hangeth down from the eaves of the house in frosty weather, is able to endure the stormy blasts of the sharpest northern wind ; but when the sun breaks out it melts and falls away. Thus is it that adversity and necessity are rather preservers of piety than plenty and prosperity. Prosperity makes many men lay aside that clean vesture of purity and innocency which they buckled hard to them while they were trained up in the school of affliction ; prosperity melts them down into vanity, whilst adversity lifts them up into glory.

"Tempore sic duro est, inspicienda fides."—OVID.

CCCCCLXXVII.—The thought of God's omnipresence a great comfort in affliction.

August., de Civit.
Dei, lib. ii., cap.
29.

THERE is mention made of a company of poor Christians that were banished into some remote parts, and one standing by, seeing them pass along, said that it was a very sad condition those poor people were in, to be thus hurried from the society of men, and to be made companions with the beasts of the field. "True," said another, "it were a sad condition indeed, if they were carried to a place where they should not find their God. But let them be of good cheer ; God goes along with them, and will exhibit the comforts of His presence whithersoever they go. He is an infinite God, and filleth all places." Thus, as every attribute of God is a breast of comfort not to be drawn dry, so this of His omnipresence is none of the least, that He is both where we are and where we are not. He is in the midst of our enemies ; we think that they will even swallow us up alive, but God, our best Friend, is with them, to confound all their devices and infatuate their counsels. Our friends, our relations of wife and children, if they be taken hence, God is with them, and God is with us too on all occasions, in all conditions ; He is ordering all things for His children's good.

"Totus in celo Deus est, totus in terra," &c.—ib.

Worral's Serm.
Lond., 1620.

CCCCCLXXVIII.—The downfall of piety and learning to be deplored.

Paul, in Vita
Whitgifti.

BOYS SIST, the French leiger (ambassador) in England, inquiring what books Dr. Whitgift, then archbishop of Canterbury, had published, being answered that he had only set forth certain books in defence of the ecclesiastical government, and it being incidentally told him beside, that he had founded a hospital and a school at Croydon, in Surrey, uttered these words, "Profectò hospitale ad sublevandam paupertatem, et erudiendam juventutem sunt optimi libri, quos archiepiscopus scribere potuit (Truly, a hospital to sustain the poor and a school to train up youth are the worthiest books that an archbishop could possibly set forth)." And certainly such was the piety, such the charity of former times, that in this kingdom of ours a man might have run and read in many such books the founder's bounty and munificence—witness those Ramahs, those schools for the prophets, those colleges in both the universities, so well filled, so orderly governed, and so richly endowed. But of late, how faintly did those streams run which were wont to make glad the city of our God ! How were those breasts dried up, that once nursed up so many ! Kirjath-Sepher made Kirjath-Havala ; a kingdom of learning fairly on the way to be made a kingdom of ignorance, and seminaries of sound learning and saving knowledge likely to be seed-plots of barbarous ignorance and intolerable presumption.

"Barbarus has segetes,"—VIRG.

CCCCLXXIX.—The exceeding bounty of God.

WE read of a duke of Milan, that, marrying his daughter to a son of England, he made a dinner of thirty courses, and at every course gave so many gifts to every guest at the table as there were dishes in the course. This, you will say, was rich and royal entertainment, great bounty; yet God gives much more largely. Earthly princes are fain to measure out their gifts. Why? Because their stock is, like themselves, finite. But the treasury of God's bounty is puleus inexhaustibilis (never to be drawn dry). It is He that gives the king his royalty, the nobleman his honour, the captain his strength, the rich man his wealth, &c.; and, as Nathan said to David, "If all this were too little, He would give yet much more."

White's Serm.,
1616.

"Jovis omnia
plena."—VIRGIL.

2 Sam. xii. 8.

CCCCLXXX.—To wait with patience God's leisure.

DAVID, being assured that he should see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living, did not faint, but expect with patience the time appointed. The husbandman patiently expecteth the time of harvest, the mariner waits with content for wind and tide, and the watchman for the dawning of the day. So must the faithful learn patience in all their troubles; not to make haste or mourn as men without hope, but tarry the Lord's pleasure, and He in the fittest season will comfort their drooping souls. "He that shall come will come, and will not tarry."

Ps. xxvii. 13.
Barlow's Good Man's Safety.

"Dabit Deus his quoque finem."—
VIRGIL.
Heb. x. 37.

CCCCLXXXI.—To be mindful of the day of death.

It is written of the philosophers called Brachmanni, that they were so much given to think of their latter end, that they had their graves always open before their gates, that both going out and coming in they might be mindful of their death. And it is reported of the women in the Isle of Man, that the first web they make is their winding sheet, where-with at their going abroad they usually gird themselves, to show that they are mindful of their mortality. And thus, though we have not our graves digged before our eyes, nor carry about us the ugly, ghastly picture of death, yet let us carry in our hearts the true picture of our death, a sense of our mortality, a consideration of eternity, and in all our doings to remember our latter end, and then we shall never do amiss.

Strode's Anatomy o
Mortality.

"Vive memor
lethi."—PERSIUS.

Eccles. xi. 8.

CCCCLXXXII.—The ruin of the Church's enemies to be desired.

THE landgrave of Hesse—a mild and gracious prince, but whose clemency was much abused—being cast by adventure on a smith's forge, overheard what the smith said all the while he was striking his iron: "Duresce, inquam duresce, utinam et landgravius durescat." And truly the presumption of some amongst us is such in corrupting the truth with their books, and opposing it with their heresies, that all true-hearted Protestants are generally of the smith's mind, to wish those sons of Belial that fly-blow religion and blast the laws of the kingdom with their stinking breath, placing their greatest piety in the greatest mischiefs they can bring to Church and commonwealth, may feel the metal harder that by a just law is tempered for such kind of spirits as they are of.

Otho Melander,
Jac-scria.

White's Serm.,
Lond., 1616.

CCCCLXXXIII.—The necessity of catechising.

BEDE maketh mention of one returning out of England to Aidanus, a religious bishop in Scotland, complaining that the people little profited by his preaching: to whom Aidanus answered, that it was, perhaps, because he did not, after the manner of the apostles, give

Hist. Anglorum,
lib. iii., cap. 5.

Bernard's Serm. of Catechism.

them milk first—i. e., principle them well in the foundation of the Christian religion. And it is most true that superstructures must needs down where the ground-works are not well laid; that the only way to increase knowledge is by knowledge of the principles of religion. Being thus grounded, there will be an ability to judge of truth and false doctrine, so that men will not so easily be carried about with every wind of doctrine, as the profane and ignorant multitude be; such as are tiling the house when they should be laying fast the foundation; such as think they move in a circle of all divine knowledge, when God knows they know little or nothing at all.

CCCCLXXXIV.—Time well spent.

Ant. Dourailii Speculum Exemplorum.

THERE is a story of a certain holy man, who at first had led a dissolute life, and chancing on a time into the company of a godly honest man, was so wrought on by his holy persuasion—such is the force of good society—that he utterly renounced his former course of life, and gave himself to a more private, austere, moderate, and seclude kind of living; the cause whereof being demanded by one of his old consorts, who would have drawn him—such is the nature of evil company—to his usual riot and excess, he made this answer: “I am busy meditating and reading in a little book which hath but three leaves in it, so that I have no leisure so much as to think of any other business.” And being asked, a long time after, whether he had read over the book, replied, “This small book hath but three leaves, and they are of three several colours, red, white, and black; which contain so many mysteries, that the more I meditate thereon the more sweetness I find; so that I have devoted myself to read thereon all the days of my life. In the first leaf, which is red, I meditate on the passion of my Lord and Saviour Christ Jesus, and of His precious blood shed for a ransom of my sins and the sins of all His elect; without which we had been bondslaves of Satan and fuel for hell fire. In the white leaf I cheer up my spirits with the comfortable consideration of the unspeakable joys of the heavenly kingdom, purchased by the blood of Christ my Saviour. In the third leaf, which is black, I think upon the horrible and perpetual torments of hell, provided and kept in store for the wicked and ungodly.” Here is a good man, a good book, and a good example well met together. Would but the men of this world carry this book of three leaves in their hearts, and meditate often thereon, it would restrain their thoughts, bridle their affections, and centre all their words and actions within the limits and boundaries of the fear of God. But, alas! men, like Nabal, are so busied about white earth, red earth, and black earth, in gathering and scraping of transitory trash, or have so prostituted their affections unto carnal pleasures and delights, that they spend their time, like Domitian, in catching of flies, or, like little children, in running after butterflies; so that they have little or no leisure to think either of God or any goodness. And so on a sudden the sun of their pleasure setteth, the day of their life endeth, the night of their death cometh, and, like a man walking in the snow, not seeing his way, they fall into their graves before they be aware.

Strode's Anatomy of Morality.

“Quos gloria vexat inanis.”

CCCCLXXXV.—A child of God is best known by his affections to God.

Perkins' Government of Tongue.

A FATHER, lying on his death-bed, called three children to him which he kept, and told them that one only of them was his natural son, and that the rest were only brought up by him; therefore unto him only he gave all his goods; but which of those three was his own son he would not in any wise declare. When he was dead, each one pleaded his birth-right, and the matter brought to trial; the judge, for the making, if possible, a true discovery, took his course: he caused the dead corpse of the father to be set up against a tree, and commanded the three sons to take bows and arrows to shoot against their father, to see who could come nearest to his heart. The first and second did shoot and hit him, but the third was angry with them both, and, through natural affection of a child to a father, threw away his bow, and would not shoot at all. This done, the judge gave sentence that the two first were no sons, but the third only, and that he should have the goods. The like trial may be made of God's children. Can the drunkard be God's child, that gives Him vinegar and gall to drink? No; he is a child of the devil. Can the blasphemous swearer, that rends God in pieces and shoots Him through with his dart, as it is said of the Egyptian when he blasphemed, that he smote or pierced through God's name? No; he is a devil incarnate; whereas a child of God is discovered by his affections to his God. He makes conscience of an oath; his tongue is the trumpet of God's glory; he possesseth his vessel in holiness, and if at any time he sin against God—as who is it that doth not?—if he chance to shoot at God a bitter word, an unclean thought, a sinful act, it is as Jonathan did at David, either short or over—seldom or never home. In a word, such is his care, his zeal, his love to his God, that if he sin by infirmity, he returns by repentance immediately.

Lev. xxiv. 11.
"Fructus dignoscitur arbor."

CCCCCLXXXVI.—Judges and magistrates are to be the patrons of justice.

It is reported of a lord mayor of London, that giving order to an officer to call in the company of brewers before him, instead of them he warned in the vintners to appear, whom the lord mayor no sooner espied in the court but asked what they made there. The officer replied that, upon his lordship's command, he had warned them in. "But," saith the lord mayor, "I gave order for the brewers." "True, my lord," said the officer; "and these be the greatest brewers in the kingdom, or grand impostors in corrupting the queen of liquors, as I and my fellows find by woeful experience." Whereupon the lord mayor and aldermen approved the officer's wit, and took the matter into consideration. Thus the judges are in a most special manner patres legis (the patrons of the law), the great masters of the wine-cellar of justice; but if they once mix wine and water, and turn judgment into wormwood, they are then the brewers, the grand impostors that poison the state, because they corrupt the fountain of the people's birthright, in making the known laws of the kingdom speak according to their pleasure.

Leighton's Troubles.

"Specto modamine juris, curritur in facinus."—Jos. SCALIGER, in Epiderpidum, lib. viii.

CCCCCLXXXVII.—An argument of extreme folly not to be mindful of death.

If a man were tied fast to a stake, at whom a most cunning archer did shoot, and wounding many about him, some above and some below, some beyond and some short, some on this hand and some on that, and the poor wretch himself so fast bound to the stake that it were not any way possible for him to escape, would it not be deemed madness in him if, in the meantime, forgetting his misery and danger, he should carelessly fall to bib and quaff, to laugh and be merry, as if he could not be touched at all? Who would not judge such a man beside himself that should not provide for his end? Yet such Gotamists, such Bedlamites, such madmen are most amongst us, who, knowing and understanding that the most expert Archer that ever was, even God Himself, hath whet His sword and bent His bow and made it ready, and hath also prepared for him the instruments of death, and ordained His arrows,—yea, that He hath already shot forth His darts and arrows of death, and hath hit those that are above us, superiors and elders; such as be right against us, companions and equals; such as be very near us, kindred and allies; on the right hand, our friends; on the left hand, our enemies—yet we think to be shot-free, sit still as men and women unconcerned, not so much as once thinking of our latter end.

Strode's Anatomy of Mortality.

Ps. vii. 12, 13.
"Heu vivunt homines tanquam mors nulla sequatur."

CCCCLXXXVIII.—The sins of blasphemy and swearing, the commonness of them.

Boys' Part II.

Sand's Relation.

It is no wonder that in Italy, which is a parcel of Antichrist's kingdom, blasphemies should be darted out against God and His Christ openly, being made phrases of gallantry by the gentry and very interjections of speech by the vulgar. But in England, where the sceptre of Christ's kingdom hath a long time flourished, it cannot but wound the heart of such as mourn for the sins of the land to consider how commonly not only the ruffian in the tavern and the rascal on the stage, but also the labourer at his work and the gentleman at his recreation, and the very boys, yea, the babes in the streets, curse their Maker and revile their Redeemer.

CCCCLXXXIX.—The consideration of eternal pain to deter from the commission of sin.

Perkins, of Repentance.

A GRAVE and chaste matron, being moved to commit folly with a lewd ruffian, after long discourse and tedious solicitations, she called for a pan of hot burning coals, requesting him, for her sake, to hold his finger in them but one hour. He answered, that it was an unkind request; to whom she replied, that seeing he would not so much as hold his finger in a few coals for one hour, she could not yield to do the thing for which she should be tormented body and soul in hell fire for ever. And thus should all men reason with themselves when they are about to sin: none will be brought to do a thing that may make so much as their finger or tooth to ache. If a man be but to snuff a candle, he will spit on his finger, because he cannot endure a small and tender flame; what care is, then, requisite to leave sin, whereby we bring endless torments to body and soul in hell fire, to which our fire is but ice by way of comparison!

CCCCXC.—Seasonable repentance is safe repentance.

Strode's Anatomy of Mortality.

"Nulli nostrum est ultima nota dies."
—BILLIUS.

A GOOD husband will repair his house while the weather is fair, not put off till winter; a careful pilot will take advantage of wind and tide, and so put out to sea, not stay till a storm arise; the traveller will take his time in his journey, and mend his pace when the night comes on, lest darkness overtake him; the smith will strike while the iron is hot, lest it grow cool, and so he lose his labour. So we ought to make every day the day of our repentance, to make use of the present time, that when we come to die, we may have nothing to do but to die; for there will be a time when there will be no place for repentance, when time will be no more, when the door will be shut, when there will be no entrance at all.

CCCCXCI.—The godly man's desires are above his reach.

Perkins' Combat of Flesh and Spirit.
Rom. vii. 18.

2 Kings xxiii. 25.

"Videt meliora probatque se dēte-tionem," &c.

A GODLY man cannot do that which he would, wherein he is like a prisoner that is got out of the gaol, who, that he might escape the hands of the keeper, desires and strives with all his heart to run a hundred miles in a day, but, by reason of the heavy bolts and fetters that hang upon his heels, cannot for his life creep past a mile or twain, and that, too, with chafing his flesh and tormenting himself. And thus it is that the servants of God do heartily desire and endeavour to run in the ways of God's commandments, as it is said of that good king Josiah, to serve God with all their heart; yet, because they are clogged with the bolts of the flesh, they perform obedience very slowly and weakly, with many slips and failings.

CCCCXCII.—The good of government.

WHEN one comforted a poor widow which had lately lost her husband, for that he was unthrift and unkind, she replied, "Well, though he were but a bad husband, yet he was a husband; and such an one is better than none." So the commodities of government are so great, that a very bad husband to the commonwealth is better than none at all; for whereas in a corrupt monarchy there may be one tyrant, in an oligarchy some few tyrants, in a democracy many tyrants, in an anarchy they are all tyrants.

Boys' Pottill.

CCCCXCIII.—Death the good man's gain.

IN the ceremonial law (Lev. xxv.) there was a year they accounted the year of jubilee, and this was with the poor Jews a very acceptable year, because that every man that had lost or sold his lands, upon the blowing of a trumpet, returned and had possession of his estate again, and so was recovered out of all the extremities in which he lived before. In this life we are just such as those poor men of Israel—rifled, plundered, spoiled, in a manner and condition every way straitened. Now, death is our jubilee, and when the trumpet begins to sound life is then lost. Death is the good man's advantage. Then it is that he enjoys a better state than ever he had before. What though death be to the wicked as the rod in Moses' hand, that was turned into a serpent; yet to the godly it shall be like that of Elijah, a wand to waft them into a better life. Then it is that the funeral of their vices shall be the resurrection of all their gracious actions.

Strode's Anat. of Mortal.

"Nonne mori satius," &c.—CLAUDIAN.

CCCCXCIV.—The greatest of men subjects of mortality.

IT is with men as with letters that have great and glorious superscriptions—Right Honourable, Right Worshipful, &c.—but when opened there is nothing but a little black ink and dust upon them. So, though men have great places and offices, whether it be in Church or state, and make a great outward show in the world, yet within there is but a little black blood and dusty flesh to cover it: dust they were, and to dust they must return again.

Burges's Serm., 1646.

CCCCXCV.—Death strips us of all worldly outward things.

IT is with us in this world as it was in the Jewish fields and vineyards—pluck and eat they might what they would while they were there, but they might not pocket or put up aught to carry with them (Deut. xxiii. 24)—or as with boys that, having gotten by stealth into an orchard, stuff their sleeves and their pockets full with apples and pears, well hoping to get out with them, but when they come to the door they find one that searcheth them, and taketh all their fruit away from them, and so sendeth them away empty, with no more fruit than they brought in—or as poor men that, being invited to a rich man's board, have the use of his plate to drink in, and silver spoons to eat with whilst they are there, but if any of them dare to be so bold as to put up a piece of plate or a spoon there is search made by the porter ere they are let out for what is missing among them, and so they are turned out as they came in. In like manner it is with us in regard of these temporal blessings: we have free liberty to use them while we are here, but when we are to go hence there is one waiting on us that will be sure to strip us, and suffer nothing to pass with us, unless it be some sorry sheet or a sear rag to rot with us; such as we shall have no sense of nor be any whit at all the better for than if we were wholly without them.

Gataker's True Content.

Parisiensis, Summa de Vitiis.

"Omnia mors devorat."

CCCCXCVI.—The worth of a true Christian.

Adams's Temple
Serm., Lond., 1616.

WHEN Henry IV., that late king of France, was told of the King of Spain's ample dominions: "As first, he is king of Castile, and I," quoth Henry, "am king of France; he is king of Navarre, and I am king of France; he is king of Naples, and I am king of France; he is king of the Sicilies, Nova Hispania, of the Western Indies, and I am king of France;" he thought the kingdom of France equivalent to all those. So let the soul of every good Christian solace itself against all the wants of this mortal pilgrimage in this—that it is a member of the Church. "One hath more learning or wit, yet I am a Christian; another hath more honour or preferment in the world, yet I am a Christian; another hath more silver and gold and riches, yet I am a Christian; another hath larger possessions, yet I have an inheritance in heaven—I am a Christian." Were but this consideration of the true Christian's worth laid in the balance of the sanctuary, it would weigh down all temporary conceits whatsoever.

CCCCXCVII.—Magistrates to be advised in point of justice.

Burges's Serm.,
Lond., 1625.

It is said of Louis, the king of France, that when he had, through inadvertency, granted an unjust suit, as soon as he had read that verse in the Psalm, "Blessed is he that doth righteously at all times," recalled himself, and upon better thoughts gave his judgment quite contrary. Hence it is that an act of justice ought to flow from mature deliberation and advised attendancy: especially there ought to be consideration when it concerns the life or death of a man.

CCCCXCVIII.—In getting the things of this world, God's way is the best way.

Gataker's Serm., of Self-Suffering.

As the Israelites travelling through the wilderness towards the Land of Promise (Numb. ix. 22, 23), (which to have gone the next way had not been a journey of many days, yet were they many years about it), they were to go as Godled them, as they saw the cloud go before them, and not to take that way that seemed best or most compendious in their own eyes, so must we observe God's ways in our trade at home and traffic abroad. In our walking towards wealth we must keep the way that God leads us, go no other way than we can see Him going before us; follow the line of His law, though it seem to lead us in and out, backward and forward, as it were treading in a maze; and not take those ways that seem gainer and nearer in our own eyes, and much more compendious than the other. Though we might compass wealth with a word or two, with the bow of a knee only one way, whereas we must travel and toil and moil much ere we come by it the other way; though we might attain to it in a day or a week the one way, whereas we are like to stay many weeks, many months, nay, many years it may be, ere we come at it the other way, yet this way must we keep, and resolve to forsake all the world with our Saviour (Matt. iv. 10), if it be offered to entice us out of it. The Israelites, when they went out of God's precincts, they went withal out of God's protection, and so fell before their foes (Numb. xiv. 44). So those that make more haste than good speed to be rich, that balk God's path, and step out of God's way to get wealth, shall surely come to evil (Ps. lxxiii. 20.)

"Via Dei, via tutissima."

CCCCXCIX.—How to judge of a hypocrite.

Hall's Occas. Medit.

THERE can be no difference seen betwixt a gliding star and the rest: the light seems alike, both while it stood and whilst it fell; but being once fallen it is known to be no other than a base, slimy meteor, gilded with the sunbeams, and now a man may tread upon that with his foot which before his eye admired. Had it been a star it had still and ever shone ; now the very fall argues it a false and elementary apparition. Thus our charity doth and must mislead us in our spiritual judgments. If we see men exalted in their Christian profession, fixed in the upper region of the Church, shining with appearances and outsides of grace, we may not think them other than stars in this lower firmament ; but if they fall from their holy station, and embrace this present world, whether in judgment or practice, renouncing the truth and power of godliness, we may then conclude that they never had any true light in them, and were no other than a glittering composition of pride and hypocrisy.

D.—A vain rich man.

As a brook with a fall of rain-water swells, and, as it were, proud of its late increase, makes a noise, nay, runs here and there to show itself, till by running it hath run out all that ever it had : even so some rich men, upon some fall of wealth, begin to swell, as if they were little seas, then make a noise of ostentation, and, because they have but one tongue of their own, they get the echo of some soothing flatterers ; they overflow the lower grounds, the poor, and spread their names in letters of blood : in the end, after some short noise, as the brook leaves nothing but dirt and mire behind, so do they leave nothing at their death to themselves but confusion before God and men.

DI.—Reason must submit to faith.

WHEN three ambassadors were sent from Rome, to appease the discord betwixt Nico- medes and Prusias, whereof one was troubled with a megrim in his head, another had the gout in his toes, and the third was a fool, Cato said, wittily, " That embassy had neither head nor foot nor heart ; " so that man, whosoever he be, shall never have a head to conceive the truth, nor a foot to walk in the ways of obedience, nor a heart to receive the comfortable assurance of salvation, that suffers his reason, will, and affections to usurp upon his faith. "Qui se sibi constituit, stultum habet magistrum (He that goes to school to his own reason hath a fool to his schoolmaster)," and he that suffers his faith to be overruled by his reason may have a strong reason, but a weak faith to rely upon.

DII.—The patience of God provoked turns to fury.

As a child in the mother's womb, the longer it is in the womb before it comes forth the bigger the child will be, and the more pain it will put the mother unto : thus it is with God. Though He hath leaden feet, yet He hath iron hands ; the longer He is before He strikes, the heavier the blow will be when He strikes ; the longer He keeps in His wrath, and is patient toward a people or a nation, the bigger the child of wrath will be when it comes forth, and the greater will be their misery and affliction.

DIII.—Distrustful cares reproved.

Look on the robin-red-breast—pretty bird !—how cheerfully doth he sit and sing in the chamber window, yet knows not where he is nor where he shall make the next meal, and at night must shroud himself in a bush for his lodging. What a shame is it, then, for Christians, that see before them such liberal provisions of their God, and find themselves set warm under their roofs, yet are ready to droop under a distrustful and unthankful dullness, and are ready to say, " Can God make windows in Heaven ? " " Can God prepare a table in the wilderness ? "

DIV.—No harm in humility.

Westfield's Serm.,
1637.
Lib. Meditat.

A MAN goes in at a door and he stoops; the door is high enough, yet he stoops. You will say, "He need not stoop;" yea, but saith Bernard, "There is no hurt in his stooping, otherwise he may catch a knock; this way he is safe." Thus a man may bear himself too high upon the favour of God. Having some good measure of sanctification and of assurance of eternal life, it will be hard not to be proud of it: pride hath slain thousands. Oh, but spiritual pride hath slain her ten thousands. Humility never yet did harm to any; there is no danger in stooping. It is better to be a humble servant of the Lord than a great lord of many servants; the lowest of God's friends than the highest amongst His enemies.

DV.—Mortality of the sinner's life to be considered and deplored.

Calamy's Serm.,
Westm., 1644.

It is reported of Xerxes, that having prepared three hundred thousand men to fight with the Grecians, and having mustered them up into a general rendezvous, and taking notice of their strength and the greatness of their number, he fell a-weeping, out of the consideration that not one of them should remain alive within the space of a hundred years. Much more ought we to mourn, then, when we consider the abundance of people that are in England, and the abundance of sin perpetrated amongst us, and what shall become not only of our bodies within these few years, but what shall become of our souls to all eternity!

DVI.—Satan subdued by Christ's death.

Scaligeri, Epist.
fides.

Playfer's Serm.

It is written of the chameleon, that when he espies a serpent taking shade under a tree, he climbs up the tree, and lets down a thread, breathed out of his mouth, as small as a spider's thread, at the end whereof there is a little drop, as clear as any pearl, which falling on the serpent's head kills him. Christ is this chameleon: He climbs up into the tree of His cross, and lets down a thread of blood, issuing out of His side, like Rahab's red thread, hanging out of the window, the least drop whereof, being so precious and so peerless, falling upon the serpent's head, kills him.

DVII.—The experience of God's love is to be a motive of better obedience.

Asopian Polyhistor.

Calamy's Serm.,
Westm., 1645.

THERE is a famous history of one Androcles the Dane, dwelling in Rome, that fled from his master into the wilderness, and took shelter in a lion's den: the lion came home with a thorn in his foot, and seeing the man in the den, reached out his foot, and the man pulled out the thorn, which the lion took so kindly, that for three years he fed the man in his den. After three years the man stole out of the den and returned back to Rome, was apprehended by his master, and condemned to be devoured by a lion. It so happened that this very lion was designed to devour him: the lion knows his old friend and would not hurt him. The people wondered at it, the man was saved, and the lion given to him, which he carried about with him in the streets of Rome, from whence grew this saying, "Hic est homo medicus leonis, hic est leo hospes hominis." Well, most true it is that the great God of heaven hath plucked out many and many a thorn out of our feet, hath delighted Himself to do us good; let, then, the experience of such love prick us on to better obedience, not to bring forth thorns and briers to Him, not to have our hearts barren and dried up as the thorny ground, not to kick against Him with our feet, whilst He is pulling out the thorn that troubles us.

DVIII.—A good man is mindful of his latter end.

WE read that Daniel strewed ashes in the Temple to discover the footsteps of Bel's priests which did eat up the meal; and Abraham did strew ashes in his memory, saying, "I will speak unto my Lord, though I be but dust and ashes." And thus do all the faithful, remembering they shall be one day turned to dust and ashes, that so seeing and marking the footsteps of death, how it continually cometh and steals away their strength, as Bel's priests did the meal, how it daily eateth up, and wasteth and consumeth their life, they may be always prepared for it.

Playfer's Serm.

Gen. xviii. 27.

DIX.—Patiently to wait God's leisure.

WHEN a husbandman hath thrown his seed into the ground, he doth not look to see it the same day again, much less to reap it the same day; as one saith of the hyperborean people far north, that they sow shortly after the sun rising, and reap before the sunset—that is, because the whole half-year is one continued day with them; no, he expects not the next day nor the next week neither to see it above the ground, but he is content to wait patiently till the year comes about, and is glad when he sees, after a month's time it may be, that it begins to peep out of the ground, living in hope still of the further growth of it, and to enjoy at length, after the spire and blade, a full ear and a plentiful harvest. Thus every child of God must learn to wait God's leisure. What though he hath prayed long, yet not a word of comfort, no return at all appears, yet let him pray still. What though he sees not for a long time, after much mortification, but a slender growth of spiritual joy in his heart, nay, scarce any glimpse, any sight at all, yet let him not be dismayed or discouraged therefore, but live in hope, as the husbandman doth, of a further increase and a full crop at length, when God shall see it good, and most advantageous for his spiritual state and condition.

Gataker's Joy of the Just.

Heresbachius, de Re Rustica.

"Perfert patientia palmam."

DX.—A good man will be a good example to others.

WHEN Diogenes saw a bungling archer shoot, he went as fast as he could to the mark. The lookers-on wondered what he meant to do in so doing. He answered, "To make sure that he might not be hit; for this fellow," says he, "never means to come near the mark." And thus must we do, when we see profane stragglers starting aside like a broken bow, and roving a great way wide in their lives and conversations: we must presently run to the mark, that not only we may keep ourselves safe from the danger of their ill example, but also may give aim, as it were, to others by our good example, and direct them, that they be neither wide nor short of the mark intended.

Laert. Diog. in Vita.

DXI.—Mortification of sin breedeth sense of sin.

"Nemo ægrè molitur artus suos (a living member is not burdensome to the body)." A man's arms are not any burden to him, though otherwise massy and weighty; but a withered arm, or a limb mortified, hangeth like a lump of lead on it. Thus, so long as sin liveth in the soul, unkill'd wholly, and unmortified as yet, so long our corruption is nothing at all cumbersome unto us, but when it is once mortified in a man, it beginneth to grow burdensome unto him, and to hang like a lump of dead flesh on his soul, and then beginneth the poor soul, pestered and oppressed with the weight of it, to cry out with the apostle: "O wretched man that I am! when shall I be once freed from this body of sin?"

Seneca, Ep. cxxi.

Gataker's Joy of the Just.

Rom. vii. 24.

DXII.—Consideration of God's omnipresence to be the sinner's curb.

Fuller's Serm.,
 Lond., 1650.

CAMDEN, in his "Britannia," maketh mention of a great high hill in Staffordshire, called Weever, under which there is a little village called Wotton. Now this village, being seated in so sad, dreary, and dolesome a place, the sun not shining into it any further than on the tops of the houses, by reason of the height of the hills overtopping it, the people of the place have been observed to chant out this note :—

"Wotton under Weever, Where God came never."

"Locis præsens simul est Deus omnibus unus."—
 PROSPER.
 Ps. cxxxix. 7.

This, now, were an excellent place for a rapacious rich man to make a purchase of, and then to plant a colony there, where God came never—a good place for drunkards to swill in, for epicures to surfeit in, for the voluptuous to take pleasure in, for the prodigal to riot in, &c. But let them all know that God is at Wotton, and God is with them all, in all places, at all times, everywhere included, nowhere excluded. "Whither shall I fly," said David, "from Thy presence ?"

DXIII.—The readiest way to get riches is to trust God for them.

Prov. xxx.

Greenham's Serm.

SOLOMON desired wisdom of the Lord, but for outward things his prayer was that he might have a mean estate. The Lord gave him wisdom, which his heart so much desired, and riches also, which he did not once desire. Abraham gave unto the Lord Isaac his son, which, when the Lord did behold, He gave him his son again. And thus must we do. The readiest way to obtain life is to be heartily well contented either to live or die, and to commit ourselves unto the Lord; and for these outward things the very ready way to obtain them is to give them up wholly to His hands, so that when we least desire them we shall have them, and when we freely give them up to Him we shall sooner have them again.

DXIV.—Time ill spent.

Fuller's Holy State.

SIR FRANCIS DRAKE, though a curious searcher after the revolution of time, in three years sailing about the world, through the variations of several climates, lost one whole day, which was scarce considerable in so long a time. It is to be feared that there are many amongst us that lose a day in every week, one in seven, neglecting the sabbath, nay, every day in the week, not once thinking on God, or any goodness at all.

DXV.—The world's hard censure of the godly man.

Greenham, ut antea.

"Vexat censura columbas."

IF some silly astrologer, or figure-flinger, do but hit in one thing of twenty, he is presently cried up for a cunning man; but let the physician work six hundred cures, yet if, through the impatience of his patient, he fail but in one, that one failure doth more turn to his discredit than his many eminent cures did formerly get him praise. Thus doth the world deal with men in the matter of censure. If a worldly-minded man have but an outward gift of strength, of speech, or of any other natural endowment, he is accounted filius gallinæ albæ, one of the white boys of the time, a precious man, a man of excellent parts, &c., though he be at the same time in ordine ad spiritualia, an idolator, a profane person, &c. But let the child of God be truly zealous for God, honest and holy in life and conversation, yet if there be but one infirmity in him (as who is free?), or if he have, through weakness, fallen into some one sin, that one infirmity against which he striveth, or that one sin for which he is grieved, shall drown all the graces in him, be they never so eminent, never so great, and the world is ready to give him up for a wicked man, a hypocrite, &c.

DXVI.—The godly and ungodly, their different motions in goodness.

A VIOLENT motion is quick in the beginning, but slow in the end; a stone cast upward is then most weak when it is most high; but a natural motion is slow in the beginning, quicker in the end. For if a man from a high tower cast a stone downward, the nearer to the centre the quicker is the motion; and therefore, when a man at his first conversion is exceeding quick, but afterwards waxeth every day slower and slower in the ways of goodness, his motion is not natural and kindly, but forced: otherwise, like a constant, resolved Christian, the longer he lives, and the nearer he comes to the mark, the more swiftly doth he run, the more vehemently doth he contend for that everlasting crown which he shall be sure to attain at his race's end.

De Burgo, Pupilla Oculi.

DXVII.—Self-conceited men blameworthy men.

ST. JEROME observeth this much of Petrus Abælardus and his followers, that he was used to say in point of controversy, "Omnes sane patres sic dijudicant at ego non, &c. (Indeed, the stream of all the fathers runs this way, but I am of another judgment)." So what St. Augustine affirmeth of some in his time, "Nisi quod faciant nihil rectè judicant," is too true in this self-conceited time of ours: men wade so far in a vein of singularity, that they think nothing well done but what they do themselves. How do they dote upon the issue of their own empty brains! and, thus admiring themselves, whom do they not censure? hating the persons of their superiors and scorning the opinions of their elders.

Smith's Serm., Gloucester.

DXVIII.—Great men to be merciful men.

As the snow which falls upon the mountains, being dissolved into water by the beams of the sun, and descending into the valley maketh it to give its increase; but, being deprived of the sun's heat, remains congealed, useless, and unprofitable; so they which are in high places, as it were mountains, in court or country, upon whom the favour of God and the king shine most, ought not to be frozen in charity, not to be bound up to themselves, but to be public-spirited men, to have the bowels of piety and pity melt within them for the good of their inferior brethren.

Paul de Francis Orat. Regia

"(Crede mihi) res est, succurrere lapsis."—OVID.

DXIX.—A rich man is God's steward.

A BEGGAR upon the way asked something of an honourable lady; she gave him sixpence, saying, "This is more than ever God gave me." "Oh," says the beggar, "madam, you have abundance, and God hath given you all that you have; say not so, good madam." "Well," says she, "I speak the truth; for God hath not given, but lent unto me what I have, that I may bestow it upon such as thou art." And it is very true indeed, that the poor are God's almsmen and the rich are but His stewards, into whose hands God hath put His moneys to distribute to them in the time of necessity.

Udall's Serm., London, 1632.

DXX.—An orthodox Christian hath a like esteem of all God's ordinances.

WHEN, at the taking of New Carthage in Spain, two soldiers contended about the mural crown due to him who first climbed up the wall, so that the whole army was thereupon in danger of division, Scipio, the general, said he knew that they both got up the wall together, and so gave the scaling crown to them both. Thus a good orthodox Christian doth not clash God's ordinances together about precedency; he makes not odious comparisons betwixt prayer, preaching, and catechizing, prayer public and private, premeditate and extemporary, but compounds all controversies about God's ordinances by praising them all, practising them all, and thanking God for them all.

Fuller's Holy State.

Plutarch, in Vita Scipionis.

DXXI.—God's two hands of mercy and judgment.

Vincetili Speculum Morale.

Hardy's Serm.,
Lond., 1647.

THERE is mention made of a loadstone in Ethiopia which hath two corners—with the one it draweth to, with the other it puts the iron from it. So God hath two arms, the one of mercy, the other of judgment; two hands, the one of love, the other of wrath: with the one He draweth, with the other He driveth; the one stroketh, the other striketh: and as He hath a right hand of favour wherewith to load the saints, so He wants not a left hand of fury wherewith to dash the wicked in pieces.

DXXII.—A wife to be subordinate to her husband.

Lake's Serm.,
Wells, 1619.

"Uxor bona chara supellex."

As Tertullian saith of a king, that he is "solo Deo minor (hath in his kingdom none above him but only God)," so is a woman in a family solo marito minor. She should command all in the house but her husband—she may be similis, but not æqualis honoris; she may partake in the same kind of honour, but not in the same degree of honour as man doth: otherwise, if it come to a Γυναικοκρατία, to the rule of a woman, actum est de familia, farewell all good order. Why? Because women have more of the heart than the head, their affections outstep their discretion, they are commonly more witty than wise; so that wisdom requiring the pondering of circumstances, the forwardness of their affections will not suffer them to pause so long. Hence it is that their resolutions are rash and wilful, which cannot prognosticate any good event. Haply, some woman may be as wise as Abigail, and some man as silly as Nabal; yet, then, neither doth man lose his prerogative nor woman acquire a title above him: deal with him she may per viam consilii, but not imperii; counsel him she may, command him she may not.

DXXIII.—The fiery trial on the Church of God.

Lazius, de Reb. Rom.

WHEN the Romans immortalised any of their emperors, they did it with this ceremony: they brought one to swear that they saw him go to heaven out of the fire, intimating that the fiery trial had passed on him. Sure it is that the fiery trial is now on the Church, and the Lord will discover what is in the heart of His Israel while they are in the troublesome wilderness, ere they come into Canaan, a land of rest.

DXXIV.—Religion pretended, mischief intended.

Hayward, in Vita.

"Rabido gestans sub pectore vul-
pim."—PERS., Sat.
V.

Phil. ii. 21.

It is reported of young King Edward VI., that being about to lay hold on something that was above the reach of his short arm, one that stood by, espying an embossed Bible lying on the table, offered to lay that under his feet to heighten him; but the good young king utterly disliked the notion, and, instead of treading it under his feet, he laid it to his heart. But now there are many amongst us that make religion but a stalking horse to their policy, that make use of the Bible to no other end but to reach at and to seek out their own wicked designs, quærentes sua non quæ Christi (seekers of their own things, not the things of Jesus Christ).

DXXV.—The Church's enemies the Church's good.

As we say of fire and water, and as the Romans said of Caligula, "Nemo melior servus, nemo peior dominus," we may say of the Church's enemies, "They are very bad masters, executing their own lusts and cruelty against God's people, yet very good servants, if the Divine hand makes use of them for the Church's service;" just like the good husbandman, who makes use of briars and thorns, which, though they be fruits of the curse and cumber the ground, yet he will suffer them to grow in hedges, that he may make them a fence unto his fruitful ground.

Sætonius.

Strickland's Serm.,
Westm.

DXXVI.—The devil's endeavour to darken the understanding.

It is written of Antiochus, that entering into the sanctuary, he took away the golden altar and the candlestick for light. And Nebuchadnezzar, when he conquered Zedekiah, put out his eyes and bound him in chains, and then carried him to Babylon. In like sort the devil, so soon as he hath entered into man's soul, which is God's holy temple, doth endeavour instantly to put out the light, to darken the understanding, that a man may not be able to discern betwixt good and evil, and so be more easily carried into Babylon, to his soul's confusion.

Boys' Psall.

2 Kings xxv.

DXXVII.—The devil's charge and the sinner's discharge.

THERE is a story how the devil appeared to a dying man, and showed him a parchment roll which was very long, wherein was written on every side the sins of the poor sick man, which were many in number: and there were also written the idle words he had spoken, which made up three-quarters of the words that he had spoken in his life, together with the false words, the unchaste words, and angry words; afterwards came in rank his vain and ungodly words; and lastly, his actions, digested according to the commandments; whereupon Satan said, "See here, behold thy virtues; see here what thy examination must be!" whereunto the poor sinner answered, "It is true, Satan; but thou hast not set down all, for thou shouldst have added, and set down here below, 'The blood of Christ Jesus cleanseth us from all our sins:' and this also should not have been forgotten, 'That whosoever believeth in Him shall not perish, but have everlasting life:" whereupon the devil vanished. Thus, if the devil should muster up our sins and set them in order before us, let but Christ be named in a faithful way, and Satan will give back, and fly away with all the speed that may be.

Du Moulin, de
l'Amour de Dieu.

1 John i. 3.

John iii. 15.

DXXVIII.—The dangerous effects of riches being not well used.

THERE was in the King of Denmark's court one that played on the harp so exceedingly well, that it was said he could put men into what passion he listed, though it were into fury and madness. One desirous to make the trial would needs hear him, but so that divers gentlemen standing aloof out of hearing should be ready to come in and stay the music if they saw him in any distemper. Things thus ordered, the musician began to play; and first he struck so deep and sweet a note, that he put the man into dumps, so that he stood like one forlorn, his hat over his eyes, his arms across, sighing and lamenting. Then the musician began a new note, and played nothing but mirth and devices, when the man began to lose his dumps, and fell a-dancing; but in the third place, the harper so varied his notes, and by degrees so wrought upon the man according as he saw him incline, that from dancing he brought him to shouting, until he grew frantic, and slew four of his friends that came to stay him. And thus is it with riches: if not used wisely, they will play such feats as the harper did—in the beginning, when a man is gathering them together, they will fill him with care and restlessness, so that nothing is more 1616.

White's Serm.,

"Divitiarum acquæta est luxuria, ira intemperans, furor injustus," &c.

"Quod nemo læditur," &c.—
CHRYSOS., lib. i.

miserable than a man carking after the world; then, when he hath tasted the sweetness of them, and has gotten through his travail, and comes to be master, he falls a-dancing, shows the vanity of his mind, speaks high, looks big, and his apparel is excessive—and usually in this fit his wife fetches a frisk or two with him; but when the merry fit is over, the third passion is frenzy, killing and slaying all that come in his way. He becomes a rapacious griping usurer, grinds the face of the poor, breaks the back and cuts the throat of many a man, and is so strong and boisterous, that no man can tell how to get within him, and come off with safety.

DXXIX.—Sin only is the godly man's terror.

Exod. viii. 8.

Ps. xxv. 11.

Dyke's Worthy Communicant.

"OH," says Pharaoh, "take away these filthy frogs, this dreadful thunder!" But what says holy David? "Lord, take away the iniquity of Thy servant!" The one would be freed from punishment, the effect of sin; the other from sin, the cause of punishment. And it is most true that a true Christian man is more troubled at sin than at frogs and thunder; he sees more filthiness in sin than in frogs and toads, more horror than in thunder and lightnings.

DXXX.—Want of love to be deplored.

Featly's Clav. Myst.

Acts iv. 32.

"Rara est concordia fratrum."

SUCH was the love of the saints of God in old time, that their hearts were knit one unto the other; yea, which is more, all the believers had but one heart—cor unum, via una—no breach in their affections, no difference in their judgment—such love is not to be read in our books, nor to be found in our conversations. We are not descended of this peaceful line, but rather from that of Coelius, whose motto was "Dic aliquid ut duo simus," who could not be quiet unless he was engaged in one quarrel or other—such as the salamander, that lives not but in the fire of contention. All the true family of love may even seem to be extinguished, and the household of faith quite broken up, for the greatest part of men, as if they had been baptized in the waters of strife, are in continual frettings, vexings, quarrels, schisms, and factions.

DXXXI.—Preparation necessary before prayer.

Smith, on Job. ix.

Gen. xii. 14.

Mark x. 50.

Exod. iii. 5.

Heb. xii. 1.

As Joseph thought not himself fit to be presented to Pharaoh before he was shaved and had changed his raiment, as Bartimæus threw away his cloak when he was going towards our Saviour, and as Moses was bid to put off his shoes before he approached to the bush where God appeared, so it behoveth every Christian, when he addresseth himself unto God by prayer, that he be prepared, that he cast away everything that oppreseth, and the sin that doth so easily beset him.

DXXXII.—The magistrate is to do justice and right.

Sueton., Imp. Vite.

Smith's Serm., ut
antea.

"Judicis officium est, ut res, ita tempora rerum."
Deut. i. 17.
1 Tim. v. 21.

It was a shame for Cæsar to confess, "Melior causa Cassii, sed denegare Bruto nihil possum." And Henry the emperor (the seventh of that name) is much taxed in story for that being appealed unto by a couple of lawyers, who contended about the sovereignty of the empire, they first making the agreement betwixt themselves, that he for whom the emperor should give sentence should win a horse of his fellow-lawyer. Now the emperor fairly pronounced truth to be on his side who spake most for his power and authority, whereupon this proverb was taken up, "Alter respondet æquum, sed alter habet equum (The one hath the right on his side, but the other rides the horse)." Thus it is that partiality perverteth right and corrupteth judgment, whereas the law is plain you shall have no respect of persons in judgment, &c. And the apostle's charge unto Timothy is, that he do nothing κατὰ πρῶσκλησιν, i. e., by tilting the balance on one side.

DXXXIII.—Weak ones, how to be catechized and instructed.

TAKE a bottle, or any other vessel, with a narrow mouth ; liquor must be poured into it softly and by degrees, or else more will be spilt on the ground than filled into the vessel. So it is with weaker Christians, such as have narrow-mouthed capacities, shallow apprehensions, dull conceptions : the Word of God must be taught them by degrees—now a line and then a line, now a precept and anon a precept—they are not to be surcharged. It was well considered of Jacob, when he and his brother Esau were to travel together, that the children were tender and that not the flocks only, but the herds with young were with him also, and that if they should be over-driven but one day they would perish. He desired his brother, therefore, that he would pass before him, and that he would come softly after, as the cattle and the younglings were able to endure. Thus must every minister do : he must not set out before the weakest of the flock, but stay and take them along with him ; he must so drive on with them, that they may hold on with him ; so instruct them, that they may profit by him ; so principle, so catechize, so feed them with milk as tender babes, that they may by degrees take in meat like stronger men.

Preston's Serm., 1526.

Gen. xxxiii. 13.

"Qui animum curam pro Domino suscepit ut errantes doceret."

DXXXIV.—The law, God's rhetoric in the delivery of it ; man's duty to attend to it.

THE whole nineteenth chapter of Exodus is but an exordium to the next, wherein the law was delivered ; and therein is observable how God plays the skilful orator, and performeth all things which the best rules in rhetoric require in an exordium. The rules require that an orator should first caplare benevolentiam (work himself into the good liking of his auditors). And why ? Because, if they like not the man, they will not much care for the matter. This God doth at the fourth verse : He sets forth His well-deservings of them in overthrowing their enemies and in setting them free ; and what may better give them an earnest for their love than an experiment that He had given them of His love ? The next rule of rhetoric is reddere auditores dociles (to bring them that already affect the man to understand the matter). And how is that done ? By showing how much the matter concerneth them, how beneficial it will be to them : for men gladly hear of their own good ; and the greater good the more gladly do they hear of it. Excellently doth God play His part of the orator at the fifth and sixth verses, significantly setting forth the benefit which they shall reap by their obedience, showing them what rate He will set upon them, what an approach they shall make unto Him, how sacred, how blessed their estate shall be ; and who will not be curiously inquisitive after such a matter, and hear them gladly that bring such tidings ? The third point of rhetoric is auditores attentos reddere (to rouse his auditory), to make them attentive, that no part of the speech slip by or pass unweighed. God omitteth not this part of rhetoric either : He sets before the people the danger that might overtake them, the respect that must be used by them. The case now is ours ; the same sermon that was then preached to Israel is now ours. Let us therefore be attentive. God hath deserved better of us than ever He did of Israel. We enjoy the truth, whereof they had but the type. Have we not reason, then, to affect Him ? yea, and to affect that also which is delivered by Him ? for it containeth our spiritual good, our blessed communion with God. And those spurs of attention must work no less upon us than upon them ; for though we be not called to the parliament we must be at the assizes, which will be far more dreadful at the meeting than ever the parliament was.

Lake on Exod. xix.

Aristot., Rhetor., lib. iii., cap. i.

"Accipite ergo animis atque hæc mea figite dicta."
—VIRGIL, Æneid.,
x.

DXXXV.—Not to make use of the present time dangerous.

It was day at Jerusalem in Christ's time, at Ephesus in St. John's time, at Corinth, Philippi, &c., in St. Paul's time, at Crete in Titus' time, at Alexandria in St. Mark's time, at Smyrna in Polycarp's time, at Pergamus in Antipas' time, at Antioch in Evodius' and Ignatius' time, at Constantinople in St. Chrysostom's time, at Hippo in St. Augustine's time, &c. It is now night with most of them, and yet day with us. Jerusalem had a day, and every city, every nation, every Church, every congregation, every man hath a day of grace, if he have but grace to take notice of it, and an accepted time if he do but accept of it, and he may find God if he seek Him in time; but if he let the Sun of righteousness go down, and work not out his salvation whilst it is called to-day, he must look for nothing but perpetual darkness when time will be swallowed up in eternity, when there will be no time at all.

Featly's Clavis Mystica.

"Nemo vestrum parvi aestimet tempus," &c.—BERN., ad Scholares.

DXXXVI.—Ministers, of all men, to be men of knowledge and understanding.

If one should have a phial or a glass of that precious blood which distilled from Christ on the cross, and were forced to remove it and transport it from place to place, how wise should this person be that he did handle it warily, lest the glass should break and all perish! This were no suitable task for an ignorant or silly fellow to undertake. But the minister, as St. Bernard hath well observed, hath the charge of those souls in his congregation whom Christ loved more than His blood; for He was no unwise merchant who gave that to redeem them, and therefore he who has to do with these should be no baby for knowledge and understanding.

Abbot's Lecture on Jonah.

De Adventu Domini, Serm. iii.

DXXXVII.—The consideration of death will cure all distempers.

THE hand of a dead man, as they say, stroking the part cures the tympany; and certainly the consideration of death is a present means to cure the swelling of pride in the most high-minded: it will level the aspiring thoughts of the most ambitious. In this life many things make a distance between men and women, as the greatness of birth, the freeness of education, the abundance of wealth, alliance, honours, and preferments. "But death makes all even (Respice sepulchra, &c.)," saith St. Augustine. Survey men's graves, and tell me then who is beautiful and who is deformed: all there have hollow eyes, flat noses, and ghastly looks. Tell me who is rich and who is poor: all there wear the same weeds, their winding sheets. Tell me who is noble and who is base: the worms claim kindred of all. Tell me who is well housed and who ill: all there are bestowed in dark and dankish rooms underground. And if this will not satisfy, take a sieve and sift their dust, and tell me which is which. It is granted that there is some difference in dust: there is powder of diamonds, princely dust; gold dust, the remains of noblemen; pin dust, the relics of the tradesman; saw dust, the remains of the labouring man; common dust, the remains of the vulgar, which have no quality or profession to distinguish them; yet all is but dust, one and the same dust. The consideration of this will allay the heat of all distempered spirits.

Leech's Serm., Lond., 1619.

Lib. de Natura et Gratia.

"Omnia mors æquat."

DXXXVIII.—How to use the things of this world.

As a traveller with his staff in his journey, as long as it doth further him, so long he will carry it with him; but when it hinders him, then he casts it away. So must we do with the things of this world, as long as they are helps to further and fit us for the kingdom of heaven; but if they be any hindrance to the regiment of Christ, we must renounce them, and cast them away, be they never so precious unto us.

Perkins' Exposit., on Lucas.

DXXXIX.—Slandering of our brother, the danger thereof.

A MAN's good name is like a piece of white paper, which, if once blotted, will very hardly be got out again, so as to leave no print of it behind. It is like a merchant's estate, long a-getting, but lost in a moment; and when it is lost in the bottom of the sea, how shall it ever be recovered again? What care, how circumspect, then, ought men to be in what they say of their brother, not to steal and murder his good name, which is as precious as life itself! And so to do is a sin that God will not pardon, unless the party that is guilty make restitution, which is a work not easy to be done; yet God will accept of endeavours, if faithful and industrious.

Calamy's Serm.,
Lond.

"Curam habe de bono nomine," &c.

DXL.—An unregenerate man a careless man.

THE infant, while it lieth in the dark prison of the mother's womb, is never unhappy nor weepeth, but as soon as ever it cometh out of the womb into the light, it knits the brows, and wrings the eyes, and cries and takes on. Even so the child of God, whilst he is yet kept in the darkness of ignorance, in his unregenerate state, never crieth to his Father nor weepeth for his sin; but as soon as the light of grace shineth upon him, he bewaileth his grievous misery, and never thinketh that he hath filled his cup with tears full enough.

Featly, ut antea.

DXLI.—Curiosity in the hearing of God's Word condemned.

IF a man should come to a table furnished with variety of dishes, and he should pass over the most wholesome nourishing meat, and fall a-peddling and picking here and there upon kickshaws and puff paste that had little or no substance in them, should not we judge such a man to be sick and squeamish in stomach? So when God, by the mouths of His ministers, presents us with wholesome doctrine, with meat fit for men, should we pass it over, and not rest satisfied but with new-coined phrases and quaint expressions, would not this savour of great distemper? There were the Israelites: nothing would down with them but quails; no wholesome diet; they must have picking meat, birds to feed upon. But they were paid for it; they had their bellies full in the end. Surely, then, a heavy judgment hangs over this nation of ours in this very thing. We must have quails too—new lights, new ways, new doctrines. God affords wholesome meat, fit for our appetites, but we must have it fit for our lusts. We do not receive the truth in the love of the truth; we come to church to please our humours and tickle our ears; and it is just with God that we should be delivered up to all loose opinions.

Some's Serm.,
Lond., 1640.

"Quidam veniunt ut audiant," &c.—
SEN., Epiit. 20.

2 Tim. iv. 3, 4.

DXLII.—A humble heart a contented heart.

THE sheep can live upon the bare common, where the fat ox would be starved. A dinner of green herbs reliseth well on the poor man's palate, whereas a stalled ox is but a coarse dish for the rich man's stomach. Thus a humble heart is content with a mean condition, and takes up with hard commons which a proud spirit would murmur at and scorn to be owned by.

Wood's Serm., 1629.

DXLIII.—Job's true heraldry.

EZEKIEL, in one of his visions, sets out unto us twenty-five young men so besotted and ravished in beholding the sun, that, with their backs towards the temple of the Lord and their faces towards the east, they must needs worship the sun, which, by way of exposition, signifieth the adoring of the glory of their birth. Such are many among us, which are much taken with the nobleness of their lineage, and out of a desire they have to make good their

Ezek. viii. 16

Fonseca's Serm., Quadragesimal.

descent and beginning, they multiply coats, hang up escutcheons, blazon forth their arms, tell the large history of their pedigrees and genealogies, and many times most of them mere lies and fables. But Job was a better herald than any of these that thus glory in the gold that only glisters : he makes corruption his father, and the worms his mother and sister.

Job xvii. 14.

DXLIV.—Busy-bodies condemned.

Lake, on Ps. li.

1 Cor. vii. 24.

"Limbs oculis in res alienas inquirunt."—HORAT.

As in an orchard there is variety of fruit—apple-trees, pear-trees, plum-trees, &c.—and every tree endeavours to suck juice answerable to his kind, that it may bear such a fruit ; and an apple-tree doth not turn a plum-tree, nor a plum-tree a cherry-tree, &c. ; but every tree contents itself to be of its own kind ;—so in the Church and commonwealth there are varieties of callings : pastors, people, magistrates, subjects ; some higher, some lower. And here now every man is to walk as he is called of God, and learn what belongs thereunto, not to encroach or intermeddle with that which belongs to others ; for the saying of that Roman general to the soldier that kept the tents when he should have been fighting in the field, "Non amo nimium diligentem," will be one day used of God, if He call us to one profession, and we busy ourselves about another ; if He set us on foot, and we will be on horseback ; if He make us subjects, and we must needs be superiors. God will not be pleased with such busy-bodies.

DXLV.—A blessed thing to have God for our Lord.

Cataker's Sermon of True Gain.

Ps. cxliv.

Ps. cxliv. 15.

It is a usual saying, "He cannot likely want money that is master of the mint," and "He can never be poor that hath my lord mayor for his uncle ;" much less, then, can that man want aught that is good, who is possessed of God, who is Lord of lords and King of kings, the very fountain of all good : in regard whereof David, having prayed for many temporal blessings in the behalf of his people, "that their sons might be tall and hardy, like goodly young cedars," &c., at last he winds up all with his epiphonema, or conclusion, "Blessed be the people that are in such a case ;" but on the neck of it he cometh as with an epanorthosis, or a correction of his former speech : "Yea, rather, blessed are the people that have Jehovah for their God," that have the Lord for their portion.

DXLVI.—A good Christian to be heavenly-minded.

Abbot's Lect. on Jonah.

Prov. vi. 8.

Matt. vi. 26.

"Os jubet et mentem tollere ad astra piam."—OVID.

Phil. iii. 20.

It is noted that the creatures which are nearest the earth take most care to get store of provision ; those which are more remote are less busied ; but those who live next the heavens have their hearts least upon it. What hoardeth like the emmet or pismire, which is an earthly thing, and hath its dwelling thereupon ? But the birds of the air, which fly next to heaven, as Christ Himself doth teach, "do neither sow nor reap nor carry into barns." Then let the meditations of every good Christian mount higher than their wings can reach, that though they live with men, yet their love may be with God. "Sursum corda" was the language of the ancient liturgies, and it is well backed by the apostle : "Let your conversation be in heaven, from whence ye expect a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord."

DXLVII.—The reward of heaven will make amends for all.

Hall's Occasional Meditations.

A MAN in his journey sees afar off some great mountain, so that his very eye is weary with the foresight of so great a distance ; yet his comfort is that time and patience will overcome it, and that every step he takes sets him nearer to his journey's end, and being once there, he shall both forget how long it then seemed, and please himself in looking back upon the way that he hath measured. It is just thus in our passage to heaven : our weak nature is ready to faint under the very conceit and length of the journey ; our eyes do not more guide than discourage us. Many must be the steps of grace and true obedience that must insensibly bring us thither ; only let us move and hope, and God's good grace will perfect our salvation. And when we are once comè to the top of that holy mount, meminisse juvabit, all the weary steps and deep sloughs that we have passed through, all the pangs that we have felt, all the sorrows that we have undergone, all the difficulties that we have met with in the way, shall either be forgotten or contribute to our happiness in the remembrance of them.

"Omne opus leve fieri solet," &c.

DXLVIII.—Extreme folly not to be mindful of death.

IF a traveller coming into an inn, having but a penny in his purse, should sit down and call for all sorts of provision and dainties, till such time as the reckoning were inflamed to such a height as his slender stock could no way compass, what would be thought of such a man ? Surely, in the judgment of all men, he would be esteemed a fool or a madman. And such are most of us whilst we are in this world. How foolish and mad is the practice of every man that liveth in his sins, bathing himself in the pleasures of this world, never thinking how he shall meet God at the last day of judgment, and there come to an account of all his doings ! That which sounded always in St. Jerome's ears ought to ring in the ear of every good Christian : "Surgite mortui, venite ad judicium." In all thy doings, remember thy end, and so thou shalt never do amiss.

Perkins' Exposition on Creed.

"Sera nimis vita est crastina, vive hodie." — MART., lib. xi.

DXLIX.—A good name once lost very hardly recovered again.

THERE is a fable how that Reputation, Love, and Death made a covenant to travel all the world over, but each was to take a separate way. When they were ready to depart, a mutual inquiry was made how they might find each other again. Death said they should be sure to hear of him in battles, hospitals, and in all parts where either famine or diseases were rife. Love bade them hearken after him amongst the children of poor people, whose parents had left them nothing ; at marriages, at feasts, and amongst the professed servants of virtue, the only places for him to be in. They long expected a direction from Reputation, who stood silent ; but being urged to assign them places where they might find him, he sullenly answered, his nature was such, that if once he departed from any man he never came to him more. And it is most true that honour or credit, or a good name, being once lost, seldom or never returns again. A cracked credit will hardly be soldered anew ; and credit is said to be a good fore game but a bad after one, very hardly and with much difficulty to be recovered.

Maph. Vegius, de Liberor. Educat.

"Famam bonam tueri facile est, extincam," &c.—SENEC.

DL.—The best Christian is the best artist.

MANY there are that are accounted deep scholars, great linguists, profound philosophers, good grammarians, excellent mathematicians, sharp logicians, cunning politicians, fine rhetoricians, sweet musicians, &c. These, for the most part, spend all their time to delight themselves and please others, catch usually at the shadow and lose the substance. They study the circumstance of these arts, but omit the pith and marrow of them. Whereas he is the best grammarian that hath learnt to speak the truth from his heart ; the best astronomer that hath his conversation in heaven ; the best musician that hath learnt to sing the praises of his God ; the best arithmetician that numbereth his days. He that amendeth his life and groweth every day better and better is cunning in the ethics ; he that traineth up Attersoll's Comment. on Numb.

Ps. xv. 2.

Phil. iii. 20.

Heb. ii. 12.

Ps. xc. 12.

his family in the fear of God is best seen in the economics; whoso is wise to salvation, prudent in giving and taking good counsel, is the best politician; and he is a good linguist that speaks the language of Canaan. Thus the best Christian is the best artist.

DLI.—Magistrates, ministers, and people to be peaceably-minded.

Panormitan., in Vita.

Burges' Serm.,
Lond., 1646.

It was a good speech of Alphonsus, king of Aragon, that if he had lived in those times when the Roman commonwealth was almost consumed with mutual and civil jars, he would have built a temple, Jovi positorio, wherein men should have deposited and laid down all heart-burnings, all quarrels, before they entered the senate. How necessary were such a place for the magistrates, ministers, and people of these times! For magistrates, before they come into any places of public judicature, where they may meet and lay down all private thoughts, all prejudicate opinions, that so justice and judgment may be duly and conscionably administered; for ministers, before they preach in public, where they may teach themselves the lessons of self-denial and self-seeking, that so the kingdom of Jesus Christ may be advanced; for people, before they touch the mount, before they come to hear the Word preached, or to partake of the blessed sacrament, where they may lay aside all carnal and worldly thoughts, all prejudices of the ministers and ordinances, that so the Word of God and the professors thereof be not evil spoken of;—that magistrates, ministers, and people may be so peaceably minded, that the God of peace may delight to dwell amongst them.

DLII.—How it is that we may hate our enemies.

Harris's Drunkard's Cup.

It was a true Norman distinction that William I. made, when he censured one that was both Bishop of Bayeux and Earl of Kent; and his apology to the plaintiff popeling was this: that he did not meddle with the bishop, but with the earl. Thus, in the matter of hatred and envy, we must hate our enemies as David did his. How is that? Odio perfecto (with a perfect hatred): love their persons, but hate their vices; meddle not with them as they are friends or acquaintances, but abominate their uncleanness, &c.

DLIII.—Riches ill gotten never prosper.

Erasm., Adagia.

Sueton., in Vita.

Mic., l. 7.

"Salis onus unde venerat illuc abiit (The burthen of salt is returned thither from whence it came)," saith the Latin proverb. The occasion was this: a ship laden with salt being torn by wreck, let the salt fall into the sea, from whence it was first taken. So, for the most part, goods gotten by spoil or plunder are usually lost in the same way. Vespasian's officers, that by rapine and exaction filled themselves like sponges, after they were full were squeezed by the emperor. And it is daily seen that the spoiler is himself spoiled, and that that which was gathered by the hire of a whore returneth to the wages of a harlot.

DLIV.—The excellent connection of the Scriptures of God.

Weems's Exercitiat.

THE heathen said that there were three things impossible to be done: "Eripere Jovi fulmen, Herculi clavam, et Homero versum (To pull Jupiter's thunderbolt out of his hand, Hercules' club out of his hand, and a verse from Homer);" for they thought there was such a connection between Homer's verses, that not one verse could be taken away without a great breach in the whole work. But this may much more be said of the Scriptures of God: there is such a coherence, such a connection, such a dependence, that if you take away but one verse the whole will be marred; all the books of Scripture being, like a chain, linked together, except the book of Solomon's Proverbs, which is like a bag full of gold rings, every verse being one entire and distinct sentence.

DLV.—God the only delight of His children.

LET Jacob but hear that Joseph his son is yet alive, he hath enough. If the king come home with freedom, honour, and safety, Ziba may keep the land; let him take all, Mephibosheth is satisfied. Could but the son of Hamor match with Dinah, his circumcision shall be endured; and though the daughters of the country be denied him, yet shall he be well contented. Give but Rachel children, and she will not die. And let Simeon see his Saviour, and he will die. Thus, let God's children enjoy but Him, the subject of their affections, tide life, tide death, come what can come, whatsoever befalls them, they are contented: He is the only object of their love, and He it is in whom their soul principally delighteth; wherefore, in the enjoyment of Him they have all they would have.

Gen. xlv. 28.
2 Sam. xix. 30.
Gen. xxxiv.
Luke ii. 29.
Barlow's Serm.,
1616.

DLVI.—A faint-hearted Christian described.

SOME fresh-water sailor, standing upon the shore in a fair day, and beholding the ship's top and top-gallant in all their bravery, riding safely at anchor, thinks it a brave thing to go to sea, and will by all means aboard; but being out a league or two from the harbour, and feeling by the rocking of the ship his stomach begin to work and grow sick, and his soul even to abhor all manner of meat—or otherwise a storm to arise, the wind and the sea, as it were, conspiring the sinking of the vessel—forthwith repents his folly, and makes vows that if he but once be set ashore again he will bid an eternal farewell to all such voyages. And thus there be many faint-hearted Christians to be found amongst us, who, in calm days of peace, when religion is not overclouded by the times, will needs join themselves to the number of the people of God; they will be as earnest and as forward as the best, and who but they? yet, let but a tempest begin to appear and the sea to grow rougher than at the first entry, the times alter, troubles raised, many cross minds of opposition and gainsaying begin to blow, they are weary of their course, and will to shore again, resolving never to thrust themselves into any more adventures: they would have Christum, but not Christum crucifixum (Christ they would have by all means, but Christ crucified by no means). If the way to heaven be by the gates of hell, let who will they will not go that way, but rather sit down and be quiet.

Jerome's Serm. of Fishing.

"Sed contra audentior ito."

DLVII.—Diligence in our callings commendable.

PLINY relateth of one Cressinus, who, from a very little piece of ground gathering much wealth, and much more than his neighbours could from a greater quantity of land, was thereupon accused of witchcraft. But to defend himself he brought into the court his servants and their instruments of labour, and said: "Veneficia mea, Quirites, hæc sunt (My witchcrafts, O ye Romans, are these); these servants and these working tools are all the witchcraft that I know of. I say not to my servants, 'Go and do this or do that,' but 'Come, let us go do it,' and so the work goes on." Well, it is the diligent hand that maketh rich. It is diligence and industry that makes any man excellent and glorious, and chief in any condition, calling, or profession. "Seest thou a man diligent in his way, he shall stand before princes."

Lib. xviii. cap. 6.

Worral's Serm.,
Lond., 1624.

Prov. xxii. 29.

DLVIII.—Different measures of grace in different persons.

As Abimelech's soldiers, some cut down greater branches, some lesser, according to the proportion of their strength; and as St. Paul's mariners, some were saved on board, some on broken pieces of the ship: even so amongst Christians. Some, in their approaches unto God, carry a greater, some a lesser confidence; and some arrive at the port of heaven

Judges ix. 49.
Acts xxvii. 44

Shute, Funeral Sermon, 1626.

with one measure of trust, some with another; for as the members of the body are knit unto the head, but some nearer, some farther off, so, in Christ's body, all draw grace from Him, although in difference of grace, in difference of hope, yet all have anchor-hold enough to stay by for their better support.

DLIX.—Drunkenness condemned.

White's Serm., 1616.

"Stultorum imò ebriorum plena sunt omnia." — AVENTIN., Abinal.

Isa. v. 22.

Hab. ii. 15.

THE use of drinking is now so taken up in England, that the Germans (it is probable) are like to lose their charter. There was a street in Rome called Vicus sobrius (The sober street), because there never was an alehouse in it, which is hard to say of any street in England. The Emperor Aurelian was ill troubled to find out one Bonosus to quaff with the German ambassador, who yet was derided for his labour, and commonly called non homo, sed dolium (not a man, but a tub of swill). Yet our time affords store of these, like the German mentioned by Pontanus, who, hearing a solemn tilting at the court, applauded by the loud echoes of the people, cried out, "O valeant ludi quibus nemo bibit (farewell the game where there is no drinking)." But let all men remember this before they pour in their morning's draught: "Woe be to them that are strong to drink, and to such as give their companions drink, that they may see their nakedness."

DLX.—God's time the best time.

Augustin, de Mortibus Catholicæ Eccles., lib. i., 18.

Confess., lib. v., 8.

Westfield's Serm., 1619.

THE case of Monica, the mother of St. Augustine, is famous. She grieved that her son was spotted with the heresy of the Manichees, and she prayed that the Lord would bring him to the knowledge of His truth. She prayed and prayed still, yet he, as himself confesseth, continued for nine years together so infected. It fell out afterwards that he would needs go and travel out of Africa into Italy. His mother, being loth to part with him, being the staff of her age, earnestly prayed that God would hinder him of that purpose. Yet Augustine went, and coming to have his ears tickled, had his heart touched, and got religion in to boot, with the eloquence of St. Ambrose at Milan; whereupon, not long after, he broke out into this confession: "Bone Deus, &c. (Thou, O good God, deep in counsel, and hearing the substance of my mother's desires, didst not regard what she then asked, that in me Thou mightest do that which she ever asked)!" Thus the Almighty God dealeth with other of His servants, working all things to the best; but it is at such times as He Himself thinketh best. For our friends and children the Lord knoweth better what is good than we ourselves can desire; yet we must pray and beg with this condition: "Thy will be done!" That which we think is most dangerous turneth oftentimes to our good, and thence whence we expect our undoing God raiseth our greatest comfort; and when it is our greatest extremity then it is His best opportunity. If it be in Him to bless and protect us, it is in Him to do it when it seemeth good to Himself.

DLXI.—Truth seeks no corners.

Plutarch, in Lucullus.

Lovell's Serm.,
Lond., 1626.

LUCULLUS, a noble Roman, being told by one that he would build a house for him in such a manner that none should see what he did, and yet he should have a good prospect out of it, and see all men, the answer which Lucullus made was this: "That he would rather he could make him such a house wherein all might see what he did, and so know what he was." And most certain it is that truth, though naked, seeks no corners wherein to hide itself; and they only dwell in such houses mentioned by Lucullus whose actions, being done in truth and sincerity of heart, are, as it were, so many windows, which openly show and make known to all the world what they are indeed.

DLXII.—To beware of the lusts of the flesh.

WHEN the oyster openeth himself to the sun, being tickled with the warmth thereof, then his enemy the crab-fish stealeth behind him and thrusteth in his claw, and will not suffer him to shut again, and so devoureth him. The like is written of the crocodile, that being so strong a serpent as he is, and impregnable, yet when he is gaping to have his teeth picked by the little bird called trochil, his enemy the ichneumon creepeth into his body, and ceaseth not to gnaw upon his entrails till he hath destroyed him. Think upon the urchin and the snail: whilst the urchin keeps himself close in the bottom of a hedge he is either not espied or contemned, but when he creeps forth to suck the cow he is dogged and chopped in. So the snail, when he lies close, with his house on his head, is esteemed for a dead thing, and not looked after; but when, in liquorishness to feed upon the dew that lies upon the grass or upon the sweetness of the rose-bush, he will be perking abroad, then the gardener findeth and squasheth him. The lesson is, we must not yield to the sweet baits of the flesh, but we must rather mortify our members upon the earth, and ever beware that we seek not our death in the error of our life; otherwise, if we wilfully offer ourselves to be led as an ox to the slaughter, and as a sheep to the shambles, what marvel if we have our throats cut, or be led away captive by Satan at his will!

Ambrosii Hist.,
cap. 8.
Aldrovandi, Orn.
theologia.

Smith's Serm. on
Heb. l.

"Vis adversus hoc corpus liber esse,"
&c.—BOETHIUS.

DLXIII.—Ministers to cry down the sins of the time.

It is observable that our Saviour never inveighed against idolatry, usury, Sabbath-breaking amongst the Jews—not that these were not sins, but they were not practised so much in that age, wherein wickedness was spun with a finer thread; and therefore Christ principally bent the drift of His preaching against spiritual pride, hypocrisy, and traditions then predominant amongst the people. Thus it ought to be with the ministers of the Gospel. In this thing they are to trace their Master's steps. They are chiefly to reprove the raging sins of the time and place they live in; yet with this caution, that in publicly reproving sin they ever whip the vice, and let the person go free.

Fuller's Serm.,
London, 1649.

DLXIV.—No appeal from God's tribunal.

AMONGST the judges of the earth, upon motion made by counsel, a man may have order for a hearing and re-hearing of his cause—hearing upon hearing, a first and a second hearing. But with God it is not so; there is no such rule in the court of heaven. The motto that is written over that tribunal is: "Amplius non ero (I shall be no more);" for we may not die twice to amend in our second death the errors of our first life. There is no reversing of judgment; no appeal from this judge to that, or from one court to another. How doth it, then, concern us to condemn ourselves before God condemn us, and that we kill sin in ourselves before God kill us in our sins!

Fonseca's Serm., Quadragesima.

DLXV.—Corrections instructions.

"I HAD never known," said Martin Luther's wife, "what such and such things meant in such and such Psalms, such complaints and workings of spirit—I had never understood the practice of Christian duties, had not God brought me under some affliction." And it is very true that God's rod is as the fescue to the child, pointing out the letter, that he may the better take notice of it, and to point out to us many good lessons which we should never otherwise have learned.

Funeral Serm.

"Nocumenta, documenta."

DLXVI.—Unworthy communicants condemned.

Gen. xxii. 5.
Dyke's Worthy
Communicant.

ABRAHAM, when he went with his servants to sacrifice Isaac, said unto them, "Abide you here with the ass, and I and the lad will go yonder and worship, and come again to you." Thus too many do with their sins when they come to the sacrament: they do, in effect, say to their sins and lusts, "Stand you awhile aside; I must go to the sacrament and receive the communion. Do but stand by awhile, and when the sacrament is over, or, at farthest, as soon as the sacrament-day is over, I will come again to you." Thus, the duty once over, and the sacrament a little forgotten, they and their sins are hail-fellow-well-met upon all occasions.

DLXVII.—Religion, not reason, is the square of good actions.

Weems' Exercitat.

A CARPENTER, when he is working, doth see by his eye, when he applieth the square to the wood, whether it be straight or not; but yet his eye, without the which he cannot see, is not the judge to try whether the tree be straight or not, but only the square is the judge. So reason in man, without which he could not judge, is not the square to try what is right or wrong in ordine ad Deum (in order to salvation); but religion, the Word of God itself, is the only rule and square. For instance, reason cannot consider how faith justifieth a man, or whether works be an effect of faith or not; but reason can conclude ex concessis of things granted. If faith be the cause and works the effect, then they must necessarily go together, and reason can go no higher.

DLXVIII.—God chastiseth His children's security.

2 Sam. xiv. 30.
Barlow's Serm.,
1619.

ABSALOM sends once or twice to Joab to come and speak with him, but when he saw that Joab would not come he commands his corn-field to be set on fire, and so he fetched him with a witness. So the children of God, when they stand off upon terms, and will not see His face, the fire of affliction will make them seek Him early and diligently. It is the custom of our gallants, when their horses be slow and dull, to spur them up. If iron grow rusty we put it into the fire to purify it. And so doth God in our backwardness to duties: He pricks us on, or, being in our filthiness, purifies us by casting us into the hot coals of tribulation.

DLXIX.—Christ in all His excellencies to be the Christian's object.

Mabb's Afflicted
Man's View.

A WOMAN in travail, being delivered, if she should desire but to see the feet only of the babe, and not the head, face, and body, would she not be accounted a strange, foolish, and wicked woman? So man, being in travail and sorrow under sin, but salvation having appeared by the coming of Christ into the world, is it sufficient for him to look only upon the death of Christ, it being the last extreme, or foot, as it were, of His sufferings and passion? No, it is not. He will behold the dignity of His nature, He being God; the pre-eminence of His government, He being the Head of His Church; the beauty of His goodness, He having love and mercy shining in His face; the painfulness of His labour, He sustaining and bearing all in His body.

DLXX.—The convenience of virginity.

Fuller's Holy State.

THERE are none but beggars that desire the church porch to lodge in, which others use only as a passage into the church. So virginity is none of those things to be desired in and for itself, but because it leads a more convenient way to the worship of God, especially in time of persecution and trouble; for then, if Christians be forced to run races for their lives, the unmarried have the advantage, lighter by many ounces, and freed from much incumbrance which the married are subject to, who, though private persons, yet herein are like princes, they must have their train follow them.

DLXXI.—The certain prevalency of prayer.

It is reported of a nobleman in this kingdom, that had a ring given him by the queen, with this promise, that if he sent that ring to her at any time when he was in danger, she would remember him and relieve him. This was a great privilege from a prince, yet it is known to many what that was subject unto; he might be in such distress as the queen could not be able to help him, or though she were able (as she was in that case), yet the ring might be sent and not delivered. Now then, consider what the Lord doth to us: He hath given us this privilege, He hath given us prayer, as it were this ring; He hath given us that to use, and tells us whatsoever our case is, whatsoever we are, whatsoever we stand in need of, whatsoever distress we are in, "Do but send this up to Me," saith He, "do but deliver up this message to Me of prayer, and I will be sure to relieve thee." And most certain it is, whatsoever case we are in when we send up our prayers to God, they are sure to be conveyed, for we send them to One that is able and ready to help us, which a prince many times is not willing or not able to perform.

Robert, Earl of Essex.

Preston's God's All-sufficiency.

"Precis justæ ex-auditor Deus,"—ANSELM.

DLXXII.—Infirmities to be in the best of God's children, and why so.

THE merchants of London petitioned Queen Elizabeth that they might but have liberty to level the town of Dunkirk (a place at that time very obnoxious to the safety of the merchants' trade), and they would do it at their own charges. The queen, by the advice of her council, returns them an answer in the negative; she could not do it. What, not suffer them to beat hers and their enemies? Not to fire such a nest of hornets? Not to demolish such a piratical town as that was? No, it must not be. And why? She knew well that it would not be amiss that they should be always sensible of so near and so offensive an enemy, and so be always preparing and prepared to defend themselves and the state of the whole kingdom, which took a right effect; for hereupon all turn men of war, hardly a boat but is manned out for service, which otherwise might have either rotted in the harbour or ridden securely at anchor. Thus God, when His dear children cry out unto Him to be delivered from the body of sin, that sin may not reign in their mortal bodies, He so far granteth their requests, that by the special dispensations of His Holy Spirit sin shall not prevail over them; not but that sins of infirmity shall still cleave to the best of His children here in this world. Why? Because they shall be still upon their guard, in a posture of defence, resisting the devil, acquitting themselves like men who otherwise might live in a security.

Fuller's Sermon, Lond., 1649.

Rom. vii. 24.

DLXXII.—Man to be peaceable, and why so.

MAN by nature seems to be ζῷον ἐιρηνικόν, a peaceable creature, fitter to handle the ploughshare than the sword; fitter to deal with the pruning hook than the spear. All other creatures are naturally armed with some kind of weapon, wherewith, being offended, they are able to right and revenge themselves: the lion hath his paws, the bull his horns, the boar his tusks, the dog his fangs, the cock his spurs, the little bee his sting, "habet et musca splenem." There is no creature so small, so contemptible, which hath not some Pigot's Abner's Plea, Lond., 1645.

"Candida pax homines, trux decet ira feras."

weapon to fight withal, only man : he hath none of these, he comes naked, unarmed into the world, "whereby," saith the poet, "even nature itself teacheth us this lesson, that it is for brute beasts, that have no understanding, to bite and tear and gore one another." As for men, they should be meek, gentle, helping, defending, comforting one another. God hath given them reason and speech, that they might delight to live and converse together in cities and families, not to hunt and to worry and to kill one another.

DLXXIV.—Sanctification not wrought all at once, and why.

Smith's Serm. on
Ps. li.

HE that will dye a purple in grain doth give his cloth inferior colours first, and after many dippings in many preparative liquors he doth at length perfect the colour and give it its full lustre. Even so the splendour of sanctity is not attained in the first moment of our conversion ; many a line must be drawn in our souls by the Spirit of God before we can fully recover His image. Not that there is any inability in God, so that He cannot in a moment, as in the creation, make us both innocent and holy, but He is pleased, by the difficulty on our part, to make us mindful of our former unthriftiness, and careful also to husband grace better when He is pleased to give it.

DLXXV.—God only wise.

Rerum Anglicar.
Script.

1 Tim. i. 17.

In Vita Thaletis.

Suidas.

CANUTE, a king of this land, contended that the name of king was only due to the King crucified, Jesus Christ ; so surely the name of Wisdom is due and to be ascribed to God only, as being only wise. It is St. Paul's acknowledgement ; nay, the very heathen, as arrogant as they were, have acknowledged no less. Laertius writes, that certain young men of Ionia, standing upon the sea-shore and beholding fishermen making of a draught, agreed with them for their draught, that what they should hail up to land in their net should be their own. Now it was so, by the providence of God, that together with certain fish they enclosed a certain piece of plate (which no man knew when it was sunk there), and dragged the same to land in their net. The same being claimed and seized on by the young men, by virtue of their bargain, they cast between them how to dispose of it ; but when they could not agree about the sharing of it, they sent to the oracle for resolution : they were returned answer, to send it to the wisest. They sent it, therefore, to Thales, their countryman, a man of great note in those days for wisdom ; but when it was brought to him, he disabled himself, and disdained the name of wise, and sent it to such a one as being more wise than he was ; the second also, he would none of it, but sent it to a third, and the third to a fourth, &c. ; and so they posted it from one to another till seven had it. The seventh and last, Solon by name, he made no more ado, but sent it to the temple at Delphi, for a present to God, acknowledging Him to be only wise—a marvellous confession for heathens to make touching the alone wisdom of God !

DLXXVI.—Magistrates to look to their attendants.

Abbot, on Jonah.

As it is the eye of the master which feeds the horse, so it is that also which keeps good order. If Mephibosheth cannot stir because he is lame in his feet, and David have other business than to examine things to the full, Ziba will play his part ; he will abuse his prince, he will defraud his master. It is a remembrance to magistrates and men in place, that they look on such as attend them, and suffer not their approaches to be ill spoken of, for the behaviour of those that are about them. The blind swalloweth many a fly, and he that knows his charge but by relation doth swallow many a gudgeon.

DLXXVII.—God's mercy above His justice.

A MERCHANT that keeps a book of debtor and creditor writes both what is owing him and what he oweth himself, and then casteth up the whole; but God doth not so: His mercy is triumphant over His justice, and therefore He wipes out what we owe Him and writes down that only which He owes us, by promise—much like the clouds that receive ill vapours from us, yet return them to us again in sweet, refreshing showers. The very consideration of this may be as a full gale of wind in our sails, to put us on to load God's chronicle with thankfulness, writing upon ourselves, by a real profession of His service, as Aaron did, "Holiness to the Lord." Surely our judgment is with the Lord, and our work with our God.

Shute, Funer. Serm., 1626.

Exod. xxxiii. 36.

Acts x. 3.

DLXXVIII.—Remedy for a hard heart, to cure it.

THERE is a story of an earl, called Elzearus, that was much given to immoderate anger, and the means he used to cure this disordered affection was by studying of Christ and of His patience in suffering the injuries and affronts that were offered unto Him; and he never suffered this meditation to pass from him before he found his heart transformed to the similitude of Christ Jesus. Now, we are all of us sick of a hard and stony heart, and if we ever desire to be healed of this soul-damning disease, let us have recourse to the Lord Jesus Christ, and never leave meditating of His breakings and woundings for us, till we find virtue coming out of Him, that the great Heart-maker may become a great Heart-breaker unto us.

Laurent. Surius, in Vita.

Calamy's Serm., Westminster.

DLXXIX.—Grace sometimes seemingly lost to a child of God.

MEN seek for keys sometimes when they are in their pocket, and they think they have lost some jewel when it is safe locked in their desk; yea, or as the butcher looketh about for the candle that sticketh in his hat and he carrieth it about with him on his head, and seeketh it by the light of that which he seeketh, as if he had it not about him, not remembering suddenly where he stuck it: so the godly are oft in their own conceit at a loss when yet that they deem lost is sure and safe, they miss many times God's grace in them, and seek for this grace by the light of the same grace which yet they see not in themselves, thinking that they are out of God's way when indeed they are in it, and out of favour with God when they are in as much favour with Him as any.

Gataker's Joy of the Just.

DLXXX.—The Scripture not to be jested withal.

IF in the troublesome days of King Edward IV. a citizen in Cheapside was executed as a traitor, for saying he would make his son heir to the crown, although he meant only his own house, having a crown for the sign, how much more dangerous is it to jest with the two-edged sword of God's Word, to wit-wanton it with the majesty of God? Wherefore if, without thine intention and against thy will, by chance-medley, thou hittest Scripture in ordinary discourse, yet fly to the city of refuge and pray to God to forgive thee.

Speed's Chron.

Fuller's Holy State.

"Non est bonum ludere cum sanctis."

DLXXXI.—The New Testament an exposition of the Old.

As Numerius said, that Plato was nothing else but Moses translated out of Hebrew into Greek; and Ascham, that Virgil is nothing but Homer turned out of Greek into Latin; and as divines have censured Cyprian to be nothing else but Tertullian in a Theodoret, de Curat. Græ. Affect., lib. ii.

Tullius, ad Brutum.

"Evangelium, revelata lex; lex, occultum evangelium."—AUGUSTIN, Quæsti. super Levit.

more familiar and elegant style: so the New Testament is nothing else but an exposition of the Old. That difference which Zeno put betwixt logic and rhetoric, divines usually make between the law and the Gospel—the law, like the fist shut; the Gospel, like the hand open: the Gospel, a revealed law; the law, a hidden Gospel.

DLXXXII.—Interest in Christ best of all.

Boys' Serm.

It is the fashion of many men, at Christmas especially, to boast of their rich attire, great attendance, good fire, large cheer, yet (seeing Christ is heir of all things in the world) they cannot in their own right, they cannot so much as enjoy a Christmas log or a Christmas pie till they be first engrafted in Him. Here, upon the earth, a man may have evidences to show that his land is his own, his house, his horse, all is his own, and that he is a very thief who takes any of these from him; but all the men in the world cannot give the least claim, title, or interest, to heaven, cannot endow him with these temporal things before the living God, but His Son Christ only, who is heir of all; and therefore, that our land may be our own, our meat, our men, our money, our own, let us be Christ's, that in Him we may have the good assurance of them all, so that in the end of all that may be pronounced to us which the apostle did to the Corinthians, "All are yours, ye Christ's, and Christ God's."

1 Cor. iii. 22.

DLXXXIII.—God slow to anger and of great patience.

Fenestella, de Magistr. Rom.

It is observable that the Roman magistrates, when they gave sentence upon any one to be scourged, a bundle of rods, tied hard with many knots, was laid before them. The reason was this: that whilst the beadle or flagelliser was untying the knots, which he was to do by order, and not in any other hasty or sudden way, the magistrate might see the deportment or carriage of the delinquent, whether he was sorry for his fault and showed any hope of amendment, that then he might recall his sentence or mitigate the punishment, otherwise to be corrected so much the more severely. Thus God, in the punishing of sinners, how patient is He! How loth to strike! How slow to anger if there were but any hope of recovery! How many knots doth He untie! how many rubs doth He make in His way to justice! He doth not try us by martial law, but pleads the case with us: "Why will ye die, O ye house of Israel?" And all this to see whether the poor sinner will throw himself down at His feet; whether he will come in and make His composition, and be saved.

Fuller's Serm.,
 Lond. 1647.

Ezek. xxxiii. 11.

DLXXXIV.—The fruits of repentance are to be as well outward as inward.

THERE is a workhouse in the inward closet of our hearts, where we must fructify and lay the foundation of those things which we do in the outward man. All our outward deeds should be but deeds of deeds; yet we must not content ourselves only with the inward, we must bring forth the outward also: he that hath an inside for God and an outside for the devil may, with his pardon, be cast into hell for ever. We must therefore show some outward evidence of the efficacy of grace. Gregory Nyssen sets it forth excellently: "Come on, you," saith he, "which glory in your baptism. How shall it appear that the mystical grace hath altered you? In your countenance there appeareth no change, nor in your outward lineaments; how, then, shall your friends perceive you are not the same? I suppose no otherwise but by your outward manners and deportment; they must show that you are not what you were, when you are tempted with the same sins whereunto you before were subject, and yet forbear them." It is reported of one of the worthiest of the ancients, who, before his conversion, had kept company with a strumpet, when, after his conversion, she came towards him, he

Marchantii Hortus
Pastorum.
In Lib. de Communibus Notionibus.

St. Augustine.

fled. She calleth after him, "Quo fugis? Ego sum (Whither fliest thou? It is I!)" His answer was, "At ego non sum ego (But I am not I)." This should be the true frame of every repentant spirit, to show by outward demonstration the lively fruits of inward conversion.

DLXXXV.—Government of the tongue commendable.

It is related of Thomas Aquinas, that being a young man, he was so careful over his words and watchful over his tongue, that he was called by his fellow-scholars bos mutus (a dumb ox); but Albertus Magnus, perceiving by his disputations the greatness of his wit, and thereupon judging to what his silence tended, gave this sentence of him, "Bos iste talem aliquando edet mugitum, ut sonum ejus totus orbis exaudiat (This ox will at length make such a lowing, that all the world shall hear the sound of it)," which afterwards proved true in his writings. Thus, where the tongue is kept at bay, and shut up within the compass of a careful government, the soul is kept from many troubles, and the mind freed from many distractions which do usually attend upon intemperate talkings.

Gazeus, Com. Cassian.

Jermin, Com. on Prov.

DLXXXVI.—Ministers to stand up for the truth.

THEODORET, in his "Ecclesiastical Story," reporteth that when Valens the emperor, with his Arian opinions, had bepestered much of the world, and by that means the flock of Christ stood in great danger, Aphrates, a monk, a holy man of that time, contrary to his order and holy profession, came forth out of his monastery to help to keep up the truth. And being asked by the emperor, who was offended at him, what he did out of his cell: "I would," saith he, "have kept it, and did keep it, so long as Christ's sheep were in quiet; but now that tempests do come on, and storms bring them in danger, every stone is to be turned, all means are to be sought for their safety." He goeth on: "If I were daughter to any man whatsoever, and according to my sex, as decency should require, were kept up in a closet, or in some secret chamber, or in some inner part of the house, yet if my father's dwelling-house were on fire, should I not be very careless if I should not come forth to help to quench the fire or give directions for it? So if now I should not help to teach true faith by Christ, by coming out of my monastery, I should do much amiss." Thus ministers, if ignorance or idolatry, if heretical doctrines, damnable and pernicious errors, did not, like the wild boar of the forest, go about to root up the vine of our Church, or the little foxes of schism and separation pluck off her grapes, they might then cloister up their tongues and lay aside their pens. But if all these and many more do fret and daily consume like a canker, it is high time to look about them, to stand up for the truth, to cry down the Diana of all such mad Ephesians; and in so doing they shall discharge their consciences and disburden their souls, and God Himself will reward it.

Lib. iv., cap. 24.

Abbot's Lect. on Jonah.

DLXXXVII.—Sin overthrows all.

AULUS GELLIUS doth tell of a goodly horse which belonged to one Seius, and thereof had his name to be called "Equus Seianus." This horse was never possessed by any, but both himself and his family did come to nought. So Seius, his first master, sped, and then Dolobella, who bought the horse at a great rate, purchased his own destruction into the bargain. Then Cassius was his owner, and after him Antonius, and the end of both these was ruin. So it is with sin and wickedness: they fret the goods of the owner, like eagles' feathers; they consume all; little or nothing prospers that they have a hand in. Though sin, therefore, be as pleasant to the flesh and to thy fancy as the horse of Seianus was comely to the eye, yet better it is to leave it than to have it; he is the best man and the blest man that is furthest from it.

Nect, Attica, lib. iii.

Abbot, ut antea.

DLXXXVIII.—Busy-bodies condemned.

ALDUS MANUTIUS, a public-spirited man, one that was bent to enlarge the bounds of learning, was so haunted with busy-body guests—whose business at the best, for the most part, was negotii inopia (want of employment); so that if the least wind of seeming trouble did but wring them, their saying was, "Eamus ad Aldum (Come, let us go to Aldus)!"—that he was fain at length to prevent them, by setting an unmannerly watchman at the door—one that could not blush, but being as impudent as they were impertinent, thus bespake them: "Quisquis es rogal te Aldus, &c. (Whosoever thou art, Aldus doth beseech thee, if thou have any business with him, briefly to dispatch it and presently to be gone, &c. For neither thou nor any other that come hither to him could want work of your own at home, if you did but mind it)." And it is very true that the men and women of these times are very idle-headed, meddling with other men's matters, neglecting their own; physicians to other men rather than themselves; meddlers in any calling rather than that which God hath enjoined them. They will deal with the sceptres of princes, and tell them how to rule; put on Aaron's robes, and teach how to preach; just like the emperor's steward, "cujus erat pulmenta Cesari præparare, non evangelium exponere (fit for a market-man, and to prepare broth for the emperor's breakfast, yet he would be perverting the Scripture to maintain the Arian heresy)."

King's Lect. on Jonah.

"Aliena curant et nihil quæ ad illos attinent."—TER.

DLXXXIX.—Great promises in adversities, without performance in prosperity, condemned.

ERASMUS, wittily lashing at Rome's follies, describeth unto us this custom of their mariners in a fear of shipwreck: "An Englishman," saith he, "being there, promiseth no less than golden mountains to the Lady of Walsingham if he came safe to land; another voweth to go on pilgrimage to St. James of Compostella, bare-foot and bare-headed, in a shirt of mail next his skin, and begging all the way; a third promiseth unto St. Christopher—whose vast statue, mons verius quàm statua (a mountain rather than a statue), is to be seen in the great church of Paris—that he will give him a wax candle as big as himself: whom one of his fellows presently checked, saying, 'Though thou shouldst sell all that thou hast, thou couldst not perform thy word.' But he replied (softly, lest St. Christopher should hear him), 'Hold thy peace, fool! Dost thou think that I ever meant to do it? If ever I recover shore, he gets not so much as a tallow candle of me.'" And thus many men deal with God in times of sickness or of any trouble, promising mountains but performing mole-hills; some to refrain one sin, some another—some every sin; and when His hand is once off, they commit sin with greater greediness than before, and then some worse thing justly happeneth unto them.

Colloquium in Nau-fragio.

Willet's Hexapla in Levit.

John v. 14.

DXC.—Resurrection of the body proved by a natural demonstration.

I HAVE stood in a smith's forge and seen him put a rusty, cold, dull piece of iron into the fire, and after a while he hath taken the same piece, the very same individual piece of iron out of the fire, hot, bright, sparkling. And thus it is with our bodies: they are laid down in the grave, dead, heavy, earthly; but at the resurrection this mortal shall put on immortality; at that general conflagration this dead, heavy, earthly body shall arise living, lightsome, glorious; which made Job so confident: "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that with these eyes I shall see Him," &c.

Fuller's Serm.,
Lond., 1648.

Job xix. 25.

DXCI.—Upon any great undertaking, God is first to be consulted withal.

THE Israelites usually asked counsel of God by the ephod, the Grecians by their oracles, the Persians by their magi, the Egyptians by their hierophantæ, the Indians by their gymnosophistæ, the ancient Gauls and Britons by their druids, the Romans by their augurs, or soothsayers. It was not lawful to propose any matter of moment in the senate prius quam de cælo observatum erat (before their wizards had made observations from the heaven, or sky). That which they did impiously and superstitiously we may—nay, we ought to do in another sense, piously, religiously, conscionably, i. e., not to embark ourselves into any action of great importance and consequence prius quam de cælo observatum est, before we have observed from heaven, not the flight of birds, not the houses of planets, or their aspects or conjunctions, but the countenance of God, whether it shineth upon our enterprises or not, whether He approve of our projects and designs or not.

Tullius, de Arusp. Repub.

Featly's Serm.

DXCII.—Memory ought to be the treasury of all goodness.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT, when he had overthrown Darius, king of Persia, took, amongst the spoils, a most rich cabinet, full of the choicest jewels that the world had then seen; and there was a dispute before him to what use he would put the cabinet; and every one having spent his judgment according as their fancies led them, the king himself concluded that he would keep that cabinet to be a treasury to lay the books of Homer in, which were his joy. But surely the richest cabinet that is in the soul of man, and that is the memory, the ark of heavenly knowledge, where, like Mary, we should lay up all that we know and hear of God. It is a rich cabinet, indeed, and therefore the fitter for the richest jewel, the Word of God, to be treasured up in.

Sabel., Hist., lib. vii., cap. 5.

Funeral Sermon.

DXCIII.—The retaining of one sin spoils a great deal of good in the soul.

As the philosopher saith, a cup, or some such thing that hath a hole in it, is no cup; it will hold nothing, and therefore cannot perform the use of a cup, though it have but one hole in it. So, if the heart have but one hole in it, if it retain the devil but in one thing, if it make choice but of any one sin to lie and wallow and tumble in, it doth evacuate all the other good by the entertainment of that one evil; the whole box of ointment will be spoiled by the dropping of that one fly into it. By the laws of our kingdom a man can never have true possession till he have voided all; and in the state of grace no man can have a full interest in Christ till all sin, i. e., all reigning, domineering sin, be rooted out.

Funeral Sermon.

DXCIV.—Weak beginnings of grace not to be despised.

THOUGH a man have a palsy-shaking hand, yet it is a hand; a sick, weak man, that lies crying "Oh, oh!" that can scarce turn himself on his bed, is a man, a living man; a poor child that is newly born, and hath nothing that discovereth reason almost, but the shape of a man, that poor child is a reasonable creature: so that faith that beginneth with weak apprehensions and faint leanings on Christ is, notwithstanding, a true faith, and therefore to be cherished. Deep godly sorrow and other parts of repentance do begin many times to run in a slender channel, yet they must not be straitened. Amendment of life begins sometimes at a low foundation, at small sins, yet there may be increase of such small grace, and a man may be blessed for all the weakness of them. It behoves every man, therefore, to take comfort in a little, and be thankful for it, and that is the only way to get more.

Stroz., Analys. in Rom.

DXCV.—How to receive benefit from the Word and sacraments.

Dyke's Worthy Communicant.

A CHILD may handle the mother's breasts, may play with them, may kiss them, but all this while the child is never the fuller; therefore the child, when it would be satisfied, lays its mouth to the breast, gets the nipple fast, and then sucks and draws with its strength and might, and so fetches forth the milk out of the mother's breast. Thus the Word and sacraments are the breasts of consolation, and they be full of very sweet milk indeed; but there can be no satisfaction till there be sucking. Men may come to the sacrament, and gaze upon the elements, and eat and drink them, and yet not receive the sweet of the ordinance; but if they would have the milk out of His breast they must fall to sucking and drawing with all their power and strength. Now, it is faith actuated that sucks virtue out of the sacrament, that sucks from Christ, in the sacrament, mortifying virtue to kill lusts, healing virtue to cure the pollutions of the heart, and quickening virtue to enable to duties and actions of spiritual life.

DXCVI.—Faith in the time of trial needful.

Abbot's Lectures on Jonah.

Solinus, cap. 15.

As a ship without its ballast is tossed and rocked at sea, and cannot endure the waves, so is that soul right unstable, and every hour apt to perish, which hath not faith in temptation. It is written of the cranes, that when they do intend, in stormy and troublesome weather, to fly over the sea, fearing lest that by the blasts of the wind their bodies, which be but light, should be beaten into the sea or be kept from the place whither they intend, they swallow some sand and little stones into their bellies, whereby they are so moderately poised that they are able to resist the raging of the wind. So it must be with every Christian, whilst they do cross this troublesome world of sin and great temptation. It is faith that must be their ballast; it is faith that must keep them upright, or recover them when they are a-going.

DXCVII.—Good laws and good men are the pillars of state.

Lake's Serm., on Ps. li.

"Salus civitatis in legibus est."— ARISTOT.

THE pillars of state are good laws and good men; good laws are the pillars that bear up men, and men, being so borne up by good laws, do bear up the whole state of a land. Licinius, therefore, the emperor, spake barbarously when, as Eusebius reports, he said that juris cognitio was virus et pestis reipublicæ; and the Jews, who, as Ambrose observes, said that leges were crimina, spake but as Jews, that is, as a rebellious people. And the Anabaptists, that hold laws to be contrary to Christian liberty, do but by their doctrine give us to understand the qualities of their lives, which is epicurean licentiousness; but Christians must give laws their right, and repute them as they are, the pillars of the state.

DXCVIII.—Man's corrupt judgment upon the bare appearance of things condemned.

Lake's Serm., on Haggai ii.

GOD is the Lord of hosts, He is the great Commander of heaven and earth; He it is that directs the conflicts, neither are any put to try mastery; no field pitched, no battle fought but by His special order and commission, and all for the accomplishment of His glory. But it befalleth us as it doth with them which stand in the same level wherein two huge armies are ready to engage; they conceive them to be a disordered multitude, whom, notwithstanding, if they behold from a high hill, they will discern that they are artificially ranged; they will see how every one serveth under his own colours. Even so men, which behold the state of the world with the eyes of flesh and blood, dim by reason of the weakness of their judgments and wickedness of their affections, think all things are out of order; that there is nothing but confusion and disorder, to see men reeling in judgment one against the other, servants riding on horses, princes going on foot—bonis malè, malis benè (that the worse men are the better they fare), and they fare the worse the better they are. But if they did but once ascend into the sanctuary of God, and judge of occurrences by heavenly principles, then they would confess that no army on earth can be better marshalled than the great army of all the creatures of heaven and earth, yea, and of hell too; and that, notwithstanding all appearances to the contrary, all is well and will end well; that God, who is the God of order, will bring light out of darkness and order out of the greatest confusion, could they but have patience and let Him alone with His own work.

DXCIX.—Beginnings of goodness to be encouraged, and why.

CICERO maketh mention of Marcus Crassus, who, walking one day by the sea-shore, saw a boy who had found a boat there, but having no helps to further him to sail, first he got oars, then a mast, sails, and ropes, and then he set to sea. Thus, from a little beginning, if a man be industrious, he may attain unto great things, to the enlargement of a great temporal estate, to a great measure of spiritual grace, to a great height of knowledge, especially in a knowing age, wherein the gleanings of Ephraim are better than the vintage of Abi-ezer, having such helps as antiquity never knew of, and sitting under the droppings of such spiritual means as no age can parallel.

Cicero, de Oratore.

"Dimidium facti qui bene," &c.
"Ex parvis principiis," &c.
Judges viii, 2.

DC.—Unworthy communicants reprovèd.

THE Habassines, a Christian people in Prester John's country, after the receiving of the sacrament, think it not lawful for them to spit that day till the setting of the sun. It is no better than superstition in them, but yet their superstition will rise up against the monstrous profaneness of many amongst us. They hold it unlawful to spit that day: and shall some out of drunkenness spew that day—drown Him in the tavern whom they received in the temple? They will not spit that day: and shall some endure the devil's drivel to fall from their mouths that day in ungodly oaths and unsavoury, rotten conversation? They will not spit that day: and shall some in that day spit in God's face, as common, profane swearers do, &c.?

Brerewood's Inquiries, chap. xxiii.

Dyke's Worthy Communicant.

DCI.—Self-conceitedness condemned as dangerous.

It is a natural disease of all the sons of Adam, that if they have but motes of goodness, they think they are mountains, and presume that their actions go hand-in-hand with their speculations. Little children, when they begin first to find their feet, think they can go as well and as far as those that are of riper age, and this conceit makes them catch many a fall. The case is ours: most of us are but babes in Christ, and our judgment erreth in nothing more than in taking an estimate of our own ability, wherein we come so short of performing what we promise to ourselves, that we may very well blush and make this conclusion: "Man, even the best of men, is altogether vanity."

Lake's Serm. on Matt. vi.

Ps. xxxix. 5.

DCII.—The Romanists' error in the point of the antiquity of ceremonies.

A NOBLEMAN, who had heard of the extreme age of one dwelling not far off, made a journey to visit him, and finding an aged person sitting in the chimney corner, addressed himself unto him with admiration of his age, till his mistake was rectified, for "Oh, sir,"

Fuller's Holy State.

said the young old man, "I am not he whom you seek for, but his son; my father is further off in the field." The same error is daily committed by the Roman Church, adoring the reverend brow and gray hairs of some ancient ceremonies, perchance but of some seven or eight hundred years' standing in the Church, and mistaking these for their fathers, of far greater age in the primitive times.

DCIII.—The terrors of a guilty conscience.

Mark viii. 24.
Lib. i., cap. 11.
Boys' Postill.

THE blind man in the Gospel, newly recovering his sight, imagined trees to be men; and the Burgundians, as Comines reports, expecting a battle, supposed long thistles to be lances. Thus the wicked man fears where no fear is, sonus excitat omnis suspensum; the guilty conscience conceives every thistle to be a tree, every tree a man, every man a devil—afraid of every man that it sees—nay, many times of those that it sees not. Not much unlike to one that was very deep in debt, and had many creditors, who, as he walked London streets in the evening, a tenter-hook caught his cloak, "At whose suit?" said he, conceiving some sergeant had arrested him. Thus the ill-conscienced man counts every creature he meets with a bailiff sent from God to punish him.

"Sonus excitat omnis suspensum."—
VIRGIL.

DCIV.—Atheism advanced by the distractions of the Church.

Institut., lib. iii.,
cap. 4.

Boys' Serm.

LACTANTIUS reports of Arcesilas, that having thoroughly considered the contradictions and oppositions of philosophers one against another, in fine, contemned them all, "et novam philosophandi philosophiam constituit (and set up a new way of philosophy)." Thus worldlings and atheistically-spirited men, expending their differences of Christians in matters of religion, have resolved to be of no religion; and understanding the violent contentions about forms of prayer and interpretation of Scripture, use no prayer nor Bible, but make Lucian their Old Testament and Machiavel their New.

DCV.—How to benefit by the sacrament.

Luke vi. 1.
Dyke, ut antea.

THE disciples of Christ, as they passed through the corn-fields, plucked the ears of the corn and did eat, rubbing them in their hands. They did not pluck off the ears and eat them whole, that would have been dangerous, but they first rubbed the ears with their hands, to fetch out the corn, and then did eat. Thus, at the sacrament, we must not devour those holy things all at once, hand over head, that will be dangerous; but we must set faith on work to rub the ears and fetch out the corn that is in them for food, and then there will be comfortable refreshing for the soul.

DCVI.—To submit to God's will in all things.

De Trugillo, Ther.
Cenciati.

It is for profit that men rise up early and go to bed late, and eat the bread of carefulness. The husbandman takes much pains, ploughs his ground, endures many sharp storms and piercing winters; "Currit mercator ad Indos;" the merchant runs divers hazards abroad, difficulties at home, and all for profit. So should we be willing patiently and quietly to submit ourselves to God's dealing with us, in all conditions humbly to apply ourselves to His wise and fatherly administrations, and take heed of murmuring, for He intendeth nothing but our good, even the salvation of our souls, which is the chiefest good of all.

DCVII.—The powerful effect of the Word of God preached.

PHILETUS, a disciple of Hermogenes, that conjuror, coming to dispute and maintain an argument with St. James the elder, relied much upon his sophistry; but the apostle preached Christ unto him with that powerfulness, that Philetus, returning back to his master, told him, "Magus abieram, Christianus redeo (I went forth a conjuror, but am returned a Christian)." Oh, the power of divine truth! If Peter do but preach, the Jews will cry out, "Men and brethren, what shall we do to be saved?" Where the Word goes along with the operation of the blessed Spirit, crooked things will be made straight, mountains will be level with the valleys, sinners will become saints, and there will be a daily addition to the Church of such as shall be saved.

Marull, Hist.,
lib. ii., cap. 9.

DCVIII.—Great engagements to love one another.

EUCLID showed in himself the true symptoms of brotherly affection, who, when his brother, in his rage, made a rash vow, saying, "Let me not live if I be not revenged on my brother!" Euclid turns the speech contrary way: "Nay, let me not live if I be not reconciled to my brother! Let me not live if we be not as good friends as ever we were before!" Shall a heathen thus outstrip us Christians?—nature be stronger than grace?—the bonds of flesh tie faster and surer than the bonds of grace? We call on God our Father, we acknowledge—or should do—one Church our mother, we suck the same breasts of the Old and New Testament, we are bred up in the same school of the Cross, fed at the same table of the Lord, incorporated into the same communion of saints; if these and the like considerations cannot knit our hearts in love one to another, the very heathens will rise up in judgment against us, and condemn us.

Plutarch, de Amore
Frat.

Featly, Clavis My-
stic.

DCIX.—The winning of a soul unto God very acceptable with God.

MEMORABLE is the story of Pyrrhias, a merchant of Ithaca, who, on a time, seeing an aged man captive in a pirate's ship, took compassion on him and redeemed him, and with him bought likewise his commodity, which the pirate had taken from him, being certain barrels of pitch. The old man perceiving that, not for any service that he could do him, nor for the gain of his commodity, but merely out of charity, Pyrrhias had done this, presently discovered unto him a great mass of treasure hidden in the pitch, whereby he grew exceedingly wealthy, having, not without Divine Providence, obtained an answerable blessing for so good an act of piety. Now, if God so bountifully requite the redemption of a poor old man de servitute corporeâ (from a corporal servitude), how much rather should every man contend to the utmost of his power—ministers in the pulpit, magistrates on their benches, masters in their families, every one by a good example—to win a soul unto God, to redeem his brother from the thralldom of the devil, which is to save a soul from death, and for which they shall be honoured with the name of saviours, and their reward shall be that they shall shine like stars, for ever and ever.

Plutarch, Quæst.
Græc., xxxiv.

Willet, Hexapla on Lev.

James v. 20.

Obad. 21.

Dan. xii. 3.

DCX.—The great difficulty of forgiving one another.

It is worthy observation, and such as are conversant amongst little children know it to be true, that when they are taught to say the Lord's Prayer, they are usually out at that petition, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us;" the reason is because of the harshness of the sound, the reiteration of one and the same words, the multiplicity of the consonants, and the like. It were to be wished that that which they are so often out at we could be more frequently in at; that what is not easy for their shallow heads

Fuller's Serm.,
Lond., 1648.

Matt. vi. 14.

to conceive may not be too hard for our more experimental hearts to practise. But it is hard indeed, why else did Christ make a comment on that petition, passing by the other five, when He taught His disciples to pray? And hence it is that injuries are registered in sheets of marble to all posterity, whilst benefits are written in the sand, ready to be dashed out by the foot of the next that passeth by.

DCXI.—Death is the true Christian's advantage.

Lucian, in *Piscatore.*Playfer's Serm.

As that ass, called Cumanus's ass, jetting up and down in a lion's skin, did for a time much terrify his master, but afterwards, being descried, did benefit him very much : thus Death, by the death of Christ, stands like a silly ass, having his lion's skin pulled over his ears, and is so far from terrifying any, that it benefits all true Christians, because by it they rest from their labours, and if they be oppressed with cares and troubles of the world, perplexed, distracted in the midst of a crooked and froward generation, let but death come, they have their quietus est, and are discharged.

DCXII.—The great danger of not listening to the Word preached.

Volateran, lib. xix.

Fuller's Observat.

"Propter malos auditores sermo subtrahitur."— GREG., in Execk.

THE Roman senators conspired against Julius Cæsar to kill him; that very next morning Artemidorus, Cæsar's friend, delivered him a paper (desiring him to peruse it) wherein the whole plot was discovered. But Cæsar complimented away his life, being so taken up to return the salutations of such people as met him in the way, that he pocketed the paper among other petitions, as unconcerned therein, and so, going to the senate-house, was there slain. Thus the world, the flesh, and devil have a design for the destruction of men: ministers, such as watch for their good, bring a letter of advice, God's Word, wherein all the conspiracy is revealed; but who doth believe their report? Most men are so busy and taken up with worldly delights, that they are not at leisure to listen to them, or read the letter, but thus, alas! run headlong to their own destruction.

DCXIII.—Universal repentance.

Webb's Serm. at Court, 1619.

WE commend prisoners for their wisdom who, knowing they are guilty more ways than one, desire that all the indictments may be brought in against them before the verdict pass upon them, that so they might be thoroughly discharged. So he that arraigneth himself before the bar of God's justice should not leave anything unrepented of whereof he knoweth himself guilty, nor conceal any part of his misery that needeth the help of God's mercy.

DCXIV.—Prudence and worldly policy uncertain.

Smith's *Serm. on
Jer. ix.*

THE chirurgeon that dealeth with an outward wound seeth what he doth, and can tell whether he can heal it or no, and in what time; but he that is to make an incision within the body, be it for the stone or the like disease, he doth but, as it were, grope in the dark, and may as well take hold of that he should not as of that which he would; and the artisan that worketh in his shop, and hath his tools about him, can promise to make up his day's work to his best advantage; but the merchant adventurer that is to cut the seas, and hath need of one wind to bring him out of the haven, another to bring him out to the land's end, another perhaps to bring him to the place of traffic, where he would be, he can promise nothing, neither touching his return, neither touching the making of his commodity, but as the wind and the weather, and the men of war by the way, and as the honesty and skill of them whom he tradeth with, shall give him leave. Just so it fareth in matters of prudence and worldly policy : they are conjectural, they are not demonstrative, and therefore there is no science of them ; they have need of concurrence of many causes that are casual, of many men's minds that are mutable, therefore uncertain, not to be built upon.

DCXV.—Matter enough within us to condemn us.

Piso, one of the Roman generals, to show the bloody humour that was in him, commanded that a soldier should be put to death for returning without his fellow, with whom he went from the camp, saying that he had killed him. The captain who had the charge to execute this poor soldier, when he saw his fellow coming, who had been missed before, did spare the first man's life. Upon this, Piso finds matter to take away the lives of all three ; hear his worthy reason for it : " You are a man condemned," saith he unto the first ; " my sentence was passed on you, and therefore you shall die : " then turning to the second, " You were the cause," quoth he, " wherefore your fellow was condemned to death, and therefore you must die : " and to the third, " You, centurion, because you have not learned to obey the voice of your general, shall die also for company (ex cogitatione quomodo tria crimina faceret, &c.). " He devised how he might make three faults because he found not one ; but the just Judge of all the world needs not do so with us : no beating of His brains to invent an accusation against us. He needs not draw three faults into one, or find one where there is none ; there is matter enough within us to condemn us : our thoughts, our words, our deeds, do yield Him cause enough to pronounce the sentence of death upon us.

Seneca, de Ira.

Abbot's Lect. on Jonah.

DCXVI.—The giving up of ourselves an acceptable sacrifice to God.

It is reported of Æschines, when he saw his fellow-scholars give great gifts to his master Socrates, he being poor and having nothing else to bestow, did give himself to Socrates, as confessing to be his in heart and good will, and wholly at his devotion. And the philosopher took this most kindly, esteeming it above all other presents, and returned him love accordingly. Even so the gracious disposition of our heavenly Father taketh in far better part than any man can take it the laying down of our souls, the submitting of ourselves unto His direction, the melting of our wills down into His will. The widow's two mites were welcome into His treasury, because her heart was full, though her purse was empty : He accounteth that the best sacrifice which is of the heart. External things do well, but internal things do far better.

Seneca, de Beneficiis, lib. i.

Donne's Sermon, London, 1629.

" Non vox, sed votum."

DCXVII.—Heaven worth contending for.

If a man were assured that there were made for him a great purchase in Spain, Turkey, or some other parts more remote, would he not adventure the dangers of the seas, and of his enemies also, if need were, that he might come to the enjoyment of his own ? Well, behold Jesus Christ hath made a purchase for us in heaven, and there is nothing required on our parts but that we will come and enjoy it. Why, then, should we refuse any pains or fear anything in the way ? Nay, we must strive to get in. It may be that we shall be pinched in the entrance, for the gate is strait and low, not like the gates of princes, lofty, roofed, and arched, so that we must be fain to leave our wealth and the pleasures of this life behind us ; yet enter we must, though we leave our skins, nay, our very lives, behind us ; for the purchase that is made is worth ten thousand worlds—not all the silks of Perkins's Exposition, on Creed.

Luke xiii. 24.

" Non est ad astra mollis e terris via," —SEN.

Persia, not all the spices of Egypt, not all the gold of Ophir, not all the treasures of both Indies are to be compared to it. Who, therefore, would not contend for such a bargain, though he sold all to have it?

DCXVIII.—Adoption of God's children known by their sanctification.

FIRE is known to be no painted or imaginary fire by two notes, by heat and by the flame. Now, if the case so fall out that the fire want a flame, it is still known by the heat. In like manner, there be two witnesses of our adoption, or sanctification: God's Spirit and our spirit. Now, if it so fall out that a man feel not the principal, which is the Spirit of adoption, he must then have recourse to the second witness, and search out in himself the signs and tokens of the sanctification of his own spirit, by which he may certainly assure himself of his adoption, as fire may be known to be fire by the heat, though it want a flame.

Perkins, ut supra.

DCXIX.—The danger of worldly-mindedness.

It is seen by experience, that a man swimming in a river, as long as he is able to hold up his head and keep it above water, he is in no danger, but safely swimmeth and cometh to the shore with good contentment; but if once his head, for want of strength, begin to dive, then shaketh he the hearts of all that do behold him, and himself may know that he is not far from death. So is it in this wretched world, and swimmers of all sorts, if the Lord give us strength to keep up our heads, i. e., to love God and religion above the world, and before it, and all the pleasures of it, there is then no danger, but after a time of swimming in it up and down, we shall arrive in a firm place with happiness and safety; but if once we dive, and the head go under water, if once the world get the victory, and our hearts are set upon it, and go under it in a sinful love and liking of it, oh, then take heed of drowning!

Babington's Fun. Sermon.

DCXX.—God's delight in a relapsed sinner's repentance.

As a husbandman delights much in that ground that, after long barrenness, becomes fruitful; as a captain loves that soldier that once fled away cowardly, and afterwards returns valiantly: even so God is wonderfully enamoured with a sinner that, having once made shipwreck of a good conscience, yet at last returns and swims to heaven upon the plank of faith and repentance.

Calamy's Sermon.

DCXXI.—Unworthy communicants condemned.

CHILDREN, when they first put on new shoes, are very curious to keep them clean; scarce will they set their feet on the ground for fear to dirty the soles of their shoes, yea, rather they will wipe them clean with their coats; and yet, perchance, the next day they will trample with the same shoes up to the ancles. Alas! children's play is our earnest: on that day we receive the sacrament we are often over-precise, scrupling to say or do those things which lawfully we may; but we, who are more than curious that day, are not so much as careful the next day, and too often (what shall I say?) go on in sin up to the ancles—yea, our sins go over our heads.

Fuller's Observat.

"O curvæ in terris animæ et celestium inanes."—PERS., ii.

Ps. xxviii. 1.

DCXXII.—A sense of the want of grace a true sign of grace.

It is the first step unto grace for a man to see no grace, and it is the first degree of grace for a man to desire grace: as no man can sincerely seek God in vain, so no man can sincerely desire grace in vain. A man may love gold, yet not have it; but no man loveth God but is sure to have Him. Wealth a man may desire, yet be never the nearer for it; but grace no man ever sincerely desired and missed it. And why? It is God that hath wrought this desire in the heart. And He will never frustrate the desire that Himself there hath wrought. Let no man say, "I have no faith, no repentance, no love, no fear of God; no sanctifying, no saving grace in me." Doth he see a want of these things in himself? Yes, that is it which so grieves him that he cannot love God, stand in awe of Him, trust in His mercy, repent of sin as he should. Yea, but doth he seriously and unfeignedly desire to do thus? Yes, he desires it above all things in the world, and would be willing, as it were, to buy, even with a whole world, the least measure, or dram, or drop only of such grace. Who is it, let me ask him, who is it that hath wrought this desire in him? Not the devil; he would rather quench it all he could in him. Not his own corruption; that is naturally averse thereunto. It must needs, then, be the work of the Spirit of God, and of Him who affirmeth all them to be in a blessed plight that thus desire after grace.

"Pars sanitatis velle sanari."

Prov. xiii. 4.

August., in 1 John i. 6.

Gataker's Joy of the Just.

Bernard, in Cant. iii. 1.

Phil. ii. 13.

DCXXIII.—Experimental knowledge the only knowledge.

ARISTOTLE saith a man is not a physician that knows things in the general, in the gross, but he that knows them in particular. This is not to be a physician, to know that such dry meats are good for a moist stomach, unless he also know dry meats and the symptoms of a moist stomach. So it is in the knowledge of the world and in the knowledge of God. To know what repentance is is not enough, except we know the parts and the signs of it in ourselves. To know that none are translated from death to life, except they love the brethren, is not enough, except we know the brethren and love them. To know that he that is in Christ hath crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts thereof is not enough, except we know that we ourselves have crucified it.

Preston's Treatise.

"Scientiæ quis unus potest, nisi ea agamus?"—MAX. TYRIVS, Disert. v.

Gal. v. 24.

DCXXIV.—The danger of loose travel into foreign parts.

As it is said of one who, with more industry than judgment, frequented a college library and commonly made use of the worst notes he met with in any authors, that he weeded the library: so it may be said of some loose travellers, that are got abroad too early, before they be well principled, that they weed foreign countries, bringing home Dutch drunkenness, Spanish pride, French wantonness, and Italian atheism. As for the good herbs, Dutch industry, Spanish loyalty, French courtesy, and Italian frugality, these they leave behind them.

Fuller's Holy State.

DCXXV.—St. Augustine's judgment of the time of Christ's birth.

CHRIST was born when the days were at the shortest, ut diminuto noctis curriculo defec-tionem sentiant opera tenebrarum (that the chariot wheels of the night being taken off, the works of darkness may drive heavily). "He must increase," said the Baptist, "but I must decrease;" John was therefore born at Midsummer, when the days grow shorter and shorter, but Christ about the calends of January, when the days wax longer and longer, giving at once both life to man and length to days.

Serm. xxii., de Tempore.

Boys's Postill.

Ambros., contra Marcian.

DCXXVI.—Good endeavours assisted by God.

Mark xvi. 3.

Boys' Sermon.

Ps. xci. 11.

Matt. xxviii. 2.

"In magnis voluiss: sat est."

It much perplexed Mary how she should roll away the tomb-stone and so purchase the sight of her beloved Master; but He that hath given His angels charge over His children, that they hurt not their foot against a stone, sent a messenger from heaven to roll back that huge stone for her. Even as a loving father, when he carrieth his little child to the town, will let him alone to walk in the plain and fair way, but when he cometh to slippery paths he takes him by the hand, and in dirty passages bears him in his arms, and when he comes to a stile he gently lifts him over: so God our heavenly Father useth His dear children. If they endeavour to go as far as they may in the ways of His commandments, so fast as they can in the way to the celestial Jerusalem, He will assist them in danger and help them over stiles of discouragements, take away all rubs of offence, remove all blocks and hindrances in their passage; and the very great stone parting Christ and them, even whilst they least think of it, shall be rolled away.

DCXXVII.—*To rejoice with trembling.*Pier. Moulin, de l'Amour de Dieu.

"Tristitia lætis."

A QUAIL, the very same bird that was the Israelites' meat in the wilderness, as he flies over the sea, feeling himself begin to be weary, lights by the way into the sea; then, lying at one side, he lays down one wing upon the water and holds up the other wing towards heaven; lest he should presume to take too long a flight wets one wing; lest he should despair to take a new flight he keeps the other wing dry: thus must every good Christian do. When he holds up the wing of love towards heaven to rejoice for Christ, he must lay down the wing of fear upon the water to weep for his sins, that so his two wings may be answerable to God's two wings: that as God hath two wings, the one of mercy, the other of judgment, so he may have two wings, the one of joy for Christ, the other of sorrow for himself, and so to rejoice with trembling.

DCXXVIII.—*Magistrates to be always ready to do justice.*Plutarch, Apophthegm, et in Vita Demetrii.

A VERY poor widow was earnest with Philip of Macedon to do her justice, but he deferred her and told her that he had no leisure to hear her; she, forgetting all dutiful respect, asked immediately why he had leisure, then, to be a king. Thus, surely, if petitioners for justice be put back, whose souls speak within them for it, with the answer of not being at leisure, they will go near to ask why they had leisure to be kings and judges and magistrates, unless they did mean to execute judgment and do justice, which they are bound to do at all times.

DCXXIX.—*Lex talionis.*Raleigh, Pref. to Hist. World."Autorem feriunt vola. retorta suum."
—AUSON., Ep. lxxi.

Ps. vii. 15.

By the advice of the Lord Hastings and a warrant signed by Richard III., thereupon the two lords Rivers and Grey, with others, were, without trial of law or offence given, executed at Pontefract in the North, and (which is very remarkable) the very self-same day and (as near as could be guessed) the self-same hour was Hastings' head, in the same lawless manner, struck off in the Tower of London. Here is lex talionis (the just law of retaliation). God, in His eternal providence and divine justice, subverts the wisdom oftentimes of evil plots and irreligious imaginations, and turns them upon the very heads of the actors themselves, according to that passage, "In foveam, quam foderunt," &c.

DCXXX.—The power of God's Word.

JUNIUS was reclaimed from atheism by casting his eye upon the New Testament, lying open in his study, and reading the first of St. John's Gospel, "In the beginning was the Word," &c., being amazed with the strange majesty of the style and profoundness of the mysteries therein contained. What should I speak of St. Augustine, who was strangely converted by hearing a voice saying "Tolle, lege; tolle, lege!" and fastening his eyes upon the first passage of Scripture he alighted on, which was this, "Let us walk honestly as in the day, not in gluttony and drunkenness," &c.? No sooner was the verse read, than the work of conversion began and a pious resolution for amendment of life settled in him. Alipius, certified hereof, desires to peruse the place, and falleth upon the verse immediately following, "Him that is weak in the faith receive you," which he, applying to himself, besought St. Augustine to strengthen him in the truth, as Christ commanded Peter, "Tu conversus confirma fratres," which task he so well performed, that with a little travail, in a short space, two twins were brought forth to the Church at one time. Thus the Word of God, whether heard or read, non ut sonus, non ut litera (not as it is, ink and paper, not as it is, a sound or collision of the air), but as it is, an instrument of God and the power of God unto salvation, maketh the man of God perfect: it frameth and mouldeth the heart, it printeth it like a stamp, melteth it like wax, bruise it like a hammer, pricketh it like a nail, and cutteth it asunder like a sword.

In Vita.

Rom. xiii. 13, 14.

August., Confess., lib. viii., cap. 12.

Rom. i. 16.

2 Tim. iii. 17.

DCXXXI.—A good man's life preserved for the good of others.

RIVERS of themselves would run the straightest and directest way to the sea, as being greedy to pay tribute unto their great master the ocean; but God, in His wise disposal of all things, hath set here a mountain and there a hill in the way, that so, by turning and winding, now this way, now that way, and going further about, they might enrich the earth, as they pass along, with fertility and abundance. Thus a good man and a good Christian man, having but once tasted of God's love, oh, how he desires to be dissolved and to be with Christ! He prays (but still with reference to God's will) that his hope may be turned into fruition, his faith into vision, and his love into perfect comprehension; but God, in His providence, hath resolved upon the negative, that his days shall be prolonged to do good unto others, that he may be serviceable in his place to Him and his country.

Donne's Serm., of St. Paul's, 1626.

Luke xxii. 32.

Phil. i. 23.

DCXXXII.—The great difference of both good and bad in life and death.

THE hawk flies high and is as highly prized, being set upon a perch vervelled with the jingling bells of encouragement and carried on his master's fist, but being once dead and picked over, the perch is cast upon the dunghill as good for nothing. The hen scrapes in the dust, not anything rewarded when she is alive, but being dead is brought as a choice dish to her master's table. Thus wicked men are commonly set in high places and prosper in this life, and good men lie grovelling with their mouths in the dust as the very underlings of the world, but being once dead, the one is cast into the dungeon of hell, the other advanced to the kingdom of heaven: the one is in Abraham's bosom, whilst the other is tormented with the devil and his angels.

Westfield's Serm., 1619.

"Cuncta bonis prosumt, quos et mors ipsa beatos efficit," &c.—BILII, Antib.

DCXXXIII.—Opportunities of sin to be avoided.

ST. AUGUSTINE, in his "Confessions," maketh mention of his friend Alipius, that having resolved with himself never to look upon the fencers' prizes, was upon a time, through the importunity of his friends, drawn along to the theatre where these bloody sports were performed, protesting that he would keep his eyes shut all the while, and not so much as once open them; yet it so fell out that, upon a sudden great shout of the people, he looked about to see what the matter was, whereupon he became another man, and altered his former course, so that his hatred to the sport was turned into love and liking of it. It is opportunity, we say, that makes thieves. Look what a clear fountain is to the thirsty, what a shade to the scorched traveller! Such is occasion to a man that is accustomed to do evil. He that walketh in the sun is sure to be tanned; he that toucheth pitch shall be defiled. Physicians may converse with sick men, and cure them; but if their diseases be dangerous, contagious, they will not easily adventure on them, lest that, in curing others, they should kill themselves. Vices are of the same nature, and vicious persons and places are alike dangerous, and therefore to be shunned.

Fonseca's Serm. Quadragesima.

"Delinquendi materia debet praescindi."—CYPRIAN, Ep. ii.

DCXXXIV.—How the good and the bad look upon death in a different manner.

Lightfoot's Serm., 1624.

A CHILD at school, when he seeth one riding post through the streets as if he would run over him or tread upon him, crieth out; but when he perceives that it is his father's man, sent to bring him home from school, all the fear is past: then he laugheth and rejoiceth. So, whilst men are in the state of nature, they look upon death as an enemy, as a spoiler, as one that would bereave them of all their worldly delights; but being once the sons and daughters of God by adoption, then they apprehend death as their heavenly Father's man, riding on the pale horse, sent to bring them home from a prison on earth to a place of perfect liberty in heaven.

DCXXXV.—The confidence of much knowledge an argument of no knowledge.

Plutarch, in Solone.

Barton's Melancthon.

THALES sent the golden tripes which the fishermen took up in their net, and the oracle commanded to be given to the wisest, to Bias, Bias to Solon, and then they had but seven wise men; and if you will but believe the times, there are now hardly so many fools to be found. If such a thing were now to be had we should all fight for it, as the three goddesses did for the golden apple. We are so wise. We have now women-politicians, women-preachers, preaching soldiers, teaching tradesmen, children-metaphysicians; every silly fellow can square a circle, make perpetual motions, find out the philosopher's stone, interpret the Revelation of St. John, make new theories, new logic, dispute de omni scibili. Town and country are now so full of deified spirits, divine souls, that you may sooner find a god than a man amongst us, we think so well of ourselves; and that is an ample testimony, a sufficient demonstration, that there is a great deal of folly, much ignorance, much indiscretion, to be found amongst us.

"Qui se dicit scire quod nescit, temerarius est," &c.—AUGUST., in Serm. de Ascensione.

DCXXXVI.—Afflictions follow the godly man close in this world.

Micklethwait's Serm., Lond., 1631.

"Duri's premitur justus, cum floret iniquus,"—BILL.

HE that goeth towards the sun shall have his shadow follow him; but he that runneth before it shall have it fly before him. So he that marcheth with his face towards the Sun of righteousness, that setteth himself to do the things that may be without offence to God and man, shall be sure to have afflictions close at his heels. As for him that hath his back upon Christ, that maketh a trade of sin, his sorrows and vexations of spirit, like the shadow, are still before him in this world, but they will be sure to meet him in another.

DCXXXVII.—How to read the Scriptures and books apocryphal.

WHEN Moses saw an Egyptian and an Israelite striving together he killed the Egyptian and saved the Israelite; but when he saw two Israelites striving together he laboured to reconcile them, saying, "Ye are brethren; why do ye strive?" So, when we read or see the apocryphal books, or heathen story, or popish traditions, contradicting the Scriptures—as, for instance, Jacob cursed Simeon and Levi for murdering the Shechemites, and Judith blessed God for killing of them—here, and in such like places, let us kill the Egyptian, but save the Israelite; set a value on the Scriptures, but slight the Apocrypha. But when we meet with any appearance of seeming contradiction in the canon of Scripture—as where it is said God tempted Abraham, and God tempteth no man—here, now, and in many other places, we must be reconcilers, and distinguish betwixt a temptation of trial, which is from God, and a temptation of seducement, which is by the devil, and these two seeming different friends will appear to be brethren, and agree well.

Wemens' Exercitat.
Exod. i. 12.

Gen. xlix. 7.
Jud. th. ix.

"Oninis sensus qui fuerit extra Scripturam, non est sensus."—ORIGEN, in Matt., homil. xxi Gen. xxii. i. James i. 13.

DCXXXVIII.—True repentance will not admit of any sin.

"I came," says Nehemiah, "to Jerusalem, and understood of the evil that Eliashib had done for Tobiah, in preparing for him a chamber in the courts of the house of God, and it grieved me sore;" but he rests not there, but goes further: "therefore I cast forth all the household stuff of Tobiah out of the chamber." What should Tobiah do with a chamber there? Therefore he not only outs Tobiah, but out goes all his stuff too. Thus doth repentance, when it considers all the evil that Satan and corruption have done, that they have taken chambers in the heart that should be the house of God, it is grieved sore, and thereupon it outs Satan and all his stuff. Neither he nor any of his retinue shall be housed there any longer; not any one sin shall find the least entertainment.

Micklethwait's Serms., Lond. Neh. xi. 7.

"O penitentia, quid de te novi referam? Omnia clausa tu referas." —CYPRIAN, de Laud. Pœnit.

DCXXXIX.—The Scripture's rhetoric.

IF we look up to the heavens we find in some part of the sky single stars by themselves, in others a constellation of many stars together: so, in some passages of Holy Writ, you may observe one figure or trope as a membrum, or similiter cadens, "I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty," &c.; or an allegory, as, "Where the body is, there the eagles will be;" or an exclamation, "Oh that they were wise!" &c.; or an apostrophe, which, by a kind of miracle, giveth life to dead things and ears to the deaf, "Hear, O heavens! hearken, O earth!" &c. And in other passages there is a conjunction of many figures and ornaments of speech, as in that text, "Is there no balm in Gilead? no physician there? Why, then, is not the health of my people restored?" Here, now, are four figures couched up together

Funeral Sermons; or, House of Mourning.

Matt. xxv. 35.

Matt. xxiv. 28.

Deut. xxxii. 29

Isa. i. 2.

Jer. viii. 22.

1. An interrogation, for more emphatical conviction.
2. A communication, for more familiar introduction.
3. An allegory, for more lively expression.
4. An apostrophe, for safer reprehension. And the like may be observed in our Saviour's exprobration of the Jews: "Oh that thou knewest, in this thy day, the things that belong to thy peace! O Jerusalem, Jerusalem," &c., where there is a posy of rhetorical flowers—

Matt. xxiii. 37.

1. An acclamation, "O si cognovisses," &c.
2. A repetition, "Jerusalem, Jerusalem!"
3. An interrogation, "Quoties volui," &c.
4. An icon, or lively expression to the eye, "Sicut gallina congregat pullos," &c. Where are now our Anabaptists and plain pack-staff methodists, who esteem all flowers of rhetoric in sermons no better than stinking weeds, and all elegancy of speech than of profane spells;

"Tanta est Christianarum profunditas literarum," &c. —AUG., Ep. ii. ad Volusian.

and so at unawares censure the holy oracles of God, which excel all other writings, as well in eloquence as science? And where, too, is the profane critic, that delights in the flesh-pot and loathes manna, that admires carnal eloquence in poets and heathen orators and taxeth the Scripture for simplicity and want of all art and eloquence?

DCXL.—God suffers wicked men to torment His people.

Goddard's Serm.,
Lond., 1647.

"Plerumque mali in sanctos ævire sinuntur."—BILLIE Antholog.

Isa. x. 12.

THE physician applieth horse-leeches to his dætempered patient; the horse-leech intendeth nothing but the satiating and filling himself with the blood of the sick party; but the physician hath another aim, even the drawing of the putrified and corrupt blood. Thus God suffereth wicked men and devils to suck His people, to draw out ever their hearts' blood; but it is in order to their good. It is no matter what wicked men think, God will have His glory; and though Ashur think not so, yet God purposeth it and aims it and, in conclusion, effects it.

DCXLI.—Prosperity of the wicked a stumbling-block to the godly.

Diog. Laert., in Vita.

Donne's Serm.,
Lond., 1624.

Job xxiv. 12.
Jer. xii.
Ps. xxxvii.

DIOGENES the cynic, seeing Harpalus, a vicious fellow, still thriving in the world, he was bold to say that wicked Harpalus's living long in prosperity was an argument that God had cast off His care of the world, that He cared not which end went forward. But he was a heathen. Yet, for all that, the lights of the sanctuary have burnt dim; stars of no small magnitude have twinkled; men of eminent parts, famous in their generations for religion and piety, have staggered in their judgment, to see the flourishing estate of the wicked. It made Job to complain, and Jeremiah to expostulate with God; and David was even ready to sink in seeing the prosperity of ungodly men: to see the one in wealth, the other in want; the one honourable, the other despised; the one upon a throne, the other on a dunghill.

DCXLII.—Time to be well husbanded.

Sibbs's Serm.,
Lond., 1622.

"Utendum est
ut cito pede præterit ætas."—
OVID, art. 3.

HE that hath a great way to go and but a little money to spend had need to pluck up his heels. If a man have much to write and but a little piece of paper to write in, he must write small and thick, and as close as ever he can. So it is with every one of us: there is not a soul of us but we shall find so many thousand things to repent of, so many graces to obtain that we stand in need of, so many evidences for heaven to get that are not yet sealed unto us, so many particulars concerning a better life, that it is a wonder that any of us should find one half-day to mind anything else, but to husband our time to the best advantage.

DCXLIII.—Better live amongst beasts than beastly-minded men.

Fonseca's Serm., Quædæm.
John xi. 54.

Job xxx. 29.
Ezek. ii. 6.

OUR Saviour Christ hied Him to the wilderness, amongst the beasts, and carries His disciples thither with Him, holding their fellowship to be less hurtful and dangerous. "Præter fui draconum," says Job; "Inter scorpiones habitavi," saith Ezekiel. Thus, if it go ill with any man, that he cannot live well and quietly amongst some men, he may shun their society, and, for want of better company, retire himself, and live amongst known wild beasts than with such beastly-minded men.

DCXLIV.—One man is to help another as God hath enabled him.

Lake, on Psalms li.

"Ingenui est agnoscere, et imitari Benefactorem suum (There is no truer character of ingenuity than a humble acknowledgment whose creatures we are, and a careful resembling of our Creator)," especially seeing our gifts, whether they be of learning or riches, &c., are bestowed upon us, "non ut ornamenta, sed instrumenta (not only to recommend us, but also for the good of others)." We see it in the frame of the whole world, in heaven and in earth; neither of them is more beautiful than useful—yea, the more glorious, the more commodious are the parts of the great world—which should make this microcosm, this little world of ours, blush, if we use our endowments, as many do their garments, for pride, and not for profit, that fools may gaze on us, and nobody be the better for us.

"Non nobis solum nati sumus sed par-tem patriæ paremtes," &c.,—TUL.

DCXLV.—The health of the soul is the true health of the body.

THE earth is a huge globe, made to be the nursery of plants, herbs, birds, &c. While the sun shineth upon them comfortably, how cheerfully do all things look! how well do they prove and prosper! But remove the sun from it, as in winter, or eclipse the beams thereof, how squalid is the face thereof! how do all things languish and die! Even so fareth it between our souls and our bodies: according to the influence of the soul is the true health and strength of the body. Our bodies may be then said to be summer-like when they be cherished by our souls; but if our souls neglect them, then they grow winter-like and droop.

Lake's Serm. on Psalm li.

DCXLVI.—Sorrows in this life not comparable to the joys of the other life.

As the globe of the earth, which, improperly for its great show and bigness, we term the world, and is, after the mathematician's account, many thousands of miles in compass, yet, being compared unto the greatness of the starry sky's circumference, is but a centre or a little prick: so the troubles and afflictions and sorrows of this life temporal, in respect of the joys eternal in the world to come, bear not any proportion, but are to be reputed as nothing, or as a dark cloud that cometh and goeth in a moment.

Boys' Psittill

"Hoc est parvis componere magna."

DCXLVII.—Dangerous to pry into God's counsels and secrets.

WISE Solomon says the light is a pleasant thing, and so certainly it is; but there is no true outward light which proceedeth not from some fire. The light of that fire is not more pleasing than the fire of that light is dangerous; and that pleasure doth not more draw on our sight than that danger forbids our approach. How foolish, then, is that fly which, in the love and admiration of the candle-light, will know no distance, but puts itself heedlessly into the flame, wherein it perisheth! How many bouts it fetcheth, every one nearer than the other, ere it make the last adventure! And so the merciless fire, taking no notice of the affection of an over-fond client, singeth his wings, and suddenly consumes it. Thus do those bold and busy spirits who will needs draw too near unto that inaccessible Light, and look into things too wonderful for them; so long do they hover about the secret counsels of the Almighty, till the wings of their presumptuous conceits be scorched, and their daring curiosity hath paid them with everlasting destruction.

Hall's Occasional Meditations.

"Noli altum sapere."

"Curiosus nemo est, qui non sit ma-levolus."—
PLAUT., in Stiche.

DCXLVIII.—We die daily.

JERUSALEM was once finally sacked by Titus and Vespasian, where, besides an infinite number which were otherwise spoiled, ten hundred thousand men were downright slain by the sword altogether, as Josephus, a Greek writer, and Josippus, a Hebrew author, testify. But that which happened once to them happeneth every day to us: we die daily.

Playfer's Serm.

1 Cor. xv. 31.

DCXI.IX.—How faith justifieth alone.

Vide in Hist.

King's Lett. on Jonah.

BETHULIA was in danger of Holofernes, the terror of the East, as we are (or ought to be) of the justice of God; and as the strength of Bethulia was thought too weak to encounter him, so all our obedience to the law of God is weak and insufficient to defend us. Judith undertakes for the people of the city, faith for us; Judith goes accompanied with her handmaids, faith with her works; and though the eyes of her handmaid were ever towards her lady to carry the scrip, &c., yet, in performing the act of deliverance, Judith is alone, her maid standing and waiting at the door, not so much as setting her foot within the chamber door. Thus it is that faith goeth foremost and good works follow after; and although our love and obedience be as attendant to faith as ever that servant was to Judith, yet, in performing the mighty act of deliverance, acquitting the conscience from the curse of the law, pacifying the anger of God, and presenting us blameless before His holy eyes (all which standeth in the apprehension of the merits of Christ Jesus, and a steadfast persuasion that He hath assured for us), faith is solely and wholly alone, our works not claiming any part in that sacred action.

DCL.—*To be mercifully minded is praiseworthy.*Sabellii Hist., lib. ix.“Regia (crede mihi) res est succur-tere lapsis.”—OVID.

APPIUS, in the Roman story, was a very great oppressor of the liberties of the commons, and particularly he took away all appeals to the people in case of life and death. Not long after this decree, he, being called in question for forcing the daughter of Virginius, found all the bench of judges against him, and was constrained, for saving his life, to prefer an appeal to the people, which was denied him with great shouts and outcries of all, saying, “Ecce provocat qui provocationem sustulit (He is forced to appeal who, by barring all appeals in case of life and death, was the death of many a man)!” Thus Justice revenged Mercy’s quarrel upon this unmerciful man: and certainly, if we expect mercy at the hands of God or man, we must show mercy; for there shall be judgment without mercy to him that will show no mercy; and that happeneth many times even in this life, when God is pleased to reckon with hard-hearted men, that have no bowels of compassion.

DCLI.—To do as we would be done by.

Matt. vii. xii.

“Quod sibi quis
nolit fieri, non in-ferat ulli.”

Lake, on Matt. xxii.

“Do as you would be done by” is a golden rule. If the judge that sits on the bench, the landlord that deals with his tenant, the tradesman that vendeth his commodities, and every man that dealeth with another, did square his carriage by this rule, there would be much less wrong in society, and much more comfort in men’s consciences; for pulcher liber cor tuum (every man beareth in his own bosom a fair table book), engraven legibly by the finger of nature, wherein, if he would read, he might learn without any other help what usage is fit for his neighbour; and if men were as prompt scholars in learning active charity as they are acute doctors and teachers of the passive of that charity they expect from others, the moralists and casuists might save much of their pains in discoursing and determining our mutual duties.

DCLII.—*Wisdom of the world proves folly.*Lake’s Sermon, at Court.

CRUELTY is forbidden, courage is commanded: we may partake the good of the lion, but not the evil of the lion. It was and is a gross mistake, a very large conceit of Nicholas the Florentine, to think that those properties of the dove, to be without guile, have been the bane of Christendom, whilst the enemies thereof have taken advantage of their simplicity to ensnare them, and of their pity to devour them. It is true, well may imprudent simplicity and cowardly pity disadvantage the prudent; the courageous they never can—nay, sincerity, in the end, overcometh infidelity, and pity triumpheth over cruelty: none ever dealt more plainly than Christ, none was dealt withal more deceitfully; none used more pity, none was used more cruelly. And what was the issue? He proved the wisdom of His enemies plain folly, and their fury turned to His greater glory. And there was never any crafty wit that was not unto himself a snare, nor cruel heart whose hands did not give himself the deadliest wounds in the conclusion.

"Sapientia prima, stultitia caruisse."—
HORAT., l. i, Ep. I.

DCLIII.—Destruction is from ourselves.

JULIAN the apostate gave for his arms, in his escutcheon, an eagle struck through the heart with a flight-shaft, feathered out of her own wing, with this motto, "Propriis configimur alis (Our death flies to us with our own feathers, and our wings pierce us to the very heart)." The eagle struck dead is the Church and commonwealth; the arrow is the swift judgment of God; the feathers shed out of her own wings, which carried the arrow so swift to destruction, are the sins of a Church and commonwealth. A lamentable thing it is to hear of the ruin of any kingdom, but when it comes to perditio tua ex te, that Israel should be Israel's overthrow, that any Church or commonwealth should be felo-de-se, that any particular man should by sin be accessory to his own death, is a thing to be much lamented.

Rhodogin, Var.
Lect.

Featly's Serm.

DCLIV.—The world's opposition no obstacle to a child of God.

ALCIAT hath it in one of his emblems, that a dog barketh most when the moon is at the fullest; whether it be by some special influence that it then worketh in the dog, or whether it be occasioned by the macule, or spots in the moon, represented unto him in the form and shape of another dog, let the dog bark never so much, yet the moon walks her station securely through the heavens. And thus, though tyranny, persecution, afflictions, bark never so much at the just man, yet he doth not stay to take up a stone at every foul-mouthed dog that barks, he makes not a stand in every cross way that he meets with, but rides on through the storm and comes to his journey's end in safety: opposition is no obstacle to him.

Ponsca, ut antea.

"Aspera creant hymis, omique à parte feroces bella gerunt venti," &c.
—OVID., Met. 13.

DCLV.—Unworthy communicants condemned.

It was a smart and piercing speech of St. Ambrose to Theodosius, offering himself to the table of the Lord, "Ila ne adhuc stillantes injustæ cædis cruore manus extends, &c. (What! wilt thou reach forth those hands of thine, yet dropping with the blood of innocents slaughtered at Thessalonica, and with them lay hold upon the most holy body of the Lord? Or wilt thou offer to put that precious blood in thy mouth?" &c.) The like may be said to many coming to the sacrament, that, instead of washing their hands in innocency, they rinse them in the blood of innocents. What! will they reach forth those hands of theirs, defiled with blood, with the blood of oppression, those fingers of theirs, defiled with iniquity, and with those hands and fingers touch those holy mysteries? with those lips of theirs, that have drivelled out such a deal of filthy communication, with those mouths, which have drunk of the cup of devils, with those mouths and lips will they offer to drink the precious blood of Christ? Is it not sin enough that with their sins they have already defiled their hands, fingers, lips, mouths, but that now also they will needs come and defile the Lord's table, and impudently crowd in to the sacrament, when they come piping hot out of their sins and provocations?

Magdeburg, Cent.
iv., cap. 6.

Dyke, ut antea.

"Procul hinc procul este profana."

DCLVI.—Not to be children in understanding.

Ex Cent. ad Hail. et Hispan., Epist. v.

"Pueri puerilia."

"Ludere his in rebus, in quibus serio agendum," &c.—PACHIMERUS, in Hist., lib. iv.

1 Cor. xiv. 20.

A LITTLE child never thinks he shall be a man himself, and maintain himself, and live in the world by his own labour, or by the patrimony which, at years of discretion, shall be due unto him; he cares for nothing but meat and drink, looks after nothing but sport and pastime; come day, go day, God send night, that is all his care. Nomine mutato de nobis fabula. Most of us are even such: we blame the child's folly, and laugh at it as ridiculous, yet we build houses, purchase lands, lay house to house, land to land, and all to raise up a glorious name to posterity, and to make a great show in the world. But for the getting of grace, for the gaining of faith and hope and love and repentance, none of our thoughts are so bestowed. And is not this to be children in understanding?

DCLVII.—A competent estate the best estate.

Sibb's Sermon, 1622.

WHEN a man is to travel into a far country, a great burthen or pack at his back will but hinder him in his journey; one staff in his hand may comfortably support him, but a bundle of staves would be troublesome. Thus a competency of these outward things may happily help us in the way to heaven, whereas abundance may be hurtful, and, like long garments to a man that walks on in the way, will trip up our heels too, if we look not well about us.

DCLVIII.—Not to continue angry.

Cic., Tusculan., I.

WHAT Silenus spake of the life of man, "Optimum non nasci, &c." (The best thing was not to be born, or, being born, to die)," may be fitly applied to all quarrels and contentions amongst brethren, especially Christian brethren. It were the happiest thing in the world that such dissensions never saw light, but if they should arise and come into the world, that they might die as soon as they were born—at the most, that they might but be like those ἡμερό-βια ζῶα, small creatures, Aristotle speaks of, whose life exceeds not a summer's day; not to let the sun go down upon our wrath.

Eph. iv. 26.

DCLIX.—Hearers and not doers of the Word condemned.

Aristaeas, apud Gen.

Willlet, in Levit.

SOME say that the weasel doth aure concipere, ore parere (conceive in the ear and bring forth by the mouth). Sure it is that there are many such wild conceptions amongst us, many that hear tales with their ears and enlarge them with their tongues. And such there are, too, that are zealous to hear the Word preached, but all their practice is only in prating of what they have heard; all their religion is at their tongue's end, which rather should be at the bottom of their hearts.

DCLX.—Rich, poor men.

Aristot., de Animal.

1 Cor. i. 26.

Willlet's Hexapla on Levit.

THE philosopher reckoneth the camel amongst the beasts that are μονοτοκία, which bring forth but one at once; and generally it is observed that, among the creatures, the greater do bring forth the fewest young. And so it is in the spiritual birth: not many mighty, not many noble are called. It is noted that the richest men have fewest children, whereas the poor are most prolific and fertile; and men that are rich and abounding in the wealth of this world are usually most barren in the fruits of the spirit. Greatness and goodness seldom meet together; riches and religion are very rare companions.

DCLXI.—The event of war uncertain.

AMURATH I., emperor of the Turks, after he had got the field against the Christians at Cassova, came to view the dead bodies, which lay on heaps like mountains. On a sudden, one of the Christian soldiers, that lay sore wounded amongst the dead, seeing Amurath, raised himself as well as he could, and in a staggering manner made towards him, falling for want of strength divers times in the way; which, when the captains saw, they would have put him back; but Amurath commanded him to approach, thinking that he would have done him honour and have kissed his feet: but the soldier, being drawn nigh him, suddenly stabbed him in the belly with a short dagger that he had under his coat; and thus the conqueror was conquered, and died presently. Did not the poor wounded Chaldeans, such as were thrust through and through with the sword, gasping for life, rally again to the ruin of their enemies? And thus, when God seeth His time, even a few poor despised men, wounded and half dead, even sinking in despair of better times—at such uncertainty runs that alea maris, that die of war—may recover the battle that was lost, and cry “Victoria!” having spoiled the spoilers, stricken down the chiefest and the strongest and the choicest men that before prevailed and had the upper hand.

Knoles, Hist. of Turks.

Attersoll, en Numb. Jer. xxxvii. 9.

“Et pendebat adhuc belli fortuna.” —OVID, Metam. 8

DCLXII.—No true comfort but in God.

WHEN a man walketh in the sun, if his face be towards it, he hath nothing before him but bright shining light and comfortable heat; but let him once turn his back to the sun, what hath he before him then but a shadow? And what is a shadow but the privation of light and heat of the sun? Yea, it is but to behold his own shadow, defrauding himself of the other. Thus there is no true wisdom, no true happiness, no real comfort, but in beholding the countenance of God. Look from that, and we lose these blessings; and what shall we gain? A shadow, an empty image. Instead of a substantial, to gain an empty image of ourselves, and lose the solid image of God. Yet this is the common folly of the world; men prefer this shadow before that substance, whereas there is not the least appearance of any true comfort but in God only.

Aug., Exposit. in Ps. xxxvi.

“Temporalibus gaudent, qui bona aeterna non verum desiderare.” —Ibid., in Ps. lii.

DCLXIII.—Heart and tongue to go together.

IT is well worth the observation what is written of the peach, namely, that the Egyptians, of all fruits, did make choice of that principally to consecrate to their goddess, and for no other cause but that the fruit thereof, τῇ καρδίᾳ ἔοικεν, is like to one's heart, γλώττῃ δὲ τὸ φύλλον, and the leaf like to one's tongue. What they did like heathens, let us do like Christians; for indeed, when the heart and the tongue go together, then is the harmony at the sweetest and the service best pleasing, both to God and man.

Plut., in Hist. Liba dis et Ostrid.

“Quam bene conveniunt!”

DCLXIV.—All creatures subject to God's pleasure.

GOD is in heaven, He doth whatsoever He will; there is not any in the heaven, or earth, or sea, be it body or spirit, which is not at His devotion and waiteth not at His beck; the greatest do Him homage, the smallest do Him service. What is greater than the heaven? Yet, if Joshua pray unto Him, that ever-wheeling body shall cease his diurnal motion. The sun shall stand still in Gibeon, and the moon in Ajalon. That which cometh forth as a giant, and rejoiceth to run his course, to satisfy Hezekiah, and to confirm his faith, shall fly back as a coward ten degrees at once; as then it appeared by the dial of Ahaz. What is ruder or more unfit to be dealt withal than

Ps. cxv. 3.

Josh. x. 12.

Ps. xix. 5.
2 King. xx. 12.

Hag ii. 7.

Abbot, on Jen. 2b.

Rev. ix. 14.

the earth? Yet, at His pleasure, He shaketh both earth and sea. What is more pure, a more excellent and subtle essence, than the angels? Yet He hath bound up four of them in the river of Euphrates; and although they be prepared, at an hour, and at a day, and at a moment, and at a year, to slay the third part of men, yet these angels cannot stir until they be loosed by His special commandment. Inconceivable is His majesty, inestimable is His power! The highest things and the lowest, the greatest and the weakest, do obey Him.

DCLXV.—The inconsiderate multitude.

Raleigh's Preface to History of the World.Demonology, lib. iiii., cap. 1.

WE see by experience that dogs do always bark at those they know not, and that it is their nature to accompany one another in those clamours. And so it is with the inconsiderate multitude, who, wanting that virtue which we call honesty in all men, and that especial gift of God which we call charity in Christian men, condemn without hearing, and wound without offence given, led thereunto by uncertain report only, which King James truly acknowledgeth for the father of all lies.

DCLXVI.—The great goodness of God in sending His Son Jesus Christ to save sinners.

Esther viii. 7.

Perkins' Exposition on Creed.

“Sic acceptissima semper munera sunt, author quæ gratiosa facit.”—OVID, Ep. xvi. 11.

WICKED Haman procured letters from Ahasuerus for the destruction of the Jews—men, women, and children; all that were in his dominions. This done, Esther, the queen, makes request to the king that her people might be saved and the letters of Haman reversed. She obtains her request; freedom was given, and letters of joyful deliverance were dispatched with speed to all those provinces where the Jews inhabited; whereupon arose a wonderful joy and gladness amongst that people, and it is said that thereupon many of the people of the land became Jews. But now, behold a greater matter amongst us than this. There is that chirographum, that handwriting of condemnation, the law, and therein the sentence of death, of a double death of body and soul, and Satan, as wicked Haman, accuseth us, and seeks by all means to make good his charge against us. But yet behold, not any earthly Esther, but Christ Jesus, the Son of God, is come down from His Father in heaven, and hath taken away this handwriting of condemnation, and cancelled it on the cross, and is now ascended into heaven, and there sits at the right hand of His Father, and makes requests for us, and in Him is His Father well pleased, and yieldeth to His request on our behalf. Let us, then, as the Persians, the people of that country, became Jews, in life and conversation become Christians, turn to Christ, embrace His doctrine, and practise the same unfeignedly.

DCLXVII.—Wantonness in apparel reprov'd.

Babington's Serm. at Court.

“Exterior superfluitas interioris vanitatis indicium est.”—BERN., in Apol.

SURELY, if it be a shame for a man to wear a paper on his hat at Westminster Hall, to show what he hath done, it is then as reproachful to wear vain garments on one's back. As for a man to be like a fantastical antic, and a woman like a Bartholomew baby, what is this but to pull all men's eyes after them, to read in capital letters what they are—vain, foolish, ridiculous. It were to be wished that such back-papers (apparel in excess) might be as odious in the eyes and hearts of men and women as those hat-papers be at Westminster and elsewhere; for certainly the one tells as foul tales as the others do, and, could they but speak, would make the wearers ashamed of their doings and ridiculous behaviours DCLXVIII.—The prevalency of repentant tears.

WEeping hath a voice; and as music upon the water sounds farther and more harmoniously than upon the land, so prayers, joined with tears, cry louder in God's ears, and make sweeter music than when tears are absent. When Antipater had written a large letter against Alexander's mother unto Alexander, the king answered him, "One tear from my mother will wash away all her faults." So it is with God. A penitent tear is an undeniable ambassador, and never returns from the throne of grace unsatisfied.

Ps. vi. 8.

"Lachrymæ pondera vecis habent," — OVID.

Plutarch, in Vita Alexand.

DCLXIX.—The danger of introducing useless ceremonies in the Church.

THEY that are the most zealous for the introducing of useless ceremonies in the Church are usually the most negligent to preach the cautions in using them; and simple people, like children in eating of fish, swallow bones and all, to the danger of choking. Besides, what is observed of horschairs, that lying nine days in water they turn to snakes, so some ceremonies, though dead at first, in continuance of time quicken, get stings, and may do much mischief, especially in such an age wherein the meddling of some have justly awakened the jealousy of all.

Fuller's Serm.

DCLXX.—Momentary pleasure attended by sorrow eternal.

It is written of Lysimachus, that having his city besieged, and himself, together with his whole army, being in great danger of perishing by thirst, in exchange for a cup of cold water he delivered up the keys of his city to his enemy, which cold comfort he had no sooner tasted but his tongue bewrayed the grief of his heart, saying, "Oh that, in lieu of so momentary a pleasure, I should be made of a sovereign a servant, of a king a captive!" It were to be wished that every one would apply this, and meditate with Jerome: "Brevis est voluptas fornicationis, et perpetua pena fornicatoris (What shall the fornicator get, enduring an ocean of torture for a drop of pleasure)?" "Momentaneum est quod delectat, æternum quod cruciat," says another. Sweet meat must have sour sauce. Oh that men, therefore, would forget the beginning, and only behold the end of these delights, and consider, with the apostle, that God is an avenger of such things.

Plutarch, in Reg. et Imp. Apophthegm.

St. Bernardus.

I Cor. vi. 9, 10.

DCLXXI.—Knowledge not to be reserved.

IN a dark lantern there is light indeed, but so shut up as if there were none; and when the side is most open there is light enough to give direction to him that bears it, none to others. He can discern another man by that light which is cast before him, but another cannot discern him. Right such is reserved knowledge. No man is the better for it but the owner. There is no difference betwixt concealed skill and ignorance: and when such hidden knowledge looks forth, it casts so sparing a light as may only argue it to have an unprofitable being; to have ability without will to good; power to censure, none to benefit; so that the suppression of those gifts which God would have us to impart is but as a thief's lantern in a true man's hand, and therefore they are to be communicated.

Hall's Centenal Meditations.

"Scire tuum nihil est, nisi te scire hoc sciat alter."

DCLXXII.—Not to admire our own learning or parts.

WHEN Orpheus went to fetch his wife Eurydice out of hell, he had her granted unto him upon condition that he should not turn back his eyes to look upon her till he brought her Ovid, Metam., lib. 10.

"Flexit amans oculos," &c.

Player's Sermon.

"L'homme et la nature," &c.

into heaven; yet, having brought her forward a great way, at length his love was so excessive that he could not contain any longer: whereupon he lost both her sight and herself, she suddenly vanishing out of his sight. This is a poetical fiction, yet the moral is good. If we have any virtue, any parts of learning, or outward endowments whatsoever, be they never so eminent or admired by others, yet we must not be so blind in affection as to dote too much upon them, or to fall in admiration of ourselves for them, or to be always gazing and wondering at them, lest, by too much looking on them, or too much liking of them, or too much remembering them, we lose them; because, indeed, it may so fall out that he that remembers his virtue may have no virtue to remember.

DCLXXIII.—Consideration to be had in all undertakings.

Prov. iv. 26.

terminus, Expositio, in Proverbia.

Oppian., *de Natura
Piscium*, lib. xxi.

Bernard., super Mi- rus est, Homil. x. ii.

"Ponder the path of thy feet" was good counsel from a wise man. And it was an emblem wherewith Titus Vespasianus was much affected, to see a dolphin wreathed and fastened about an anchor, whereby he signified the staidness of his thoughts before he did anything; and when he had well considered, then the diligence of his care in the execution of it. The dolphin swims with as much speed in the sea as a bird flies in the air; and it is the anchor which stays the ship from being tossed and carried away with the winds. This may teach us that consideration must stay our feet before we go about anything; to look before we leap: "Prudentis est animi, prius cernere," &c. It is the part of a wise man not to decree to do anything before he hath descried and discovered what is to be done.

DCLXXIV.—England's distractions.

Josh. Shute.

Hardy's Sermon,
Weston, 1647.

It was once said by a reverend divine, now with God, that England was a little place, but had a great deal of Rome in it; but it may now be said that England is a narrow place, but hath a world of confusion in it. The well-compacted hedge of our laws is broken down: so true is that maxim, Inter arma silent leges (The voice of law cannot be heard for the noise of drums). The well-wrought vestment of our religion is rent, with Jeroboam's garment, into twelve, nay, into a hundred pieces, by schismatical sectaries. Women are not more sick for new fashions than both men and women are for new opinions.

DCLXXV.—The hypocrite described.

Plutarch.

Wall's Sermon,
Oxon., 1624.

THE army of Philopæmon, a great commander amongst the Grecians, is likened unto a man that hath legs and feet and no belly, because they wanted money, the sinews of war. And it is more than probable that in the Church militant there be divers that have legs and feet, but no belly. They have the legs and the feet of outward conversation, but they want the heart and the belly of inward devotion. "Non vilæ, sed famæ negotiatores," as Tertullian makes the character (such as negotiate and trade more for a good name than a good life); for a good report than a good conscience: like fiddlers, that are more careful in tuning their instruments than composing their lives; making a show of godliness, but denying the power thereof.

DCLXXVI.—God hath a peculiar blessing for His children.

Gen. xiv. 2.

ALL the sons of Jacob returned laden from Egypt with corn and money in their sacks; only Benjamin had the cup in the mouth of his sack, as a singular pledge of his brother Joseph's favour. Thus, many there are in the world that rejoice for the corn and the wine and the oil that have increased in the quickness of their trade, in the largeness of their incomes, in the greatness of their revenues. Oh! but the light of God's countenance, Benjamin's cup, whether it be scyathum gratia (a cup of grace), with St. Ambrose, or calicem benedictionis (a cup of blessing), with the apostle, this silver cup, this grace cup, is the portion of none but Benjamin; it is reserved only for Benjamin, for the sons of God, and the children of His right hand, that grow and flourish under the wing and shadow of His protection.

Arnold, Pontani, Bibliotheca Concion.

DCLXXVII.—To be active in the service of God.

JOSEPH's brethren stood so long dallying and delaying and trifling out the time, that, having a journey to buy corn, they might have returned twice before they went once. Elisha, when Elijah called him, went about the bush, and must needs go and bid his father and mother farewell before he could follow the prophet. But let every good Christian, when he is called of God to profess His religion, not stand "Shall I? shall I?" temporizing, and circling and consulting with flesh and blood, and fetching a compass about, but be always pressed, and ready to act, and do the will of God; not only to be bound, but, if he be thereunto called, to die for the Lord Jesus.

Gen. xliii. 10.

Hect. Pintus, in Dan.
1 King xix. 20.

Acts xxi. 13.

DCLXXVIII.—Sin attendant on the best of religious performances.

THERE goes a tradition of Ovid, that famous poet, which receives some countenance from his own confession, that when his father was about to beat him for following the pleasant, but unprofitable study of poetry, he, under correction, promised his father never more to make a verse, and made a verse in his very promise; probably the same, but certainly more elegant for composition than this verse, which common credulity hath taken up—

De Trist., lib. ii.

"Parce precor, genitor, posthac non versificabo."

"Father, on me pity take, Verses I no more will make."

Thus, when we so solemnly promise our heavenly Father to sin no more, we sin in our very promise; our weak prayers, made to procure our pardon, increase our guiltiness. We say our prayers, as the Jews did eat the Passover, all in haste. And whereas, in bodily action, motion is the cause of heat, clean contrary, the more speed we make in our prayers the colder we are in our devotion; so that sin is a close attendant on the best of our religious performances.

Fuller's Medit.

Exod. xii. 11.

DCLXXIX.—Not so much to eye the creature as the Creator in all occurrences.

XERXES, the Persian monarch, having received a loss by the rage of Hellespontus himself, more mad than the sea, caused fetters and manacles to be cast into the waters thereof, as if he would make it his prisoner, and bind it with links of iron at his pleasure. Darius did the like upon the river Gyndes, who, because it had drowned him a white horse, threatened the river to divide it into so many streams, and so to weaken the strength of it, that a woman great with child should go over it dry shod. And there were people in Africa that went out to fight with the north wind, because it drove heaps of sand upon their fields and habitations. Such is the madness of our days. If we be crossed with wet or dry, wind or rain, fair or foul weather, we fall a-cursing and banning, repining and murmuring at the creatures, like a dog that biteth the stone, and never looketh after the hand that threw it. We cast our eye, not upon the agent, God, but upon the instruments, His creatures, which cannot do us the least harm till they have a commission from Him so to do.

Herodotus, lib. vii.

Seneca, de Ira.

King's Lecture on Jonah.

DCLXXX.—To have particular safety in the midst of general dangers is impossible.

Paul de Francis,
Orat.

"Paries cum proximus ardet,"
&c.

THE best man in the voyage cannot be safe in the cabin under hatches when the whole ship is ready to be drowned under water; nor can the spider be secure in his web when the whole window is pulled down; nor the young bird be out of danger in the nest when the whole arm of the tree is torn off. Thus, all private men's interests are ventured in the bottom of the commonwealth, and all commonwealths in the great vessel of the earth, which was once swallowed up with a deluge of water, and shall be, ere it be long, with a conflagration of fire. What folly, then, or rather madness, is it for any private man to look for safety in the midst of a public danger; to dream of perpetuities and certainties and indefeasible estates for his own particular use, when the whole is in danger of a sudden destruction!

DCLXXXI.—Temperance cannot preserve a man's life when God calls for it.

Sibbe's Sermon,
Lond., 1619.

A VESSEL of wine or beer, kept for a man's own use or for his special friend, may hold out a long time, being moderately drank off; but if there come in such customers as are strong to drink strong drink, that may be spent in a day which would have lasted a month. So the life of man, which otherwise, with temperance and care, might have lasted and spun out to a full length of years, and that, with moderate diet, might have reached to a full period, if God do but let in great drinkers, as agues, burning fevers, plague, &c., it will be spent and gone on a sudden.

DCLXXXII.—The sinner's care is more for his body than for his soul.

Gerhard's Meditat.

"O curas hominum,
O quantum
est in rebuijane!"
—PERS., Sat. I.

It is said that swine, especially the wild boar, are of that strange quickness of scent, that if the huntsman mean to shoot at him he must take the wind of him, or else he will wind him out and be gone; now, on the contrary, they are not so sensible of the ill savour of a dunghill, nor the stench of mud and mire, but rather take delight to lie wallowing therein, esteeming it as a great recreation and refreshing unto them: This is the figure of a filthy, foul sinner, who will fly a thousand miles from the perils and dangers of his body: so that he may sleep in a whole skin, he cares for no more, but, in the meantime, takes delight and pleasure in those muckhills and dirty puddles which defile his soul.

DCLXXXIII.—Worldly thoughts to be set aside before receiving the sacrament.

Gen. xxii. 4, 5.

Dyke's Worthy Communicant.

ABRAHAM, when he went to sacrifice his son on Mount Moriah, seeing the place afar off, said unto the young men that were with him, "Abide you here with the ass, and I and the lad will go yonder and worship." He saw and knew well enough that if they had gone along with him they would have distracted him, troubled him, and hindered him in the sacrifice: they would have cried out and have made such a noise, and have hung like so many weights upon his arms, that with no freedom or quietness he could have performed the sacrifice; and therefore, when he saw the place afar off, he prepared himself and bade them stay behind. The like should our care be, when we see the time afar off that we should receive the sacrament, especially when we see the time draw near and at hand, the very evening before; we then should set aside all our thoughts and business, all worldly cares and employments, and bid them wholly stand aside, and not only not suffer them to go to the mount with us, or to go into our closets and secret chambers with us, but shut them out of doors, make them dance attendance there, that we may perform the duty with more comfort and freedom.

DCLXXXIV.—God's care of His children, notwithstanding their several aberrations.

TREES, if the roots run too deep into the earth, they must be cut shorter ; if the branches spread too far, they must be lopped ; and if the canker or caterpillar once infect and cleave to them, then they must be blazed and smoked. Thus the children of God, when they be too much rooted by their affections in the things of this world, and, with the great and large boughs of their ability, wrong and impoverish their poor neighbour, or let their coin, like the canker, eat into their souls, God will give them many a cutting, lopping, and smoking ; and as they cannot but naturally do the one, so God, intending to heal them spiritually, will do the other ; His care will be still for them, notwithstanding their several failings.

Hobbes's Serm., 1627.

DCLXXXV.—The wicked worker hateth the light.

THE quail rageth at the rising of the sun ; and Pliny saith of the Atlantes, a people in Ethiopia, that they curse the sun, both at his rising and setting, with a thousand curses, because it parcheth their ground and burns up their grass ; and those that fish for whales curse the day ; and he that is asleep is offended when the light awakeneth him. Qui malè agit, odit lucem. Thus many are offended that the glorious light of Jesus Christ should discover their sins ; many shut their eyes and will not see. It is one of the saddest things in the world, and much to be deplored, that, light being come into the world, men love darkness better than light ; but there is reason for it, though not a good one—because their deeds are evil.

Lib. vi. cap. 8.

Aldrovand., Ornitholog., lib. III.

Ponsæ's Serm., Quadragesimæ.

DCLXXXVI.—The word brother, how far extended.

As the circles made by a stone cast into the water not only multiply, but much enlarge themselves—the first is a narrow circle about the stone, the next fetcheth a bigger compass, the third a greater and more capacious than that, the fourth so large that it toucheth the banks of the river : in like manner the first brethren mentioned in Scripture are confined to one house and bed, one womb, as Jacob and Esau were natural brethren ; the second extendeth itself to all of one family or lineage, thus Christ and James were brethren and kinsmen ; the third to the whole nation or country, thus Peter and the Jews were brethren and countrymen ; the fourth and last, to all the utmost bounds of the earth, whether spiritually, as all Christians, or carnally, as all men.

Featly's Clavis Mystica.

DCLXXXVII.—Salvation is the Lord's.

PLUTARCH writeth that the Amphyctions in Greece, a famous council of twelve sundry people, wrote upon the temple of Apollo Pythius, instead of the liads of Homer, or songs of Pindarus (large and tiring discourses), short sentences and memoratives, as, " Know thyself," " Use moderation," " Beware of suretyship," and the like. Thus, doubtless, though every creature in the world whereof we have use be a treatise and narration unto us of the goodness of our God, and we might weary our flesh and spend our days in writing books of the inexplicable subject, yet that one short, independent apophthegm of Jonah comprehendeth all the rest, "Salvation is the Lord's." Not king nor parliament, not army or any assistance abroad nor any help at home whatsoever, nor any of these, nor all of these together, can put an end to our unnatural divisions. "Salvation is the Lord's."

In Lib. Moral.

King's Leet, in March.

DCLXXXVIII.—One sin never goes alone.Hardy's Serm. at 18's 179.

1 Kings xii.

"Nolite contemnere venialia, quia minima sunt, sed timeo quia plura."
—AUG., de Chordis. 10.

JEROBOAM, being at the head of ten rebellious tribes, thinks it not safe that they should go up to Jerusalem to worship; his suspicious heart, no doubt, told him that religion is a friend to loyalty; and if they continued still to worship the true God, they would ere long have embraced their right king. What then? Rebellion against the king must be attended with defection from God. His politic brain finds out two nearer and, as he pretends, fitter places within their own territories, Dan and Bethel; there he sets up golden calves for them, makes wooden priests, and invites the people to worship them. Thus, one sin ushers in another; one lesser draws on a greater. Cain's anger is seconded with murder, Ahab's covetousness attended with cruelty, Peter's denial backed with an oath, and Jero-boam's rebellion with idolatry.

DCLXXXIX.—*The great power of envy.*Pontan., Biblilist.
Cantic.

"Fuge invidiam, quæ non solum alienos, verum multò magis eum, quem possederit," &c.—AMBROS., de Fuga Seculi.

Prov. xxvii. 4.

As an earthquake ariseth from a tumultuous vapour shut up in the caverns and bowels of the earth, where it tosseth and tumbleth until it break out and overturn all that standeth in the way of it: so envy is a pestilent vapour which lieth in the heart of a man, where it boileth and fretteth until it find occasion to vent itself, and then it tumbleth and throweth down all that standeth in the malicious eye of it. Houses and trees stand firm against a tempest of lightning or a flood of rain, and men stand out against the cruelty of sudden wrath and rage of a man's lasting anger, but what house or tree standeth against the force of an earthquake; and who is able to stand before the force of envy?

DCXC.—*Listening after vanity reprov'd.*Jermin, on Proverbs.Diog. Laert., in Vita.

THERE is a story of Demosthenes, who, speaking to the Athenians in a very serious matter, and finding them not to regard his words, interrupted himself, and told them that he had some special thing to relate, to which he would have them fain to attend; whereupon, silence being made, that which he told them was this: "Two men," saith he, "having bargained for the hire of an ass, were travelling from Athens to Megara in a very hot day, and both striving to enjoy the shadow of the ass, the one said that he hired the ass and the shadow too; the other said that he did but hire the ass and not the shadow;"—thus leaving them at strife, Demosthenes went away; but the Athenians calling him with great eagerness to come back and to end the tale, upon his return that which he said was this: "O ye Athenians, will ye attend unto me speaking of a shadow and an ass, and will ye not attend unto me speaking of most important things and affairs?" Now, how justly may this be the reproof of many in our days?—such as tithe mint, anise, and cummin, and let pass the more substantial points of the law; such as have an ear for vanity, but not for truth; that attend to things of folly, but not to the words of wisdom. Hence it is that wisdom cries out in the streets and few regard it, but if folly once appear there will be many auditors.

DCXCI.—Knowledge and practice must go together.

John iv. 7.

Gen. xxx. 15.

Playfer's Serm.

THE Samaritan woman did not fill her pitcher at the well to spill it by the way, but to carry it home full of water, and there to use it as an occasion served; and Rachel, that holy woman, did not desire the mandrakes so much to hold in her hand, or to smell at, as to be made apt thereby to bring forth the fruit of her womb. And we must not come to the Well-spring of life, and, when we have filled our pitchers, spill all presently on the ground; nor we must not so much labour to know the Word, that we may subtly dispute or discourse of it, as to practise it, that we may show the fruit of it in the amendment of our lives and conversations.

DCXCII.—Dullness and drowsiness in the service of God reproved.

It is reported of Constantine the Great, that when divine service was read, he would help the minister to begin the prayer and to read the verses of the Psalms interchangeably; and when there was a sermon, if any place of special importance were alleged, that he would turn to his Bible, to imprint the place the better in his mind, both by hearing and seeing it; and being as it were ravished with those things which he heard, he would start up suddenly out of his throne and chair of state, and would stand a long while to hear more diligently, and though they which were next him did put him in mind to remember himself, yet he heard the Word so attentively, that he would not give any ear at all unto them. How wonderfully should this confound us, that are every way inferior, when we hear that emperors and mighty kings showed such a good heart in hearing of the Word of God, and were so cheerful in the service of God, and we, in the meantime, to have such lumpish and dull spirits as to be never a whit moved or affected with the same; that though Christ talk with us never so comfortably in the way, yet our hearts are not so much as warmed within us; though He putteth His hand to the hole of the door, yet we will not lift up the latch to let Him in; and though our Well-beloved speak, yet we will not hearken unto Him.

Eusebius, de Vita Constant., lib. iii., cap. 17.

Playfer's Serm., on Luke xxiv.

Cant. v. 4

DCXCIII.—A good man bettered by afflictions.

SPRING water smoketh when all other waters of the river and the channel are frozen up; that water is living whilst they are dead. All experience teacheth us that well waters, arising from deep springs, are hotter in winter than in summer; the outward cold doth keep in and double their inward heat. Such is a true Christian in the evil day: his life of grace gets more vigour by opposition; he had not been so gracious if the times had been better; I will not say, "He may thank his enemies," but I must say, "He may thank God for his enemies."

Shute's Serm., Lond., 1628.

DCXCIV.—Christ compared to an eagle.

CHRIST is not unfitly compared to an eagle, in three respects—first, because as the eagle fluttereth over her young ones, and safeguards them from any that would annoy them, so Christ doth so carefully protect His Church, that the gates of hell nor the deepest counsels of her enemies shall not prevail against her; secondly, as the eagle stirs up her nest and taketh up her young ones, enforcing them to look towards the sun, thereby trying her generous and degenerating brood, even so doth Christ make trial of true and counterfeit Christians: He rejects them as counterfeits that have but owl's eyes, such as hate the light; but those who can look upon the Sun of righteousness, and delight in beholding of Him, they go for true Christians; thirdly, the eagle hateth the serpent, and wheresoever he seeth him rendeth him with his beak: and Christ, the seed of the woman, did break the serpent's head.

Ambros., in Lib. de Salomone.

Matt. xvi. 18.

Lake's Serm., on Matt. xxii.

Gen. iii. 15.

DCXCV.—The hypocrite's discovery of himself.

THERE is a sort of men that call themselves Christians, profess that they know God, and that their hope is in heaven, but no sooner doth any vanity come in the way, any temporal commodity present itself, but their hearts quickly betray where their treasure is: just like the juggler's ape of Alexandria, which, being attired like a reasonable creature, and dancing curiously to his master's instrument, deceived all the spectators, until one, spying the fraud, threw a handful of dates upon the stage, which the ape no sooner espied, but he tore Lake's Serm., at Court.

"Simia simia est, etiamsi avaro gestet insignia."—ÆÆASM., in Adag.

off his vizard, and fell to his victuals, to the scorn of his master; which gave an occasion to the proverb, "An ape is an ape, though he be clad never so gaily." And most sure it is, that a hypocrite will at last show himself a hypocrite, for all his specious show and goodly pretences.

DCXCVI.—The Church's condition under the two Testaments.

Gal. iv. ST. PAUL resembleth the different conditions of the Church under the two Testaments to the different conditions of a child, when he is in his nonage, though he be heir, and when he is come to his full age. While he is in his nonage, though he be heir, yet he is kept in awe and under a pedagogue; but when he cometh to full age, his father affords him a more cheerful countenance and a more liberal maintenance. Even so, under the law, the Church was kept under and scantied of grace; but under the Gospel she is more free, and endued with a more plentiful measure of God's Holy Spirit.

DCXCVII.—The kingdom of heaven an everlasting kingdom.

Bodin, de Repub. MORTAL kingdoms are not lasting; and, while they last, they continue not uniform. They have their climacterical years, and commonly determine within certain periods. The politicians write of it—Bodin, by name, and he out of others—and the stories are clear, and experience daily sheweth it to be so. Justin hath calculated the three first monarchs, but Sleidan all four; and we see their beginning and ending: and, as they are not lasting, so, while they last, they continue not uniform. The planters of great states are commonly heroical men; but the proverb is "Heroum filii noxæ." The parents were never so beneficial as the children are mischievous, oppressing by tyranny or wasting by vanity; worldly peace breedeth plenty, plenty breeds pride, and pride breeds war, where-with cometh ruin. This being the condition of mortal kingdoms, how blessed is that kingdom of heaven which shall have no end! The words are short, but they are full; the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. This is typified in David and Saul: the kingdom of the one was temporal, of the other eternal. The angel repeats the same promise; the Psalms do often urge it; so do the prophets, Isaiah especially: they all concur in this, that it shall have no end.

* Magna imperia limites suos habent, quo cum venerunt, sistunt, retroeunt, ruunt. — Ex Gent. 8, ad Belg., Ep. 31.

Sam. vii.

Luke i. 33.
Ps. xlv., lxxii., and lxxxix.
Isa. ix. 7.

DCXCVIII.—God's laws obeyed are the support of a commonwealth.

Bodin, de Repub., ut antea. IT fareth with the body politic as it doth with the body natural: if the humours keep their proportion, we have health; no sooner do they swerve from it, but they begin a disease, which maketh way to putrefaction, and so to dissolution; wherefore we apply physic to reduce them again into a due temper. Even so, while good laws sway our carriage towards ourselves, towards our neighbours, each man doth well, the commonwealth doth prosper; but no sooner doth the subject break these bonds, but a civil putrefaction enters, which maketh way to the ruin of a state, wherein every man's particular interest is hazarded with the whole, the remedy whereof is the work of judgment; but it must be attended with justice also. Not the king's affections, but his laws, must moderate his judgment, and the medicine must be fitted to the disease; otherwise, if the scales of justice do not first weigh the merits of the cause, the judgment will as much disquiet the state as discontent the party judged.

"Leges perquam egregie res sunt," &c. — MENAND., in Alidragma.

DCXCIX.—All have not the same measure of Christ.

Lake, on Mary's xxxi. CHRIST hath the fullness of grace, we, but every one his proportion, according to our capacities: even as, from the sun, every man receives a beam of the same kind, though not the same beam; or, from a tree, every man gathereth an apple, though not the same apple; or, out of a river, every man drinketh a draught of the same water, but not the same draught of water: even so all do partake of the same Christ, but not in the same measure; and no man whole Christ—by whole I mean totum Christi—though every man doth receive him whole—that is, totum Christum. Every man hath Christ alike intensivè, though extensivè all have him not alike; and yet extensivè, too, every man hath his full measure. As it was in manna, he that gathered more had not too much, and he that gathered less had enough. Exod. xvi. 18.

DCC. — Ministers to teach as well the practice as the knowledge of religion.

A DISCREET schoolmaster doth not only teach his scholars grammar rules, whereby, for example, true Latin may be made; but he teacheth them also to make true Latin, according to those rules: neither doth he think his pains bestowed to any purpose till his scholars can do that. Even so a discreet minister must teach his people not only how to know, but how to do, their duty; to turn their science into conscience; so to learn Christ as to become Christians—Christians in St. Paul's sense. For certainly he is a very truant in Christ's school whose life doth not express his learning, that is not a doer as well as a hearer of the Word. Preston's Serm.
Gal. v. 1.
1 Cor. iii. 2.

DCCI.—Justice described.

TRAVELLERS write (Nath. Chytreus by name) that, in Padua, Justice is described in a public place, between a pair of scales and a sword (according to the old manner), with these two verses proceeding from her mouth:— "Ponderat hæc causas, percutit ille res,"

"Reddo cuique suum, sanctis et legibus omne Concilio mortale genus, ne crimine vivat."

The verses are but clouter-like (unworthy such an university as Padua is renowned to be), but the sense is good, and, for the shortness of them, they may be the better remembered. "I give," saith Justice, "to every man his own; I procure and win all men to be subject unto godly laws, lest otherwise they should prove criminal, that is, grievous transgressors." Were it otherwise, servants would be on horseback and masters, even princes, on foot. Like people, like priest; like buyer, like seller; like borrower, like lender (as Isaiah again saith). Nay then, no buyer, no seller, or borrower, or lender; but all upon snatching and catching, and rifling and plundering, and rapine, and wrong, and blood touching blood. Isa. xxiv. 2.
Eccles. x. 7.

DCCII.—The minister's labour though unsuccessful, yet rewarded by God.

THE minister's labour, whether it hit or miss, is accepted of the Lord. For, as he who persuadeth to evil, be it heresy or treason, is punished accordingly, although he do not prevail, but because he intended it, because he did labour for it: so he that doth his best to win men to heaven, though he effecteth not what he desired, though he hath laboured in vain, and spent his strength in vain, yet he shall be accepted, and his reward shall be with his God. August., In Lib. 1, contra Cresconium Abbott's Lect. on Jonah.

DCCIII.—The happy meeting of body and soul in the resurrection.

WHEN we pluck down a house, with intent to new build it or repair the ruins of it, we warn the inhabitants out of it, lest they should be soiled with the dust and rubbish, or offended with the noise, and so, for a time, provide some other place for them; but when we Chrysost., In 2. ad Corinth., Heb. 1.

⁴⁴ Recurgent sanctorum copora sine ullo vitio," &c.—AUG., Enchirid.

have new trimmed and dressed up the house, then we bring them back to a better habitation. Thus God, when He overturneth this rotten room of our flesh, calleth out the soul for a little time and lodgeth it with Himself in some corner of His kingdom, but repaireth the bracks of our bodies against the resurrection, and then, having made them decent, yea, glorious and incorruptible, He doth put our souls back again into their acquainted mansions.

DCCIV.—The pope's policy to advance his holiness.

Maximus Tyrius.

ONE Psapho, dwelling in the parts of Lybia, desirous to be canonized a god, took a sort of prating birds and secretly taught them to sing this one note, "Psapho is a great god!" and, having their lesson perfectly, let them fly into the woods and hills adjoining, where, continuing their song, other birds, by imitation, learned the same, till all the hedgerows rang with nothing but Psapho's deity. The country people hearing the birds, but ignorant of this fraud, thought Psapho to be a god indeed, and began to worship him. The same is the pope's practice. Desirous to effect his ambition and show himself to be a god, he maintains a sort of discontented English fugitives in his seminaries, as it were in so many cages, where, feeding them for the nonce, he easily teaches them what tune he pleaseth, and having so done, takes off their bells and sends them home again, where, filling every hedge and out-house with their tunes, no marvel if other birds of the same feather and as wise as themselves, by conversing with them, do the like.

White's Sermon,
Lond., 1610.

DCCV.—The power of faith reviving the deadly sin-sick soul.

2 Kings xiii. 21.

Perkins, on Creed.

WHEN the Israelites were burying a man, for fear of the soldiers of the Moabites, they cast him for haste into the sepulchre of Elisha; now the dead man, as soon as he was down and had touched the body of the prophet, he recovered and stood upon his feet. So let a man that is dead in sin be cast into the grave of Christ—that is, let him by faith but touch Christ dead and buried—it will so come to pass that he shall be raised from death and bondage of sin, to become a new man.

DCCVI.—To sin against the mercies of God is to double our sins.

Calamy's Sermon, at
Westm., 1645.

HE that sins against the mercies of God fights against God with his own weapons, which must needs provoke God. Suppose a man should come into a smith's shop and take up the smith's own hammer and knock him on the head, this were to commit a double sin; not only to kill the smith, but to kill him with his own hammer. Such a double sin are they guilty of who, the more wit they have, the more they plot against God, and the more wealth and health and honour they have, the more they despise God and His commandments with their wealth and honour. If a chirurgeon should freely bestow his pains and charge to cure a man of a lame hand and he should, as soon as ever he were cured, kill this chirurgeon with his cured hand, this were a horrible ingratitude and provoking sin; and thus do they that, when they are delivered from sickness and made whole, released out of prison and set at liberty, fall presently to sinning again with that health and that liberty which God bestowed on them.

⁴⁵ Quam cito mortuos beneficium perit, et amicum deprehenditur."—SOPHOCLES, in Ajace Flagit.

DCCVII.—A true sense of wanting grace is an argument of having grace.

Catker's Joy of the Just.

A YOUNG scholar when he hath gotten his selon or his ramus once by heart thinketh he hath as much logic as his tutor can teach him; but when he cometh to understand things, he seeth his own error; and so the raw students at Athens, when they were but yet freshmen, they thought that they moved in a circle of knowledge: they would be called sophoi (wise men); but having spent some time at their books they found themselves at a loss, and thought it a great honour to be called philosophi (lovers of wisdom); and, last of all, having made some good progress through the arts and sciences, they accounted themselves moroi (mere ignoramuses, that understood nothing at all)—the more knowledge they had, the more they discovered their own weakness and ignorance. So the more men believe, the more they come to see and feel their unbelief; the further they wade on in the study and practice of repentance, the more they find out and discover their own impenitency and complain of the hardness and untowardness of their own hearts; the more they labour and make progress in sound sanctification, the more they come to apprehend and see their own corruption. And this very sense of wanting grace is an argument of grace: it is a sure sign of grace to see no grace and to see it with grief; for Christ saith, "Blessed are the poor, as well as pure in spirit; the one shall see God, the other hath a present right to the kingdom of heaven," which is the same in effect.

Plutarch, de Perfectione.

Matt. v. 3, 8.

DCCVIII.—Not to rest in outward performances of duty, because dangerous.

REMIGIUS, a judge of Lorraine, tells this story, that the devil in those parts did use to give money to witches, which did appear to be good coin, seemed to be current at first, but, being laid up a while, it then appeared to be nothing but dry leaves. So the devil deceives men now, in these days of so large professions: he makes them do outward actions which have a fair show, but when they need them, then they appear as they are, nothing but dry leaves, mere dead leaves, because there is no life in them. They hear, they pray, they read, they sing psalms, but they turn not to the man's spiritual nourishment; there is not a principle of spiritual life in them.

Preston's Treatises, iv.

Augustine, in P. lxx.

DCCIX.—The great return of a faithful prayer.

AMONGST the sons of men, a courtier, a favourite in the court, gets more by one suit, it may be, than a tradesman, or merchant, or husbandman, gets with twenty years' labour, though he takes much pains, rising up early, going to bed late, and eating the bread of carefulness; for one request may bring in more profit, may make a courtier richer, than so many years' labour and pains. So, in like case, a faithful prayer put up to God may more prevail with Him, we may obtain more at His hands by it, than by many years' labour or using much means in another way.

Preston, on Sacrament.

"Oratio pura, caelos penetrans vacua non redibit."
—AUG., in Serm.

DCCX.—Moderation little set by.

MEN of extraordinary tallness, though otherwise little deserving, are made porters to lords, and those of unusual littleness are made ladies' dwarfs, whilst men of moderate stature may want masters: thus many, notorious for extremities, may find favourers to prefer them, whilst moderate men, in the middle course, may want any to advance them. But what saith the apostle, "If in this life only we had hope, we are of all men the most miserable."

Fulci's Holy State.

1 Cor. xv. 19.

DCCXI.—The powerful effect of God's Word painfully preached.

EUTYCHUS, in the Acts, is an emblem of a Christian in temptation: he fell from a high loft and was taken up dead, and so reputed of all that were then present; but Paul laid

Acts xx. 9, 10.

Du Moulins, de
l'Amour de Dieu.

himself upon him and embraced him, and found life in him, and set him on his legs again. So, though a man fall high from heavenly grace to the very pit of hell (if it were possible), yet he may be raised again by some skilful Paul, some painful (careful) preacher, applying the comforts of the Gospel, and showing that his life is not altogether extinguished, but hid only with God in Christ Jesus.

DCCXII.—Anabaptistical zeal condemned.

Nat. Hist., lib. viii.,
cap. 5.

Procopius, de Bello
Gothorum, lib. ii.

Boys Postill.

THERE is a story in Pliny how two goats, meeting on a bridge, non viam, sed viam fecere (they did not make away each other, but made way one for the other), as Mutianus, an eye-witness, tells the tale. The one, lying down on his belly, suffered the other to pass over his back, and so both escaped the danger of the ditch. And, in the time of the Gothish wars, it may be read that a Roman soldier and a barbarian, casually falling into the same pit, as they marched along the country, were so far from contending with each other, as that they both agreed mutually to relieve each other; and so, necessity making them friends, they were both drawn out of the pit and delivered. It were to be wished that the separating Anabaptist in this case had so much wit as the goat, or else so much good will as the Goth; they would not then hold dissoluteness a resoluteness, the breaking of ecclesiastical orders a point of devotion. If their zeal were but half so good to the Gospel as Mary's was to the law at the time of her purification, they would rather wring themselves in the particular than wrong the Church in the general.

DCCXIII.—Grace in the heart may be a long time concealed.

Hall's Occas. Meditation.

Look upon a coal covered with ashes; there is nothing appearing in the heap but only dead ashes; there is neither light, nor smoke, nor heat; and yet, when those embers are stirred to the bottom, there are found some living gleams which do contain fire, and are apt to propagate it. Many a Christian breast is like this hearth, no life of grace appearing there for the time, either to his own sense or the apprehension of others. Whilst the season of temptation lasteth, all seems cold and dead; yet still, at the worst, there is a secret coal from the altar of heaven raked up in their bosom, which, upon the gracious motions of the Almighty, doth both bewray some remainders of that divine fire and is easily raised to a perfect flame. Let no man, therefore, deject himself or censure others for the utter extinction of that spirit, which doth but hide itself in the soul for a glorious advantage.

DCCXIV.—How to prevent wavering mindedness.

Ambros., de Virginitate.

Playfer, ut antea.

Acts ix. 13.

It is observable that the bee, being to fly home to her hive, and fearing lest she should be taken by the way with the wind, and so might be tossed up and down in the air, counterpoiseth herself with a little stone, and so flies straight home. This may teach us what we ought to do. We must not be wavering, and carried about with the blast of every doctrine, like a reed shaken in the wind; but, as the bee is balanced with a little stone, so we must be built upon the chief corner stone, and grounded upon a rock, and established with grace, that however the rain fall, or the floods arise, or the winds blow, or what times soever come, yet we may stand fast in the street which is called Straight, always following Christ directly to the mark.

DCCXV.—Parents' care only to enrich their children reproved.

Aristot. de Animal.,
lib. iv., cap. 14.
Job, xxxix. 14.

OF the ostrich it is said that she leaveth her eggs in the earth, and warmeth them in the dust; it is the benefit of the earth only that she gives unto them. And such surely is the only care, worthily to be reprov'd, which too many parents have of their children. It is only concerning the things of the earth, that they may be rich and noble and great men in this present world : as for heavenly things, the eternal good of their souls, they are not so much as once thought of.

DCCXVI.—The folly and danger of self-conceitedness.

THERE were some amongst the philosophers of old qui jactabant solæcismos suos esse laudes et gemmas philosophice (who accounted their rude barbarisms as ornaments of philosophy). Such are all self-conceited men, our new opinionists, who present their vain fancies as the exquisite patterns of God's mind. How are the pulpits made stages for every man to act his humour in ! and the printing presses market-places for men to vent their false wares and counterfeit doctrines ! They pretend fair to build the Lord's house, but it is Babel, not Bethel, if one may guess by the division of their languages ; and whilst they pretend to depart from a mystical Babylon they run into a literal one, that of confusion.

Hardy's Serm.,
Westm., 1647.

DCCXVII.—Hope well and have well.

THE mariners sailing with St. Paul bore up bravely against the tempest whilst either art or industry could befriend them ; finding both to fail, and that they could not any longer bear up to the wind, they even let the ship drive. Thus many have endeavoured, in these distempered times, to hold up their spirits and to steer them steadily. Happy peace was the port whereat they desired to arrive ; but now, since the storm grew too sturdy for the pilot, all the skill they will hereafter use is no skill at all : and even let the ship sail whither the wind will send it, but with this hope and comfort, that the most weather-beaten vessel cannot properly be seized upon for a wreck which hath any quick cattle remaining therein, and their spirits are not as yet forfeited to despair, having one lively spark of hope in their hearts, because God is even where He was before.

Goddard's Serm.,
Lond., 1642.
Acts xxvii.

"Magna tamen spes est in boni-
tate Dei."—OVID.

DCCXVIII.—Bloody-minded men condemned.

WHEN Vedelius Pollio, a Roman, at a supper provided for Augustus, the emperor, would have thrown his servant into his fish-pond, where he kept his lampreys, because he had broken a cup of crystal, the emperor withheld him, and controlled him with these words : "Homo cujuscunque generis, &c. (A man of what condition soever he be, if for no other cause, yet, because he is a man, is more to be valued than all the cups and fish-ponds in the world)." What a shame is it, then, for Christians ! How are they to be condemned when a heathen emperor shall exceed them in the principles of humanity ! How is our gold become dross, our blood so stained ! What is more rare amongst men than to find a man !—i. e., amongst men how many beasts are there, for want of using reason ! and for not using it well how many devils, whose hearts are so bound with sinews of iron that they are no more moved with the life of a man than if a dog had fallen before them !

Plutarch.

Morney, de Relig.,
cap. 16.

"Fera regnat Erinnys."—OVID,
Metam., lib. i.

DCCXIX.—Satan's policy to ensnare us by the observance of our natures.

THE chameleon, when he lies on the grass to catch flies and grasshoppers, taketh upon him the colour of the grass, as the polypus doth the colour of the rock under which he lurketh, that the fish may boldly come near him without any suspicion of danger. In like manner Satan turneth himself into that shape which we least fear, and sets before us such

Aldrovandus, de Serpentinibus.

objects of temptation as are most agreeable to our natures, that so he may the sooner draw us into his net. He sails with every wind, and bows us that way which we incline of ourselves, through the weakness of nature. Is our knowledge in matter of faith deficient, he tempts us to error. Is our conscience tender, he tempts us to scrupulosity and too much preciseness. Hath our conscience, like the ecliptic line, some latitude, he tempts us to carnal liberty. Are we bold spirited, he tempts us to presumption. Are we timorous and distrustful, he tempteth us to desperation. Are we of a flexible disposition, he tempteth us to inconstancy. Are we stiff, he labours to make obstinate heretics, schismatics, or rebels of us. Are we of an austere temper, he tempteth us to cruelty. Are we soft and mild, he tempteth us to indulgence and foolish pity. Are we hot in matters of religion, he tempteth us to blind zeal and superstition. Are we cold, he tempteth us to Laodicean lukewarmness. Thus doth he lay his traps in our way, that one way or other he may ensnare us.

"Diabolus, quando decipere tentat, prius naturam unius cujusque intendit, et inde se applicat," &c.—HUGO DE S. VICT., lib. ii.

DCCXX.—All things come from God, who is therefore to be praised.

MANY are the symbols and emblems of true thankfulness and grateful acknowledgement: as in the sun-dial, with all the hours thereon by distinct figures, the motto, "In umbra desino (to the sun only I owe my motion and being);" as likewise the shell full of pearl, lying open to the sun and the dew of heaven, with this word, "Rore divino;" as also of the olive amidst the craggy cliffs, without rooting or moisture, with this wreath coming out of it, "A celo." And thus must every good Christian acknowlege, that it is in God that he liveth and moveth and hath his being; that without the divine dew of heavenly grace there is no virtue in himself, and that all his happiness is from heaven only; that all the gifts of fortune, falsely so-called, as riches and possessions, &c., all the graceful endowments of the body, as agility, strength, comeliness, &c., all the goods of the mind, as virtue, wit, learning,—all these and all other beside these descend from God above, who gives πάντα πᾶσι, to all, all things; —no silver in Benjamin's sack till Joseph put it in; no good in man except the Lord bestow it. What hast thou that thou hast not received?

Donne's Serm., Lond., 1627.

"Omnia dat nihil accipit."—TRISMEGISTUS, Acts xvii, 25.

DCCXXI.—Sanctification wrought by degrees.

SANCTIFICATION is not perfect in an instant. As wounds are easily taken, but not easily cured, so are sins quickly contracted, but not quickly purged. Sins are compared to scum, and meat will ask some good boiling before all the scum be out of it; to dross and metals, and they must be long in the fire before they be refined; and lastly, to spots and stains, which, if they be deep in a garment, will not be fetched out but with the fuller's soap. Neither are such garments scoured without a great deal of toil—that which is bred in the bone will hardly be got out of the flesh. Sanctification, therefore, is wrought by degrees; there must be many a sigh, many a tear, many a groan, before we come to a full height and stature in Christ Jesus.

Udall's Serm., Lond., 1636.

Ezek., xxiv, 6.

Isa. i, 22.

Jude 12.

DCCXXII.—To be thankful unto God at all times, especially in prosperity.

It was a fault both noted and condemned in the Carthaginians, that whereas they were sprung from Tyrus, and used yearly to send the tenth or tithe of their incomes to Hercules, the peculiar god of the Tyrians, which custom they observed whilst their commodities were small, but neglected afterwards (when they grew to be masters of greater matters) to send at all, and so by little and little to condemn that Hercules, their god. In the service of the true God, let this be never said of Christians, that they should so far forget themselves, that when God hath raised them out of the dust and set them on the thrones of justice, when He loadeth them with benefits, that they should load Him with unthankfulness; but rather, as their riches do increase, to honour Him with that substance, and, as they rise in temporal preferment, so to raise themselves up unto Him by an humble acknowledgment, from Whom only, and by whose blessing it is, that they enjoy what they have so received.

Diod., Siculus, lib. xx.

Prideaux' Serm.,
Oxon, 1625.

DCCXXIII.—To be careful for our soul's good.

It is, methinks, a very preposterous course that many men take in the world. Those that have children are very careful and diligent to bring them up (as it is fit they should) under some man's tuition; and if they have cattle, sheep, or oxen, they provide neat-herds and shepherds to keep them, but in the meantime, unum necessarium, for the good of their own souls, they have no care at all; they may sink or swim, or do what they will. Strange blindness or madness, like the Gadarenes, to have more mind of their hogs than of Christ, more thoughts of their cattle than of their souls. Learn we, therefore, of Christ to commit our souls into the hands of God.

Perkins, on Creed.

Luke viii. 37.

Matt. xxvi. 39.

DCCXXIV.—To be always prepared for death.

THERE is a story of a certain man pursued by an unicorn, who, in his flight, falls into a dungeon, and in his fall he takes hold and hangs by the arm of a tree growing on the side of the pit or dungeon. Now, as he thus hangs looking downward, he sees two worms gnawing at the root of the tree, and as he looks upward, he sees a hive of most sweet honey, whereupon he climbs up unto it and, sitting by it, feeds thereon. In the mean season, whilst he is thus sitting, the two worms gnaw in pieces the root of the tree, which done, down falls both tree and man, and all, into the bottom of the dungeon. Now, this unicorn is death, the man that flies is every man living, the pit over which he hangs is hell, the arm of the tree is life itself, the two worms are day and night, the continuance whereof is the whole life of man, the hive of honey is the pleasures and profits and honours of this world, to which, when men wholly give up themselves, not considering their ends, till the root, that is, this temporal life be cut off, they plunge themselves quite into the gulph of hell. Preparation, therefore, for death is not to be deferred till the time of death, but rather we must be ready every day to entertain it.

Specul. Exemplorum.

"Omnes crede diem tibi diluxisse
supremum."

DCCXXV.—God will have the whole heart in His service.

MR. CAMDEN reports of one Redwald, king of the East Saxons, the first prince of this nation that was baptized, yet in the same church he had one altar for Christian religion, another for that of the heathens. And many such false worshippers of God there are to be found amongst us—such as divide the rooms of their souls betwixt God and the devil, that swear by God and Malcham, that sometimes pray and sometimes curse, that halt betwixt God and Baal—mere heteroclitics in religion. But God cannot endure this division: He will not have thy threshold to stand by His threshold; He will have all thy heart; He cares not for half, if it and the devil have the other.

Britannia, p. 465.

Greg. Naz., Trad.
Eva.

Zeph. i. 5.

Ezek. xliii. 8.

DCCXXVI.—A good sermon *not to be so much questioned as practised.*Fuller's Holy State.

As it is no good manners for him that hath good venison set before him on the table to ask from whence it came, but rather fairly fall to it: so a good Christian, hearing an excellent sermon, he never inquires whence the preacher had it, or whether it were not before in print, but at every point that concerns himself he turns down a leaf in his heart and falls aboard to practise it.

DCCXXVII.—*God's goodness ought to procure man's thankfulness.*Holdsworth's Serm.,
Lond., 1634.
Gen. xxxii. 10.

THE patriarch Jacob, pondering in his mind God's exceeding great care to him in his pilgrimage, breaks forth into this excellent confession: "I am not worthy of the least of all Thy mercies and all Thy truth which Thou hast showed unto Thy servant; for with my staff came I over this Jordan, and now I have gotten two bands." Even so may many a man say with Jacob, "I came to such and such a place in a poor leathern suit, with a stick in my hand only, destitute of means and money, yet Almighty God hath so blessed me that I now possess two bands, wife, children, and servants; and for further employment, I that was scarce worthy to sit with the dogs of the stock, am now taken out of the dust, and lifted out of the mire, to sit with princes of the people. Blessed be the name of the Lord!"

"Tempora mutantur."
Job xxx. 1.DCCXXVIII.—*Strange sins, strange punishments.*Fuller's Meditat.

HAD any man beheld Sodom in the beauty thereof, and had the angel told him that the same should be suddenly destroyed by a merciless element, he would certainly have concluded that Sodom should have been drowned, led thereunto by these considerations:—First. It was situated in the plain of Jordan, a flat, low, level country. Secondly. It was well watered everywhere; and where always there is water enough there may sometimes be too much. Thirdly. Jordan had a quality, in the first month, to overflow all its banks. But not one drop of moisture is spilt on Sodom; it is burnt to ashes. How wide, then, are our conjectures when they guess at God's judgments! How far are His ways above our apprehensions! especially when wicked men, with the Sodomites, wander in strange sins out of the road of common corruption, not once coming within the compass of a rational suspicion; so true is it that strange sins have and ever will be attended with strange and unheard-of punishments.

Gen. xiii. 10.

1 Chron. xii. 15.

"Nova peccata, nova supplicia."DCCXXIX.—The soul's delight, *once set upon God, hardly to be removed.*Burroughs, on Psalms xx.

HE that lets down a bucket to draw water out of a deep well, as long as the bucket is under the water, though it be never so full, he may get it up easily; but when he begins to draw the bucket clear out of the water, then, with all his strength, he can hardly get it up—yea, many times, when it is at the very highest, breaks the iron chain, and falls violently back again. After the same sort, a Christian heart, so long as it is in Him wherein is a well of life, is filled with delight, and with great joy drinketh in the water of comfort out of the fountains of salvation; but being once haled and pulled from God it draweth back, and, as much as it can possibly, resisteth, and is never quiet till it be in Him who is the very centre of the soul's happiness.

DCCXXX.—*The incorrigibility of error.*Hardy's Serm.,
Westm., 1647.

It is observable that, in the time of the great sweating sickness in England, the sick persons, when they were beaten on the face with sprigs of rosemary by their friends, would cry out, "Oh, you kill me! you kill me!" whereas, indeed, they had killed them in not doing it; for, had they slept, they had died. So those whom the sickness of error hath surprised, if you but go about to suppress them you shall presently hear them exclaim and say, "Oh, you persecute us! you persecute us!" whereas, indeed, it is not such a persecution as lets out the heart-blood, but such a persecution as lets out the corrupt blood; and they will one day acknowledge, though now they may stiffly stand it out, that to be a happy violence which pulled them out of the fire, blessed bonds that tied them to Christ, and comfortable fetters which kept their feet in the way of peace.

"O quam detest-andus est error hominum."—AUG.

DCCXXXI.—The slothful contractedness of our prayers unto God reproved.

POPE BONIFACE IX., at the end of each hundred years, appointed a jubilee at Rome, wherein people, bringing themselves and money thither, had pardon for their sins; but centenary years returned seldom, popes were old before, and covetous when they came to their place; few had the happiness to fill their coffers with jubilee coin. Hereupon Clement VI. reduced it to every fiftieth year, Gregory XI. to every three-and-thirtieth, Paul II. and Sixtus IV. to every twenty-fifth year, as now it is. Some overtures have been to bring it lower, and would have succeeded had there not been opposition. Just thus we serve our prayers unto God, as they their jubilees. Perchance they may extend to a quarter of an hour, when poured out at large; but some days we begrudge this time as too much, omitting the preface, with some passages conceived less material, and running two or three petitions into one, so contracting them to half a quarter of an hour. Not long after we fall to decontracting and abridging the abridgment of our prayers; yea, be it confessed to our shame and sorrow, that hereafter we may amend it, too often we shrink up our prayers to a minute, to a moment, to a "Lord, have mercy on me!"

Bapt. Platina, in Vita.

Exam. Conc. Trid.,
p. 736, Col. 2.

Fuller's Meditat.

DCCXXXII.—The difficulty of returning unto God, having long strayed from Him.

JOSEPH and Mary left their Son at Jerusalem, and went but one day's journey from Him, but they sought Him up and down three whole days, and that with a great deal of sorrow too, before they could find Him. They are, therefore, deceived who think it an easy matter speedily to return unto God when they have long been straying from Him, that are gone with the prodigal child in regionem longinquam (into a far country), far from the thought of death, and consequently from the fear of God, yet promise themselves a quick return unto Him.

Silv. de Priore,
Aur. Rosa.

DCCXXXIII.—The grace of God the only armour of proof.

THERE was a judge in Poland, called Ictus, who a long time had stood for a poor beggar, the plaintiff, against a very rich man, the defendant, but in the end took a fee of the defendant, a considerable sum of money, stamped according to the usual stamp of the country, with the image of a man in complete armour, and at the next sessions, in court, judged the cause in favour of the defendant. But being taxed for it by his friends in private, showed them the coin he received, and demanded of them, "Quis possit tot armatis resistere (Who is able to stand against such an army as this is)?" Steel armour is, indeed, musket-proof, but nothing, except the grace of God, is gold or silver proof. Nothing can keep a judge or a magistrate from receiving a reward in private, in a colourable cause, but the grace of God, the eye of the Almighty, who seeth the corrupt judge in secret, and will reward him openly, if not here, hereafter.

Salom. Neuge-haveri Hist. Polon.

Fealty, ut animæ.

DCCXXXIV.—*God both powerful and merciful.*Lake, *ut antea.*Tacit., Annal.

Chap. xi.

God showed the Israelites, in the spectacle of thunder and lightning, at the delivery of the law, what He could do, and what they deserved; so that what Cæsar one time said to the quæstor, who would have hindered him from entering into the treasury at Rome, shaking his sword, "It is easier for my power to dispatch thee, than for the goodness of my nature to be willing to strike thee!" may much more truly be said of God. His power maketh Him merciful, and His mercy doth manage His power. The author of the Book of Wisdom openeth this at large.

DCCXXXV.—*The excellencies of Christ are theirs that are in Him.*Iacch's Serm., 1624.

As the wife communicates in her husband's honour and wealth, the branches partake of the fatness and sweetness of the root, and the members derive sense and motion from the head: so Christ, our King, is not like the bramble, that receiveth all good and yields none to the state; but He is like the fig-tree, the vine, the olive. They that pertain to Him are all the better for Him; they are conformable to Him; if He have any excellency they shall have it also.

DCCXXXVI.—*The best improvement of worldly sorrow.*Shute's Serm.,
Lond., 1628.

WHEN a man, by extreme bleeding at the nose, is brought in danger of his life, the physician gives order to let him bleed in another place, as in the arm, and so turns the course of the blood another way, to save his life. And thus must we do: turn our worldly sorrows for loss of goods or friends to a godly sorrow for our offences against God.

DCCXXXVII.—*Flesh and spirit, their opposition.*Lib. Similitudin.

ANSELM, archbishop of Canterbury, as he was passing on the way, espied a boy with a bird tied in a string to a stone; the bird was still taking wing to fly away, but the stone kept her down. The holy man made good use of this sight, and, bursting out into tears, said, "Even so it is betwixt the flesh and the spirit: the spirit is willing to mount upwards in heavenly thoughts and contemplation, but the flesh keepeth it down, and, if possible, would not admit of the least thought of heaven."

DCCXXXVIII.—*The conversion of great ones to be endeavoured, for example's sake.*Calamy's Fast *Serm.*Florus, in Hist.

Acte viii. 10.

As it is in the exquisite mystery of printing, the great difficulty lies in the composing and working of the first sheet, for by that one many thousands are easily printed: so the great work of the ministry is to convert great men. If they were once converted, hundreds would follow their example. "In uno Cæsare multi in sunt Marii (In one great man are many inferiors contained);" when the great wheel of the clock is set a-moving, all the inferior wheels will move of their own accord. How zealous was St. Paul about the conversion of Sergius Paulus, the deputy of the country! He knew well enough that to take such a great fish was more than to catch many little ones, though the least of all is not to be despised DCCXXXIX.—The differences betwixt Papists and Protestants not easily reconciled.

IN Merionethshire, in Wales, there are high mountains whose hanging tops come so close together, that shepherds on the tops of several hills may audibly talk together, yet will it be a day's journey for their bodies to meet, so vast is the hollowness of the valleys betwixt them. Thus, upon sound search, we shall find, notwithstanding some pontifical bridge-makers over the great gulf betwixt Papists and Protestants, that there is a grand distance between them, which, at the first view, may seem near and tending to an accommodation.

Gyraldus, Conversens.

Franc. de S. Clara, et alii.

DCCXL.—The soul's breathing after Christ in time of trouble.

A BULL which is baited at the ring, as soon as he gets any breathing, be it never so little, turns him straightway towards that place by which he was brought in, imagining that by how much the more he is nearer to the stall, by so much the more he shall be further from the stake. In like manner a faithful heart, being baited and toused in this world with many dogs that come about it, always hath an eye to that place from which it came; it pants and breathes and never is at quiet till it return to Him from whence it was sent at first.

Playfer's Serm.

Ps. xxii. 16.

DCCXLI.—God's moderate answer to the prayers of His people.

"THERE are three sorts of answers," saith Plutarch, "that men usually make to a demand: the first, if you ask whether Socrates be within, telleth you faintly and unwillingly, 'He is not within,' perhaps he answereth by a laconism, οὐ (not); the second, with more courtesy and to the sufficient measure of the demand, willing to instruct the ignorant, 'He is not within, but at the exchange,' &c.; the third, running over with loquacity, knoweth no end of speaking, 'He is not within, but at the exchange, waiting for strangers out of Ionia, in whose behalf Alcibiades hath written from Miletum,' &c. Now, the answers of God to the prayers of His people are neither so sparing nor restricted as the first, leaving the soul in a manner as doubtful and perplexed as He found it, by granting too little; nor so idle and superfluous as the last, to bring a loathing to men by surcharge of His benefits; but they are in the middle sort, tempered with good moderation, full of humanity, kindness, and grace, giving enough, and happily more than asked, and sending the heart away joyful for that which it hath obtained.

Lib. de Garrulitate.

DCCXLII.—Baptismal water, the power and virtue thereof.

SOLINUS reporteth of a river in Boetia, that it turneth the colour of the sheep that are washed in it in such sort, that, if they were before black or dun, they became presently as white as milk. That may be a fable, but this is Gospel: that such is the virtue of the consecrated water in baptism, wherein Christ's lambs are usually washed, through divine benediction upon that holy ordinance, that though they were never so black or foul before, yet after they come out of that laver, they are most clean and white, and so continue till they plunge themselves into the mire of worldly desires and fleshly lusts.

Solinus, Poly. Hist.

Peatly's Serm. at Court, 1622.

DCCXLIII.—The folly of youth discovered and reprov'd.

THE ancients painted a young man stark naked, his eyes veiled, his right hand bound behind him, and his left hand left at liberty, and Time following him close at the heels, and Picti, Hieroglyphica.

"Juvenilibus annis luxuriant animi."— Ovid, Fast.

ever and anon pulling a thread out of the veil. He was so drawn, in a naked posture, to show with what little secrecy he had used his delights and pleasures ; with his right hand bound behind him, to express that he did not do anything right ; his left hand free and at liberty, signifying that he doth all things awkwardly and untowardly : he was pourtrayed blind because he doth not see his own follies ; but Time, behind him, opening his eyes by little and little, and so bringing him to the knowledge of his errors, that if he go on in such a course of life he is no other than as a broken ship, which leaks and draws in water at a thousand places, and will not be long ere it sink ; as a house, whereinto the rain doth fall and drop in so fast, and at so many places, that it must speedily fall without recovery.

DCCXLIV.—To shun ill company.

Fuller's Good Thoughts.

Numb. vi. 3.

It is better—safer, I am sure it is—to ride alone than to have a thief's company : and such is a wicked man, who will rob thee of precious time, if he do thee no more mischief. The Nazarites, who might drink no wine, were also forbidden to eat grapes, whereof wine is made. So, we must not only avoid sin itself, but also the causes and occasions thereof, amongst which bad company (the lime-twigs of the devil) is the chiefest, especially to catch those natures which, like the good-fellow planet Mercury, are most swayed by others.

DCCXLV.—Hearing the Word and not meditating thereon dangerous.

Baxter's Salute's Everlasting Rest.

If a man have the lientery, a disease so called, because that his meat passeth from him as he took it in, or he vomit it up as fast as he eats it, what strength and vigour of body and senses is this man like to have ? Indeed, he may well eat more than a sounder man, and the small abode that it makes in the stomach may refresh it at the present, and may help to draw out a lingering, languishing, uncomfortable life. Thus many hearers there are that are sick of this disease : what they hear is many times in at one ear, out at the other ; perhaps they hear more than otherwise they needed, and the clear discovery and lively delivering of the truth of God may warm and refresh them a little while they are hearing, and perhaps an hour or two after, and, it may be, may linger out their grace in a languishing, uncomfortable life ; but if they did hear one hour and meditate seven, if they did as constantly ruminate and digest their sermons as they hear them, and not take in one sermon before the other be well concocted, they would soon find another manner of benefit by sermons than the ordinary sort of many forward Christians do.

DCCXLVI.—Outward formality only in the service of God condemned.

Lake's Sermon.
Exod. xix.

PROV. XXX. 12.

MEN put on clean linen, their best clothes, and how often do they look in a glass to see that all be handsome, before they show themselves in the church to their neighbours ; and it is hoped that they which will not come slovenly before their neighbours will not appear sordidly before the Lord of heaven and earth ; and withal remember that that God who approveth this outward decency requireth the inward much more. He will have us lift up to Him not only clean, but pure hands also. A neat outside and a slovenly inside is like a painted sepulchre, full of dead men's bones ; and it is to be feared that most of our churches in the time of God's service are full of such tombs. There is a generation that are clean in their own eyes, but are not washed from their filthiness.

DCCXLVII.—Conversion of a sinner wrought by degrees.

"Little children, of whom I travail again in birth," &c., saith the apostle, "until Christ be formed in you." So that conversion is not wrought simul et semel, but by little and little, in process of time. In the generation of infants, first the brain, heart, and liver are framed; then the bones, veins, arteries, nerves, and sinews; and after this flesh is added, and the infant first begins to live the life of a plant, by growing and nourishing: then it lives the life of a beast, by sense and motion; and thirdly, the life of a man, by the use of reason. Even so God outwardly prevents us with His Word, and inwardly He puts into us the knowledge of His will, with the beginnings or seeds of faith and repentance, as it were a brain and a heart. From these beginnings of faith and repentance arise heavenly desires, from these desires follow asking, seeking, knocking; and thus the beginnings of faith are increased, and men go on from grace to grace, from one degree of virtue unto another, till they be tall men in Christ Jesus.

Perkins, on Gal.
Gal. iv. 19.

"Nemo repente fit optimus."

DCCXLVIII.—Not to be ashamed of the profession of Christ.

ST. AUGUSTINE, in his "Confessions," relates an excellent story of one Victorinus, a great man at Rome, that had many great friends that were heathens, but it pleased God to convert him to the Christian religion, and he came to one Simplicianus and tells him secretly that he was a Christian. Simplicianus answers, "Non credam, nec deputabo te inter Christianos, &c. (I will not believe thee to be a Christian till I see thee openly profess it in the church)." At first Victorinus derided his answer, and said, "Ergo ne parietes faciunt Christianum (What! do the church-walls make a Christian)?" But afterwards, remembering that of our Saviour, "He that is ashamed of Me before men," &c., he returns to Simplicianus and professeth himself openly to be a Christian. And let this text of Christ always sound in our ears also, and that of the Revelation, where the fearful, such as Nicodemus, nocturni adoratores, such night-walkers in religion, such as are faint-hearted in the profession of Christ, are put in the fore-front of those that shall go to hell, before murderers, whoremongers, adulterers, &c.

Lib. viii.

Mark viii. 38.

Calamy's Sermon.
Westm.
Rev. xxi. 8.

DCCXLIX.—Man to be sociable.

IT is to be observed that the farthest islands in the world are so seated, that there is none so remote but that from some shore of it another island or continent may be discovered, as if herein nature invited countries to a mutual converse one with another. Why, then, should any man court and hug solitariness? Why should any man affect to environ himself with so deep and great reservedness, as not to communicate with the society of others? Good company is one of the greatest pleasures of the nature of man, for the beams of joy are made hotter by reflection when related to another; were it otherwise, gladness itself must grieve for want of one to express itself to.

Cuadrografia del Mundo.

Fuller, ut antea.

DCCL.—Ministers to live according to that doctrine which they teach others.

THERE WAS a ridiculous actor in the city of Smyrna, which, pronouncing "O cælum (O heaven)!" pointed with his finger towards the ground; which, when Polemo, the chiefest man in the place, saw, he could abide to stay no longer, but went from the company in a great chafe, saying, "This fool hath made a solecism with his hand; he hath spoken false Latin with his finger." And such are they who teach well and do ill, that, however they have heaven at their tongue's end, yet the earth is at their finger's end: such as do not only speak false Latin with their tongue, but false divinity with their hands: such as live not according to their preaching. But He that sits in the heavens will laugh them to scorn and hiss them off the stage, if they do not mend their action.

Casp. Barthii Ad
versari.

Playfer's Sermon.

DCCLI.—England's ingratitude to God.

Val. Max., lib. v.,
cap. 3.

King's Lett. on Jonah.

SCIPIO AFRICANUS the elder had made the city of Rome, being at that time exanguem et moriturum (in a deep consumption, and ready to give up the ghost), lady of Afric. At length, being banished into a base country town, his will was that his tomb should have this inscription on it: "Ingrata patria, ne ossa mea quidem habes (Unthankful country, thou hast not so much as my bones)." Thus many and mighty deliverances have risen from the Lord to this land of ours, to make provocation of our thankfulness; yet "Ingrata Anglia, ne ossa mea quidem habes," may the Lord say (Ungrateful England, thou hast not so much as the bones of thy Patron and Deliverer). Thou hast exiled Him from thy thoughts, buried Him in oblivion. There is scarcely a footstep of gratitude to witness to the world that thou hast been protected.

DCCLII.—The Papists' blind zeal discovered.

Lib. de Rebus Germ.

Faatly, ut antea.

RHENANUS reporteth that he saw at Mentz, in Germany, two silver cranes standing upon the altar, into the bellies whereof the priests, by a device, put fire and frankincense so artificially, that all the smoke and sweet perfume came out of the cranes' beaks: a perfect emblem of the people's devotion in the Romish Church. The priests put a little fire into them—they have little warmth of themselves, or sense of true zeal—and as those cranes sent out sweet perfumes at their beaks, having no smelling at all thereof in themselves, so these breathe out the sweet perfumed incense of prayer and zealous devotion, whereof they have no sense or understanding at all, because they pray in an unknown tongue.

DCCLIII.—Saints in glory, what they hear and see.

Baxter's Saints'
Everlasting Rest.

ST. AUGUSTINE was wont to wish three things: first, that he might have seen Christ in the flesh; secondly, that he might have heard St. Paul preach; thirdly, that he might have seen Rome in its glory. Alas! these are small matters to that which Austin and all the saints in glory do now behold. There they see not Christ in the form of a servant, but Christ in His kingdom, in majesty and glory; not Paul preaching in weakness and contempt, but Paul, with millions more, rejoicing and triumphing; not persecuting Rome, in fading glory, but Jerusalem, which is above, in perfect beauty and splendour. And there they hear, too, not Elijah, Isaiah, Daniel, with all the prophets of old; Peter, John, James, Jude, apostles of the New Testament, preaching to an obstinate people in imprisonment, persecution, and reproach; but triumphing in the praises of their God, that hath thus advanced them.

DCCLIV.—God a mighty God.

Huntington's Hist.

Lake's Sermon, on Job, ix.

Exod. xv. 11.

CANUTE, a king of this land, when flatterers magnified his power and did almost deify him, to confute them, caused his chair to be set by the seashore, at the time of the flood, and, sitting in his majesty, commanded the waves that they should not approach his throne; but when the tide kept its course and wet his garments, "Lo!" saith he, "what a mighty king I am by sea and land, whose command every wave dareth to resist!" Here, now, was weakness joined with might. It is otherwise with God; He is a mighty God. It appears in the epithet that is added unto El, which is Gibbor, importing that He is a God of prevailing might, whom the winds and seas obey. In Daniel He is called El Elim, the Mighty of mighties; whereupon Moses, magnifying His might, saith, "Who is like unto Thee, O Lord, amongst the gods?" which words, being abbreviated, the Maccabees, in their wars against their enemies, did bear in their standard, and there hence, as the learned have observed, did take their name of Maccabees. Certainly, this epithet is a just ground of that which King David persuades: "Ascribe unto the Lord, O ye mighty, ascribe unto the Lord glory and strength." Ps. xxix. 1.

DCCLV.—Drunkenness the shame of England.

THERE is a complaint in Pliny, for the time present and past, "Latifundia perdiderunt Italiam (Italy is undone by large severals)." We may take up the like complaint against drinking, multifundia, that is, multum infundendo, the pouring in of much liquor, is the shame of England already, and will be, if not reformed, the utter undoing of it. Smith's Serm. on Eph. v.

DCCLVI.—To trust in God, who is the great Lord Protector of His people.

THERE is an excellent story of a young man that was at sea in a mighty raging tempest, and when all the passengers were at their wit's end for fear, he only was merry; and when he was asked the reason of his mirth, he answered that the pilot of the ship was his father, and he knew his father would have a care of him. The great and wise God, who is our Father, hath from all eternity decreed what shall be the issue of all wars, what the event of all troubles. He is our Pilot, He sits at the stern; and though the ship of the Church or state be in a sinking condition, yet be of good comfort, our Pilot will have a care of us. There is nothing done in the lower house of parliament on earth but what is first decreed in the higher house in heaven. All the lesser wheels are ordered and overruled by the upper. "Are not five sparrows," saith Christ, "sold for a farthing?" One sparrow is not worth half a farthing, and there is no man shall have half a farthing's worth of harm more than God hath decreed from all eternity. Calamy's Serm. Luke xii. 6.

DCCLVII.—How to come off well in ill company.

IT is reported of the river Dee, in Merionethshire, in Wales, that, running through Pimble Meere, it remains entire, and mingles not her streams with the waters of the lake. So if, against thy will, the tempest of an unexpected occasion drive thee amongst the rocks of ill company, though thou be with them, be not of them; keep civil communion with them, but separate from their sins; and know, for thy comfort, thou art still in thy calling, and therefore in God's keeping, who, on thy prayer, will bring thee off with comfort. Camden's Britannia.

DCCLVIII.—Greatness and goodness well met together.

SIMEON, the son of Onias, was as a fair olive-tree that is fruitful, and as a cypress-tree, which groweth up to the clouds. A cypress-tree is high, but barren; an olive-tree is fruitful, but low. So a Christian is, or ought to be, not only a cypress-tree, reaching high in preferment and worldly honour, but he must also be low as the olive-tree, bringing forth fruit with patience, like Simeon, neither low nor barren: though an olive, yet as high as the cypress; though a cypress, yet as fruitful as the olive-tree. Playfer's Serm. Eccles. v. 15.

DCCLIX.—Prosperity of the wicked destructive.

THE king of Egypt blessed himself for having anything to do with Polycrates, king of Samos, because he was over-fortunate; for, having a massy and rich ring, he cast it into Herodotus.

King, on Jonah.

Job xxi. 10.

Ps. lxxiii. 5.

the sea to try an experiment : in despite of fortune, he found it again at his table in the belly of a fish, which was brought for a present unto him. The thriving estate of the wicked is set out at large : "Their bullock gendereth, and miscarrieth not ; their cow calveth, and casteth not her calf ;" &c. ; and "they come not into misfortune as other men." What ! no misfortune ? Even the greatest in this, that they are so fortunate. Surely it were good for men not to be acquainted with such engrossers of prosperity, and much less to be partakers of their unhappy happiness.

DCCLX.—God's people meet with many discouragements in the world.

Donne's Pseudo-Martyr.

TIBERIUS CONSTANTINUS, in the year of our Lord 577, commanding a golden cross, set in marble, to be digged up, that it might not be trod upon, found under it a second, and under the second a third, and under the third a fourth. So the dearest servants of God in this world, digging for the hidden treasure of the Word, and putting themselves into a frame of Gospel obedience, find but hard dealing in the world, cross under cross, and loss upon loss, and sorrow after sorrow. Look how the waves in the sea ride one upon the neck of another ! and as Job's messengers trod one upon the heels of another, so miseries and calamities and vexations in the course of this life follow close one upon the other.

DCCLXI.—The great comfort of heavenly meditation.

Gen. xl. 10.

Baxter's Saints' Everlasting Rest.

PHARAOH's butler dreamed that he pressed the ripe grapes into Pharaoh's cup and delivered the cup into the king's hand. It was a happy dream for him, and signified his speedy access to the king's presence. But the dream of the baker, that the birds did eat out of his basket on his head the baked meats prepared for Pharaoh, had an ill omen, and signified his hanging and their eating his flesh. Thus, when the ripened grapes of heavenly meditations are pressed by a good Christian into the cup of affection, and this put into the hands of Christ by delightful praises, it is a true argument of real comfort, that that Christian, in so doing, shall be shortly taken from the prison of this flesh, where he liveth, and be set before Christ in the courts of heaven, and there serve up to Him that cup of praise (but much fuller and much sweeter) for ever and ever ; but if the ravenous birds of wandering thoughts do devour these meditations, intended for heaven, it is hard to say but that, so far as they intrude, they will be the death of that service, if not of that soul, they thus infest.

DCCLXII.—God gives warning before He smites.

Lake, on Hag. ii.

"Non solet Deus subrepere," &c., saith Chrysostom. God, when He doth any great work in the world, stealeth not upon the world ; He giveth a warning piece before He dischargeth His arming piece : so did He before He brought on the flood, before He delivered His people out of Egypt, before He gave the Jews over unto the Babylonian captivity. We cannot read these stories, but we must needs find in them God's palpable harbingers ; so that if men be surprised, it is not because they are not forewarned, but because they will take no warning.

DCCLXIII.—Excess of apparel condemned.

Matt. Paris.

It was an arrogant act of Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury, who, when King John had given his courtiers rich liveries, gave his servants the like ; wherewith the king was not a little offended. But what shall we say to the riot of our age, wherein, as peacocks are more gay than the eagle himself, every ordinary subject outvies his sovereign ? What fancies and fantastical habits are daily seen amongst us !

DCCLXIV.—The dangerous example of wicked governors.

JEROBOAM, the son of Nebat, is never mentioned in the Scripture, never read or heard of in the chronicles of Israel, but he draweth a tail after him like a blazing star, "who made Israel to sin." A sick head disordereth all the other parts, and a dark eye benights the whole body. It is said "facile transitur ad plures (people are apt to flock after a multitude);" and it is as true "facile transitur ad majores (men are apt to imitate great authority, whether good or bad)." Evil behaviour in men of high degree corrupteth, as it were, the air round about, which the people, drawing in over-hastily, are made like to themselves in all manner of lewdness.

Udal's Serms.
Lond., 1637.

DCCLXV.—How to use riches.

WHEN a man taketh a heavy trunk, full of plate or money, upon his shoulders, it maketh him stoop, and boweth him towards the ground; but if the same weight be put under his feet, it lifteth him up from the ground. In like manner, if we put our wealth and riches above us, preferring them to our salvation, they will press us down to the ground, if not to hell, with their very weight; but if we put them under our feet, and tread upon them as slaves and vassals to us, and quite condemn them in respect of heavenly treasure, they will raise us up towards heaven.

Taylor's Serms.
Lond.

DCCLXVI.—The great danger of concealed knowledge.

CASSIUS tells of one that had such a receipt as would so likely and certainly dissolve the stone in the bladder; and he concludes of him, that he makes no doubt but that he is now in hell because he never revealed it to any before he died. This was somewhat a hard sentence; but what shall we think, then, of them that know of the remedy of curing souls, such as have receipts for hard and many hearts, yet do not reveal them nor persuade men to make use of them? Is it not hypocrisy to pray daily for their conversion and salvation, and never once endeavour to procure it? And if hypocrisy, then what is the reward of hypocrisy? There is none so ignorant but knows it.

Dexter's Saints'
Eternal Rest.

DCCLXVII.—How the Gospel propagateth itself.

As the scope of the sun is in all the world, and yet at one time the sun doth not shine in all the parts thereof; it beginneth in the east, and passeth to the south, and so to the west, and as it passeth forward, bringing light to one place, withdraweth from another: so it is in regard of the Sun of righteousness, the Sunshine of the Gospel. He hath jus ad omnes nations, but He hath not at the same jus in omni terra; the propriety of all is His, but He taketh possession of it all successively and by parts. The eastern Churches, the southern, have had His light, which now are in darkness for the most part; and we, that are more northerly, do now enjoy the clearest noontide. But the Sun beginneth to rise to them in the west, and it is not plain that our light beginneth to grow dim. It is to be feared that it hath to their meridian, and whether, after their noon, it will set, God knoweth. Yet the cause hereof is not—lest we mistake—in the Sun of righteousness, as the cause why all have not light as one time is in the material sun. The material cannot at one time enlighten all the Sun of righteousness can; but for the sins of the people the candlestick is removed, and given to a nation that will bear more fruit. We interpose our earthliness between ourselves and the sun, and so exclude ourselves from the beams thereof.

Lake, on Isa. ix.

DCCLXVIII. — England's distractions to be England's peaceable directions.

Nect. Altior.

AULUS GELLIUS tells of certain men that were in a ship ready to perish, by reason of a great tempest, and one of them, being a philosopher, fell to asking many trifling questions; to whom they answered, καὶ σὺ παίζεις ἡμεῖς ἀπολούμεθα (We are a-perishing, and dost thou trifle)? So it may be said of us: Is England a-sinking, and is this a time to be raising of unnecessary disputes, to be wrangling in controversies about points of Church government, when God knows whether we shall have any government either in Church or state at all, when there is Hannibal ad portas, a generation of men crying out, "No governors! No Church! No ministers! No sacrament!" As Elisha said to Gehazi, "Is this a time to receive money?" so it may be said again, "Rebus sic stantibus (Is this a time to divide)?" Is such a time as this a time to trouble England with new opinions? Is this a time to divide? Nay, is it not rather a time to unite, and to have quiet hearts and peaceable dispositions one towards another, that so the God of peace may delight to dwell amongst us.

2 Kings v. 26.

DCCLXIX.—*Deformity of body not to be contemned.*Gul. Malmsh.,
lib. ii., cap. 10.

AN emperor of Germany, coming by chance on a Sunday into church, found there a misshapen priest, pecūe portentum nature, insomuch that the emperor scorned and contemned him. But when he heard him read these words in the service, "For it is He that made us, not we ourselves," the emperor checked his own proud thoughts, and made inquiry into the quality and condition of the man; and finding him, on examination, to be most learned and devout, he made him archbishop of Colen, which place he did excellently discharge. Mock not at those, then, who are misshapen by nature; there is the same reason of the poor and of the deformed: he that despiseth them despiseth God that made them. A poor man is a picture of God's own making, but set in a plain frame, not gilded; and a deformed man is also His workmanship, but not drawn with even lines and lively colours: the former not for want of wealth, as the latter not for want of skill, but both for the pleasure of the Maker: and many times their souls have been the chapels of sanctity whose bodies have been the spitals of deformity.

Fuller's Holy State.

DCCLXX.—*Profession and practice to go together.*Isa. lviii. 1.
Stiles Sermon, Lond., 1626.

THE prophet Isaiah is willed to lift up his voice like a trumpet. There are many things that sound louder than a trumpet, as the roaring of the sea, the claps of thunder, and such like; yet he says not, "Lift up thy voice as the sea!" or "Lift up thy voice as thunder!" but "Lift up thy voice as a trumpet!" Why as a trumpet? Because a trumpeter, when he sounds his trumpet, he winds it with his mouth and holds it up with his hand. And so every faithful heart, which is, as it were, a spiritual trumpet to sound out the praises of God, must not only report them with his mouth, but also support them with his hand. When profession and practice meet together, quàm benè conveniunt (what a harmony is in that soul)! When the tongue is made God's advocate, and the hand executor of God's will, then doth a man truly lift up his voice like a trumpet.

DCCLXXI.—All men and things subject to mortality."Homo stature parvæ caput incurvabat," &c.—
BAPT. PLATINA, in Vita Felicitis Secundæ.

WHEN the emperor Constantius came to Rome in triumph, and beheld the companies that entertained him, he repeated a saying of Cyneas the Epirote, that he had seen so many kings as citizens; but viewing the buildings of the city, the stately arches of the gates—so lofty, that at his entrance he needed not to have stooped like a goose at a barn door—the turrets, tombs, temples, theatres, aqueducts, baths, and some of the work so high, like Babel, that the eye of man could scarcely reach unto them, he was amazed, and said that Nature had emptied all her strength and invention upon that one city. He spake to Hormisda, the master of his works, to erect him a brazen horse in Constantinople, like unto that of Trajan the emperor which he there saw. Hormisda answered him, that if he desired the like horse, he must then provide him the like stable. All this, and much more, in the honour of Rome. At length he asked Hormisda what he thought of the city: who told him that he took no pleasure in anything there, but in learning one lesson, that men also died in Rome, and that he perceived well the end of that lady-city—which, in the judgment of Quintilian, was the only city, and all the rest but towns—would be the same with all her predecessors: the ruins whereof are even gone to ruin. This is the doom that attendeth both men and places, be they never so great and stately; the consideration whereof made a learned gentleman close up his admirable "History of the World" in these words: "O eloquent, just, and mighty death! whom none could advise, thou only hast persuaded; what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised. Thou hast drawn together all the far-stretched greatness, all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of man, and covered it over with these two narrow words: 'Hic jacet.'"

Ammian. Marcellin., lib. xvi.

"O jam periore ruinæ."—LUCAN.

Raleigh's Hist., in fine.

DCCLXXII.—Faith in Christ the only support in the time of trouble.

IN that famous battle at Leuctra, where the Thebans got a signal victory, but their captain Epaminondas his death-wound, it is reported that Epaminondas, a little before his death, demanded whether his buckler were taken by the enemy; and when he understood that it was safe, and that they had not so much as laid their hands on it, he died most willingly and cheerfully. Such is the resolution of a valiant soldier of Christ Jesus: when he is wounded even to death, he hath an eye to his shield of faith, and, finding that to be safe out of the enemy's danger, his soul marcheth courageously out of this world, singing St. Paul's triumphant ditty: "I have finished my course; I have kept the faith: henceforth is laid up for me a crown of righteousness."

Plutarch.

Pausanias, in Boet.

Featly, ut antea.

2 Tim. iv. 7, 8.

DCCLXXIII.—Nothing but Christ to be esteemed as of any worth.

As the Jews used to cast to the ground the Book of Esther before they read it, because the name of God is not in it; and as St. Augustine cast by Tully's Works, because they contained not the name of Christ: so must we throw all aside that hath not the name of Jesus on it. If honour, riches, preferment, &c., come not in the name of Jesus, away with them, set them by as not worth the taking up: give them no entertainment further than as they have reference to Christ and eternity.

Steph. Menochius.

Baxter's Saints' Everlasting Rest.

DCCLXXIV.—Humility the way to glory.

WE say in our creed that Christ descended into hell, descendit ut ascendat; He took his rising from the lowest place to ascend into the highest. And herein Christ reareth a good lecture unto us; He teacheth us that humility is the way to glory, and the more we are humbled the more we shall be exalted. Adam and those once glorious angels were both ambitious. Both desired to climb; but they mistook their rise, and so in climbing both had grievous falls. If we, then, would climb without harm, we must learn of Christ to climb; so shall we be sure to tread the steps of Jacob's ladder, which from earth will reach even to the highest heavens.

Udall's Serm., Lond., 1640.

"Primus ascentionis gradus, est humilitas."—BER.

DCCLXXV.—A kingdom divided within itself cannot long stand.

MELANTHON, persuading the divided Protestants of his time to peace and unity, illustrateth his argument by a notable parable of the wolves and the dogs who were marching onward to fight one against another. "The wolves, that they might the better know the strength of their adversary, sent forth a master-wolf as their scout. The scout returns, and tells the wolves that, indeed, the dogs were more in number, but yet they should not be discouraged, for he observed that the dogs were not one like another. A few mastiffs there were, but the most were little curs, which could only bark, but not bite, and would be afraid of their own shadow. Another thing also he observed, which would much encourage them, and that was that the dogs did march as if they were more offended at themselves than with us, not keeping their ranks, but grinning and snarling and biting and tearing one another as if they would save us a labour; and therefore let us march on resolutely, for our enemies are their own enemies, enemies to themselves and their own peace; they bite and devour each other, and therefore we shall certainly devour them." Thus, though a kingdom or state be never so well provided with men, arms, ammunition, ships, walls, forts, and bulwarks, yet notwithstanding, if divisions and heart-burnings get into that kingdom, that state, or that city, like a spreading gangrene, they will infect the whole, and, like a breach made in the walls of a city besieged, they will let in the enemy to destroy it. Nay, though there should be a kingdom of saints, if differences and distractions get within that kingdom, they will, like the worm in Jonah's gourd, eat up all the happiness of it in one night.

Calamy's Fast Serms., Westm., 1644.

"En quò discordia cives perduxit miseros!"—VIRG., Elog.

DCCLXXVI.—Not to continue angry.

THE English, by command from William the Conqueror, always raked up their fires and put out their candles when the curfew-bell was rung; some part of which laudable custom of those times remaineth yet in the ringing of our eight or nine o'clock bell. Let it, then, remind us thus much, that the sun go not down upon our wrath. Let it not carry news to the antipodes, in another world, of our revengeful nature, but rather quench all sparks of anger, rake up all heat of passion, that may arise within us.

Stow's Annals.

Eph. iv. 26.

DCCLXXVII.—The great state of heaven.

WHEN Cineas, the ambassador of Pyrrhus, after his return from Rome, was asked by his master what he thought of the city and state, he answered and said that it seemed to him to be respublica regum (a state of none but great statesmen, and a commonwealth of kings). Such is heaven: no other than a parliament of emperors, a commonwealth of kings. Every humble, faithful soul in that kingdom is co-hair with Christ, hath a robe of honour and a sceptre of power and a throne of majesty and a crown of glory.

Plutarch, in Vita Pyrrhi,
"Hic locus est, quem, si verbis audacia detur," &c.
—OVID.

DCCLXXVIII.—Every man to be active in his place.

HE is not worthy to be a member of a state by whom the state is no whit bettered. The Romans well understood this when they instituted their censors, to inquire into every man's course of life, and to note them carbōne nigro (with a character of infamy) that could not give some good account of their life. It is a thing pitiful to consider how many there are in this land of ours whose glory is their shame, the very drones and cumber-grounds of their country, the chronicle of whose life was long since summed up by the poet: "Nos numerus sumus, et fruges consumere nati (no better than cyphers, if you respect the good they do)." But let them know that God will have no mutes in His grammar, no blanks in His almanack, no dumb-shows on His stage, no false lights in His house, no loiterers in His vineyard.

Wolff, Lazius, de Reb. Gest. Rom.

DCCLXXIX.—How to get into heaven.

As Socrates told a lazy fellow that would fain go up to the top of Olympus, but that it was so far off: "Why," said he, "walk but as far every day as thou dost about thine own house, and in so many days thou shalt be sure to be at Olympus." Thus, let but a man employ every day so many serious thoughts upon the excellent glory of the life to come as he now employeth daily on his necessary affairs in the world—nay, as he loseth daily on vanities and impertinencies—and his heart will be at heaven in a very short space.

Erasm., Arctophagm, lib. iii.

Baxter's Saints' Everlasting Rest.

DCCLXXX.—The strength of imagination demonstrated.

IMAGINATION, the work of fancy, hath produced real effects. Sad and serious examples of this truth may be produced; but a merry one by the way. A gentleman, having led a company of children beyond their usual journey, they began to be weary, and jointly cried to him to carry them, which, because of their multitude, he could not do, but told them he would provide them horses to ride on; then, cutting little wands out of the hedge, as nags for them, and a great stake as a gelding for himself, thus mounted, fancy put mettle into their legs, and they came cheerfully home.

Fuller's Holy State.

DCCLXXXI.—The heavenly conqueror the happy conqueror.

In the several kingdoms of the world there are several orders of knights, as of Malta, of the Garter, of the Golden Fleece, of St. John of Jerusalem, of St. Saviour, of St. James, of the Holy Ghost, and divers others; and most of these have been found λιποτάκται, white-livered soldiers, carpet knights, that either never drew sword or saw battle, or else had fled from their colours. But in the kingdom of Christ there is found but only one sort of knights, and that is the order of St. Vincent: such as stood their ground, such as never returned from battle without the spoil of their ghostly enemies; such whose motto was, here below, "Vincenti dabitur;" and now they are more than conquerors in heaven above.

Mexia, Theater.

Featly's Serm.

Rev. ii. 7.

DCCLXXXII.—Ignorance of God's mind will not excuse at the last.

THE people of Sienna, having wilfully rebelled against Charles V., their emperor, sent their ambassador to excuse it, who, when he could find no other excuse, thought in a jest to put it off thus: "What!" saith he, "shall not we of Sienna be excused, seeing we are known to be fools?" to whom the emperor's agent replied, "Even that shall excuse you, but upon the condition which is fit for fools, that is, to be kept and bound in chains." Thus shall it be with those that sit under plentiful means of grace, rich Gospel dispensations, so that it is but opening the casements of their hearts, and the light of God's countenance will fully shine upon them, yet remain unfruitful, barren, empty, sapless, lifeless Christians, and think that ignorance shall at the last excuse them.

Paul Jovii Hist., lib. xxxiv.

Imperatorem Viter.

"Eheu quam miseris tramite devio abducit ignorantia."
—BOETHIUS, iii. 8.

DCCLXXXIII.—Preposterous zeal reproved.

WE choose the best lawyers for our causes, the best physicians for our bodies; but to supply the defect of our souls, to guide our judgment and conscience aright in the ways of God, we trust we know not whom. The humour of such cannot be better resembled than to the distempered appetite of girls that have the green sickness. Their parents provide for them wholesome diet, and they get into a corner and eat chalk and coals, and such-like Lake's Serm., Wells.

"Hoc est zelum Dei habere, sed non secundum scientiam."

trash: so they that may have in the Church grave and sound instructions for the comfort of their souls, in conventicles feed upon the raw and undigested meditations of some ignorant tradesman.

DCCLXXXIV.—The danger of stage plays.

Plinii Hist., lib. liii.,
cap. 10.

Fulgosus.

Fuller's Holy State.

ZEUXIS, the curious painter, painted a boy holding a dish full of grapes in his hand, done so lively that the birds, being deceived, flew to peck the grapes; but Zeuxis, in an ingenuous choler, was angry with his own workmanship. "Had I," said he, "made the boy as lively as the grapes, the birds would have been afraid to touch them." Thus, two things are set out to us in stage plays: some grave sentences, prudent counsels, and punishments of vicious examples, and with these, desperate oaths, lustful talk, and riotous acts, are so personated to the life, that wantons are tickled with delight and feed their palates upon them. It seems the goodness is not pourtrayed out with equal accents of liveliness as the wicked things are, otherwise men would be deterred from vicious courses with seeing the woeful success that follows after. But the main is, wanton speeches on stages are the devil's ordinance, to beget badness; but it is a question whether the pious speeches spoken there be God's ordinance to increase goodness, as wanting both His institution and benediction.

DCCLXXXV.—Profit is the great god of the world.

Cicero, in Verre.

Featly, ut antea.

"Vulgus amicitias utilitate probat."—
OVID.

It was the usual demand of one of the wisest amongst the Roman judges, Cassius—surnamed the Severe—in all causes of doubt in matters of fact about the person of the delinquent, "Cui bono (Who gained by the bargain)?" on whose side lay the advantage? assuring himself that no man of understanding would put himself into any dishonest or dangerous action without hopes of reaping some fruit by it, as also that there can be no enterprise so beset with difficulties and dangers which some men, for apparent hope of great gain and profit, would not go through with. And it is very true, no arguments conclude so necessarily, in the opinion of the greater part of men, as that which is drawn ab utili. Profit is the great god of the world. "Hæc omnia tibi dabo" was the topic place the devil made use of, above all other, when he tempted our Saviour. Profit is a bait that all bite at; hence is that maxim of the Parthians, "Nulla fides, nisi prout expedit (No faith or keeping touch with anything, but as it maketh for advantage)." Justice and honesty, religion and conscience, may be pretended, but that which turneth the balance and carrieth the greatest sway in all concerns is the matter of profit and emolument.

DCCLXXXVI.—The poor distressed man's comfort by his appeal unto God.

Cartwright, in *Ex
clt.*

Ps. ix. 18.

As a man that, in some of the courts, is overpowered in a just cause by a strong hand, yet keeps up his hope so long as he hath liberty to make his appeal to a higher court, especially if he be confident of the sincerity of the judge to whom he is to make his appeal: so those that are here oppressed, rejected, distressed, are not therefore to be discouraged if at man's hand they receive little or no relief. Why? Because they may appeal unto God, and they are sure to prevail with Him, according to the equity of their cause. With Him there is no respect of persons, no accepting of bribes. He is One who, as He will not be corrupted, so He cannot be deluded; and that the poor may not always be forgotten, nor the hope of the oppressed perish for ever, hath set down a certain day wherein He will, without fail, and without further delay, if not before, hear every man's cause, right every man's wrong, and do justice on every wrong-doer.

DCCLXXXVII.—The charity of former times abused in these times.

THE first Christians, after the rage of persecution was over, how open-handed were they in erecting and providing for places and persons dedicated unto Christ's service! And as in other countries, so the good Christians of this island have left honourable memorials in their magnificent foundations, and munificent endowments thereof. Many millions have been that way expended, at the foot of which account, as a schedule thereunto annexed, is a bank of a million of money—not perfectly audited, but slenderly cast up by an unskilful hand in matters of account—bestowed in the city of London and the two universities, in the last century of years, setting the rest of the kingdom aside. All these followed the rule of God's law: whatsoever they offered unto Him was still of the best. But, by the way, it may be observed that the flood of our ancestors' liberalities rose not to so high a pitch but that their posterity's sacrilege hath taken it down to as low an ebb; and a saying of William Rufus, a great, though no good king of this island, pleaseth too many that live on the spoils of the Church: "Christ's bread is sweet."

Willet, Synopsis Papismi.

DCLXXXVIII.—Covetousness and contentment inconsistent.

It is one property which, they say, is required of those who seek for the philosopher's stone, that they must not do it with any covetous desire to be rich, for otherwise they shall never find it. But most true it is, that whosoever would have the jewel of contentment (which turns all into gold, yea, want into wealth) must come with minds divested of all ambitious and covetous thoughts, else are they likely never to obtain it.

Shute's Serm.,
Lond., 1619.

DCCLXXXIX.—Not to be in love with sin.

It is observable that Xerxes bare a strange affection to the plane-tree, which he hung about with chains and decked with jewels of greatest price. A fond and foolish affection as being to a tree, and such a tree as is good for nothing but to shade one out of the sun. This folly of so great a monarch very well resembleth all those who are not guided by the Spirit of God into the ways of truth and life, but are led by the spirit of error, or by the error of their own spirits, to ungodly and sinful courses, the very beaten paths to hell and death. The tree they are in love with and adorn, and spend so much cost upon, is the forbidden tree of sin, altogether unfruitful as that of Xerxes; it hath neither fair blossoms nor sweet fruit on it, only it is well grown, hath large arms and broad boughs, and casteth a good shade, or, to speak properly, a shadow of good, a noisome or pestilent shade, making the ground barren, and killing the best plants of virtues by depriving them of the sunshine of God's grace; yet, as divers nations, in the days of Pliny, paid tribute to the Romans for the shade of these trees, so do these men pay for the seeming delight and pleasure of sin (being indeed but a shadow of vanity), to the devil, the greatest tribute that can be paid, even the tribute of their most precious souls.

Herodotus.

Factly, ut antea.

Nat. Hist., lib. xii.

DCCXC.—The sad effects of a wounded conscience.

If a man be sick, wear he never so stately robes, he minds them not; have he never so dainty fare, he relisheth it not; lay him in never so soft a bed, yet he cannot rest: his diseased body feels nothing but the afflicting peccant humour. Even so, when the remorse of conscience works, all our gifts and parts, be they never so great, appear not: riches, though in great abundance, satisfy not; honours, preferments, though never so eminent,

Lake's Serm. at Court.

"Nihil est miserius quàm hominis animù conscius."— PLAUTUS, in Cap-tivi.

advantage not; though we have them all for the present, yet we have not the use of them: we see, we hear, but we feel nothing but sin; as experience teacheth them that have been distressed in this kind.

DCCXCI.—Multitudes of time-servers.

Sir F. Bacon's
Hen. VIII. p. 211.

WE read of an earl of Oxford fined, by King Henry VII., fifteen thousand marks for having too many retainers: but how many retainers hath time had in all ages, and servants in all offices? and chaplains, too, upon occasion, doing as the times do, not because the times do as they should do, but merely for sinister respects, and by ends to ingratiate themselves?

DCCXCII.—God's spiritual blessing upon a man's employment in his calling.

Zuingeri Theatrum
Hum. Vitæ.

Bromiardi sum Prædicant.

As the sons of the husbandman in the fable, who, being told by their father, lying on his death-bed, that he left much gold buried under the ground in his vineyard, fell a-delving and digging all about the vines; and though they found no gold, yet by stirring the mould about the roots of the trees, gained a great vintage that year: even so it falleth out in the labours of our calling, though by them we reap not always that which we expect, and the world so much looks after, riches, preferment, &c., yet thereby we may manure, if I may so say, the ground of our hearts and gain great store of those fruits, peace of conscience, joy in the Holy Ghost, the blessing of God, such as the branches that are grafted in the true vine, Christ Jesus, bear.

DCCXCIII.—Good men, as the pillars of both Church and state, to be preserved.

Gal. ii. 9.

Orat. xxi.

Isa. xxii. 23.

Lake's Serm.

"Natura sui conservatrix."—ARIST.

ST. PAUL gives the name of pillars to Peter, James, and John. Nazianzen saith of Athanasius, that he was ὁ στῦλος τῆς ἐκκλησίας; and of Attalus, Nicephorus saith, that he was στῦλον καὶ ἐδραίωμα τῶν μαρτύρων. Neither is this true only of the worthies of the Church, but of the commonwealth also. Joseph is not only called pastor, but "Petra Israelis;" the like is of Eliakim, the son of Hilkiah, of whom God saith, "I will fasten him as a nail," &c. And, indeed, there is no good man on whom the land doth not rest: for, as the world was made for them, so they bear it up; and when God removes them, the world grows so much the weaker. That any man enjoys his estate, that one friend hath society with another, they are beholden to the good; they think (poor souls!) that when they break laws and persecute good men, themselves fare the better and their posterity is the greater; but fools they are, and therein prove their own foes, for they overturn the pillars both of Church and state, whereupon themselves do lean. And whereas there is that care in unreasonable creatures of the preservation of the whole, that every part will hazard itself to prevent the common ruin, only men, forgetting that themselves must perish when the commonwealth goes to wreck, to satisfy their own lusts, continually push at, and would overturn the pillars that bear them, and, Samson-like, though not with so good a will as Samson, nor in so good a cause, for themselves are more like Philistines, endeavour the ruin both of others and themselves.

DCCXCIV.—A contented mind suits with all conditions.

Relat. de Glev.
Betser.

ONE observeth (how truly, I dispute not) that the French naturally have so elegant and graceful a carriage, that what posture of body soever in their salutations, or what fashion of attire soever they are pleased to take on them, it doth so beseem them, that one would think nothing could become them better. Thus contentment makes men carry themselves gracefully in wealth and in want, in health and in sickness, in freedom and fetters, in what condition soever God allots them.

DCCXCV.—To be thankful unto God in all conditions.

FABRICIUS told Pyrrhus, who one day tempted him with gold, and the next day sought to terrify him with an elephant, a beast that he had never seen before: "Yesterday I was no whit moved with your gold, nor to-day with your beast." So let neither abundance transport us, nor wants dismay us, nor adversity deject us, but all incite us to bless God; in prosperity to praise His bounty, and in adversity His justice, and in both His prudent and fatherly care over us.

Pistarch, in Vita.

Burrough's True Content.

DCCXCVI.—Church-spoilers condemned.

In the end of an old Latin verse are reckoned up three great wonders of England: ecclesiæ, feminae, lana (the churches, the women, and the wool). Feminae may pass still, who may justly challenge wonder for vanity, As for lana, if it be wonderful alone, most sure it is that it is ill-joined with ecclesia. The church is fleeced, and instead of wool hath gotten nothing but a bare pelt upon her back. And as for ecclesia, either men have said with the Babylonians, "Down with it! down with it, even to the ground!" or else, in respect of the maintenance, with Judas, "Ut quid perditio hæc (Why was this waste)?" They would have the Church put to board wages; the ministers, like St. Paul, to labour with their hands, rather than to be troublesome; but they will not, in the meantime, like those good primitive Christians, lay down all they have at the apostle's feet.

Hall's Contemplat. Poet of Berkeley.

"De ecclesia aut aliquid furatur, Judæ prædatori comparatur." AUG., in Joh.

Acts iv. 35.

DCCXCVII.—Wicked men instrumental for the good of God's children.

SOLINUS writeth of Hypanis, a Scythian river, that the water thereof is very bitter as it passeth through Exampius, yet very sweet in the spring. So the cup of trembling, which is offered to the children of God, is often very bitter at the second hand, as it is ministered unto them by profane persons, such as are haters of God and despisers of goodness; yet is it sweet at the first hand, as it is sent them from heaven. What Christ spake to Pilate, vaunting of the power and authority that he had over Him, the feeblest Christian may reply to the greatest potentate on earth: "Thou couldst have no power at all against me unless it were given thee from above." The wicked may have a will to hurt them, but power they have none, unless it be given them from above by God, who can and doth usually execute His judgments by unjust ministers, by the very worst of men; and let them intend never so much evil, plot never so much mischief against His servants, yet He will turn it to their good.

Cap. 20.

Du Moulin, de l'Amour de Dieu.

John xix. 10.

DCCXCVIII.—Riches, honour, &c., the devil's bait.

In some fenny places in England, where they are much troubled with gnats, they used to hang up dung in the midst of the room, for a bait for the gnats to fly to, and so catch them with a net provided for the purpose. Thus the devil ensnareth the souls of many men by alluring them with riches, honours, preferments, the muck and dung of this world, to undo them eternally.

Fuller's Meditat.

"Opes irritamenta malorum."

DCCXCIX.—*Neglect of prayer unto God condemned.*Hall's Contemplat."Nec deficiat oratione," &c.—
AUG., in Ps. lxxv.In Chron.

It is observable, that amongst the worst of men, Turks, and the worst of Turks, the Moors, it is a just exception against any witness by their law, that he hath not prayed six times in every natural day, it being usual with them that, before the daybreak, they pray for day; when it is day, they give thanks for day; at noon, they thank God for half the day past; after that, they pray for a good sunset; after that, they thank God for the day past; and lastly, pray for a good night after their day. Shall not such as these rise up against many Christians amongst us, who suffer so many suns and moons to rise and set upon their heads, and never lift up their hearts to their Creator, to ask His blessing or to acknowledge it? such as rush into the affairs of God, and of their calling, and thrust themselves into actions either perilous or important, without ever lifting up their eyes unto the God of heaven, as if they made good that slanderous speech which Surius the Jesuit cast upon Martin Luther: "Nec propter Deum hæc res capta est, nec propter Deum finietur, &c." (This business was neither begun for God, nor shall be ended for Him)."

DCCC.—Not to serve time, but eternity.

Rev. 1. 6.

WHEN the master of the house is taken away, the family is out of order and at the point of dissolution. So miserable will be the condition of base time-servers when their great Master is taken from them, and the angel hath sworn that time shall be no longer. It is best, therefore, serving Him who is Eternal, a Master that can ever protect us.

DCCCL.—God's trial of his children by afflictions.

Plin., lib. xxviii.

Shute's Serm.,
Lond., 1622.

Eccl. xii. 8.

THE manner of the Psylli, which are a kind of people of that temper and constitution that no venom will hurt them, is, that if they suspect any child to be none of their own, they set an adder upon it to sting it, and if it cry, and the flesh swell, they cast it away as a spurious issue; but if it never so much as shrink, nor be the worse for it, then they account it for their own, and make very much of it. In like manner Almighty God tries His children: by enduring crosses and afflictions He suffereth the old serpent to sting them, and bring troubles and sorrows upon them; and if they patiently endure them, and make good use of them, He offereth Himself to them, as to His own children, and will make them heirs of His kingdom; but if they fall a-roaring and crying and storming and fretting, and can no ways abide the pain, He accounteth them as bastards, and no children.

DCCCII.—*Cares and crowns inseparable.*Hall's Contemplat.
Christ's Transfig.

1 Sam. x. 22.

THE emblem of King Henry VII., in all his buildings, in the windows, was still a crown in a bush of thorns, wherefore, or with what historical allusion he did so, is uncertain; but surely it was to imply thus much, that great places are not free from great cares; that no man knows the weight of a sceptre but he that sways it: This made Saul hide himself amongst the stuff when he should have been made a king. Many a sleepless night, many a restless day, and many a busy shift will their ambition cost them that affect such places of eminency; besides, aulæ culmen lubricum (high places are slippery), and as it is easy to fall, so the ruin is deep and the recovery difficult.

DCCCIII.—God wills not the death of a sinner.

SHOULD a prisoner, led to execution, hear the judge or sheriff call to him, and say, “Turn back, put in sureties for thy good behaviour hereafter, and live!” would he not suddenly leap out of his fetters, embrace the condition, and thank the judge or sheriff upon his bare knees? And what could be thought if God should send a prophet to preach a sermon of repentance to the devils, and say “Knock off your bolts, shake off your fetters, and turn unto the Lord and live!” would not hell be soon broke loose, and rid, before the prophet could make an end of his exhortation? Such a sermon the prophet Ezekiel now maketh to all sinners: “As I live, saith the Lord, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that he turn from his ways and live; turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways,” &c. Shake off the shackles of your sins, quit the company of the prisoners of death and galley-slaves of Satan, put in sureties for your good behaviour hereafter, turn to the Lord your God, and live—yea, live gloriously, live happily, live eternally.

Featly's Sermon

Ezek. xxxiii. 11,
18, 30, 31.

DCCCIV.—Married men better commonwealth's men than bachelors.

IT is the policy of the Londoners, when they send a ship into the Levant, or Mediterranean Sea, to make every mariner therein a merchant, each seaman adventuring somewhat of his own, which will make him more wary to avoid and more valiant to undergo dangers. Thus married men, especially if having posterity, are the deeper sharers in the state wherein they live, which engageth their affections to the greater loyalty; and though bachelors be the strongest stakes, yet married men are the best binders in the hedge of the commonwealth.

Fuller's Holy State

DCCCV.—One foul sin spoilth a great deal of grace.

WOULD it not vex a scrivener, after he had spent many days and taken much pains upon a large patent or lease, to make such a blot at the last word that he should be forced to write it all over again? Yet so it is, that one foul and enormous crime dasheth and obliterateth the fairest copy of a virtuous life; it razeth all the golden characters of Divine graces printed in the soul. As one drop of ink coloureth a whole glass of clear water, so one sinful and shameful action staineth all the former good life; all our fastings and prayers, all our sufferings for righteousness, all the good thoughts we ever conceived, all the good words we ever uttered, all the good works we ever performed, are lost at the very instant of our backsliding.

Featly's Sermon

DCCCVI.—The benefit of keeping close to good principles.

HE that intends to meet with one in a great fair, and knows not where he is, may sooner find him by standing still in some eminent place there, than by traversing up and down: thus, having taken thy stand upon some ground in religion, and keeping thy station in a fixed posture, never hunting after the times to follow them, it is a hundred to one but they will come to thee once in thy lifetime. Do but fear God and reverence thy superiors, stick close to the principles of obedience to the one and of respect to the other, and it is more than an even lay that such as are given to change, such as have betaken themselves to new lights in the ways of God, and can dispense with their engagement to him that is set over them, will come about, and begin to see at the last how they have been deluded.

Fuller's Holy State.

DCCCVII.—The sinner's memento.

Dan. v. 3-5.

Numb. xvi. 32.

Acts v. 1-10.

Acts xii. 22, 23.

Featly's Serm.

BELSHAZZAR'S quaffing in the Church-plate proved a fatal draught unto him; Korah, Dathan, and Abiram had no sooner opened their rebellious mouths against Moses, but the earth opened her mouth and swallowed them up quick; Ananias and Sapphira had no sooner told a lie and stood to it, but they were struck dead to the ground; Herod had scarcely made an end of his oration to the people, and received their applause, but the angel of the Lord smote him and made an end of him. Oh, that sinners of all sorts—blasphemous swearers, bloody murderers, unclean adulterers, and sacrilegious church-robbers—when the devil edges them on to any impiety or villainy, would but cast this rub in their way, and say to themselves, "What if God should take me in the manner and strike me in the very act, and cast me into the dungeon of hell, there to be tormented with the devil and his angels for evermore! Do I not provoke Him to it? Do I not dare Him? Hath He not threatened as much? Hath He not done as much? That which is one man's case may be any man's case," &c.

DCCCVIII.—*Kings and co-rivals inconsistent.*Bodin, de Repub., cap. 20."Nulla fides regni sociis, omnisque potestas, Impatiens consortio erit."

THE Grand Seignior, when he perceived with what acclamations of all the people his son Mustapha was entertained upon his return from Persia, he commanded him presently to be slain before him, and this oracle to be pronounced by the priest, "Unus in cælo Deus, unus in terris sultanus (One God in heaven, one sultan on the earth)!" And it is true that two suns in one hemisphere have ever been portentous; the crowns of kings and princes will not admit of rivals; that kingdom can never stand where are two supreme and uncontrollable commanders.

DCCCIX.—*Easy to come into trouble, hard to get out.*Pier. d'Ancre, Of the Uncertainty of Things, lib. ii,
dist. 4.Virgil's Æneid,
lib. vi.

WHEN Francis I., king of France, was consulting with his captain how to lead his army over the Alps into Italy, whether this way or that way, Amarill, his fool, sprang out of a corner where he sat unseen, and bade them rather take care which way they should bring their army out of Italy back again. Thus it is easy for one to interest and embark himself in another's quarrel, to be engaged for another's debt, facilis descensus, &c.; but how to be disengaged, how to come off hic labor, hoc opus est, there lies the difficulty.

DCCCX.—*Divisions usher in destruction.*Featly's Serm."Discordia ordinum reipub. venenum."
—T. LIVIUS.

Matth. xli. 25.

WHEN Cyrus came near Babylon with his great army, and finding the river about it, over which he must pass, so deep that it was impossible to transport it that way, he suddenly caused it to be divided into many channels, whereby the main river sunk so on the sudden, that with great facility he passed it over and took the city. That maxim in philosophy, "Omne divisibile est corruptibile," holds in all states and societies. The divisions amongst the Trojans brought in the Grecians, the divisions amongst the Grecians brought in Philip, the divisions of the Assyrian monarchy brought in the Persian, of the Persian brought in the Macedonian, of the Macedonian brought in the Roman, of the Roman brought in the Turk; lastly, the divisions among the Britons of this nation brought in, first the Saxons, next the Danes, and last of all the Normans: and who shall come next, invited by our uncivil civil distractions, God knows. So true is that axiom of Christ, "A kingdom divided within itself cannot stand."

DCCCXI.—When sins are at the height, then comes destruction.

A FISHERMAN, when in a clear water he seeth a fish come to his hook, nibble at the bait, bite it, and swallow it down, then he giveth a jerk with his angle-rod, and striketh him. So Almighty God oftentimes permits wicked purposes and enterprises to hold on till they come to a straight line, till they are upon the very height, and then He turns and overturns them. In foribus hydram, He breaks the pitcher at the door, cutteth down the ear of corn when it is full, lanceth the sore when it is ripe. When the sins of the Amorites are full, then comes judgment; when the sins of a people or nation are at the height, then comes destruction.

Strong's Serm.,
Westm., 1640.

DCCCXII.—The tongue is the heart's interpreter.

THE strokes in music answer to the notes that are pricked in the rules. The anatomists teach that the heart and tongue hang upon one string; and hence it is that, as in a clock or watch, when the wheel is moved, the hammer striketh. So the words of the mouth answer to the motions of the heart; and when the heart is moved with any perturbation or passion, the hammer beats upon the bell and the mouth soundeth. The reason why so many are tongue-tied in their devotions to God is, because they are hide-bound in their hearts; they cannot bring forth without, because they have no stock within; their words stick in their mouths, because they have no form in their hearts.

Cic., de Orat., lib.
iii.

Featly, ut antea.

Ps. xlv. i.
Rom. x. 10.
Luke vi. 45.

DCCCXIII.—God's power, wisdom, &c., to be seen in all the creatures.

It is most strange, yet most true, which is reported, that the arms of the Duke of Rhone, in France, which are "filils," or lozenges, are to be seen in the wood or stones throughout all his country, so that, break a stone or lop a bough of a tree, and one shall behold the grain thereof (by some secret cause in nature) diamonded or streaked in the fashion of a lozenge. Yea, the very same in effect is observed in England; for the resemblance of stars, the arms of the worshipful family of the Shugburys, in Warwickshire, is found in the stones within their own manor of Shugbury. But what shall we say? The arms of the God of heaven—namely, power, wisdom, and goodness, &c.—are to be seen in every creature in the world, even from worms to men, from sensible to insensible creatures; there is not the least pile of grass that a man can tread upon, but sets out a deity unto us and tells us there is a God of power, wisdom, and goodness, &c.

Fuller, ut antea.

Camd., Britan.

"Quam libet herba Deum."

DCCCXIV.—Great safety in attending to the ministry of the Word.

ALL the adventurers in the great ship, called Argonavis, bound for Colchis to fetch the golden fleece, when they were assaulted by the Syrens, endeavouring to enchant them with their songs, found no such help in anything against them as in Orpheus's pipe. We are all adventurers for a golden crown in heaven; and, as the Grecians, so we are waylaid by Syrens—the world, the flesh, and the devil, evil spirits and their incantations—from which we cannot be safe but by attending to the Word of God, by listening to the preachers of the Gospel, who, when they pipe unto us out of the Word, our hearts should be so taken up with that celestial music that nothing else whatsoever should have the least entertainment.

Ovid, Metam.

DCCCXV.—Hypocrisy discovered.

Pantaleon, in Vita Rodolphi.
Fulgos., lib. vi.,
cap. 4.
Bonfin., lib. viii.,
decad. 2.

Strong's Serm.,
Westm., 1650.

OTTOCAR, king of Bohemia, refused to do homage to Rodolphus I. till, at last, chastised with war, he was content to do him homage privately in a tent; which tent was so contrived by the emperor's servants, that, by drawing a cord, all was taken away, and so Ottocar was presented on his knees, doing his homage, to the view of three armies then in the field. Thus God at last shall uncase the closest dissembler to the sight of men, angels, and devils, having removed all veils and pretences of religion and piety. No goat in a sheep-skin shall steal on His right hand. Here it is that men may go with their cloaks muffled over their faces, but then they shall be dismantled; here the graves are covered, but then they shall be laid open; here the glossing hypocrite may pass for a real honest man, but then he shall be discovered and made known what he is indeed.

DCCCXVI.—To speak well of the dead.

Kepos., Imperat.
Vite.
Erasmi Adagia.

Franc. Salis., Introduc., à la Vie Dévoté.

CHARLES, the emperor, when the Spanish soldiers would have digged up the bones of Luther, "Simite ipsum, inquit, quiescere ad diem resurrectionis et judicium omnium, &c. (Let him rest," saith he, "till the resurrection and the final judgment; if he was a heretic, he shall then have a heretic's reward)." Humanity, that forbids the rifling of a grave, bids forbearance toward him that is shut in it and cannot answer for himself. "De mortuis nil nisi bonum" was the saying of old; to speak well of the dead is a thing both commendable and Christian; and much to blame are they that, not contented to abuse the bodies, besmear the memories, and also quarrel at the salvation of the souls of men departed.

DCCCXVII.—The increase of drunkenness in England.

Fuller's Holy State.

It is an observation amongst the mariners, that as the sea grows daily shallower and shallower on the shores of Holland and Zealand, so the channel of late waxeth deeper and deeper on the coasts of Kent and Essex. It is much to be feared that, as drunkenness ebbs in Holland, it flows in England; that it hath gained in the island what is lost in the continent.

DCCCXVIII.—How to walk circumspectly.

Stille's Serm.,
Lond., 1628.

"Sedem prope-ram ad unam."

WHEN children meet with primroses, nuts, or apples in the way, then they loiter on their errands, bring night home, and so get the displeasure of their parents; whereas those that meet with dangers or some affrights by the way make haste in their journey, and their speed makes them welcome with commendations. Thus God hath sent all of us abroad into the world, and we are every day travelling homeward: if we meet with miseries and vexations in the way, discretion should teach us a religious haste in our journey; and if we meet with pleasures, they should only pleasure us by putting us in mind of those pleasures which are at God's right hand for evermore, or else to scorn them as worse than trifles, and to look upon them as pullbacks in the ways of God and goodness.

DCCCXIX.—The great danger of law-suits.

Warwick's Resolved
Meditat.

It is the relation of a gentleman, that seeing a jer-falcon let fly at a heron, he observed with what clamour the heron entertained the sight and approach of the hawk, and with what winding shifts he strove to get above her, labouring, even by bemuting his enemy's feathers, to make her flag-winged, and so escape; but at last, when they must needs come to a necessitated encounter, resuming courage out of necessity, he turned face against her, and striking the hawk through the gorge, both fell down dead together. This fight doth much resemble some great suit in law, where one, trusting more to his cause's potency than his cause's equity, endeavours to disinherit his stubborn neighbour by colourable title to his land. Here you may hear the clamorous obloquies of the wronged, and see the many turnings and winding meanders of the law, sought out to get above his adversary; and then, when the issue must come to trial, oftentimes in the grapple they both sink to beggary, whilst lawfully they seek to get one above the other.

"Sic cedit viribus æquum."—OVID, de Trist.

DCCCXX.—Conscientious preachers not to be slighted.

It was a memorable passage that fell some years since from a godly man, preaching before the king: "I observe," said he, "that the ambassadors that come from Placentia are welcome to this place, whereas those that come from Verona are slightly set by; but it will hereafter be found true that one Dr. Latimer, with his downright English, will be worth a thousand Dr. Shawes, who, in a sermon at St. Paul's-cross, by the command of the then Duke of Gloucester, lost both his wits and his honesty together." The sermon being ended, an eminent courtier having observed the preacher to have been an ancient chaplain, constant in his attendance, religious in the performance of his duty to God and the king, asked a great prelate, then at court, how it came to pass that so grave, so religious, so conscientious a preacher, did not rise (he meant by way of preferment) in all that time. "Truly," said this great man; "let me tell you that I verily think he will never rise till the resurrection." Thus was Amos slighted, Micaiah clapped into prison, John the Baptist beheaded, St. Paul counted an enemy by the Galatians, because he told them the truth; by all which it appears what cheap markets are made of conscience, and how little conscientious preachers are set by. But had men their wits about them they would make much of such preachers, and hug such doctrine that lays hold upon their consciences, that tells them what Christ is, and what Christ hath done and suffered for them, and what returns they have made, that whereas He hath loaded them with blessings and benefits, they have laden Him with their sins and transgressions.

Dr. Webb.

Stow's Chron.

Earl of Dorset.

Walker's Serm.,
Lond., 1629.

Amos vii. 13.
1 Kings xxii. 27
Matt. xiv. 10.
Gal. iv. 16.

DCCCXXI.—The benefit of self-examination.

It is reported of Sextus, that every night before he slept he asked of his own heart: "What evil hast thou this day amended? What vice hast thou shunned? What good hast thou done? In what part art thou bettered?" Thus must every good Christian do. There is nothing more pleasant than this custom, for a man to examine himself, to commune with his own heart, to call himself to an account how he hath passed the whole day, what good he hath omitted, what bad he hath committed, closing up all with prayer and praises to God. Then will his conscience be at quiet, his sleep both sweet and comfortable.

Seneca, de Ira,
lib. iii.

Mason's Tribun.
of Conscience.

DCCCXXII.—Harlots the devil's night-nets to ensnare us.

WHEN the larker spreads out his day-net in a fair morning, and whirls about his artificial motion, it is easy to observe how, by the reflecting of the sun on the wheeling instrument, not only the merry lark and fearful pigeon are dazzled and drawn with admiration, but stouter birds of prey. The swift merlin and towering hobby are enticed to stoop, and, gazing on the outward form, lose themselves. Thus harlots and lewd women, the very night-nets of the devil, are spread out for the sons of men in the vigour of their youth, who,

Warwick's Resolved
Med.

"Stat meretrix, parvo culvis mercabilis ære."— OVID, Am. i.

with rolling eyes, draw on the lustfulness of affection and betray the wantonness of the heart, and with their alluring glances too often make to stoop within the danger of their fatal snare, not only the simple and careless, but others also, men of known parts, men otherwise wary and wise, who, coming within pull of the net, lie at the merciless mercy of that treacherous fowler the devil, to their certain and inevitable danger.

DCCCXXIII.—The pharisee and the publican differenced.

Warwick, ut antea.

Look but upon two sawyers working in the pit : the one casts his eye upward, whilst his main action tends downward ; the other stands with a countenance dejected, whilst his work is to draw the saw upward. Thus the pharisee and the publican, the rotten-hearted hypocrite and the real professor : the one looketh up towards heaven, whilst his actions tend to the pit infernal ; the other casts down his head, whilst his hand and his heart move upward. The one seems better than he is ; the other is better than he seems : the one hath nothing but form ; whilst the other hath the power of godliness.

DCCCXXIV.—The court favourite's condition.

Warwick, ut antea.

Look but upon a gallant ship, well rigged, trimmed, and tackled, manned and munitioned, with her top and top-gallant and her spread sails proudly swelling with a full gale in fair weather, putting out of the haven into the smooth main, and drawing the spectators' eyes with a well-wishing admiration ; but soon after to hear of the same ship split against some dangerous rock, or racked by some disastrous tempest, or sunk by some leak sprung in her by some accident. This were a sudden change. And just such is the court favourite's condition : to-day, like Sejanus, he dazzleth all men's eyes with the splendour of his glory, and with the proud and potent beak of his powerful prosperity cutteth the waves, and plougheth through the press of the vulgar, scorning to fear any obstacle at his keel below, or any cross-winds from above ; and yet to-morrow, in some storm of unexpected disfavour, springs a leak in his honour, and sinks on the Syrtes of disgrace, or, dashed against the rocks of displeasure, is split and wrecked in the Charybdis of infamy, and so concludes his voyage in misery and misfortune.

"Brevis est magni fortuna favoris."— SILIUS ITAL.

DCCCXXV.—Every man haunted with one evil spirit or other.

Neubrigens, Hist.

THERE is a story of a countryman of ours, one Kettle, of Farnham, in the time of King Henry II., who had the faculty to discern spirits by the same token, that one time he saw the devil spitting over the drunkards' shoulders into their pots, at another time laughing at a rapacious usurer's elbow, whilst he was piling up gold in his coffers. The same faculty is reported of Anthony the hermit ; and Sulpitius reports the same of St. Martin. These were the wonders of those dark times ; but there is no such matter of admiration in these ill-spirited times of ours to see and clearly discern both devils and devilish-minded men. Hell may now seem to be broken loose. What natural man is free ? One hath the spirit of error, another the spirit of fornication, another the spirit of fear, another the spirit of slumber, another the spirit of giddiness, all spiritum mundi (the spirit of the world) ; every man is haunted with one ill spirit or other.

Athanasius Alexand., in Vita ejus.

Hall's Contemplat.

1 Tim. iv. 2.

Hosea ii.

2 Tim. i. 7.

"Atque hi sunt
manes quos patimur."

DCCCXXVI.—Want of maintenance the waste of religion.

Ryland's Speech in Parliam., 1625.

ONE asked sometimes how it was that in Athens, so good and great a city, there were no physicians ; to whom this answer was made : " Because there are no rewards proposed to them that practise physic." The same answer may be made for our times. The cause why the Church of God is so forsaken, why religion and the profession thereof is so much undervalued, is because of the want of zeal in them that should, either for their courtesy or for their ability, be fosterers of learning, and increase the livings, where occasion is, and give hope and comfort to learned men. What said I? Increase? Nay, the livings and provisions which heretofore were given are now quite taken away, so that he which feedeth the flock hath least part of the milk; and he that goeth a warfare hath not half his wages; and he that laboureth and sweateth in the vineyard of the Lord of hosts hath his hire abridged and abated. Hence it is that scandalous livings make scandalous ministers, and scandalous, necessitated ministers make the ordinances of God despised.

Impropriators.

DCCCXXVII.—Spoilers of Church and state condemned.

WHEN Augustus had beautified Rome with setting up many fair buildings, he said "Inveni lateritium, marmoream reliqui (I found it made of brick, but I leave it made of marble)." Such was the inscription set upon the cathedral at Carlisle, as relating to Dr. Robinson, then bishop of that see: "Invenit destructum, reliquit extractum (he found it ruined, but left it repaired)." Here was a good exchange: marble for brick, reparation for ruin. But oh, the sad inversion of late times, as concerning both Church and state, the ruins of the one and dilapidations, nay, the extirpations of the other; where religion was become rebellion, faith faction, reformation deformation; where temples were turned into stables, princes' palaces into guards of unruly soldiers, monarchy into anarchy, and the well-compacted body of the government both in Church and state into a licentious looseness of life and conversation.

Phil. Nepos, in Vita Augusti.

"In typo Carleolensis."

DCCCXXVIII.—God regardeth and rewardeth his people.

WHEN Ahasuerus read in the Book of the Records of the Chronicles, and there found how Mordecai had discovered a plot of treason against his person, he did not lay the book aside, and slightly pass by such a piece of service, but inquires what honour and what dignity had been done to Mordecai. It seems, if the king had thought on or read him sooner, he had rewarded him sooner; but God hath ever in His eye all the records and chronicles of His people's actions: He reads their journals every day, and where He meets with any that have done or spoken anything aright for Him, He inquireth what honour, what dignity hath been done for this man. If none hath been done, He will do it Himself; if anything hath been done, He will do yet more. Not a sigh, not a tear, not a thought for the glory of Christ shall fall unregarded, unrewarded.

Ezra vi. 2.

Caryll's Serm., Westminster.

"Deus absolute bonum perpetuo beneficus."—ATHEGORAS, in Legal., &c.

DCCCXXIX.—God's wisdom to be attended with patience.

It is a great burden to wait upon a fool; but we can easily stay for the resolutions of the wise, who, we are sure, have the compass of a business in their heads, and are skilled in timing and ordering every circumstance thereof. How blessed, then, are they who, while they work for things below, can attend upon the great God both of heaven and earth, whose moderation and judgment and wisdom are such as will not suffer them either to do anything before the set, appointed, fit time come, nor to stay the doing of it one minute after. Never any man repented his waiting patiently upon God's disposal of him.

Micklethwaite's Serm., Lond., 1634.

DCCCXXX.—A worldly-minded man no public-spirited man.

Melch. Adamus, in Vita Bezae.

It is recorded of the King of Navarre, then a Protestant, being pressed by Beza to appear more in the cause of God, and to own religion to the purpose, he makes answer to this effect, that he was their friend, but he resolved to put no further to sea than he might get to shore if a storm should arise. He resolved not to hazard his hopes of the crown of France, and it is well known what became of him. So, when men will make religion as twelve, and the world as thirteen, it is no marvel if, with Demas, they forsake the cause of God and embrace the world; and, with those potters in the first book of Chronicles, had rather work with the king for good wages than build up the house of the Lord.

2 Tim. iv. 10.

Potter's Serm.,
Lond., 1640.

DCCCXXXI.—Time present to be well husbanded.

Wingfield's Mount
Tabor.

UPON the dial-piece of the clock in the college church of Gloucester are pourtrayed four angels, each of them seeming to say something to those that look up to see what o'clock it is, the whole inscription being made up of two old Latin verses, after the rhyming manner—

1. An labor, an requies,
2. Sic transit gloria mundi :
3. Præterit iste dies,
4. Nescitur origo secundi.

Which may be thus Englished :—

“Whether we rest or labour, work or play,
The world and glory of it pass away ;
This day is past, or near its period grown,
The next succeeding is to us unknown.”

“Labitur occulte, fallitque volubilis ætas.”—OVID, Met., lib. x.

And most sure it is, whether we sleep or wake, the ship of our life goes on; whether we do well or ill, live frugally or prodigally, our time, with the whole world and glory of it, is transitory, and continually wheeling about, like the minutes to the hour, or the hours to the time of day in the clock; so that time past is irrecoverable, time to come uncertain, and all the time we can reckon of is the present time, this moment of time, whereupon dependeth eternity.

DCCCXXXII.—Mortality's memorandum.

Wingfield's Mount
Tabor.

THE noble Lord Chancellor Egerton, coming down the stairs at York House, to go to Westminster Hall, in the term time, observed to be written upon the wall—belike by some one or other that feared oppression by some mighty adversary—these three words: “Tanquam non reversurus!” as though he should never return again, hinting thereby unto his lordship to do justice. And it may serve for a good memorandum to all good Christians, to make them the more wary and watchful of their actions, when they go abroad out of their houses, chambers, or lodgings, even for this reason—because they may happen not to return again. There would be condescension in the plaintiff's heart, reconciliation in the defendant, truth in the lawyer, conscience in the judge, plain dealing in the tradesman, in every man and woman's heart an avoiding of evil-doing, did they but think on these few words, “Tanquam non reversurus,” and consider whether they would speak or do thus and thus if they were presently to die, or whether thus and thus behave themselves abroad if they were not to return again to their homes.

“Non est (crede mihi) sapientis dicere, vivam.”—
MARTIAL, xi.

DCCCXXXIII.—Worldly men are easily taken off from the service of God.

THERE is a pretty story of a company of people that met at the market together, amongst whom there was one that played excellently upon the harp, so that all crowded to hear him, as being ravished with the music. But no sooner did the market bell ring, but they were all gone; only one stayed behind, that was thick of hearing; to whom the harper was much beholding, and told him that he much honoured his music by staying to hear it, when the rest were gone at the ringing of the market bell. "What! the market bell! hath that rung?" said the deaf man. "Nay, then, farewell; I must be gone too." Thus it is with too many of us: if the exchange bell or the market bell ring but once, yet at the sound of them what running is there! Happy is he that can get thither first. But for the church bell, that may ring again and again, yet, nondum venit tempus, much ado there is to get men and women to church; and when their bodies are rung in thither, it is a thousand to one but their minds are roving abroad in the world. Let the charmer charm never so sweetly, the preacher instruct never so comfortably, their ears, the spiritual ears of their souls, are, like the deaf adder, so stopped that they will not listen at all to his doctrine, though never so sound and orthodox.

Strabo., Geograph.
lib. xiv.

Andrews' Serm.
Lond., 1619.

"Multū vocem prædicatoris audiunt, sed post vocem vacui recedunt."— GREG., in Esach.

DCCCXXXIV.—The reverence of man more than God a true sign of a decaying state or kingdom.

AMYRIS being sent by the Sybarites to the oracle of Delphi, to consult how long their commonwealth should stand, it was answered that it should continue ever, until they revered man more than the gods. He seeing one day a slave beaten by his master, and flying to the altar of refuge, yet his master spared him not there; then the slave fled to the tomb of his master's father, and then his master spared him; which, when Amyris perceived, presently he went and sold all that he had, and went to dwell at Peloponnesus: "For now I see," said he, "that men are more revered than the gods." But certainly, if that the reverence of man more than God be a true sign of a decaying state or kingdom, then this of ours must needs be in a sinking condition. What crying up is there of the acts and ordinances of men! and in the meantime, what slighting and contempt of God's Word and commandments! What mean those base compliances with men, when God is set by as not worthy of our notice? What, but to bring down heavy judgments upon such a people or nation?

Suidas, in Vita.

Goddard's Serm.
Lond., 1652.

"Melius est obedire Deo, quam hominibus."

DCCCXXXV.—The honour and dignity of the ministry, and why so.

THERE is a story how the castle of Truth being, by the King of Jerusalem, left to the guard and keeping of his best servant, Zeal, the King of Arabia, with an infinite host, came against it, begirt it round with an irresistible siege, cut off all passages, all reliefs, all hopes of friends, meat, or ammunition; which Zeal perceiving, and seeing how extremity had brought him almost to shake hands with despair, he calls his council of war about him, and discovers the sadness of his condition, the strength of his enemy, the violence of the siege, and the impossibility of conveying either messages or letters to the Great King his master, from whom they might receive new strength and encouragement. Whereupon, the necessity of the occasion being so great, they all conclude there was no way but to deliver the castle—though upon very hard terms—into the hands of the enemy. But Zeal staggers at the resolution, and being loth to lose hope, as long as hope had any thread or hair to hold by, he told them he had one friend or companion in the castle, who was so wise, so valiant, and so fortunate, that to him and to his exploits alone he would deliver the management of their safety. This was Prayer, the chaplain to the Great King and the priest to that colony. Hence Prayer was called for, and, all proceedings debated, he presently arms himself with humility, clemency, sincerity, and fervency, and, in despite of the enemy, makes his way through, came to the King his master, and with such moving passions enters his ears, that presently forces are levied, which, returning under the conduct of Prayer, raise the siege, overthrow the King of Arabia, make spoil of his camp, and give to the castle of Truth her first noble liberty; which performed, Zeal crowns Prayer with wreaths of olive, oak, and laurel, sets him on his right hand, and says, for his sake, divinity shall ever march in the first rank of honour. And certainly ministers of God's Word, such as apply their spirits most to the glory of God and the public good—especially such divines as are Timothys in their houses, Chrysostoms in their pulpits, and Augustines in disputations; such as are just in their words, wise in their counsels; such as are vigilant, diligent, and faithful in the execution of their place—who, that is not royal, should seek in honour to precede them?

Markham's Decade of Honour.

Theutonici Sylos Similitudinum.

"Et dominum mundi flectere vota valent."—MARTIAL., Ep. ad Demitian.

"Grandis dignitas sacerdotum," &c., JER., in Exel.

DCCCXXXVI.—How enemies are to be hated.

Harwood's Serm., Lond., 1649.

IF a general of an army, laying siege to some great fort or castle, and, upon the storming of it, the guns from off the walls, playing fiercely upon him, should do abundance of execution, were it not madness in him, upon gaining of the place, to cast away those guns? It were so. What doth he, then? He lets fly at the gunner that fired them, but preserves the guns as serviceable for himself. Thus must we do with our enemies. They abuse us; they evilly treat us; they spitefully use us; they seek to destroy us and utterly to ruin us. What! shall we hate them, abuse them again? No; we must love them and do good unto them. Preserve the guns, but destroy the gunner; love their persons—they may be afterwards instrumental to God's glory—but hate their vices, that will be the undoing of our souls. This is that perfect hatred wherewith David hated his enemies.

"Bellum cum vitis, sed pax cum personis,"—ISIDOR.

Ps. cxxxix. 22.

DCCCXXXVII.—The great good which cometh by enemies.

Diog. Laert., in Vita.

Shute's Serm., Lond., 1621.

"Multos inimicitie illustrant, qui ob scurmansissent," &c.—PETRARCHA, Dilog.

IT was the saying of Socrates, that every man in this life had need of a faithful friend and a bitter enemy—the one to advise him, the other to make him look about him. In dealing with a friend, a man is often deceived; but if he have to do with an enemy, then he is wary of his proceedings, and placeth his words discreetly. Hence is it that much good cometh by enemies, and a good use may be made of them. They are the workmen that fit us and square us for God's building; they are the rods that beat off the dust, and the scullions that scour off the rust from our souls. Were it not for enemies, how could we exercise those excellent graces of love and charity, of patience and brotherly kindness? Had it not been for enemies, where had been the crown of martyrdom? Yet further: enemies are the fire that purgeth, the water that cleanseth the dross and filthiness of our hearts. Much every way is the good that cometh by enemies, if we make a right use of them.

DCCCXXXVIII.—Prayers for the dead unavailable.

Wincop's Serm., Lond., 1627.

LOOK but upon one that plays a game at bowls, how, no sooner than he hath delivered his bowl, what a screwing of his body this way and that way, what calling doth he make after it that it may be neither short nor over, nor wide on either side; but all in vain: the bowl keepeth on its course and reacheth to the place, not where the mind but the strength of the bowler sent it. Thus it is with those that pray for the dead: they pray and call unto God, and sing requiems and dirges for the souls of men departed, that they may be sent into purgatory, not hell—a course altogether unwarrantable, unavailable; for, as the body is laid down in the dust, so the soul is gone to God that gave it, there to receive according to the deeds done here in the flesh, whether it be to life or death eternal.

DCCCXXXIX.—Knowledge without practice reproved.

It is by some observed, that the toad, though otherwise an ugly venomous creature, yet carries a precious stone in his head, which, for the excellent virtues thereof, is worn in gold rings and otherwise. Such toads, such ugly creatures are most of men: they have the excellent jewel of knowledge in their heads, they can speak well, oh, but they act ill. They live not according to that knowledge; their life and conversation is rotten and infectious to the whole neighbourhood about them.

Aldrovand.,
Hist. de Serpent.

DCCCXL.—Blamelessness of life enjoined.

A CERTAIN Roman, the windows of whose house being so very low that every one which passed by might easily see what was done within, being proffered by a workman, at such a rate, to make his windows higher, and so more private, replied, "I had rather give thee as much again to let them alone; for I do nothing in my house but what I care not who knows it." And such a one ought every good Christian to be, so to carry himself as that he need not blush to tell his very thoughts if he were asked of them; and so to demean himself, as if he had pectus fenestratum (a glass window) in his bosom, that every one might read his mind there.

Cleric's Serm.
Marc. Drusius.
Vell. Patere.

"Integer vitæ sce-lerisque purus," &c —HORAT., Ode xxii., lib. I.

DCCCXLI.—The tedious length of law-suits.

As Joshua said of the building of Jericho, "He shall lay the foundation thereof in his first-born, and in his youngest son shall be set up the gates thereof." So there may be a suit at law commenced in the birth of our first-born, and yet our youngest son shall not see the gates thereof—that is, the end of it.

Squire's Serm.,
Lond., 1637.
Josh. vi. 26.

DCCCXLII.—The true Christian's safety in danger.

WHEN the Grecians had won Troy, before they fell to plunder it they gave every man leave to bear his burthen out of what he would, and, first of all, Æneas marched out, carrying his household gods; which, when they saw, and that he did them no great damage thereby, they bade him take another burden, which he did, and returned with his old father, Anchises, on his back, and his young son, Ascanius, in his hand, which, the Grecians seeing, passed by his house, as Joshua did by the house of Rahab, saying that no man should hurt him that was so religious. And thus that man that hath his mind set on his God shall receive no hurt by his enemy: "When his ways please the Lord, his very enemies shall become his friends." Nay, he shall be in league with the stones of the field, and the beasts of the wood shall be at peace with him. And, which is yet more, God will break the bow and the sword, and snap the spear asunder; He will make all those terrible instruments of war so unserviceable, that they shall lie down quietly by him, not offering the least hurt that may be.

Dares, Phryg., de
Bello Trojano, Merchantii Hortus
Pastorum.

Prov. xvi. 7.

Job v. 23.

Hos. ii. 18.

DCCCXLIII.—Godliness the best friend.

SUPPOSE a man be cast in prison for some notorious crime, and is thereupon sentenced to death, he sends for one of his friends, entreating him to sue to the king for a pardon. He

Diez., Summa
Prædict.

answers he cannot do it; this he will do for him, he will give him a winding-sheet and a coffin. Then he sends to another; he tells him all that he can do for him is to see him buried. But a third goes to the king and gets a pardon for him. Even so riches: they can do nothing for us but give us a winding-sheet and a coffin; and our friends, they can only see us buried; but godliness is the true fast friend at a dead lift, that gets us a pardon for our sins, having the promise both of this life and that which is to come.

"Pietas ad omnia utilis."
1 Tim. iv. 8.

DCCCXLIV.—When the hypocrite is discovered.

As long as the hedgehog lies on the dry ground, she shows nothing but her prickles; but put her into the water, then she shows her deformity. Thus an hypocrite, so long as he is on the dry ground of prosperity, then he is humble and patient, and shows nothing for a time but the prickles of repentance; but let him be thrown into the waters of affliction or the fire of persecution, then he sheweth himself what he hath in him, which before was kept close.

Strong's Serm.,
Westm., 1651.

DCCCXLV.—Manna, the heavenly food of God's Word, how to relish it.

It is observed that, when the beak of the eagle is grown so big that she cannot eat any meat, so that thereupon she becometh very poor and bare of her body, she goeth to a rock and there dasheth her beak against it, till she have broke off the end of it; and then she feeds with much more ease, and so recovereth her strength again. Thus, when we have lost our taste and cannot relish that heavenly manna, the precious food of our souls, we must repair to the rock Christ Jesus, and there knock off all those domineering lusts and disordered affections, the irregularity of our wills and perverseness of our judgments, and then, and not till then, shall we taste how good the Lord is, and come to ourselves again.

Aldrovandi Ornithologia.

Honorii Serm. de Circumcissione.

DCCCXLVI.—The joys of God's children invisible.

It is St. Augustine's own relation of a certain Gentile, that showed him his idol-gods, saying, "Here is my god; where is thine?" then, pointing up to the sun, he said, "Lo! here is my god; where is thine?" so, showing him divers creatures, still upbraided him with "Here are my gods; where are thine?" But, as the father answered him, "I showed him not my God, not because I had not one to show him, but because he had not eyes to see Him." Thus the joys of a Christian, though they cannot be seen with bodily eyes, though the wicked cannot so much as discern them, yet is there nothing so delightful, so comfortable as they are: witness that peace of conscience, that joy in the Holy Ghost, which is so unspeakable, such as eye hath not seen, nor ear hath heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive them as they are.

In Lib. Confes.

White's Serm.,
Lond., 1653.

DCCCXLVII.—God's trial of His children by afflictions.

THERE is a custom amongst the Germans, that they might know whether their children were bastards or not, to throw them in fluvium Rhenum (into the river of Rhine). If they floated above, then they acknowledged them to be their own; but if the water carried them away, then they esteemed them but as bastards. So God casts His children into flumina afflictionis (floods of afflictions). Those that swim to Christ by a true and lively faith, them He acknowledgeth as His; but those who, by the violence of lust, are sunk and drenched in sin, He looketh upon as bastards, not as sons.

Sebast. Munster, Cosmographia.

"Imposita te alto fortuna," &c.— OVID, ad Laurum.

DCCCXLVIII.—The silent coming of God's Spirit into the heart of man.

RIVERS that at first run out of the sea are not heard, because of the extraordinary noise of the ocean ; they run out, no man hearing them, nor seeing the place where the main brancheth itself into rivulets ; but as they run back into the sea, being swelled with the new access of land-waters, make a great noise in their return. Even so is the Spirit of God : it comes quietly and silently into the heart of man, so that the man that hath it knoweth not when it came to him—of the day and hour knoweth he nothing ; yet at the return thereof unto God that gave it, there is a voice of praise and thanksgiving.

Leech's Serm.,
Lond., 1619.

DCCCXLIX.—God's trial of His children by cleansing their hearts.

WHEN the Queen of Sheba came to hear the wisdom of Solomon, the more to search out the same, as the Rabbins do observe, she dressed boys in women's apparel, and girls in men's apparel, asking of him which were the boys and which the girls ; whereupon he bids them all to wash their hands and their faces, and those which he perceived to wash the more, them he judged to be boys, the others girls. Thus the Lord maketh a difference to be seen betwixt His children, the children of light, and the children of darkness, by how much the more His children do purify and cleanse themselves, to be kept unspotted of the world. It is not a little smearing will serve the turn with them ; but rather than they shall seem not to be sufficiently cleansed, they will cry out with David, "Amplius lava me, Domine (Lord, wash me thoroughly) !" &c.

2 Chron. ix.

Plantavicii Florileg.
Rabbinicum.

Ps. li. 2

DCCCL.—The sinner's security.

SUPPOSE a traveller, in a stormy night, should take up his lodging in some cave in the woods, where is nothing but serpents and adders and such like venomous creatures ; he, because he sees them not, sleeps as soundly as if he were at home in his own bed ; but when the morning comes, and he sees what companions are about him, he useth all the means possible and maketh all the haste he can to get away. In the same case is every impenitent sinner beset with as many serpents as he hath sins, though he cannot see them, and therefore fears them not, but sleeps as soundly as if he were in Solomon's bed, about which was a guard of threescore valiant men, of the valiant of Israel. But when it shall once please God to open his eyes, then he sees the dangerous condition of his estate, and labours to get out of it as fast as he can.

Pontani Bibliothec.
Conclonat.

"Nemo securus esse debet in vita ista," &c.—AUG., de Lib.
Arbit., lib. ii.

Cant. iii. 7.

DCCCLI.—Man the best and the worst of creatures.

THE philosopher, being asked which was the best member of the body, answered, "The tongue ;" and being asked again which was the worst, answered, "The tongue : if good, the only trumpet of God's glory ; if bad, a very firebrand of hell." So, if it were asked which creature of God were the best, the answer would be, "Man in honour, before his fall ;" and what the worst creature, "Man in his fall ;" which hath not understanding, but is compared to beasts that perish.

Laert. Diog., in Viti Philo.

"Præ omnibus malis, homo est pessim-um malum," &c.
—CHRY.

DCCCLII.—The fall of man described.

MAN was once the mirror of all understanding, the hieroglyphic of wisdom, but now quantum mutatus ab illo (there is a great alteration). We see that the tallest trees first die at the top, and the highest cedars have the greatest lapse. So it hath happened in this man Goodman Glouc.

cestr., Fall of Man.

"Sanctius his animal mentisque, capacious altæ," &c.
—OVID, Mét. i.

"Heu tristis et lacrymosa mutatio!" &c.—BERN., in Cant. Ser. 25.
Prov. vi. 6.
Jer. viii. 7.
Isa. i. 3.
Matt. vi. 26.

of men, who at his creation was cedrus paradisi (God's sweet wood); but aspiring up, is not only through folly lopped off from what he was, but even cut down to the ground; so that, as it was said of the philosopher, "Aristotelem in Aristotele," and of Rome, "Romam in Roma quærere," so may we say of man, "Hominem in homine quærere, et quærentes non invenire;" for what was imago Dei (the very image of heaven) is now larva diaboli (the vizard of hell). He that was gloria terræ (the glory of the land) is now inutile pondus (the very burthen thereof); he that was entitled "dominus mundi et delitice Domini (the world's lord and the Lord's darling)" is now captivated and made a servant; he that was master of knowledge and wonder of understanding, perfect in the science of all things, is now grown sottish and senseless, not only, as Calvisius, forgetting those things which he was well acquainted with, but even losing the knowledge of himself. He that to whom all the beasts of the forest and every living creature before came, as the Queen of Sheba to Solomon, to admire his wisdom, must now go to the beasts and birds and creeping things to learn several lessons for instruction: to the pismire, for providence; to the stork and to the swallow, for a right use of time; to the ox and to the ass, for knowledge; to the fowls of the air, for confidence.

DCCCLIII.—The slothful Christian reproved.

Bosquieri, Ara Cali.

MAJOR LEPIDUS, a loose Roman, whilst his comrades, upon a very hot day, were exercised in the army, laid himself down in the shade, saying, "Utinam hoc esset laborare (I would this were all the duty that I had to do)!" So it may be said of many idle, slothful Christians amongst us, such as, with Balaam, wish to die the death of the righteous, but they will not take any care to live the life of the righteous; they would fain enter in at the strait gate, but they would be loth to crowd for it; they have longing desires to be in the Church triumphant, which is in heaven, but care not whether they ever make a step or not into that which is militant here upon earth.

DCCCLIV.—Prosperity of the wicked destructive.

De Trugillo, The Natur. Condon.

PROSPERITY to the wicked is as wind to a bladder, which swells it until it burst; like a ship when she is top and top-gallant, soonest cast away; like a spider in a king's house, soonest swept down. When a wicked man is at the highest, then he is nearest his fall; and usually, when he is in the ruff of all his bravery, God so orders it that he is humbled on a sudden.

DCCCLV.—God's acceptance of sinners through Christ.

Plutarch, in Vita.

Drexelli Zadatus Christianus.

THEMISTOCLES, on a time, having highly offended King Philip, and not knowing how to regain his favour, goes and takes young Alexander, his son, in his arms, and so presents himself before the king, which, when he saw, and perceiving the young child to smile upon him, his wrath was soon appeased towards him. Thus we have all of us highly offended and provoked the King of kings, God Himself. What shall we do to regain His favour? No way so ready as to take His Son Jesus Christ in our arms, and, upon the bended knees of our hearts, to prostrate ourselves before Him; and then we shall find, to our comfort, that, as one looking through a green or red glass, all things will seem to be of the same colour: so God, looking through His Son's righteousness upon us, will, for His sake, accept us as righteous, and so be reconciled unto us.

DCCCLVI.—The Christian's heart never quiet till it be in Christ.

THE needle's point in the seaman's compass never stands still, but quivers and shakes till it come right against the North Pole. The wise men of the East never stood still till they were right against the star which appeared unto them, and the star itself never stood still till it came right against that other Star which shined more brightly in the manger than the sun did in the firmament; and Noah's dove could find no rest for the sole of her foot all the while she was fluttering over the flood, till she returned to the ark with an olive branch in her mouth. So the heart of every true Christian, which is the turtle-dove of Jesus Christ, can find no rest all the while she is hovering over the waters of this world till she have the silver wings of a dove, and with the olive branch of faith fly to the true Noah, which signifieth rest, till Christ put forth His hand out of the ark and, taking her in, receive her to Himself.

Clark's Serm.

Matt. ii. 9.

Gen. viii.

DCCCVII.—Christ the proper food of the soul.

EVERY kind of living creature hath a kind of food proper to itself. Offer a lion grass and he will have none of it, but give him flesh and he eats it; fodder is for the herds and the flocks of the field, but flesh for the beasts of the woods that hunt for their prey. Thus, offer a Christian heart all the kingdoms of the world and the glory thereof, which is but as the flower of the grass, they will not down, there is no relish in them; but give it Christ, who saith, "My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed," then it falls to very eagerly and makes a comfortable meal thereof.

Diez, Sum. Predicant.

John vi. 55.

DCCCLVIII.—Prayers of the wicked ineffectual.

IT is said of the precious stone diacletes, that though it have many excelling qualities in it, yet it loseth them all if it be put into a dead man's mouth. And certainly prayer, which is the only jewel of a Christian, though it have many rare virtues in it, many excellencies belonging to it, yet it loseth them every one if it be put in a man's mouth who is dead in sins and trespasses.

Burgund., Biblioth. Mundi.

DCCCLIX.—The ungrateful Christian reproved.

WE would think that beggar intolerably impudent who, coming to our doors to ask an alms, and when we have bestowed on him some broken bread and meat, yet (like those impudent persons the Psalmist speaks of, that grudge and grumble if they be not satisfied, if they have not their own will and their own fill) he should not hold himself contented unless he might have one of our best dishes from the table. But this is the case of very many amongst us: we come all as so many beggars to God's mercy-seat, "Quantumvis dives, dives Dei mendicus est; annon mendicus, qui panem petis?" saith St. Augustine. And God gives us abundance of many good things, as life, liberty, health of body, &c., yet we cannot be quiet, nor think ourselves well unless we be clothed in purple and fare deliciously every day as such and such do, not considering in the meantime many that are below us, and above us too, wanting those things which we comfortably enjoy.

Bernandio., Senen- sis.

Ps. lix. 15.

"Quam cito mortalibus benecium perit?"—SOPHOCLES in Ajace.

DCCCLX.—The great danger of little sins.

A LITTLE rope sufficeth to hang a great thief; a little dross abaseth much gold; a little poison infecteth much wholesome liquor; a little heresy corrupteth much sound doctrine; a little fly is enough to spoil all the alabaster box of ointment. So the smallest sin, the least peccadillo, without God's mercy, is sufficient to damn our souls to all eternity.

Boskieri, Cadus Evang.

DCCCLXI.—*A worldly-minded man no heavenly-minded man.*Bercnor, Moralitat.

THE lark, as long as she sits on the ground, is very silent and still; but having once mounted up into the air, hovering in the golden beams of the delightful sun, then she sets up her pretty little throat and chants it out merrily. It is just so with worldly-minded men: whilst their thoughts and affections are let out upon the things of the world, they are faint and dull, and as even dead to all good works; but when their minds are raised up to higher things, and their thoughts set upon heaven, then their notes are changed, they are put into such a tune as is both sweet and pleasant to God Himself.

"Mundus mundana quærit."DCCCLXII.—*The great power of fervent prayer.*In Catech. Majore.

IT is Martin Luther's saying, that prayer is bombarda Christianorum (the Christian's gun-shot). As, then, a bullet out of a gun, so prayers out of the mouth can go no further than the Spirit carrieth them: if they be timida (put out faintly), they cannot fly far; if they be tumida (hollow-hearted), then they will not pierce much: only the fervent, humble, active devotion hits the mark and pierceth the walls of heaven, though, like those of Gaza, they were made of brass and iron, &c.

Isa. xlv. 2.

DCCCLXIII.—*University learning to be countenanced by men in authority.*Miller's Serm.,
Lond., 1627

THE University of Cambridge hath for her arms a book, clasped, between four lions, and Oxford, a book, open, between three crowns, hereby signifying, that Englishmen may not only study the liberal arts closely and quietly, but also profess them publicly and openly, being guarded with the lion and the crown, protected thereby, and encouraged thereunto by royal charters and princely privileges; and thus the University of Heidelberg hath for her arms, a lion holding a book in his paw, intimating that persons in authority ought to be favourers of all good literature. Hence it comes to pass that universities are the nurseries of all sorts of learning, like the Persian tree, which, at the same time buds and blossoms and bears fruit. Some there are ripe for the Church, others drawing on to maturity, some in the flower, others in the bud of hope: all advancing themselves for the service of God and their country.

Theophrast., Eres. *de Plantis.*DCCCLXIV.—*The life of man miserable.*Fonseca's Serm., Quadrages.

THE life of man may very well be resembled to a river, which, as it comes from the sea, so it returns thither again. And thus the beginning and ending of our days may be said to be full of salt-water, full of crosses, full of misery: our first voice a cry, our last a groan. There may be, haply, some fair, fresh, clear water in the way, some lucida intervalla, some seeming delights and pleasures in the middle age of our life, but it passeth away so swiftly, that it is no sooner seen but gone.

"Nascimur in lacrymis," &c.— ANON.

Job iv. 14. 21.

DCCCLXV.—*Ministers, of all men, to be painful in their calling.*In his serm. before King Edward VI.

ART thou put to be a preacher of the Gospel, thou art a labourer; elders that rule well are worthy of double honour. Many (saith Bishop Latimer) can away with præsumt, but not with benè: if that benè were out of the text, all were well. If a man might eat the sweet and never sweat, it were an easy matter to be a preacher; if there were not opus, but bonum, all were well too ; but every clergyman is, or ought to be, ἐπίσκοπος. That, as St. Augustine says, is nomen operis. To be a steward and overseer in God's house is an office of great employment. Well, art thou a student in any profession, then, as Cato said of Scipio, "Thou must be least idle when thou art most idle." Thou must read diligently, confer often, observe daily ; reading makes a full man, conference a ready man, and writing an exact man.

"Pensate fratres, quanta damnationis est sine labore," &c.—JER.

DCCCLXVI.—Joy, how to be regulated.

As an able workman, in building a house, would not have too many windows, lest thereby he should weaken the house too much, nor too few, lest he should darken it too much : so should a man be not overjoyed upon the access of some prosperous fortune, nor over-much transported upon the income of some happy tidings, lest his too much outward joy should weaken his inward rejoicing ; neither must he not rejoice at all, lest his spirit become dull and stupid. But as the windows of the temple were broad without, yet narrow within, so, in the matter of joy, he must be full within, but somewhat contracted without.

Pet. Abelard, in Rom.

"Pone modum letici."—STAT., Theb. ii.

DCCCLXVII.—The study of divinity most necessary.

He that hath a garden-plot doth sow the pot-herbs as well as the marjoram, the leeks as the lily, the wholesome hyssop as the sweet carnation gillyflower: the which he doth to this intent, that he may have wholesome herbs, as well to nourish his inward parts as sweet flowers to please his outward senses, as well fruitful plants to refresh his body as fair shows to please his mind. Even so, he that hath a capacious brain, a pregnant wit, a fancy that is luxuriant, let such a head-piece apply himself as well to the sacred knowledge of divinity as to philosophy, to a Creator-knowledge as well as a creature-knowledge, that so he may reap, not only pleasure, but profit, not only contentment in mind, but quietness and peace of conscience.

Spencer's Serm., Lond., 1616.

"Theologia est doctrina necessaria homini," &c.—AQUIN., p. 1, q. 1, art. 10.

DCCCLXVIII.—Several varieties to be found in Scripture.

As in Noah's Ark were to be numbered all sorts of creatures, or as, in eodem prato (in the same meadow), the ox may lick up grass, the hound may find a hare, the bird may pick up seeds, the virgins gather flowers, and a man find a pearl: so, in one and the same Scripture, are varieties to be found for all sorts of conditions. In them the lamb may wade and the elephant swim, children may be fed with milk and meat may be had for stronger men : there is comfort for the afflicted, and ease for those that are weary and heavy laden, &c.

Camero, de Script.

DCCCLXIX.—Ministers, how to preach profitably.

As in building of a house, first, there must be a respect had to the situation, next, to the foundation, then, to the superstructure, the contriving of lights and several rooms, lastly, the covering to keep all dry : so every minister is to consider the situation of his text, what is the coherence, what is the context, and then, omitting the working of curious cobwebs in the top of the house, he must lay the foundation of sound doctrine, raise it upon strong pillars of reason, glaze it with natural demonstration, and, lastly, cover all with useful application.

Willan, Psittat. Serm., 1622.

"Qui ad vera prædicationis verba se præparat, necesse est," &c.—GREG., in Moral.

DCCCLXX.—The Scriptures but a dead letter without operation of the Spirit.

Pier. Charron, de la Sagesse.

It is reported of a great person, that, being desirous to see the sword wherewith Scanderbeg had done so great exploits, when he saw it, replied, he saw no such great matter in that sword more than any other sword. "It is truth," quoth one, standing by, "you see the sword, but not the arm that wielded it." So, when we look upon the Scriptures, the bare Word, whether printed in our Bibles or audible in the pulpit, we shall find no such business in it more than in other writings; but when we consider the arm of God's power that joins with it, when we look upon the operation of His holy Spirit working therein, then we shall change our thoughts and say, "Nec vox hominem sonat, O Deus certe!" or as Jacob did of Bethel, "Surely, of a certain, God is in this Word!"

"Nisi Spiritus sanctus adit cordi legentis," &c.—GREG., in Evangel.

DCCCLXXI.—The falls of good men presage the nation's ruin.

Lud. Carbo., Interior Homo.

WHEN a man cuts down his chiefest timber trees, it is an argument that he intends to part with his land; and hath not God, of late, cut down many of the tallest cedars in this our Lebanon? And what can we expect, such and so many are our wickednesses, but that He will either part with or depart from this sinful nation of ours? It is high time, therefore, to lay hold upon Him by faith, saying, "Help, Lord! for there is not one godly man left," &c.

Ps. xli. 1.

DCCCLXXII.—Neutrality in religion dangerous.

Pliny, Nat. Hist.

Aldrovandus, Ornitholog.

Harwood's Serm., Lond., 1649.

THERE is mention made of a kind of bastard eagle, that hath one leg like the goose, close at the foot, the other open and armed with talons, like that of the ordinary eagle: with the close foot she swimmeth on the water, and dives for fishes there; with the open foot she soareth into the air, and seizeth on her prey there. But so it is, that, participating thus of two several natures, her strength is weakened, and she herself made at last a prey to every ordinary crow. Thus fares it with all neuters, all hermaphrodites, all ambodexters in religion; such as have one close foot for sea and land, for the world and worldly things, and another open foot for the air above, for heaven and heavenly things. So that they may not be seen to float on the sea of this world altogether, they take themselves to their wing, and will seem to be religious, and make some small fluttering up of their hearts towards heaven, but all in vain; for, being divided in their thoughts, the act of their souls not being set upon the only object, God, and the powers and faculties thereof not contracted to Himward, no marvel if they wax faint in their duty and weak in all holy performances, so that the devil, like the ordinary crow, set upon them, conquer them, and lead them captive at his will.

DCCCLXXIII.—The devil most busy in time of prayer.

Perus, Comedies.

It is an usual custom that, two being at law together, when the suit comes to trial, the plaintiff, by his counsel, labours all that he can to hinder the defendant, that the judge may not hear him speak out what he is to say in his own defence. So the devil, the common plaintiff and accuser of all mankind, when he sees us upon our knees in addresses unto God, who is the Judge of all the earth, pleading for ourselves by prayer, and seeking the favour of God in the remission of our sins, by the merits of His Son Christ Jesus, then doth he stir most to interrupt us, by weakening our evidence, by throwing strange thoughts into our hearts, and so distracting our devotions, that we may not be heard in what we pray for.

DCCCLXXIV.—Sense of sin is from God only.

As, when the pool of Bethesda was troubled, the poor cripples that lay there for cure did absolutely conclude that it was not any natural motion of the water, but an angel that came down at a certain season and did it : so, when the heart of a sinner is troubled for his sin, let him know for his comfort that this shaking of his soul ariseth not from any principle of corrupt nature—that will defend itself—nor from the devil—he will not destroy his own kingdom—but from some seeds of grace sown in the heart, which the Spirit of God greatly breathing upon, the soul is thereby made sensible of sins and transgressions committed.

Paul de Paris, in Matt.
John v. 2.

"Natura sui conservatrix."

DCCCLXXV.—Lewd ministers, what they are like unto.

LEWD, debauched ministers, whose doctrine and lives are as distant as the two polar lines cosmographically described on the globe terrestrial, are like those statuæ mercuriales on the road, that point out unto a man which is the way to London, but move not a foot thitherward themselves; like those carpenters that built the ark to save others, and were drowned themselves; or like porters of great men's gates, that let in others, but lodge without themselves. So that what was said of Christ falsely and maliciously may be spoken of them really and truly: "He saved others, Himself He cannot save;" for whereas another by his good life sets a seal to his doctrine, he by his bad life puts a lie upon the truth; his words prove unprofitable, because his life is abominable.

Willian's Serm., 1627.

"Qui curios simu-lant, et bacchanalia vivunt."

"Qui sana docet et turpiter vivit," &c.
—GREG. NAZIAN.

DCCCLXXVI.—Nor to admit of impediments in our way to heaven.

A CERTAIN heathen, making an oration, as he was sacrificing to his god, in the midst of his devotion word was brought him that his only son was dead; whereat, being nothing at all moved, he made this answer: "Scio me genuisse mortalem (I did not get him to live for ever)," and so went on with his business. Thus, when we are entering into the sight of God's favour, it may so please Him to try us by afflictions: there may news come of a ship wrecked at sea, of a chapman broke in the country, of the death of friends and allies, &c., yet ought we not, for all this, to leave off our course in the service of Him, but rather, whatsoever comes cross, make it, as it were, a parenthesis, an ornament, not emora (a hindrance) in our progress to heaven.

Phil. Bosquier, Tab.
Naufragii.
Anaxagoras.

Inchini, Scala Cæli.

DCCCLXXVII.—But one sure way to heaven.

THE Phrygian fabulist hath a story of a fox and a cat, as they were discoursing their evasions in the midst of danger: "I," says the fox, "have many holes to earth in; if hindered of one, I have another to run to. Let me alone to shift for myself, to save my life, and to sleep in a whole skin." "Well," says the cat, "I must do as well as I can; I have but one way to save my life, and that's to climb for it." As they were thus conferring, the toils were laid, the dogs began to open, the hunt was up, and the fox, for all his cunning, for all his tricks and devices, was torn in pieces by the hounds; whilst the cat, getting up into a tree, secured herself from danger. Thus there may seem to be many ways to heaven, but there is one only true, safe way. There is many a man, in these days, that thinks to go to God by the way of two religions—one at home, another abroad; one public, another private—and whilst he is thus divided and halting betwixt two, the hunt is up, that roaring lion, the devil, lays hold upon him and devours him; whereas the true, real, well-affected Christian, cleaving close unto one God, one faith, one baptism, gets upon that scala cæli, and so, by prayer and meditation, climbs up to heaven, where the enemy's gun-shot shall never be able to reach him.

De Vulpe et Cato.

Harwood's Serm.,
Lond., 1647.

DCCCLXXVIII.—Love of the world enmity to God.

Jac. Acontii,
Stratagem. Satanae.

"Mundi amor et Dei, pariter in uno
corde habitare non possunt," &c.—
CYPRIAN.

THERE is no one sublunary thing in the world can make an eclipse of the body of the sun but the interposition of the earth betwixt it and the moon. So there is nothing can eclipse the Sun of righteousness, Christ Jesus, but the earth, the love of earthly things, the love of this world being enmity to God. If, then, our conscience tell us that the love of some worldly matter hinders our confidence, darkens our knowledge, and clouds our understanding, so that we cannot see God as He is, let us remove it, and stand up from the dead, that Christ may give us light.

DCCCLXXIX.—The Papists' abuse of Scripture by traditions, &c.

White's Way to the True Church.

Gen. xxvi. 18.

It was a very malicious plot of the Philistines to stop the wells of Abraham, and to fill them up with earth, that so the memorial of them might be quite dammed up, whereby Isaac his son might not have the least inkling that ever they belonged to his father, and so they might make a challenge to them as their own. Thus the Papists have, as much as in them lies, stopped up the veins of the springs of life, which flow everywhere in the Sacred Word of God, with the earth of their own traditions, false glosses, and unfit allegories; all this to monopolize the Bible to their own use, shutting up the kingdom of heaven, neither entering themselves nor suffering others to enter therein.

DCCCLXXX.—Who fit for government in point of temporal estate.

Val. Max., lib. vi., 14.

Smith's Serm.

Prov. xxx. 8.

WHEN Servius Sulpitius Galba and Aurelius the consul did strive in the senate which of them should be sent into Spain against Viriatum, the senators differing amongst themselves, and waiting which way Scipio would incline, he said: "I give my voice that neither of them be sent." His reason was this: "Alter nihil habet, alteri nihil sat est (the one hath nothing, and the other will never have enough)," intimating thereby that it was a dangerous thing to put the government either into the hands of a rich wretch or a wretched poor man. And most true it is that the balance of justice, whether it be in the hands of a covetous rich man or a man of a low estate, it will be very apt to tighten on one side. Necessitas cogit ad turpia (poverty is a great temptation to corruption), and riches an incentive to oppression; one, therefore, qualified, like Agur in his prayer, that hath neither poverty nor riches, but a competent estate, is fit for the management of great affairs, and the most likely to do justice according to the merits of the cause before him.

DCCCLXXXI.—The unthankful husbandman condemned.

Weems's Ceremon Lato.

"Vivite contenti casulis et collibus istis,"—JUVENAL,
xiv.

THE heathens, when they went to plough in the morning, laid on one of their hands to the stils of the plough, and lifted up the other to Ceres, the goddess of corn: this did they by the dim light of nature. What a sad thing, then, is it, in such times of light, that so many husbandmen manuring the ground should be but as so many fungi, αὐτόχθονες, sprung up out of the ground, like toad-stools, affixi glebæ, filii terræ, having their minds fixed to the earth, never elevating them higher than the ox which laboureth with them! But had they hearts to look up to God, and to eye Him in the ways of His providence, O beatos agricolas! how happy would they be!

DCCCLXXXII.—The providence of God to be eyed at all times.

WHEN Lazarus was dead, his two sisters, Martha and Mary, came to Christ with a doleful noise and pitiful complaint: "Lord, if Thou hadst been here, my brother had not died," saith one; "Lord, if Thou hadst been here, my brother had not died," said the other. And is not this the note and common language of the world when a man is dead? If such a physician had been here, if he had been let blood, if he had not taken such a potion, or eat of such meat, or lived in such a foggy air; if he had not done thus and thus, or so and so, he might have been a live man to this day; not considering, with Job, that the days of man are determined, and his bounds appointed which he cannot pass. The time, the place, and every circumstance of his dissolution is decreed from all eternity; that one man dies in the field, another in his bed; one at sea, another on the shore; one in this manner, another in that: this, and all this, is fore-ordained in heaven; the hand of God is in all, and He it is that, having brought us into the world at His pleasure, will take us hence at His own appointment.

Newsham's Sermon, at Fun. of Sir F. Vincent.

John xi. 21, 32.

"Providentiâ Dei
omnia gubernantur," &c.—JER.,
in Ezek.

DCCCLXXXIII.—To make Christ our Lord and Master.

It is said of Mr. George Herbert, that divine poet, that, to satisfy his independency upon all others, and to quicken his diligence in God's service, he used in his ordinary speech, when he made mention of the blessed name of Jesus, to add "my Master." And, without all doubt, if men were unfeignedly of his mind, their respects would be more to Christ's command, to Christ's will, to Christ's pleasure. Could they but lift up their eyes to God, to Him that dwells in the heavens, then, as eyes of servants look unto the hands of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hands of her mistress, so would their eyes wait upon, and their hearts be in a dutiful frame of obedience unto, the commands of Christ their Lord and Master.

Preface to his Poems.

Ps. cxxiii. 3.

DCCCLXXXIV.—A wanting ministry will soon become a contemptible ministry.

PLUTARCH, in his "Morals," tells us of a Laconian, who, seeing a collector going about, and gathering the people's devotions for the use of their gods, "Oh," says he, "I will now make no more reckoning of the gods, so long as I see them go a-begging, and to be poorer than myself." And this will be the case of the service of the great God of heaven, if ever we live to see that the minister's maintenance shall depend upon the people's courtesy, or that ever the offals of any repining Laban's revenues or churlish Nabal's purse become the stay of the ministerial function. This may be so by God's permission, yet great pity it is that it ever should be so; but if it must needs be, then take another story, by the same author, of one Philippus, a priest amongst the heathen, so poor that he begged for his living, and yet he would go about and tell how happy he should be. "When," quoth one, "will this be?" "When I am dead," says he. "Then, poor fellow," quoth the other, "thou art to blame thou diest not quickly, that thou mayest be happy." And thus it will be with the poor, despised, distressed ministers of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. "The Lord is our portion," say they, "and we shall be happy." "But when?" says the world. "When we die," say the ministers. "Why, then," says the world, "ye are to blame that ye die not quickly, to be happy in heaven, whom the world hath taken an order with never to be happy upon earth." This will be the voice of the sons of Belial, who have an evil voice at Sion, and had rather put a church into their purse than any way empty their purses towards the Church's maintenance.

Plutarch, Moral.

Adams's Sermon.

"Ecclesiam frudare sacilegum est,"—
JER., Ep. xx.

DCCCLXXXV.—God to have the glory of all.

Polyd. Virgil, lib. xix.

Ps. cxv. 1.

Phil. iv. 13.

THAT martial king, Edward III., outwent his fame, and was accounted to have done things more commendable than his victories; for having vanquished the French king by force of battle, he put off from himself the whole glory, and gave it devoutly to God, causing to be sung "Non nobis, Domine, non nobis, Domine, &c." (Not unto us, Lord, not unto us, Lord, but unto Thy Name, be the glory given)!" And thus must every one do, be his achievements never so great, whether private or public, let God have the glory of all; for it is no less than blasphemy in man to attribute either the strength or the glory of success unto himself. St. Paul's omnia possum had been over-presumptuous, had he not added "by Him that strengtheneth me."

DCCCLXXXVI.—How it is that one man censureth another.

Page 1, lib. iii., cap. 5.

Burton's Melancholy.

"Aliena judicantes melius quam sua."
—TERENCE.

THAT divine Spaniard, in his pleasant but useful fictions of the life of Gusman, makes his rogue wittily discourse of the unconscionableness of the Genoese, and their prying into and censuring of other men's lives; that when they are young and go first to school, they play away and lose their consciences; which their master finding, he lays them up carefully in a chest; but because he hath the keeping of so many, and they mixed one with another, he gives to his scholars, when they go away, such consciences as come first to hand, which they take to be their own, but are indeed somebody's else; whence it comes to pass that, no man bearing his own conscience in his own bosom, every man looks and prys into that of another man's. The truth of this story may be questioned, but the moral is true, without all question; and we have need sometimes of such pleasant passages to tell us the truth, that we may understand ourselves the better. There is hardly the man to be found that is not curious in other men's faults, blind in his own; partial to himself, never without matter against others; still complaining of the badness of the times, the decay of trade, the ripeness of sin, but will not be persuaded that he is any way the occasion of the same.

DCCCLXXXVII.—To be thankful to God as well in adversity as prosperity.

Plutarch, in Vita.

Preston, of Mortification.
"Si venerint mala, bene dicite," &c.
—CHRYSOST., in Symb.

THEMISTOCLES was wont to tell his ungrateful countrymen, the Athenians, that they used him like a shady tree, under which, when a storm happened, they would run and take shelter; but when the storm was over, they would be ready to cut it down and burn it. When there were any tumults or uproars in the commonwealth, who but Themistocles? All the people would flock to Themistocles for succour. But when there was a calm in the state, and all things at peace, through his good advice and industry, then, who more base, who more contemptible than poor Themistocles? And is not this the case of many at this day? They will pray unto God in time of adversity, but they will not praise God in time of prosperity. While the corn is growing, the hedge is well fenced; but when it is in, the fields are thrown open. When they stand in need of any blessings, then they are all upon the spur, somewhat careful to please God; but when they have caught what they fished for, then they let the reins slack, and are not so forward in the ways of obedience. So that it is a great blessing of God that we are kept in want of one blessing or other. Were it otherwise, He were likely to have but a little of our company.

DCCCLXXXVIII.—The doctrine of seducers dangerous.

Alsted, Theol. Nat., lib. ii., cap. 28, p. 556.

WE may read of a wolf taken in a snare, which, when a man went about to kill with his hunting spear, the wolf breathed in his face, and poisoned him in such a manner that he presently began to swell all over his body, and was very hardly recovered again. Such is the contagion which the soul of the hearer receives by the poisoned breath of seducers' doctrine. If so be that, coming near such kind of vermin, a man do not wind them, that is, not draw up into his soul the sweet breathings of the Spirit, it is great odds but that he is totally infected thereby, to the irreparable loss both of soul and body together.

Abbot's Serm.

DCCCLXXXIX.—God seeketh His people more especially in His own house, the Church.

WHEN we receive a summons from any supreme authority, the messenger or officer of the court seeks us not in idling places : he pursues us not into the fields, neither doth he come to our sports to warn us, but to our houses, and there reads his message as if we were there, because we should be there, and then, without any further inquiry, departs, fastening the scrip or writ upon the door. In like manner, the ministers of the Gospel are God's ambassadors and God's messengers. God supposes every man to be at home, and so do they, because, at hours and times set apart for His worship, they are presumed to have no houses but His house, whom they shall meet nowhere nor more certainly find than there. There it is that, more especially when two or three are met together in His name, He will be in the midst of them ; there He will teach them His ways, and there He will give them grace, too, to walk in His ways ; nor can a sermon have any influence upon such as are not there ; so true is that saying of the venerable Bede, that " he that comes not willingly to church shall one day go unwillingly to hell."

Laurence's Serm.
1629.

2 Cor. v. 20.
Mal. ii. 7.

Hist., lib. i., cap. 15.

DCCCXC.—The sincere preacher's comfort.

IN a great festival, when the expectation was not less than the concourse—both very great—St. Bernard having preached a very eloquent sermon (as that heavenly tongue was able, beyond expectation), while the people admire and applaud, the abbot walks sadly, with a mind not ordinarily dejected. The next day he preaches a lively sermon, full of profitable truth, plain, without any rhetorical dress ; whereupon his meaner capacitated auditors went away very well contented, but curious itching ears were unsatisfied ; but he walks cheerfully, with a mind more than usually pleasant. The people wonder why he should be sad when applauded, and when not, merry ; but he returns this answer : "Heri Bernardum, hodiè Jesum Christum (Yesterday I preached Bernard, but to-day Jesus Christ)." It is the same with all preachers of God's Word : there can be no feast within, when a man is conscious to himself of dallying with God. Integrity is that which furnishes out the sweet banquet and heavenly repast of joy. That preacher shall have most comfort that preacheth most of Christ ; and so shall he, too, that lives most to Christ ; when a rotten-hearted Wolsey, whose conscience tells him he served the king his master better than God his Maker, shall languish away in discontent and vexation of spirit.

Gillebert, in Vita Quint.

Holdsworth's Serm.
London, 1626.

Godwinus, de Præf.
Lib. Anglie.

DCCCXCI.—God afflicts His children for their good.

It is the observation of an excellent preacher yet living, that, passing by on a dark night in the streets of London, and meeting a youth who had a lighted link in his hand, who, being offended thereat, because it burnt so dark and dim, the better to improve the light thereof, he beat, bruised, and battered it against the wall, that the wick therein might be spread out, and the pitch, with other combustible matter, which before stifled the light with its over-stiffness, might be loosened, which presently caused the

T. F., in a Serm. of Assurance.

"Aurem cordis
tribulatio aperit quam sæpe prosperitas claudit."— GREG., in Moral.

link to blaze forth in a brighter flame. Thus God deals with our souls: that they may shine the brighter before men, He buffets and afflicts us with several temptations, to give us occasion to exercise those graces which otherwise would lie dormant within us; and such corrections will, in fine, greatly add to our spiritual light and lustre.

DCCCXCII.—The godly man is God's favourite.

Seidan, Comment.

LUTHER was known to pray oft with intention of mind and zealous fervency, that so long as he lived Germany might be quiet, and had often professed that he firmly believed it would be so, that so God's Word might have a little freedom and space to spread itself; whereupon one Nicholas Mark, a citizen of Frankfort, was wont, as oft as he heard of any rumours of war, to say: "I fear it not so long as Luther lives." This was the esteem that Luther had of all good men, they thought that God would deny him nothing. And certainly the godly man is God's favourite; God will hear him in a time of trouble; it is he that must stand in the gap to prevent, and that must stand up to take off the hand of God when it lies heavy upon a sinful nation or people, be the judgment near or afar off, imminent or incumbent; it is the godly man, if any, that must be instrumental for delivery.

Udall's Serm.,
London, 1634.

DCCCXCIII.—Christians and their knowledge to be communicative.

Plin., Nat. Hist.

Muffety, Hist. In- sectorum.

THE naturalists do observe that the pismires, which are reckoned amongst the most sagacious creatures, and the bees, which are amongst the most useful, and the elephants, amongst the potent, are for communion, and do gather and keep together. And the excellency of other creatures lies in the communication of themselves, the sun raying out his warm and cherishing beams, the fountain bubbling out his purling streams, the earth yielding forth sovereign herbs and plants, all for the benefit of others. Such are all true Christians: they are then in their excellency, when they are communicative and useful; nay, they increase by communicating, and gain by giving away and imparting their gifts. There is a story of some mountains of salt in Cumana which never diminished, though carried away in much abundance by the merchants; but when once they were monopolized to the benefit of a private purse, then the salt decreased, till afterwards all were allowed to take of it, when it had a new access and increase. The truth of this story may be uncertain, but the application is true: he that envies unto others the use of his gifts decays them, but he thrives most that is most diffusive.

Mart., Hist. Indis
Occident.

Reyn. de Pisis, Fanthologia.

DCCCXCIV.—The ways of hypocrites not easily traced.

Torshel's Hypocrisy Unmasked.

A HORSE may be known by the track, and where a cart hath gone you may perceive by the print of the wheel, but we know not the way of a ship: though Hondius, Mercator, and others have delineated in their maps the several voyages of Captains Drake, Cavendish, Scouter, &c., yet the mariner can see no such path upon the sea as they have drawn out. Such are the ways of all hypocrites: though a man may have some directions and marks to follow them, yet may he miss them at the very last; you may search all the rooms of their hearts and yet be at a loss; they have secret and back doors to go out at; they are cunning to keep their secrets, as a harlot doth her lover. The sister of the emperor Henry III., when a great snow fell, carried her lover upon her shoulders, that the fact might not be discovered. The lover is entertained, but nothing can be seen but the print of the lady's feet; and the hypocrite harbours his lust, but there is nothing to be found but the steps of the upright in heart. It is harder to discover the rottenness of his soul than the tricks of a horse-courser in the open market of Smithfield.

Vincent, Spensl., lib. xxv., cap. 10.

"Intus Nero, foris Cato."

DCCCXCV.—Man's inconstancy.

THERE is a fable how that Inconstancy would needs have her picture drawn, but none would undertake it, because her face and shape altered so often. But, at length, Time took a pencil in hand, and because he had no other table to do it upon he printed her picture upon man. And most true it is that all men and women since that time have had too much of her resemblance, and too many men have her very face to the life: they will be religious, and they will not be religious; there is nobody knows what they will be, or what to make of them; they are constant in nothing but inconstancy: they have their gales of devotion, their breathings of love, one while; at another time, when the fit is upon them, there is nothing but lumpishness of spirit and dullness of affection—now faithful to their promise; anon, fallen off, for one cause or other.

Torshei ut antea

"Herodes devotionem promittit, sed gladium acuit."
—CHRYSOST.

DCCCXCVI.—The sincere preacher's courage.

THERE was a nobleman, one Reinard, at Rothenburgh, that much loved Wolfgang Musculus, and was very tender of his safety, as knowing that he had many enemies, because of his revolt from Popery, and perceiving that he was gone abroad, as his use was, into a village to preach, he, disguising himself, because he would not be known, and taking many of his horsemen with him, came rushing in at the church-door, and in a threatening manner bids him come out of the pulpit. Musculus, thinking they were the servants of a popish bishop, who was his violent adversary, desired he might have leave to finish his sermon, and then he would go with them whithersoever they would carry him. And so he went on, being nothing at all daunted, exhorting the people to constancy in the faith, and withal to pray for him who was now, as he thought, in his enemy's hands. When sermon was done, the nobleman discovers himself, hugs him in his arms, admires his courage, tells him he did it to try his spirit, and withal to warn him how easily he might be endangered. See here the courage of sincerity, how the righteous are as bold as lions. It is a gracious God and a good cause that supports them; but, on the other side, how do the wicked fear, even where no fear is! He hath nothing at all left to sustain him, nothing to cover his head when the cloud breaks in upon him; yea, before the appearance of any actual trouble, he creates both fears and jealousies to himself, sonus excitat omnis suspensum (he trembles at every motion).

Musculus, in Vita Patrii.

Torshei, ut antea.

"Hic murus aheneus esto, nil concire sibi," &c.
—VIGIL.

DCCCXCVII.—To make God our counsellor.

AN ancient able divine reports it of Sir Thomas Thin, a religious Western knight, that he would undertake no business before he was fully persuaded of the lawfulness of it, both by clear texts of Scripture and approbation of the learned; he made scruple of committing not only the least known sin, but of embarking into any action which was questionable amongst those that love the truth in sincerity. This was in him a good frame of spirit, and it were heartily to be wished that men's actions were suitable to their professions; that they would consult with God in all things, that, as they carry a Bible in their hand, so they would make that their master to direct them, not listening to the close whisperings of the Jesuit in one ear for matters of religion, or to Nicholas the Florentine at the other ear in point of policy; but, in all the changes and chances of this mortal life, commit themselves to God's guidance, and so they shall be sure to prosper.

Bernard of Batcomb.

"Quicquid vel dicimus vel facimus, id testimonio Scripturarum confirmari debet."
—BASIL, in Reg. Mon.

DCCCXCVIII.—Minding of the great day of judgment a means to live godly.

Vizarus, de Rebus Persicis.

"Nihil est quod magis proficiat ad vitam honestam quam ut credamus Christum judicem," &c.—AMBRÓS.

Winuliffe's Serm. at Court, 1637.

WHEN Sapores, king of Persia, raised a violent persecution against the Christians, Ust hazanes, an old nobleman, a courtier, that had Sapores' government in his minority, being a Christian, was so terrified that he left off his profession; but he, sitting at the court gate when Simeon, an aged, holy bishop, was being led to prison, and rising up to salute him, the good bishop frowned upon him and turned away his face with indignation, as being loth to look upon a man that had denied the faith. Ust hazanes fell a-weeping, went into his chamber, put off his courtly attire, and brake out into these or the like words, "Ah, how shall I appear before the great God of heaven, whom I have denied, when Simeon, but a man, will not endure to look upon me. If he frown, how will God behold me when I come before His tribunal?" The thought of God's judgment-seat wrought so strongly upon him that he recovered his spiritual strength and died a glorious martyr. Thus, did but men consider that they must one day stand before the bar of God's tribunal, they would then be casting up how things stood betwixt Him and their own souls. Would any man loiter away the day when he knows that he must show his work to his master at night? Let every man, then, in all his doings, remember his end, and so he shall never do amiss; remember that all must come to a reckoning in that great day, and that, though here in this world a man may wear white gloves upon foul hands, and a crooked body may be bolstered under a silken gown, yet, when they shall consider that these gloves shall be plucked off in that day, and the body he showed naked before God, with whom they shall then have to do, it will be a means to order and regulate their lives, so that their appearance may be with comfort.

DCCCXCIX.—The great power of faith seated in the heart of man.

Bodin, de Repub.

"Quid non inveniat fides? Attingit inaccessible, deprehendit ignotas," &c.—BÉRN., in Cant.

THE philosopher, when he would persuade the king to settle his court and place of residence in the heart of his dominion, laid before him a bull's hide, ready tanned, upon which, when he stood upon one side of it, and so kept down, that the other side would rise up; when he removed to the side that rose up and kept down that, then the side he came from would rise as high; but when he stood in the middle, he kept down all alike. Thus faith is this great king, which, being seated in the heart, makes provision against every rebellion, keeps down every mutiny, marshals and orders every action and affection, takes a man off from all servile dependencies and by-respects, and makes him profess God's name boldly, evenly, and without halting; it cleanseth the whole heart, seasons every affection, alters the taste of every appetite, strengthens every propension to good, and fortifies the soul against all evil.

DCCCC.—Blasphemous language condemned.

Fuller's Serm., Lond., 1647.

"Non minus peccant, qui blasphemant Christum regnantem in cælis quam qui crucifixerunt ambulantem in terris,"—AUGUST.

CATO, being very much struck in years, would by all means study the Greek tongue; and being asked by one why, in his old age, he would set upon such an exotic language, "Oh," said he, "I am informed that the Greek is a copious and a fluent tongue, and withal such a tongue as the gods speak in; I would therefore learn it, that I may be able to converse with the gods in their own dialect." This was Cato's conceit in those darker times of nature; but there is a generation amongst us in these clearer times of grace such as are great proficients in all manner of blasphemous language, such as belch out nothing but oaths and direful execrations in the very face of heaven. What can this else be, but to practise here on earth what, by a sad prolepsis, they are sure to come to hereafter, that is, to be blasphemers and swearers in hell to all eternity.

DCCCCI.—Drowsiness in prayer to be avoided.

It is reported of Queen Katharine, dowager of King Henry VIII., that in her devotions to God she was poplite flexo nudo, &c. (on her bended knees, naked, upon the bare floor); it was, without doubt, that she might be the more watchful over her heart, which otherwise might be apt to slumber and take a nod in the performance of so holy a duty. It is not hereby meant to take away the use of cushions, but to remind us that we do not lay cushions of sloth under our knees, nor pillows of idleness under our elbows, nor to be drowsily devoted, but to be active and sprightly upon the bended knees of our hearts, when we approach unto God in the spiritual exercises of prayer and heavenly meditation.

Caussin, la Cuan. Saincte.

"Sit oratio pura fervida," &c.—PROSPER.

DCCCCII.—The least measure of true faith rewarded.

A MAN having many children, and one amongst the rest a small under-growth, a very weakling, doth he cast off this child? doth he cease to be a father therefore? No; his bowels are the more enlarged. He provides for it, supports it, cherisheth it, more than all the rest, till in some measure it be enabled to help itself. Thus God, if we be weak in faith, though we be but as younglings of Christ's flock, we must not therefore be discouraged; He will take care of us, not cast us off; He hath a crown for the least works. If there be but singultus fidei, a sob or a sigh of faith, nay, which is less, if but a panting of faith present itself, "Surgam, dicit Dominus, &c. (I will up, saith the Lord, help them, and set them at rest);" yet further, which is the least of all, though the pulse of faith beat not at all, though David be like a deaf man, that heareth not, or as one that is dumb, not opening his mouth, yet God will look down from His sanctuary and make deliverance for David, as He did also for the poor man sick of the palsy.

Gore's Serm., Lond., 1631.

Rev. ii.

Ps. xii. 5.

Ps. cii. 19.
Matt. ix. 2.

DCCCCIII.—Hypocrisy, the generality of it.

THE Emperor Frederick III., who, when one said unto him he would go find some place where no hypocrites inhabited, he told him he must travel then far enough, beyond the Sauromatæ, or the Frozen Ocean, and yet, when he came there, he should find a hypocrite if he found himself there. And it is true that omnis homo hypocrita (every man is a hypocrite). Hypocrisy is a lesson that every man readily takes out: it continues with age, it appears with infancy; the wise and the learned practise it, the duller and more rude attain unto it. All are not fit for the wars: learning must have the picked and choicest wits, arts must have leisure and pains; but all sorts are apt enough and thrive in the mystery of dissimulation. The whole throng of mankind is but a horse-fair of cheaters, the whole world a shop of counterfeit wares, a theatre of hypocritical disguises.

Imperat. Vita.

Plutarch, Apophtegm.

Torshel, ut antea.

"Serpit hodie purida tabes hypocrisis," &c.—BERNARD.

DCCCCIV.—The justice of God, what it is, and how defined.

IN the reign of King Edward I. there was much abuse in measuring by the ell of all sorts of drapery—much wrong done betwixt man and man, by reason of the diversity of their measures—every man measuring his cloth by his own yard; which, the king perceiving, being a goodly, proper man, took a long stick in his hand, and having taken the length of his own arm, made proclamation through the kingdom that ever after the length of that stick should be the measure to measure by, and no other. Thus, God's justice is nothing else but a conformity to His being, the pleasure of His will; so that the counsel of His will is the standard of His justice, whereby all men should regulate themselves as well in commutative as distributive justice, and so much the more righteous than his neighbour shall every man appear by how much he is proximate to this rule, and less righteous as he is the more remote.

Walsingham's Hist.

Fuller's Serm., Lond., 1647.
Eph. i. 5.

DCCCCV.—Justification by Christ, the extent of it.

As the sun by his beams doth not only expel cold, but works heat and fruitfulness also, thus, in the justification of a sinner repenting, there is a further reach than tollere peccata (the taking away of sin); there is also infusion of grace and virtue into the sinner's heart. The father of the prodigal did not only take off all his son's rags, but put on the best he had, and a ring on his finger; and, to say truth, our justification doth not consist only in the taking away of sin, but in the imputation of Christ's righteousness and obedience; for though the act be one, yet for the manner it is twofold—1. By privation; 2. By imputation.

Reyn. de Plais, Panthologia.

DCCCCVI.—How it is that the proceedings of God, in His justice, are not so clearly discerned.

TAKE a straight stick, and put it into the water; then it will seem crooked. Why? Because we look upon it through two mediums, air and water: there lies the deceptio visus; thence it is that we cannot discern aright. Thus the proceedings of God, in His justice, which in themselves are straight, without the least obliquity, seem unto us crooked: that wicked men should prosper, and good men be afflicted; that the Israelites should make the bricks, and the Egyptians dwell in the houses; that servants should ride on horseback, and princes go on foot: these are things that make the best Christians stagger in their judgments. And why? Because they look upon God's proceedings through a double medium of flesh and spirit, so that all things seem to go cross, though indeed they go right enough. And hence it is that God's proceedings, in His justice, are not so well discerned, the eyes of man alone being not competent judges thereof.

Fuller, ut antea.

Williams' Serm. at Funeral of L. Bayning, 1629.

DCCCCVII.—Resolution in the cause of God very requisite.

JOHN, duke of Saxony, who might have had the world at will if he would not have been a Christian, resolved rather to pass by much difficulty, nay, even death itself, than to desert the cause of God, which afterward he did heroically maintain against all opposition in three imperial assemblies; and when it was told him that he should lose the favour of the pope and the emperor, and all the world besides, if he stuck so fast to the Lutheran cause: "Here are two ways," said he; "I must serve God or the world, and which of these do you think is the better?" and so put them off with this pleasant indignation. Neither would he be ashamed to be seen which way he chose to go; for when, at the public assembly of the states of the empire, it was forbidden to have any Lutheran sermons, he presently prepared to be gone, and professed boldly he would not stay there, where he might not have liberty to serve God. Thus must every good Christian be thoroughly resolved for God, and for the truth which he takes up to profess. Resolution must chain him, as it did Ulysses, to the mast of the ship, must tie him to God, that he leap not overboard, and make shipwreck of a good conscience, as too many have done. It is resolution that keeps Ruth with her mother; it makes a man a rocky promontory, that washes not away, though the surges beat upon him continually. Resolution in the ways of God is the best stimulus of a Christian, and a resolved Christian is the best Christian.

Spangenberg, in Chron.

Whitaker's Serm.,
Westm., 1644.

DCCCCVIII.—To be careful in the censure of others.

It is reported of vultures that they will fly over a garden of sweet flowers, and not so much as eye them, but they will seize upon a stinking carrion at the first sight. In like bolos. and, ut.

manner, scarabs and flies will pass by the sound flesh; but if there be any galled part on the horse's back, there they will settle. Thus many there are that will take no notice at all of the commendable parts and good qualities of others; but if the least imperfection shall appear, there they will fasten, that they will be sure to single out of the crowd of virtues and censure. But let such know that aquila non capit muscas (the eagle scorns to catch at flies), so that they discover what dunghill breed they are come of by falling and feeding upon the raw parts of their brothers' imperfections, without any moderation at all.

Torshel's Hypocrite Discovered.

DCCCCIX.—Prejudice in judgment very dangerous.

THE mad Athenian, standing upon the shore, thought every ship that came into the harbour to be his own. Pythagoras's scholars were so trained up to think all things were constituted of numbers, that they thought they saw numbers in everything. Thus prejudice in judgment and opinions, like coloured glass, makes everything seem to be of the same colour when looked through. And it is most true, that when men have once bound their judgments to this or that error, then they think everything hits right, whether pro or con, that is in their fancy; all the places of Scripture that they read, all the doctrinal parts of sermons that they hear, make for their purpose; and thus they run into monstrous absurdities and dangers inevitable.

Williams's Serm., 1627.

DCCCCX.—The hypocrite characteristically laid open.

HYPOCRITES are like unto white silver, but they draw black lines; they have a seeming sanctified outside, but are stuffed within with malice, worldliness, intemperance; like window-cushions, made up of velvet, and perhaps richly embroidered, but stuffed within with hay; or like some mock-beggar halls or houses in the country built with lofty turrets, that are presently in the travellers' eye, and if they draw nearer to view they find them built with stately porches, neat galleries, fine staircases, curious gate-houses, but not one convenient lodging-chamber, nor any hospitality at all. They have much to entertain the passenger and the viewer; they will entertain you with fine notions, choice discourses; but if ye dwell with them ye shall find very ill accommodation; ye shall hear of them as ye ride through the country, they have the name amongst professors, they carry it away from others; but you shall experience it that they are not such as are spoken of, they are not furnished to be hospitable to the weary Christian, they cannot close with any godly spirit, because they move by a clean contrary principle.

Erasm's Similia.

Torshel's Hypocrite
Cured.

"Herodes devotionem promittit, sed gladium acuit."
—CHRYSOST., in Matt. ii.

DCCCCXI.—The policy of tyrants in doing many good things for the public.

RICHARD III., that great master of mischief, as Sir Walter Raleigh styles him, having made his way to the crown through an ocean of innocent blood, by the advice of his parliament, enacted many good laws—as yet unrepealed—for the benefit of the people, as the settling of trade, condemning the grievous tax of benevolence, rectifying the credit of jurors, &c. Thus have all tyrants done from time to time: knowing that their actions stink in the nostrils of God and the world, they so perfume them with favours and spice them with acts of grace, that the people can hardly scent them, and by this means they ingratiate themselves in such manner, that they work their own safety.

In Prefatione, Hist.
Mund.

"Vultu tyrannus est quidem lætissimus, intus dolorum sed foret," &c.

DCCCCXII.—To make good use of opportunity.

In times of dearth, the poor man picks up every grain of corn that falls. "Oh," saith he, "it is dear; none must be lost." But he that should, in the time of famine, give his corn to the hogs, were worthy to be hanged at his own barn door. So are they worthy to lose the reward of well-doing that lose the opportunity thereof. Let no man omit to do seasonable courtesies, because the least crumb of time wherein a man may have occasion to do good is not to be lost. The salve must not be deferred till the sore doth putrify, nor the potion kept back till the patient be endangered. A penny given now may do more good than a hundred pounds hereafter. "Serò dat qui roganti dat (Those benefits are slow of foot that come not till they are called for)."

Quirin. Salazar,
Cam. in Prov.

"Data tempore pro-sunt."—OVID.

DCCCCXIII.—Not to talk of our good deeds.

A FRIEND of Cæsar's had preserved a certain man from the tyranny of the triumvirate proscription, but he did so talk of it, that the poor man was enforced to exclaim, "Redde me Cæsari, &c. (Prithee, restore me up to Cæsar again! I had rather undergo a thousand deaths than to be thus continually upbraided by thee with my life)." And, to say truth, the frequent commemoration of a benefit doth rack the mind of him that doth receive it. We must not, therefore, make ourselves the trumpet of our benevolence, nor enter our liberalities upon record, or in a calendar register the days of our good deeds, but let them be like John Baptist, the speaking son of a dumb parent—speak to the necessity of our brother, but dumb in the relation of it to others. It is for worthless empiries to stage themselves in the market and recount their cures, and for all good Christians to be silent in their charitable transactions.

Tacitus.

"Eximia est virtus præstare silentia re-bus."—OVID.

Tuteville's Essay.

DCCCCXIV.—God a merciful God.

THERE happen sometimes in England such assizes as are called the maiden assizes—that is, when the offences brought to the bar do not reach to the taking away of life, so that there is not any execution; whereupon the high sheriff of the county presents the judges, at their departure, with white gloves, to wear in commemoration of the mercies then shown to offenders, which perhaps, by the strict rule of justice, might have been cut off. Such an assizes as this God now keeps. We sin daily, we offend hourly, and therefore guilty of death eternal; but God woos and entreats us to repent; promiseth life eternal—nay, binds it with an oath: "As I live," saith He, "I will not the death of a sinner." Let us, then, return unto Him white hands, candid thoughts, clean hearts, and then rest assured that He will look upon us, neither black with revenge nor red with anger, but, with a smooth brow and smiling countenance, receive us into mercy.

Fuller's Sermon,
London, 1650.

"Quid est peccatum
ad Dei misericordiam?
Tela aranearum," &c.—CHRY-SOST., in Ps. l.

DCCCCXV.—Change of government not to be affected.

A CERTAIN rustic, having blamed Antigonus while he lived, grew, after some trial had of his successor, to recant his error or his crime, and, digging one day in the field, was questioned what he did there. "O," said he, "Antigonum refodio (I seek Antigonus again)." And is there not many a man at this time that would be glad to delve and dig for peace, if he might have it?—would be joyful to see order and decency both in Church and state restored? But—

1ycosthenes, Apophthegm.

Tuteville, ut antea.

"Saturnus periiit, perierunt et sua jura;
Sub Jove nunc mundus, jussa sequare Jovis."

Thus Englished

"Saturn is dead, his laws are all decayed;
Jove rules the world, and Jove must be obeyed."

What, then, is best to be done? Seeing the day grows cloudy and overcast, let every man betimes withdraw himself to shelter, and there remain till the storm be past; not complaining of the violence of the tempest, because it may be followed with a worse; not to repine at the present government, but take it as it is; and, since he cannot reform it, by no means be induced to provoke it, leaving all to God's good will and pleasure.

"Principibus placuisse viris, non ultima laus est."—HORAT., l., ep. 17.

DCCCCXVI.—Like to like.

AUGUSTUS CÆSAR, being present at a public prize with his two daughters, Livia and Julia, observed diligently what company came to court them, and perceived that grave senators talked with Livia, but riotous and wanton youths with Julia; whereby he discerned their several humours and inclinations, according to the Italian proverb—

Sueton., in Vita,

"Dimmi con chi tu vai, Et sapro quel che fai."

"Tell me with whom thou goest, I'll tell thee what thou doest."

And most true it is, that custom and company are cousins-german, and that manners and meetings, for the most part, sympathise together. He that walks in the sun is sure to be tanned, and he that toucheth pitch shall be defiled, or at least he shall be thought so; for all flesh will resort to their like, and every man will keep company with such as he is himself, saith the wise man.

Tuteville's Essays

"Similia similibus."

DCCCCXVII.—A man full of talk full of vanity.

A PRATING barber asked King Archelaus how he would be trimmed; the king replied, "Silently." Surely, in much talk there cannot choose but be much vanity; loquacity is the fistula of the mind, ever running and almost incurable. Let every man therefore be a Phocion or Pythagorean, to speak briefly to the point or not at all; let him labour, like them of Crete, to show more wit in his discourse than words, and not to pour out of his mouth a flood of the one when he can hardly wring out of his brains a drop of the other.

Plutarch, de Garrulitate.
Feltham's Resolves.

"In garrulo, verborum flumen, mentis gutta."—STON.

DCCCCXVIII.—How to read with profit.

As it is not the best way for any that intendeth to make himself a good statesman to ramble and run over in his travels many countries, seeing much and making use of little for the improving of his knowledge and experience in state policy, but rather stay so long in each place till he have noted those things which are best worthy his observation: so is it also in the travels and studies of the mind, by which, if we would be bettered in our judgments and affections, it is not our best course to run over many things slightly, taking only such a general view of them as somewhat increaseth our speculative knowledge, but to rest upon the points we read, that we may imprint them in our memories, and work them into our hearts and affections, for the increasing of saving knowledge; then shall we find that one good book, often read and thoroughly pondered, will more profit than by running over a hundred in a superficial manner.

Downham's Christi Warfare.

"Hoc lege quod possis dicere jure, meum est."—MARTIAL., x.

DCCCCXIX.—The several expressions of God in His mercies, and why so.

Fuller, ut antea.

As lawyers, in this captious age of ours, when they draw up any conveyances of lands, or other writings of concernment betwixt party and party, are fain to put in many equivocal terms of one and the same signification, as "to have and to hold, occupy and enjoy, lands, tenements, hereditaments, profits, emoluments; to remise, release, acquit, discharge, exonerate of and from all manner of actions, suits, debts, trespasses," &c., and all this to make sure work, so that if one word will not hold in law another may: thus God, when He shows Himself to His people in love, He varies His expressions as He did to the Israelites:

Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7.

"The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercies for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin," &c. Here is a homonymy of words, all synonyms; and why so? To raise up the drooping soul, to bind up the broken-hearted, that if it chance to stumble at one expression, it may be supported by another; if one word will not reach, another may. His mind is that the poor soul may rather leave than lack, when it comes to draw comfort out of the breasts of mercy.

DCCCCXX.—Love to Christ, how to be recovered when it is once lost.

Peter's Serm.,
Lond., 1651.

A MAN upon the way, having accidentally lost his purse, is questioned by his fellow-traveller where he had it last: "Oh," says he, "I am confident that I drew it out of my pocket when I was in such a town, at such an inn." "Why, then," says the other, "there is no better way to have it again than by going back to the place where you last had it." This is the case of many a man in these loose unsettled times: they have lost their love to Christ and His truth since their corn and wine and oil have increased, since outward things are in abundance added unto them; they have slighted the light of God's countenance, the love of Christ is defective in their souls; but when they were poor and naked of all worldly comforts, then they fasted and prayed, then they sought God's face both early and late; nothing was more dear and precious unto them than the truth of Christ. Oh, how they loved Him! What, then, is to be done to recover this lost love of Christ? Back again, back again directly where you last had it, to the sign of the broken and contrite heart; there it was that you drew it out into good words and better works; and though it be since lost in the crowd of worldly employments, there and nowhere else you shall be sure to find it again.

Ps. lv. 6, 7.

DCCCCXXI.—The generality of God's knowledge.

Sir J. Heyward, in Vita.

It is said of King Edward VI., that he knew all the ports, havens, harbours, and creeks in and about the English coasts, together with the depth and shallows of the water, as also the several burthens of every ship that could ride there with safety; yet this was but a puny knowledge in that young king, when we look upon the general knowledge of God. He knows all things, all creatures, nothing is hid from His knowledge; He knows the thoughts of man afar off, He knows what he will think many years hence if he live to it; He knows the stars by their names; whereas they are small, the distance great, our eyes are dim, yet His infinite essence is a vast nomenclator of them all. Such and so general is the knowledge of our all-knowing God, that He knows all things, also simul, semel, et uno intuitu (all at once, both things past, present, and to come.

Fuller's Serm.,
Lond., 1650.

DCCCCXXII.—God's goodness and man's ingratitude.

It is storied of a certain king, that, fighting a desperate battle for the recovery of his daughter, injuriously stolen from him, he found but ill success, and the day utterly against him, till, by the valour of a strange prince, disguised in the habit of a mean soldier, that pitied his loss and bore love to his daughter, he recovered both her and victory. Not long after, this prince received some wrong in the point of honour, which he deservedly prized. He made his complaint to the king, desires justice; the forgetful king puts him over to a judge. The prince replies, "Know this, O king! when thou wast lost, I stood betwixt thee and danger, and did not bid another save thee, but saved thee myself. Ecce vulnera! behold the scars of those wounds I bore to free thee and thy state from ruin inevitable! And now my suit is before thee, dost thou shuffle me off to another?" Such was our case: Satan had stolen our dear daughter, our soul; in vain we laboured a recovery. Principalities and powers were against us, weakness and wretchedness on our side; Christ, the Son of God, took pity on us, and, though He were the eternal Prince of Peace, disguised Himself in the habit of a common soldier, induens formam servi (putting on Him the likeness of a servant), undertook the war against our too strong enemies, set Himself betwixt us and death, and bore the wounds in His own person, which should have alighted upon us. Now that His glory is in question, His honour much concerned in the transactions of these times, we stand by and behold it; He appeals to our hearts, reminds us of the wounds, passions, sorrows, He endured for us; we put off from one another and let the cause of Him that saved us fall to the ground. Who shall plead for our ingratitude? Heaven and earth, sea and stars, orbs and elements, angels and devils, will cry shame upon us.

Specul. Exo. Arum,

Thos. à Kempis' Serm.

Greg. Naz., Tract. Evang.

"Ingratitudo est hostia gratus, inimica salutis."—BERN., de Mittere cordis, vii.

DCCCCXXIII.—The right use that is to be made of dreams.

THERE are many people that find out more mysteries in their sleep than they can well expound waking. The Abbot of Glastonbury, when Æthelwold was monk there, dreamt of a tree whose branches were all covered with monks' cowls, and on the highest branch one cowl that out-topped all the rest—which must be expounded to mean the greatness of this Æthelwold. If they dream of a green garden, then they shall hear of a dead corpse; if they dream that they shake a dead man by the hand, then there is no way but death. All this is a kind of superstitious folly, to repose any such confidence in dreams; but if any man desire to make a right use of dreams, let it be this: let him consider himself, in his dreaming, to what inclination he is mostly carried, and so by his thoughts in the night he shall learn to know himself in the day. Be his dreams lustful, let him examine himself whether the addictions of his heart run not after the bias of concupiscence. Is he turbulent in his dreams, let him consider his own contentious disposition. Be his dreams revengeful, they point out his malice. Run they upon gold and silver, they argue his covetousness. Thus may any man know what he is by his sleep, for generally men answer to such actually waking, as their thoughts do sleeping.

Malmesburiens., Hist.

"Somnia fallaci ludunt temeraria nocte."—TIBUL., iii., 4.

Shute's Serm., Lond., 1633.

DCCCCXXIV.—Consultation with flesh and blood, in the ways of heaven, is very dangerous.

Look upon a man somewhat thick-sighted: when he is to pass over a narrow bridge, how he puts on his spectacles to make it seem broader; but his eyes may so beguile his feet, that he falls into the brook. And thus it is that many are drowned in the whirlpool of sin: by viewing the passage to heaven only with the spectacles of flesh and blood, they think the bridge broad, which indeed is narrow, the gate to be wide, which indeed is strait, and so ruin themselves for ever.

Potter's Serm., Lond., 1461.

DCCCCXXV.—The sad condition of adding sin to sin.

P. 1404.

MR. FOX, in his "Martyrology," hath a story of the men of Cockram, in Lancashire. By a threatening command from Bonner, they were charged to set up a rood in their church; accordingly, they contracted with a carver to make it. Being made and erected, it seemed it was not so beautiful as they desired it, but with the hard visage thereof scared their children. Hereupon they refused to pay the carver. The carver complained to the justice. The justice, well examining and understanding the matter, answers the townsmen: "Go to! pay the workman, pay him, get you home, and mark your rood better. If it be not well-favoured enough to make a god, it is but clapping a pair of horns on it, and it will serve to make an excellent devil." Thus, when men add one sin to another, when they add superstitious dotage, covetous oppression, and racking extortion to their worldly desires, whereby they gore poor men's sides and let out their very hearts'-blood, they shall find no peace of God to comfort, but devil enough to confound them.

Adams' Exposit en
2 Pet.

"Montibus accumulant montes," Eccl.—OVID, Met.

DCCCCXXVI.—Preaching and prayer to go together.

Nonius, de Arte Na-vigandi.

Dr. Mart., *Day
Lett.*, 1619.

Rom. xii. 1.

"Quam bene conveniunt!"
Prov. xxix. 18.

Matt. xxi. 13.

It is observed by those that go down into the deep, and occupy their business in great waters, that when they see the constellation of Castor and Pollux appear both together, then it is the happy omen of a successful voyage; but if either of them appear single, actum est de expeditione (there is small hope of thriving). Thus it is that when preaching and prayer do meet together, and, like Hippocrates' twins, live arm in arm together—not all praying, and little or no preaching, as some would have it; not all preaching, and little or no praying, as others would have it—then is offered up that sacrifice which unto God is made acceptable; for praying and no preaching would not so well edify His Church, because where visions fail the people perish, and preaching without prayer would not well beseem His Church, which is called a house of prayer; but both together will do exceedingly well—the one to teach us how to pray, the other to fit us how to hear.

DCCCCXXVII.—Man losing himself in the pursuit after knowledge extraordinary.

Goffe's Serm.,
Lond., 1626.

Librorum Heliuones.

Dan. vii. 9.

1 Cor. ix. 24.

HOUNDS that are over-fleet often outrun the prey in the pursuit, or else, tired and hungry, fall upon some dead piece of carrion in the way, and omit the game. Thus man, who only hath that essential consequence of his reason, capacity of learning, though all his time he be brought up in a school of knowledge, yet too often lets the glass of his days be run out before he knows the author he should study. Hence it is that the greatest epicures of knowledge—as children newly set to school turn from their lessons to look upon pictures in their books—gaze upon some hard trifle, some unnecessary subtlety, and forget so much as to spell God. How great a part of this span-length of his days doth the grammatical critic spend in finding out the construction of some obsolete word or the principal verb in a worn-out epitaph, still ready to set out a new book upon an old criticism! How doth the antiquary search whole libraries to light upon some ancient monument, whilst the chronicles of the Lord, who is the Ancient of days, are seldom looked into! all of them so wearying the faculties of their understandings beforehand by over-practising, that when they come at the race indeed, where their knowledge should so run that it might attain, it gives over the course, as out of breath, before it has well begun.

DCCCCXXVIII.—Slanders of wicked men not to be regarded.

LIVIA wrote to Augustus Cæsar, concerning some ill words that had passed of them both, whereof she was over-sensible; but Cæsar comforted her: "Let it never trouble you that men speak ill of us, for we have enough that they cannot do ill to us." And, to say truth, above hell there is not a greater punishment than to become a sannio (a subject of scorn and derision). Ill tongues will be walking, neither need we repine at their violence; we may well suffer their words, while God doth deliver us out of their hands. Let it never trouble us that men speak evil of us, for we have enough that they can do no evil to us; and, withal, whilst that the derider dasheth in a puddle, the dirt flies about his own ears but lights short of innocence. The mocker that casts aspersions on his brother over-night shall find them all on his own clothes next morning.

Sueton., Octa. Aug.

"Convitia quis facile tolerat," &c.—GREG., Moral., lib. iii. Holdsworth's Serm., Lond., 1627.

"Multi cum aliis maledicunt, sibi ipsi convitiati faciunt!" —SEN., Ep. lxxvii.

DCCCCXXIX.—How to be truly humble.

EPAMINONDAS, that heathen captain, finding himself lifted up in the day of his public triumph, the next day went drooping and hanging down his head; but being asked what was the reason of his so great dejection, made answer: "Yesterday I felt myself transported with vain glory, therefore I chastise myself for it to-day." Thus did Hezekiah, thus David, thus Peter, and many others; and so must it be with every truly humbled man. If he have not the proposed or fore-humility to level all his thoughts at the glory of God in the suppression of all self-conceit, nor the opposed or mid-humility to banish all self-confidence and presumption upon his own strength, let him be sure to double the imposed or after-humility, making pride itself to humble him the more. And thus it was that the Psalmist doubles, nay, trebles, his words: "Non nobis, Domine, non nobis, Domine," &c. Feeling some thought of pride, like some fly, alighting upon his soul, he beats it away with a "Not unto us, O Lord." If it alight a second time, he flaps it off again, "Not unto us, O Lord;" but if it come the third time he kills it dead with the next word, "sed nomini tuo (but to Thy Name give the glory)." This is the exercise of a threefold humility; and if in any of these there be a failing, the best of our actions will be so far tainted that there will be no remedy to supply that defect but with doubling our after-humility, that, as pride grew up out of humility, so humility may spring out of pride again.

Plutarch, Apophtegm.

2 Chron. xxxii. 26.

1 Chron. xxi. 1-8. Cawdrey's Serm., Lond., 1624.

Ps. cxv. 1.

"Erebuscant clati, ubi credunt locum habere superbiam," &c.—CASSIODOR., in Luc. ii.

DCCCCXXX.—Men of other callings not to meddle with that of the ministry.

By the laws of the land, a person occupying the craft of a butcher may not use the occupation of a tanner, and a brewer may not deal in the occupation of a cooper; none prescribe physic but such as are doctors, at least practitioners in the faculty; none plead at the bar but such as are learned in the law. It must needs, then, be a great fault, as Jerome complains in an epistle to Paulinus, when every ordinary mechanic takes upon him exact knowledge in theology, and will teach both clerk and priest what they should say, what they should do; when artless men will judge of art, nay, enter upon the work of the ministry, instructing others when they have need to be instructed themselves.

Poulton's Abridgm. Title Breve, Butchers, &c.

"When a hatter Will go smatter In philosophy, Or a peddler Wax a meddler In theology." —SIR T. MOORE, in Juvenilia.

DCCCCXXXI.—Charity mistaken.

It is reported of those Indians in Jamaica, who, refusing to furnish Columbus, that Genoese, the first discoverer of the new American world, with provisions, that he, seeing the people idolatrously devoted unto the moon, and foreseeing her eclipse by his ephemerides, told them that if they did not speedily supply him, the Divine anger would suddenly consume them, a sign whereof they should see in the darkened face of the moon within two days. They, silly wretches, being ignorant of the cause, were so terrified at the beholding of the eclipse, that they came to beg pardon of him, and brought him provision in abundance. He made use of their ignorance, supplied his own necessity, and engaged them much unto him. Thus, many there are to be found amongst us, simple men and silly women, ignorant of the wiles of their seducing teachers, laying down all they have at their feet, thinking nothing good enough, all too little to throw upon them; when, such is their preposterous zeal, they will not willingly part with a penny that is due to maintain him that is more orthodox.

Purchase's Voyage

DCCCCXXXII.—The necessity of human learning.

WHEN St. Paul undertook to make the Corinthians know who was the Lord God, he professed a wealthy variety of much other knowledge besides the Scripture, and thanks God for it, that he spake with tongues πάντων ὑμῶν μᾶλλον more than they all did; he cites their own poets amongst the learned Athenians, and applies a satirical verse out of "Epimenides," to reprehend the lying and bestial manners of the Cretans; so powerful was his language amongst the Lystrians that he gained the repute of Mercury: and, questionless, the sitting so long at the feet of Gamaliel made him vas electionis (a vessel fit to hold that divine treasure which the Holy Ghost poured into him). It is but folly, then, for any one to be transported with the pangs of so indiscreet a zeal as to extinguish those first lamps of knowledge, polite and human studies; for they are like the crier in the wilderness before our Saviour, to prepare His way; and though they do not directly teach us to know God, yet are the fittest spectacles for unripe years and tender sights to put on, who are not able to endure at the first, vehemens sensibile, so excellently an object as God is. It is true that St. Paul was rapt into the third heavens, but God leads men now with a more apprehensive and ordinary hand than either by taking them up or sending down lights and visions from Himself, to make His Spirit to be at the command of every obstreperous, unlettered extemporist who will undertake to teach before themselves have learnt, whereby it often falls out that whilst such blockheads are about to make known the knowledge of God, though their bodies be confined within the compass of the pulpit, yet is their straggling invention fain to wander for matter, as Saul did over the Mount Gilboa and many other mountains, to seek his father's asses, and yet never found them.

DCCCCXXXIII.—No man able to free himself from sin.

It is reported of a prince, with whom a mighty neighbour-king used to pick quarrels by making impossible demands, otherwise threatening war and ruin to him, amongst the rest one was that he charged him to drink up the sea, which a counsellor hearing, advised him to undertake it. The prince replied: "How is it possible to be accomplished?" The sage answered: "Let him first stop up all the rivers that run into the sea, which are no part of the bargain, and then you shall perform it." Much more impossible is it for ourselves to consume and dry up all the ocean of sin in us, so long as lusts remain, like so many rivers, to feed it; for still sin breeds lusts, and lusts increase sin, as the sea sends forth springs that run into rivers, and those rivers return to the sea again. So that to bid a man clear his heart from all sin is to impose upon him opus Dei, the peculiar work of grace omnipotent. "Who can say, 'I have made my heart clean?'" "That can I," says the proud pharisee. "And that can I," says the popish justiciary. "Non habeo, Domine, quod mihi ignoscas (I have nothing, Lord, for Thee to pardon)," said Isidore, the sinful monk; but so could neither David, Job, nor St. Paul say, for in many things we sin all.

2 Tim. iii. 6.

"Assentatori decem talenta scortorum talentum, sed philosopho triobolum."
—LAERT., in Vita Cratii.

Goffe's Serm.,
Lond.

1 Cor. xiv. 18.

Tit. i. 12.

Acts xiv. 12.

Matt. iii. 3.

2 Cor. xii. 2.

"Nam videas in ecclesia imperitissimos quosque," &c.

1 Sam. ix.

Zuinger's Theat.
Hum. Vitæ.

Adams' Exposit., on
2 Pet.

"Nemo sine crimine vivit."

Prov. xx. 9.

Ps. cxxx. 3.
Job ix. 30.
Rom. vii. 15.

DCCCCXXXIV.—To promise much and perform little reprobable.

Livy said of Hannibal, that he never stood to his promise but when it made for his profit ; and Antigonus was called Dason, in the future tense, as being about to give, yet never giving ; whereupon grew the proverb upon him that promised much and performed little, that he was a Dason. The world is at this time surely full of such ; such as, one would think, were born in the land of promise, who feed their prisoners of hope with future promises, as Ephraim with wind ; mere alchemists, whose promises are gold, payment but dross, putting off, as the trick is, either with improbable reversions or promises of promises, like the devil's omnia dabo, imaginary and delusory ; whilst their patients, like that man of many years' infirmity in the Gospel, fainting by the pool, and none to put him in, lie languishing at Hope's hospital ; like a hungry man dreaming of meat, and when he awaketh his soul is empty ; or like men in a swoon, cheered with strong water, they revive only to bewear their eyes with further expectation, and to witness the fallibility of promise.

Plutarch, in Vita Paul.
Erasm., Adag.
Senhouse's Serm. at Court, 1617.
Hos. xii. 1.
Matt. iv. 9.
John v. 7.
Isa. xxix. 8.

DCCCCXXXV.—Partial hearers of God's Word reprov'd.

It is observable that, in great fairs and markets, the pedlar and the ballad-singer are more thronged than the wealthy tradesmen : children and fools hang upon those who sell toys, and neglect those who have their shops furnished with rich and merchantable commodities. And such is the partiality of many hearers of God's Word, that they will crowd to hear a sermon abroad, when they may hear one (perhaps a better) at home, and that, too, with a great deal more ease : and herein they wrong God, His Word, and His ministers—God, to whom only judgment belongs in this case ; for though some may judge of the minister's eloquence, many of his industry, yet none of his faithfulness, which is the chief thing required in a steward : His Word, in not having the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ in respect of persons : lastly, they offer indignities to the preachers of His Word, in over-valuing one man and too much slighting another.

"Auris bona est quæ libenter audit utilia," &c.—BERN., in Eplst.
Style's Serm., Lond., 1631.
I Cor. iv. 2.
James ii. 1.

DCCCCXXXVI.—Afflictions happen to both good and bad, but to several ends.

THE stalk and the ear of corn fall upon the threshing-floor under one and the same flail, but the one shattered in pieces, the other preserved ; from one and the same olive, and from under one and the same press, is crushed out both oil and dregs, but the one is put into casks for use, the other thrown out as unserviceable ; and by one and the same breath the fields are perfumed with sweetness and annoyed with unpleasant savours. Thus afflictions are incident to good and bad, may and do befall both alike, but, by the providence of God, not upon the same account. Good men are put into the furnace for their trial, bad men for their ruin ; the one is sanctified by afflictions, the other made far worse than before. The self-same affliction is as a loadstone to the one, to draw him to heaven, as a millstone to the other, to sink him down into hell.

Hect. Pintus, Dan.
"In eadem afflictione mali Deum detestantur, et blasphemant ; boni autem tem precantur et laudant."—AUG., de Civitat Dei, lib. i., cap. 8.

DCCCCXXXVII.—The study of school-divinity not altogether necessary.

THERE is an Italian tree mentioned by Pliny, called Staphylodendron, whose wood is fair and white, like our maple, the leaves broad and beautiful, the fruit sweet and pleasant : yet Dodoneus, a good herbalist, saith of it, that it is good for nothing. Such is the study of school-divinity : I will not say good for nothing, but, as Dr. Whitaker, a learned man in his time, said that school-men had plus argutiarum quàm doctrinæ, plus doctrinæ quàm usus 'a goodly kind of learning that whetteth the wit with quaint devices, and filleth the head with Nat. Hist., lib. xvi., cap. 16.

In Vita ejus, præfixa Operibus,

Dr. Holdsworth.
Moss's Serm., 1619.

nice distinctions). "Multa dicunt set nihil probant," said another learned man : yet giving them Christian freedom, we may use them as sweetmeats after a feast, rather to close the stomach and to delight with variety, than to satisfy the appetite or support nature.

DCCCCXXXVIII.—Atheism condemned.

Laert. Diog., 11
Vita.

PROTAGORAS ABDERITES, because he began his book with a doubt, "De Diis, neque ut sint, neque ut non sint, habeo dicere," was banished out of Athens, and his books solemnly burnt to ashes; and the same Athenians committed Anaxagoras to prison, and, but for Pericles, had put him to death, for writing a book of the moon's eclipses, after they had received her for a goddess. Then, do we find such jealousy of the heathens over their feigned gods, and shall the denial and disparagement of the honour of the one true and ever-living God be tolerated among Christians? No, let us know that atheism is the main disease of the soul, not only pestilent to the person in whom it is harboured, but to the whole land where it is permitted.

"Non est cum Dei hostibus societas cocunda."—
ZONAR., in Gra-tiana.

DCCCCXXXIX.—Heaven the inheritance of God's children.

Gen xxv.
Marc. de Piaz.
Theolog. Moralit.

It is observable, that whereas Abraham gave gifts to the sons of his concubines, and so sent them away, yet he reserved the heritage for his son Isaac, in whom the Covenant was established, the son of promise. So, if God (as oftentimes He doth) give secular things, common gifts, unto bastard-children, yet the inheritance of heaven, the crown of life, He preserveth for them who, after the manner of Isaac, are children of promise; as St. Paul speaks to His Isaacs, in whom He takes pleasure : to those that love Him, saith St. James : to those that love His appearing, saith another; all which hinteth thus much, that heaven is the proper inheritance of God's children.

Rom. ix. 8.
James i. 12.
2 Tim. iv. 8.

DCCCCXL.—God, in wisdom, ordering all things to work together for the good of His children.

Heiting, Panacea Christiana.

Look upon the revolution of the heavens, how every planet moves in its proper orbit : their motions are not alike, but various, nay, opposite each unto the other : hence those different conjunctions, oppositions, and aspects of the planets; yet, by the wheeling round of the primum mobile, they are brought about to one determinate point. Or do but observe well the wise and politic carriage of a provident governor, who, meeting with opposite factions in the state, while each man takes his own way, one seeking to undermine another, he serves his own ends of both, so wisely managing the good, so powerfully over-awing the bad, that all turn to the common good. Thus it is that, though many and sundry agents are found in the world, whose course and scope, whose aims and ends and actions are not the same—yea, divers, nay, adverse, one thwarting and crossing the other—yet the overruling providence of God so sways all subordinate and inferior instruments, that, in the midst of their mutual jars, they conspire in a sacred harmony, as if they had entered into a holy league or some sacred combination for the good of His chosen. Wherever the enemies be in respect of their places, whosoever they be in regard of their persons, howsoever disjointed in regard of their affections, all their projects and practices tend and end in the good of His elect.

"Providentiâ Dei
omnia gubernantur et quæ putatur pœna medicina est."—JER., in Exek.

Rom. viii. 28.

DCCCCXLI.—The unprofitable rich man.

It is observed by the mineralists, such as dig for treasure, that the surface of the earth is most barren where the bowels are most rich; that where the veins of gold and silver swell the biggest, the body of that earth (as if the treasure had eaten out all its fatness) is made so poor, that it is not capable of the least improvement. Thus it is, not always, but most usual, with rich men: they have full purses but empty souls, great incomes of wealth but small stocks of grace. Judas carried the bag; he was good for nothing else; and a rich man, laden with thick clay, having outward things in abundance, is good for nobody but himself; so true it is, that as greatness and goodness, so gold and grace seldom meet together.

Pintus, in Dan.

“Quid prodest arca plena si Iuanis est conscientia?” &c.
—AUG.
John xiii. 29.
Hab. ii. 6.

DCCCCXLII.—To beware of erroneous doctrine.

It is recorded by Theodoret, that when Lucius, an Arian bishop, came and preached amongst the Antiochians, broaching his damnable errors, the people forsook the congregation, at least for the time, having, indeed, been soundly taught before by worthy Athanasius. Thus, it were to be wished that the people of this age had their wits thus exercised to distinguish betwixt truth and falsehood, then false doctrines would not thrive as they do now amongst us; and errors, though never so closely masked with a pretence of zeal, would not so readily be received for truths as they now are by the multitude, nor so much countenanced by those that make profession of better things.

Hist. Eccles., lib. iv., cap. 20.

Denison's Sermon, Lond.

DCCCCXLIII.—Atheism punished.

It was somewhat a strange punishment which the Romans inflicted upon parricides: they sewed them up in a mail of leather, and threw them into the sea, yet so, that neither the water of the sea could soak through, nor any other element of nature—earth, air, or fire—approach unto them. And certainly every creature is too good for him that denies the Creator; nor can they be further separated from heaven or fall deeper into hell than they deserve that will believe neither. The God they deny shall condemn them, and those malignant spirits whom they never feared shall torment them, and that for ever.

Wolffg. Lazius, de Magist. Rom.

DCCCCXLIV.—Truth beloved in the general, but not in the particular.

As the friar wittily told the people, that the truth he then preached unto them seemed to be like holy water, which every one called for apace, yet, when it came to be cast upon them, they turned aside their faces as though they did not like it. Just so it is that almost every man calls fast for truth, commends truth, nothing will down but truth, yet they cannot endure to have it cast in their faces. They love truth in universali, when it only pleads itself, and shows itself, but they cannot abide it in particulari, when it presses upon them and shows them themselves; they love it lucentem, but hate it redarguentem; they would have it shine out unto all the world in its glory, but by no means so much as peep out to reprove their own errors.

Bosquier, Cod. Evang.

Senhouse's Sermon, Lond., 1618.

DCCCCXLV.—The confident Christian.

THE merchant adventurer puts to sea, rides out many a bitter storm, runs many a desperate hazard upon the bare hope of a gainful return; the valiant soldier takes his life in his hands, runs upon the very mouth of the cannon, dares the lion in his den, merely upon the hope of victory; every man hazards one way or other in his calling, yet all are but Hering, Panacea Christiana.

"Confidentia semper est cauta et circumsperta, nec ideo minus pugna et stronua," &c.—
PASCHAL, in Eibn.

1 Sam. xvii. 37.

Judges vii. 15.

Dan. iii. 17.

uncertain venturers, ignorant of the issue; but so it often falls out, that the greedy adventurer, seeking to increase his stock, loseth many times both it and himself; the covetous soldier, gaping after spoil and victory, findeth himself at last spoiled, captivated. But the confident Christian, the true child of God, runs at no such uncertainty: he is sure of the goal when he first sets out, certain of the day before he enters the field, sounds the trumpet before victory, and when he puts on his harness dares boast as he that puts it off; witness David's encounter with Goliath, Gideon's march against the Midianites, and the Christian resolution of those three worthies.

DCCCCXLVI.—To take time while time serves.

Bellarmin, de Aeternitate, grad. vii.

"Temporibus semper cautus servire memento."—PHO-CYLIDES.

It was a curious observation of Cardinal Bellarmine, who, when he had the full prospect of the sun going down, to try a conclusion of the quickness of its motion, took a psalter into his hand, "And before," saith he, "I had twice read the fifty-first psalm, the whole body of the sun was set," whereby he did conclude that, the earth being twenty thousand thousand miles in compass, the sun must needs run in half a quarter of an hour seven thousand miles; and in the revolution of twenty-four hours, six hundred and seventy-two thousand miles—a large progress in so short a time. And herein, though the cardinal's computations (as well as his doctrine in debates polemical) doth very much fall short of truth, yet his experience in this gives some proof of the extraordinary swiftness of the sun's motion. Is, then, the course of the sun so swift, is time so fleeting, then let time be as precious. Lay hold upon all opportunity of doing good, labour while it is day, for night will come and time will be no more. The sun was down before the cardinal could twice read the psalm "Miserere mei, Deus," and the light of thy life (such is the velocity thereof) may be put out before thou canst say once "Lord, be merciful to me a sinner!"

DCCCCXLVII.—The workings of God and man very different.

Gardiner's Serm., Lond.

"Hæremus cuncti superis."—LUCAN.

THE first and highest heaven draws by its motion the rest of the planets, and that not by a crooked, but by a right motion; yet the planets so moved move of themselves obliquely. If you inquire whence is the obliquity of this motion in the planets, certainly not from the first mover, but from the nature of the planets. Thus, in one and the same manner, man aims at one end, God at another; the same that man worketh sinfully God worketh most holily; and, therefore, they work idem, but not ad idem. The motion of our wills do exceedingly vary from God's will, and seem to drive a contrary end than that which God aimeth at; yet are they so overruled by His power, that at last they meet together, and bend that way where He intendeth.

DCCCCXLVIII.—A wicked life hath usually a wicked end.

Stapleton, in Vita Thos. Mori.

"Cæpta malè infelix exitus usque manet."—OVID.

THERE is a story of one that, being often reproved for his ungodly and vicious life, and exhorted to repentance, would still answer that it was but saying three words at his death, and he was sure to be saved. Perhaps the three words he meant were "Miserere mei, Deus (Lord, have mercy upon me)!" But one day, riding over a bridge, his horse stumbled, and both were falling into the river, when in the moment of that precipitation he only cried, "Capiat omnia diabolus (Horse and man and all to the devil)!" Three words he had, but not such as he should have had. He had been so familiar with the devil all his life, that he thinks of none else at his death. Thus it is that usually a wicked life hath a wicked end. He that travels the way of hell all his life time, it is impossible, in the end of his journey, he should arrive at heaven. A worldly man dies rather thinking of his gold than his God. Some die jeering, some raging ; some in one distemper, some in another. Why? They lived so, and so they die. But the godly man is full of comfort in his death, because he was full of heaven in his life.

DCCCCXLIX.—The telling of truth begets hatred.

As the Turk taunted some Christians at Constantinople, who said that they came thither to suffer for the truth, by telling them that they needed not to have come so far for that, for had they but told the truth at home they could not have missed suffering for it : telling truth needs not travel far for enmity ; enmity will encounter it at home, wheresoever it be. Hence is that definition that Luther made of preaching : "Prædicare nihil est quàm derivare in se furorem," &c.—that to preach, and preach home (as he did), was nothing else but to stir up the furies of hell about their ears. Mr. Dering, telling Queen Elizabeth in a sermon that it was once tanquam ovis, but now it was indomita juvenca, was never suffered to preach more at court. Tell a politician Papinian's truth, that that is the best reason which makes most for religion, that the best policy which makes most for piety ; why, this truth crossing his projects and purposes, the teller may take his bill and sit down quickly and write enmity. Tell a covetous man St. Paul's truth, that "the love of money is the root of all evil," you offer him loss, you touch his freehold, you are a trespasser on his trade, an enemy. Tell the luxurious man that theorem of truth, that temperance is the razor of superfluities and the rule of necessities, and that this whole life ought to be a kind of quadragesimal abstinence : "Away with your threadbare scholars' poesies ! What ! do you bring us into the wilderness to starve us ? You are an enemy." Thus, let the truth-teller never dream of comfits and sweetmeats, but make account to eat his passover with sour herbs ; let him never feed himself with vain expectation that the trade of truth-telling is a plausible, winning, welcome profession, an expectas ut Quintilianus ametur. Let him rather account himself to be born, as Jeremy, a contentious man ; one that striveth with the whole earth ; a troublesome companion ; an enemy.

Bosquier, Orat. Te Sancte.

Loc. Com.

"Obsequium amicorum veritas odium parit."—TER.

Senhouse's Serm. 1620.

DCCCCCL.—Men not repairing to the church of God reproved.

THE renowned Captain Huniades, when he felt himself in danger of death, desired to receive the Sacrament before his departure, and would in any case, sick as he was, be carried to the church to receive the same, saying that it was not fit that the Lord should come to the house of His servant, but the servant go rather to the house of his Lord and Master. David's desire was to dwell there ; and Nicodemus, though a ruler, did not send for Christ, but go unto Him,—whose modesty condemns many amongst us, who will not vouchsafe to come to Christ. If He will be served, Christ must come to them ; the Supper of the Lord must be brought to their table ; the ministers of Christ must church their wives at home, baptize their children at home, vainly imagining that they do God a great favour when they tread in His courts, and a grace to His ambassadors when they lend their ears to an hour's audience.

Knoles' Turk. Hist.

Ps. xxvii. 4.

Boy's Postill.

DCCCCCLI.—Grace seemingly lost in the soul.

THE two disciples talked with Christ, yet knew Him not ; Mary, with her blubbered eyes, mistakes Christ for the gardener ; Hagar, in the very midst of her distress, had a fountain of water before her, yet could not see it, till God was pleased to open her eyes. Thus, the least cloud of God's displeasure may, as it were an ecliptic line, seem to darken the splendour of His graces within us. Christ may so hide Himself from our hearts, that

Luke xxiv. 16

John xx. 15

Gen. xxi. 19.

Beller's Serm. Lond.

knowledge or faith shall not be able to reach Him; and much of the Spirit may be so darkened, that, though a man have Christ in the promise—O strange detention!—yet he shall not be able to discern Him.

DCCCCLII.—Men not to run themselves into trouble.

Hut. Tripartita.

THERE is mention made, in the ecclesiastical story, of a silly woman that must needs spit in the emperor's face, that so she might suffer martyrdom; and it is said of the lion, that, to provoke himself to anger, when there is none to hurt him, he beateth himself with his own tail. But thus must no good Christian do. We must take heed that we do not wilfully run ourselves into troubles, but rather use all lawful means to prevent them before they come, and to be freed from them when they are come; for he shall have sorrow that loves it; and he that runs into danger shall perish in it; and he that voluntarily lays a cross upon his own shoulders, when he needs not, hath no promise that God will take it off. It is true that we must drink of this bitter cup, but we must stay till God puts it into our hands, otherwise we cannot say that we are chastised by Him, but that we scourge ourselves with whips of our own making.

Downham's Guide
to Godliness.

"Non est nostrum persecutiones arriperere, sed illatas ab aliis," &c.—JER.,
super John.

DCCCCLIII.—How to behold ourselves in the glass of God's law.

Fox's Act. and Mon.

ONE of the persecutors in Queen Mary's days, pursuing a poor Protestant, and searching the house for him, charged an old woman to show him the heretic. She points to a great chest of linen, on the top whereof lay a fair looking-glass. He opens the chest, and asks where the heretic was. She suddenly replied, "Do you not see one?" meaning that he was the heretic, and that he might easily see himself in the glass. And thus God's law is the glass that shows us all our spots. Let us hold it right to our intellectual eye, not behind us, as the wicked do; they cast God's Word behind them; not beside us, like the rich worldling that called to Christ; not to turn the back side of the glass towards us, which is the very trick of all hypocrites; nor, lastly, to look upon ourselves in this glass when we are muffled, masked, or cased, for under those veils we cannot discern our own complexions; but let us set the clear glass before our face, and our open face to the glass, and then we shall soon perceive that the sight of our filthiness is the first step towards cleanliness.

"Lex divina tanquam in specula peccata monstrat."
—AUG.
Ps. l. 17.

Matt. xix. 20.

Luke xviii. 11.

Adams, on 2 Pet.

DCCCCLIV.—Men of all sorts to stand up for the truth.

Lib. de Orthod.
Fide.

Acts and Monuments.

Seahouse's Serm.

Gal. iv. 16.

It was the great praise of learned Fulgentius upon young Donatus, that, being set upon by the Arians, though he had not the skill to defend the truth with his tongue, yet he had a will to maintain the truth in his heart; though he could not unloose all their cunning tricks, he could yet hold fast the conclusion: truth. And he that (for he could neither write nor read) could not clerkly subscribe his name to truth's confession could yet manfully draw blood from himself, wherewith to set his mark to it; and he that, for want of learning, could not dispute Christ's cause, could yet be content to die for it. "And were every hair of my head a man, I would burn them all," said a third, "rather than go from truth." Thus it is to be wished that, as this was the first nation that universally received the truth of the Gospel, so to the last it may continue constant to the truth; that every man would stand up for the truth, fight and die for the truth; and happiness it will be found in the end, thus to suffer for so good a friend as truth is, to continue truth's friend, whoever he be that shall become an enemy.

DCCCCLV.—Kingdom of Christ a peaceable kingdom.

A CAPTAIN sent from Cæsar unto the senators of Rome, to sue for the prolonging of his government abroad, understanding (as he stood at the council chamber door) that they would not condescend to his desire, clapping his hand upon the pommel of his sword: "Well," said he, "seeing you will not grant it me, this shall give it me." So, when the citizens of Messana, despising Pompey's jurisdiction, alleged ancient orders in old time granted to their town, Pompey did answer them in choler, "What! do you prattle to us of your law, that have swords by our sides?" And thus it is that Mahomet dissolveth all arguments by the sword, and thus all tyrants and potentates of the world end all their quarrels and make their enemies their footstool by the sword; but the sceptre of Christ's kingdom is not a sword of steel, but a sword of the Spirit: He ruleth in the midst of His enemies, and subdueth a people unto Himself, not by the sword, but by the Word, for the Gospel of peace is the power of His arm to salvation.

Plutarch.

Calv. Turciam, lib. i., cap. 3.

Rom. i. 16.

DCCCCLVI.—Recreation, the necessity thereof.

It is reported of a good old primitive Christian, that, as he was playing with a bird, two or three youths, as they were passing by, observed it, and one of them says to the other, "See how this old man plays like a child with the bird!" which the good man over-hearing, calls him to him, and asks him what he had in his hand. "A bow," says he. "What do you with it, and how do you use it?" said the other; whereupon the young man bent his bow and notched his arrow, as if he had been ready to shoot, then, after some short time, unbent his bow again. "Why do you so?" said the holy man: "Alas!" says the young man, "if I should always keep my bow ready bent, it would prove a slug, and be utterly disabled for any further service." "Is it so?" said the good old man. "Then, my son, take notice that, as thy bow, such is the condition of all human nature. Should our thoughts and intentions be always taken up, and the whole bent of our mind set upon the study of Divine things, the wings of devotion would soon flag, and the arrows of contemplation fly but slowly towards heaven." And most true it is, that there is otium as well as negotium, a time of taking pleasure as well as a time of taking pain; neque semper arcum tendit Apollo; the bow that stands always bent will become unserviceable; and let but the frame of this body of ours want its natural rest, the roof will soon be on fire. Recreation is a second creation; when weakness hath almost annihilated the spirits, it is the breathing of the soul, which otherwise would be stifled: lawful recreation (such as that εὐτραπελία of the philosophers) strengthens labour and sweetens rest, and the blessing of God may be expected therein, as well as in doing the work of our calling.

St. John Evang.

Surius, in Vita Rheimigii.

Cassian., col. xxiv. cap. 21.

"Nec semper Causidicus arcu destinat exempto, sed laxat cornua nervo."—LUCAN, Fuller's Holy State.

"Major post otia virtus."—SIL. ITAL.

DCCCCLVII.—The great benefit of devotion at bed-time.

OVIENS that have been baked in over-night are easily heated the next morning, the cask that was well seasoned in the evening will smell sweet the next day, the fire that was well raked up when we went to bed will be the sooner kindled when we rise. Thus, if in the evening we spend ourselves in the examination of our hearts, how we have spent the time past, and commit ourselves unto the good guidance of God for the time to come, we shall soon find the spiritual warmth thereof, making us able and active for all good duties in the morning, and, by adding some new fuel to this holy fire, we shall, with much facility and comfort, cause it to burn and blaze in all Christian and religious duties.

Downham's Guide to Godliness.

DCCCCLVIII.—To accept the event of things with patience.

Walchrius, Decas Fab.

THE censurers of the world, by way of apologue, being met together, consulted about the redress of divers enormities : one, with the countenance of Heraclitus, was ever weeping for the disorders ; another, with the face of Democritus, was ever laughing at the absurdities ; a third, of a more pragmatistical spirit, was busy where he had no thanks : they all studied and plotted how to reform the ataxy of things, and to bring the world into some peace and order. Princes were implored, philosophers consulted, physicians, soldiers, the eminent in all professions, were convened ; many stratagems were devised ; still, the more they projected to still the world's troubles, the more troublesome they made it. One would have it this way, another that, the next differs from both, a fourth opposeth them three, a fifth contradicteth them all, so that there was nothing else but crossing one another : physicians with their recipes, commanders with their precipes, Jesuits with their decipes, all the rest with their percipes, could do no good at all. At last a grandfather, in a religious habit, presented them an herb of such sovereign virtue, that, when every one had tasted of it, they were all calm and quiet presently : the herb's name he called Bulapatham, the herb patience. And let but this be our diet continually, and we shall find a strange alteration in ourselves ; no troubles abroad or discontent at home shall break our peace, if we be but armed with patience. The Church and people of God are thrown upon sad times, blessings are not denied, though they be not presently granted : some while, God is not ready to give, the time for His greater glory is not yet come ; another while, we are not fit to receive, the time of our preparedness and capacity is not yet come. The Lord looks to be waited on.

"Sciaditur incertum studia in contraria," &c.

Adams, in Pet.

"Gaudet patientia duris."—LUCAN.

Ps. xxvii. 14.

DCCCCLIX.—To be careful in the prevention of danger.

Benhouse's Serm. at Court.

THE boar, in the fable, being questioned why he stood whetting his teeth so, when nobody was near to hurt him, wisely answered that it would then be too late to whet them when he was to use them, and therefore whetted them before danger, that he might have them ready in danger. Thus, as Demosthenes advised the Athenians, οὐ περιμείναντας, ἀλλὰ πρὸς εὐλαβόντας, that they would not expect till evil came, but prevent it, and to deal with dangers as men do with serpents and vipers, of which, though haply they never have been stung or bitten, yet, seeing any of them, they tarry not till it sting or bite, but, before harm done, forthwith seek to kill it, to crush the scorpion at the first appearance, not waiting and gaping after event, the schoolmaster of fools, as Fabius calls it ; but ante bellum auxilium, and ante tubam tremor, to be affected with what is not yet effected, wary before they be wounded, and prudent in seeing a danger afar off and shunning it.

"Venienti occurrere morbo."

In Poemat.

Prov. xxii. 3.

DCCCCLX.—The folly of late repentance.

Boy's Psall.

THAT carrier must needs be taken for a fool who, having to go a far and foul journey, will lay the heaviest pack upon the weakest horse : so that Christian cannot be held any of the wisest that lays the great load of repentance upon his faint and feeble dotage, whereas in the chiefest strength of his youth he cannot lift it easily, but is ready to stagger under it.

DCCCCLXI.—Watchfulness of life rewarded.

Philostratus, in Vita.

THAT famous Apollonius, held in his time for an oracle of the world, coming very early in the morning to Vespasian's gate and finding him awake, conjectured thereupon that he was worthy to command an empire, and said to his companion that went along with him, ἀνὴρ ἀρξεῖ (Undoubtedly this man will be emperor, because he is so watchful). Thus, whosoever thou art that, with David, doth seek God early, and with those three women that looked after Christ very early in the morning, thou that rememberest thy Creator in the days of thy youth, that art circumspect in walking, careful of thy life and conversation, diligent in thy way, be assured that thou shalt stand before princes; that thou hast not laboured in vain nor spent thy strength for nought; for thy judgment is with the Lord, and thy work with thy God, who will fully reward thee.

Ps. lxxiii. 1.

Mark xvi. 2.

"Vigilare docet hominem, qui vult sua temporis conferre officia."—PLAUT.

DCCCLXII.—How to behave ourselves in the hearing of God's Word.

IT were a great unmannerliness for a man that is invited at a solemn feast to rise before the table is taken away, unless in case of sickness, weakness, or some important affair; and it were a high contempt, even to the most inferior judicature, that a man, being lawfully summoned thither, would depart without license till the court were risen. And shall men dare to sneak out of the church before the sermon be ended, or make haste away after the sermon be ended, rushing out like prisoners or school-boys when the doors are opened, without craving a blessing of God or attending the blessing from God by the mouth of His minister? If this be not a contempt of God's Word and commandments, let any man judge.

Downham's Guide to Godliness.

DCCCLXIII.—Learning and honesty to go together.

FRANCISCUS PETRARCHA, that scholarium tetrarcha, a man famous in his time, was put under the scrutiny of men's judgments. Four men undertook the task: one had no learning, the other had a little, a third not much, the fourth somewhat, but intricate and perplexed. Good man! he was not tried by his peers. All their opinions were summed up in this sentence: "Petrarcha sine literis, vir bonus (Petrarch, an illiterate good man)." The king stormed at this sentence, the nobles fretted, his friends were vexed, and almost all men threatened revenge upon such saucy judges; but Petrarch himself applauded their judgment, saying, "O ulinam non verè dixerunt, &c. (The end of all my study was to be a good man. If learning came in upon the bye, I did not refuse it; but now, seeing by their sentence I may, without learning, have goodness, what a comfort is this to me and thousands more of no better knowledge)!" And most true it is that, of two unhappy disjunctions, it were better to see an honest man without learning than a learned man without honesty; but quam benè conveniunt, when learning and honesty meet together, where learning is as the sowing of the ground, and a virtuous and holy life is as the harvest; where knowledge, being married to grace, brings forth a glorious issue, a race of heavenly fruits, a posterity of good works.

In Vita, præf. Op. per Hiron, Scharzschum.

"Vita bona sine doctrina gratiam habet, doctrina sine vita integritatem habet."—GLOS., in Ep. ad Philippens.

DCCCLXIV.—Carnal security reproved.

IT is observable of the smith's dog, that neither the noise of hammers by him, nor the sparks of fire flying about him, nor some that light upon him, do any whit awaken him, but he snorts and sleeps on securely. St. Paul speaks of men ἀπηλγγκότες, such as are past all feeling; and Solomon brings in one so insensible, that if he were stricken, he was not sick; if beaten, he felt it not; another, going like a fool to the stocks, not knowing of the danger that he was running into. Such are they that dally and fool with dangers, even spiritual dangers, the harlotry of sin; so that, whether it be that they are besotted with carnal security, or engrossed with covetous secularity, or deafened with the noise of worldly vanity, nescio quid teneros fascinat, one thing or other so stupifying and deadening the faculties of their souls, that they are, as it were, benumbed with careless security, that they have little or no sense of any spiritual hazard at all.

Senhouse's Sermon, 1623. Eph. iv. 19.

Prov. xxiii. 35 and vii. 22.

"Mater negligentiam solet esse securitatem."—GREG., in Pas.

DCCCCLXV.—The time of our youth to be given up to God.

Boy's Postill,
Exod. xiii. 2.
Gen. iv. 4.

Dan. i. 4.

"Honor adolescentem est, timorem Dei habere." &c.— AMB., de Officiis,
Gen. xliii. 3.

ALMIGHTY GOD ever required in His service the first-fruits and the first-born; the firstlings are His darlings, the fattest lambs are fittest for His sacrifice. If the King of Babel would have young men, well favoured, without blemish, and such as had great ability, to stand before him, shall the God of Israel, even the King of Glory, have none to stand in His courts but the halt, lame, and blind—such as the soul of David hated? "Ye shall not see my face," saith Joseph to his brethren, "except you bring your younger brother with you." And how shall we behold the face of our blessed Jesus, if we do not remember Him in the days of our youth, if we dedicate to the devil our lovely young years, and offer unto Him nothing else but the dregs of our loathed old age?

DCCCCLXVI.—Time, the least moment thereof cannot be assured.

Laert. Diog., in Vita.

"Quocunque modo rem. Nemosibi perire diem, et nunquam rediturum causetur."—BERN., ad Scholares.

ALEXANDER, being much taken with the witty answers of Diogenes, bade him ask what he would, and he should have it. The philosopher demandeth the least proportion of immortality. "That is not in my gift," says Alexander. "No?" quoth Diogenes; "then why doth Alexander take such pains to conquer the world, when he cannot assure himself of one moment to enjoy it?" What the cynic said to this great conqueror may very well be retorted upon many in our age. How do many men turmoil themselves in the pursuit after riches, honours, and preferments, per fas et nefas, no matter how they come by them! Yet, when all is done, they cannot add one cubit to their stature, nor one minute to their lives, wherein they may take comfort in them.

DCCCCLXVII.—Lawful recreation, the benefit thereof.

Downham's Guide
to Godliness.

"Vires instigat alique, tempestiva qui es."—STAT.

THE strings of a lute, let down and remitted, do sound sweeter when they are raised again to their full pitch; and fields, being every year sowed, become at length very barren, but being some time laid fallow, repay the husbandman's patience with double increase. So our bodies and minds, if they have no remission from labours, will make but dull music; and if we do not sometimes let them lie fallow and give them a summer tilth of seasonable recreation, they will soon become barren and fruitless.

DCCCCLXVIII.—A man not well principled in his religion, unstable in all his ways.

Adams, on 2 Pet.

"Bene vivere loco, positum est."—
SENEC., in Epiat.

THE intemperate man now sucks the grape of Orleans; anon that hotter fruit of the Canaries; then he is taken with the pleasant moisture of the Rhenish plants; sometimes the juice of the pressed apples and pears delights him, which he warmeth with the Irish usquebaugh; and then quenchet it with the liquor made of English barley. Thus, a man not well principled in his religion is unstable in all his ways: he reels like a drunkard from place to place; he hath put so much intoxicating scrupulosity into his head, that he cannot stand on his legs—a drunkard, indeed, not so much for excess as change of liquors, for his soul doth affect variety of doctrines more than the intemperate body doth variety of drinks. He takes in a draught of religion from every country: so much of Anabaptism as may make him a rebel, so much of that loving family as may make him an adulterer, so much of Rome as may make him a traitor, so much of Arianism as may make him a blasphemer; only he will stand to nothing, as the drunkard can stand at nothing. He knows what he hath been, he knows not what he will be—nay, he knows not what he is.

DCCCCLXIX.—The want of zeal in the cause of God reproved.

IN the sacking of Troy, Æneas is said first to have exported θεοῦ πατρός, then τὸν πατέρα, to have carried out his gods, even before his dearest father. Look upon the Turks' eagerness in defending and propagating their law, non disputando, sed pugnando, as Mahomet, their prophet, hath taught them. Or if Christian instances may be more operative, look upon the Romanists, their Jesuits' own expression shall evidence their earnestness: Campian, in his epistle to the council of Queen Elizabeth, "Quandiu unus quispiam è nobis supererit, qui Tiburno vestro fruatur," &c., saith he (That so long as there was any one Jesuit of them remaining to enjoy Tyburn, any one of them left for the gallows, torment, and imprisonment, they had vowed never to desist endeavouring to set up that religion in the nation). Shall Turks, then, and heathens and Papists solicit their bad cause so earnestly, and we our good cause, our God's cause, so faintly? Oh let it not be said "Acrius ad perniciem, quam nos ad salutem," that they should drive like Jehu, fiercely, and we, like Egyptians with their wheels off, heavily! They clamour out for their wooden and broaden god, and we, by our sluggishness and prejudice, betray the cause of our great and glorious God.

Homer.

In Aloran.

Senhouse's Serm.
at Court.

"Si videris ethnici-cum vitæ temperatæ," &c.—
B.A.S., Serm. de Zelo.

DCCCCLXX.—How faith alone may be said to justify.

JUDITH cut off Holofernes' head alone: she commandeth all her attendants, as well great as little, to stand without her tent, and to go forth of her presence; but when once the deed is done, when the serpent's head is broken and trod under foot, her whole troop runs to her, and stands about her. Thus, albeit faith, apprehending God's sure mercy, for the full and free pardon of sins, is in our justification sola, yet in our conversation it is not solitaria, but ever accompanied with cleanness of hands, which is ready to do that which is right, and with a graciousness of tongue, which is ready to speak that which is true, neither deceiving our neighbour nor blaspheming God by lifting up the soul unto vanity, i. e., taking His name in vain, as some divines expound it.

Chap. xiii. 3.

Boy's Pestill.

Bucer, Moller, Calvin, Bellarmine, Genebrard, &c.

DCCCCLXXI.—The commandments of God, the reasonableness of them.

THERE is mention made of one who willingly fetched water near two miles every day for a whole year together, to pour upon a dry dead stick, upon the bare command of a superior, when no reason could be given for so doing. How ready, then, should every one be to do God service, to be at the command of Jesus Christ, whose service is perfect freedom, whose commands are backed with reason, and whose precepts are attended with encouragements! Never did any man serve Him in vain, never was any man's labour in and for the Lord forgotten; nay, as He doth not let obedience go unrequited, so doth He not require it with a little, or measure out His rewards by inches and scantlings, but such as shall be pressed down, shaken together, and running over.

Cassian., de Institut.
Renunciati, lib. iv.,
c. 24.

"Pater adsum, im-pera quid vis."—
PLAUT.

Luke vi. 38.

DCCCCLXXII.—To be fervent in prayer.

AN arrow, if it be drawn up but a little way, it goes not far, but if it be pulled up to the head it flies strongly and pierceth deeply. Thus prayer, if it be but dribbled forth of careless lips, it falls down at our feet; it is the strength of ejaculation that sends it up into heaven and fetches down a blessing thence. The child hath escaped many a stripe by his loud cry, and the very unjust judge cannot endure the widow's clamour. Heartless motions do but bespeak a denial, whereas fervent suits offer a sacred violence both to earth and Hall's Contemplat.

Wom. of Canaan.

heaven. It is not the arithmetic of our prayers, how many they are; nor the rhetoric of our prayers, how eloquent they be; nor the geometry of our prayers, how long they be; nor the music of our prayers, the sweetness of our voice; nor the logic of our prayers, and the method of them; but the divinity of our prayers, which God so much affecteth. He looketh not for any James, with horny knees, through assiduity of prayer; nor for any Bartholomew, with a century of prayers for the morning and as many for the evening; but St. Paul's frequency of praying, with fervency of spirit; that is it which availeth much.

"Non chordis musica, sed cor," James v. 16.

DCCCCLXXIII.—Parents not to be over-careful to make their children rich.

De Wann's Serm. de Tempore.

THERE is a true story of a rich oppressor who had stored up a great mass of wealth for his only son. This man falling into sickness, and thereby into some remorse, called his son to him, and told him how abundantly he had provided for him, withal asking him whether he did truly and really love him. The son answered that nature, besides his paternal indulgence, bound him to that. The father, being now in his sick bed, further puts him to it, how he would express his love to him. The son answered and said, in anything that he should command him. Hereupon his father chargeth him to hold his finger in the burning candle but so long as he could say one Pater noster, without removing it. The son attempted it, but could not endure it. "Yet," says his father, "to get thee wealth and a large estate upon earth I have hazarded my soul to hell; for the welfare of thy body I have ventured my soul. Thou canst not suffer the burning of a finger for me; I must burn body and soul for thy sake; thy pain is but for a minute, mine must be unquenchable fire, even torments for ever." By this consideration, being melted into repentance, he restored all the gains of his injustice, made the poor partakers of his riches, abandoned all worldliness, and was recovered both in soul and body to the Lord. As this man hath many followers in his base avarice, so it were to be wished of God that he had some in His gracious repentance. Little do griping fathers think that what was forty years a-gathering will be spent in a few days' revelling. And so it comes to pass, as by daily experience may be seen, that when men are over-careful to provide for their own, by taking away another man's, vix gaudet tertius habes; he that buys a patrimony for his child with the loss of his own soul hath but a dear purchase, a very hard bargain.

"Quocunque modo rem."

"Malè paria malè dilabuntur."

DCCCCLXXIV.—To be zealous in the cause of God.

Sleidan's Com., lib. iii.

In Epist

Acts xxi. 13.

Philo. Jud., de Vita Contemplat.

MEMORABLE is that Christian resolution of Martin Luther, that he would enter into the city of Worms, in the name of the Lord Jesus, though there were as many devils as tiles to cover the houses; and that of Calvin, "Nè decem quidem maria," &c. (that it would not grieve him to sail over ten seas, about an uniform draught for religion)." And the blessed apostle was not only ready to be bound, but to die also, for the name of the Lord Jesus. And thus must every good Christian do: be zealous in the cause of God, contend for the truth of His Word, spare no cost, leave no stone unmoved. "Ubi de religione, ibi quoque de vita agitur" (holding even their very lives to hold upon religion)," serving God with all their might, and, as is commanded, ready to run through fire and water for their holy profession.

DCCCCLXXV.—Christ to be received into our hearts by faith.

Boy's Pothil.

Luke vii. 44.

IN the Gospel history we find that Christ had a fourfold entertainment amongst the sons of men: some received him into house, not into heart, as Simon the Pharisee, who gave him no kiss, nor water to his feet ; some into heart, but not into house, as the graceless, swinish Gergesenes ; some both into house and heart, as Lazarus, Mary, Martha. And thus let all good Christians do : endeavour that Christ may dwell in their hearts by faith, that their bodies may be fit temples of His Holy Spirit, that now in this life, whilst Christ stands at the door of their hearts, knocking for admission, they will lift up the latch of their souls, and let Him in ; for if ever they expect to enter into the gates of the city of God hereafter, they must open their hearts, the gates of their own city, to Him here in this world.

Matt. x. 14. 24.
John. xii. 8.
Eph. iii. 17.
1 Cor. vi. 19.

DCCCCLXXVI.—Sermon not done till practised.

It is reported of a good man, that, coming from a public lecture, and being asked by one whether the sermon were ended, made this answer, fetching a deep sigh : “ Ah, it is said, but not done ! ” And, to speak truth, the sermon cannot be said to be done till it be practised. But herein, the Lord be merciful to most of us ! We are apt to think that when a sacrament-day is over, all the sacrament duties are over too ; when the discourse from the pulpit is finished, the sermon is finished ; as if, when the ordinance were at an end, there were an end of the ordinance, and of us with the ordinance also.

Goodwin's Evang.
Com.

“ Audire, est obedire.”—ISTIDOR.

DCCCCLXXVII.—Christ the poor man's object as well as the rich man's.

A low man, if his eyes be clear, may look as high, though not so far, as the tallest ; the least pigmy may, from the lowest valley, see the sun or stars as fully as a giant upon the highest mountain. He that stands by may see as far into the millstone as he that picks it. Christ is now in heaven ; it is not the smallness of our person nor the meanness of our condition can hinder us from beholding Him ; the soul hath no stature, neither is heaven to be had with reaching. If God be but pleased to clear the eyes of our faith, we shall be high enough to behold Him :

Hall's Contemplat

Zaccheus.

DCCCCLXXVIII.—Ministers to be encouraged and protected against the plots of wicked men, and why so.

PHILIP OF MACEDON, besieging Athens, sent legates to the city, conditioning with them that if they would deliver into his hands ten of their orators, such as he should choose, whom he pretended to be the disturbers of the common-weal, he would raise his siege, and be at peace with them. But Demosthenes smelt out his plot, and, with the consent of the Athenians, returned him this apologetical answer : “ The wolves came to treat of a league with the shepherds, and told them thus : ‘ All the feud and discord betwixt you and us ariseth from a certain generation of dogs, which you maintain against us ; deliver up those dogs, and we will be good friends with you.’ The dogs were delivered up, the peace was concluded, the shepherds, as they thought, secure. But oh the woeful massacre that was presently made amongst the poor lambs ! They were all devoured, the shepherds undone, and all by parting with their dogs.” Thus, if the popish or the peevish party could but once get the ministers of the Gospel to hold their peace, or procure them to be muzzled by authority, or to be delivered over to their wolfish cruelty, woe were it to the souls of the poor people ! Error would then play rex, darkness triumph, hell make play-day, truth would languish, and all goodness fall flat to the earth. As little as they are now regarded, men would miss them, and wish for them, and be glad to protect them if they had them.

Plutarch, in Vita
Demosthenis.

Justinus, ex Trog.

DCCCCLXXIX.—Meditations of death, the benefit thereof.

Flac. Illiic, Cat.
Test. Verit.

* Such as suffered in Savoy, anno 1655.

Potter, at Funeral
Serm.

"Ipse jubet mortis te meminisse Deus."
—CHILLO, per Au-
sonium.

PETER WALDO, a rich merchant of Lyons, in France, being invited to a great supper, where one of the company fell suddenly dead at the table, was so taken with the sight that he forsook his calling and fell to study the Scripture, trading for the pearl of the Gospel, whereby he became an excellent preacher and the first founder of those ancient Christians called Waldenses.* Such is the benefit that cometh by the meditation of death. Let but a man behold the bones of the dead, and make a Christian use thereof, he must needs fall into a pathological meditation within himself, as thus: "Behold, these legs, that make so many journeys, this head, which is the receptacle of wisdom, and remembereth many things, must shortly be as this bare skull and dry bones are! I will, therefore, betimes, bid worldly things adieu, betake myself to repentance and newness of life, and spend the rest of my days in the service of my God and thoughts of my dissolution." Away, then, with that sad, and too, too usual expression, "I thought as little of it as of my dying day." Let Otho think them cowards that think on death, but let all good men think and meditate on death, what it is unto all men by nature, what unto good men, what unto bad, and great will be the comfort arising thereupon.

DCCCCLXXX.—Men to be helpful one to another.

Augustin, in Ps. xli.

Plin., Hist. Nat.,
lib. viii, cap. 32.

Ps. xlii. 1.

"Concors sic præstat uterque."—
ALCIAT, Emblem.

Ps. xxxvi. 8.

It is reported of harts, that having to travel far by herds on the land, or else to pass over some great water, they go behind one another, and when the foremost is weary then he resteth his weary head upon the hindmost, and so, mutually bearing one another's burden, they come happily to the place where they would be. Thus, as the souls of holy men long and thirst after God, with whom is the well of life, like as the harts desire the water-brooks, let them, as deer, support the sick head and heavy heart of one another, bear up a brother who is falling, strengthening one another in the way of this earthly pilgrimage, until they all rest upon God's holy mountain, where they shall be satisfied with the pleasures of his house, drinking out of the comforts thereof as out of a river.

DCCCCLXXXI.—Graces, to stock them up against a day of trouble.

Epist. cxxx. ad
Cyrilic. Episcop.

Ps. xxiv. 1.

Job i. 21.

Acts vii. 59.
Mark vi. 24.

ST. CHRYSOSTOM, suffering under the Empress Eudoxia, tells his friend Cyriacus how he armed himself beforehand: εἰ μὲν βούλεται ἡ βασίλισσα ἐξορίσαι μέ, &c. "I thought, Will she banish me? 'The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof.' Take away my goods? 'Naked came I into the world, and naked must I return.' Will she stone me? I remembered Stephen. Behead me? John Baptist came into my mind," &c. Thus it should be with every one that intends to live and die comfortably: they must, as we say, lay up something for a rainy day; they must stock themselves with graces, store up promises, and furnish themselves with experiences of God's loving-kindness to others and themselves too, that so, when the evil day comes, they may have much good coming thereby.

DCCCCLXXXII.—Man, since the fall of Adam, subject to the creatures.

Ovid, Hist.

ACTEON, in the fable, goes abroad a-hunting, but unhappily lights upon Diana, in the midst of his game, as she was naked, bathing herself in a fountain; the goddess is angry, and transforms him into the shape of a hart; the dogs, not knowing their master, being thus changed, hunt him down and tear him all in pieces. Thus man, before his fall, was God's viceregent over all His creatures; they did homage and fealty unto him, as their liege lord and sovereign; but since Satan hath obliterated the image of God, wherein he was first created, and drawn his own in the room, the creatures, seeing him thus altered, one snaps, another snarls at him, nay, the weakest of all the creatures are able to undo him, as the spider to poison him and the fly to choke him. But, for our comfort, we may recover ourselves by the Second Adam, Christ Jesus. Get but an interest in Him, and then that lion which tore the prophet in pieces shall do us no more hurt than he did Daniel when he had him in his den, and those dogs which eat up Jezebel shall lick our sores as they did those of Lazarus; no creature shall have power to hurt us without God's especial dispensation.

Drexell Zedikus.

1 Kings xlii. 24.

Dan. vi. 22.

DCCCCLXXXIII.—To trust in God only.

THE foresters, knowing that the elephant useth to sleep leaning against some tree, are wont to cut the likeliest tree with a saw so deep, that the unsuspecting beast, thinking to rest upon it, falls down with it, and so is surprised by them. Thus they that put their trust in man or in any other creature shall soon find him hewn down by death, and then there lies all their hope in the dust. It is ill sticking to anything but God; all other props will fail us: we are sheep, apt to wander; we shall not if we keep to our shepherd. There is no trust but in God only.

Adams' Serm. on
2 Pet.

Ps. xxxiii. 18.

DCCCCLXXXIV.—Insensibility of death reprov'd.

IN a good pasture, where many good oxen are, the butcher comes and fetcheth away one and kills it; next day, he fetcheth away another, and kills that too. Now, those which he leaves behind feed and fat themselves, till they are driven to the slaughter, not considering what is become of their fellows or what shall become of themselves. So, when Death comes amongst a multitude of men, here taking one and there another, we pamper up ourselves till he overtakes us also. We live as though, like Adam and Abel, we never saw a man die before us, whereas every churchyard, every age, every sickness, should be a preacher of mortality unto us.

Alphons. ab Avendan, Com. in Matt.
vi.

DCCCCLXXXV.—Men to bear with one another's infirmities.

A BLIND man and a lame man (as it is in the fable) meeting upon the way, the lame man said, "If thou wilt be feet unto me, then I will be eyes unto thee;" so, the blind man carrying the lame and the lame guiding the blind, both arrived at their journey's end in a good hour. Thus it is that men, especially Christian men, must bear with one another—yea, bear and forbear. If a brother, in his unadvised anger, use thee roughly, rudely, bear with him, and thou bearest his burthen; if thou be too silent in thy conversation, and thy brother, on the contrary, too full of prattle, bear thou with his loquacity, that he may bear thy pertinacy. A magistrate in the commonwealth and a master in his family must have patience to see many things and not to see them; hence that motto of Frederick I., "Qui nescit dissimulare, nescit imperare," may be digested easily with a little salt; for when small faults are winked at in time and place wisely, sovereign and subject, master and man, one and another, according to that apostolical injunction, may be very well said to bear one another's burthen.

Æsopus, in Fabula
de Cæto et Claudio.

Anselm., in Gal. vi.
2.

Reusneri, Symbola.

Gal. vi. 2.

DCCCCLXXXVI.—The great danger of slighting the least sin.

Fuller's Serm.,
Lond., 1650.

GENERAL NORRIS, one of the ancients of that noble family, having (as he thought) received a slight wound in the wars of Ireland, neglected the same, presuming, belike, that the balsam of his own body, without calling in for those other auxiliaries of art, would have wrought the cure; but so it was that his arm gangrened, and both arm and life were lost together. Thus it was with him in the body natural, and thus it will be, too, in the body spiritual; the least of sin, therefore, is to be avoided, the least growth of sin to be prevented: the cockatrice must be crushed in the egg, else it will soon become a serpent; the very thought of sin, if not thought on, will break out into action, action into custom, custom into habit, and then actum est de corpore et anima, both body and soul are irrecoverably lost to all eternity.

"Principiis obsta."

DCCCCLXXXVII.—Marriage to be sought of God by prayer.

Fawcett's Serm.,
Lond.

Gen. vi. 1, 2.

"Sic dos non uxor amatur."—JUV.

It came to pass, when men began to multiply upon the face of the earth, and daughters were born unto them, that the sons of God (men well qualified) saw the daughters of men (very lewd ones) that they were fair (that is all they aimed at), and, therefore, they took them wives (hand over head) of all which they chose; but, being not of God's providing, they had better been without them. Thus, when men send out lusts to seek them wives, and unclean spirits to woo for them; when men send out ambition to make their houses great, and covetousness to join house to house and land to land; when men send out flattery, lying and deceitful speeches, and do not send out prayers and loud cries unto Almighty God, to direct them in their choice, they may thank themselves if they meet with wives, but not such helps meet as God otherwise intended for them.

DCCCCLXXXVIII.—The height of patience.

Baker's Collect. of Hist. of England.

"Gaudet patientia duris."—LUCAN.

QUEEN ANNE BOLEYN, the mother of the blessed Queen Elizabeth, when she was to be beheaded in the Tower, thus remembered her thanks to the king: "From a private gentlewoman, he made me a marchioness; from a marchioness, he made me a queen; and, now he hath left no higher degree of earthly honour for me, he hath made me a martyr." Here was patience in the highest degree, such a patience as had its perfect work and came up to its full growth—when punishment becomes preferment; when, for Christ's sake and His Gospel's, persecution shall be held a honour and misery a dignity, ipsamque crucem, coronam (and the very cross a crown). This is the patience of the saints.

DCCCCLXXXIX.—The prevalency of a good example.

Euseb., Hist., lib.
iv., cap. 8.

"Qui sanctum vi-rum imitatur."— Isid., de Sum. Bnæ, lib. i., cap. 11.

1 Pet. ii. 12.

JUSTIN MARTYR confesseth that he left philosophy and became a Christian scholar through the admiration that he had to behold the innocent and godly lives of the primitive Christians, hearing them pray unto God for the good and welfare of those who, to the utmost of their power, endeavoured and wrought their ruin. Thus forcible, thus effectual, thus prevalent is the example of a holy life, when men and women live so chastely, walk so circumspectly, and order themselves so holily, so meekly, so blamelessly, that men that are even strangers to a godly life are strongly wrought upon, and very much affected with; and won to Christ by their religious and gracious conversation.

DCCCCXC.—Faults in manners and errors in doctrine to be distinguished in the matter of reproof.

It is observable that Almighty God hath, in old time, dispensed with some precepts of the second table concerning our duty to men, as in bidding Abraham to kill his son Isaac, contrary to the sixth commandment; and in suffering the fathers to have many concubines, contrary to the seventh commandment; and in advising the children of Israel to take from the wicked Egyptians their jewels, contrary to the eighth commandment. But He who cannot deny Himself, as the apostle speaks, never dispensed with any precept of the first table concerning His own true honour, worship, and holiness. Thus it is that there must be a difference put betwixt faults in manners and errors in doctrine; for principles of faith are like a mathematical point, which admits of neither lessening nor addition. To be patient in suffering a private wrong only concerning our own person is commendable—yea, noble; but when once the quarrel is made God's and the Church's, injuriæ Dei dissimulare nimis est impium (it is too great impiety for any man to bear). In such a case, the prophet Elijah called for fire from heaven upon his enemies; in such a case, St. Paul, in sight of the whole Church of Antioch, withstood Peter to his face; "In such a case, God assisting me," saith Luther, "I am, and ever shall be, stout and stern. Herein I take upon me this title, 'Cedo nulli (I give place to none);'" and in such a case renowned Jewel, sweetly to the same purpose: "I deny my learning, I deny my bishopric, I deny myself: only the faith of Christ and truth of God I cannot deny. With this faith, and for this faith, I trust I shall end my days."

Mart., Lec. Com., p. 1, cap. xvii.
Gen. xxii. 2.

Exod. xi. 2.

2 Tim. ii. 13.

Lutheri Lec. Com.
Tit. de Zelo.

"Discamus exem-plo Christi," &c.—
ST. CHRYSOS., in Mat.

2 Kings i.

Gal. ii. 11.

In Vita ejus, per Anonym.

Ant. to Harding's Pref.

DCCCCXCI.—Judgment-day, the terrors of it to the wicked.

It is reported of Zisca, the valiant captain of the Bohemians, that he commanded, after his decease, his skin should be flayed from his body, to make a drum of it, which they should be sure to use when they went out to battle; affirming, that as soon as the Hungarians, or any other of their enemies, should come within the sound of that drum, they would never be able to abide it. Now, if Zisca's drum and the beating thereof was so terrible to the poor Hungarians, how fearful shall the sounding of the last trumpet be to the wicked, when the Lord Jesus shall show Himself from heaven, with His mighty angels, to judge the quick and the dead! Saul was astonished when he heard Jesus of Nazareth but calling unto him; Herod was affrighted when he thought that John Baptist was risen again; the Carthaginians were troubled when they saw Scipio's sepulchre; the Saxons were terrified when they saw Cadwallon's image; the Philistines were afraid when they saw David's sword; the Israelites were appalled when they saw Aaron's rod; the Romans were dashed when they saw Caesar's bloody robe; Judah was ashamed when he saw Tamar's signet and staff; Belshazzar was alarmed when he saw the handwriting on the wall; and all the enemies of God and goodness, look they never so high, wax they never so big in this world, shall be then confounded, when they shall see Christ appearing in judgment.

Dubravius, Hist.
Peric. Ecles. Bo-hem., lib. iii., cap. 6.

Acts xxii. 8.

Mark vi. 6.

Hollingshead's Chron.

1 Sam. xxi. 9.

Numb. xvii. 10.
Dion., lib. xlv.
Gen. xxxviii. 26.

Dan. v. 9.

"Heu miser pecca-tor, quo fugies," &c.—ANSELM.

DCCCCXCII.—Christ seen more clearly under the Gospel than under the law.

As a king, in his progress, coming to some great city, divers of his train ride before him and many more come after him, yet all come to the same place, but those that are before do not see what entertainment is made in the way so well as they that come behind: thus it is that Christ is seen more clearly under the Gospel than under the law. The patriarchs and the Israel of God saw somewhat of Christ, as they were before Him, but not one half which we see, that are behind. Moses was then under a cloud, but his face is now unveiled.

"Judæi legi studentibus quasi can-delæ assistentes," &c.—CHRYSOST.,
Hom. liv., in Gen.

Dr. Holdsworth.

It was a good observation of an acute preacher (now with God), then lying on his death-bed: "Oh, how happy," said he, "are the people of this age, that see more of Christ than ever their predecessors did—more than the patriarchs and people of old! They had only Moses, the Psalms, and the Prophets, but we the Books of the New Testament, setting out Christ before us."

DCCCCXCIII.—Not to give occasion that religion be ill spoken of.

Adams' Serm. on
2 Pet.Conrad. Zuingeri, Theatrum Hum.
Vitæ.

WHEN a pagan beheld Christians receiving the blessed sacrament, and observed with what deference and devotion they demeaned themselves in that holy business, he was inquisitive what that action meant. It was answered by one of them, that God, having first emptied their hearts of all their sins, as pride, envy, covetousness, contention, luxury, and the rest, did now enter into them Himself, with a purpose to dwell there. He was silent for the present, but followed and watched them whom he saw to be communicants in that action for two days together; and perceiving some of them to fall into quarrels, uncleanness, rapacity, and drunkenness so soon, he declared his censure of them with this exclamation: "I confess that your religion may be good, your devotion good, your profession good; but sure your hospitality is stark naught, apud quos ne Deus quidem biduo commorare permittitur (that you will not give your God two days' lodging)." Here, now, was a sad occasion given for the enemies of God so to judge of them that seem to make profession of His holy name. This, the shame of Christians, the disparagement of religion, when it is forced, against the nature of it, to encourage lewdness; this, an abuse of the promises of grace, of the covenants and pledges of grace, which are the sacraments, when encouragements to evil are derived from so merciful indulgence. Again, it is a dishonour done to the honour of grace and godliness, when, from the sermon which forbiddeth such a sin, we shall immediately run into the sin forbidden by the sermon, and so give an unhappy occasion for weak ones to be offended.

"Scandalum proximo hec in vultu nec in doctrina ponendum est."—BEDA.

2 Pet. ii. 3.

DCCCCXCIV.—The loss of a faithful ministry not to be slighted, and why so.

Imperator Vltis, per Phil. Nepotem.Flavius Vopiscus, in Hist.

Matt. ix. 36.
Isa. xl. 1, 2.
Act. iv. 36.
1 Cor. iv. 16.
Isa. lviii. 12.
Ezek. xxii. 30.
Jer. viii. 22.
Rom. x. 15.

GALIENUS the emperor, when tidings were brought him of the loss of Egypt, "Well," said he, "let it go. Cannot we live without the flax and hemp of Egypt?" And when he had also lost France (two great and mighty countries), "What!" said he, "cannot the land stand sine sagis trabeatis (without those soldiers' cassocks which France doth send us)?" This was a piece of heathenish stupidity; but if ever it shall come to pass—quod avertat Deus!—that the ministers of the Gospel should be driven into corners, let no good Christian make slight of it, but be deeply affected and affectionately taken with the loss; for they are such as watch for our souls; the comforters of Zion; the sons of consolation; spiritual fathers; repairers of the breach; such as stand in the gap of God's anger; spiritual physicians; doves which bring the olive-leaf of peace to the troubled soul—and what not? They are sanguis mundi; when they die or fail, a man may justly fear the world's dying: they are the buttresses and pillars to uphold it from ruin and confusion; grievous, then, must it needs be, and matter of great concernment, when such are taken away.

DCCCCXCV.—The secure worldling's sudden ruin.

Stapleton, Prompt.
Moral.

Look upon a weary traveller, scorched with the heat of the sun, how he resteth himself under the shady leaves of some fair spreading tree, and there falls asleep so long, that the sun coming about heats him more than formerly, so that he is ready to faint, his head aches, and all his body, as it were, stewed even in its own moisture. Thus it fares with the men of this world, such as, having wearied themselves in heaping up the things thereof, lie down and sing a foolish requiem to their souls: meanwhile, the course of their life runs on, the sun comes about, death overtakes them, and instead of a comfortable shade to refresh them, they may easily perceive the fire of hell, if God be not the more merciful, ready to consume them.

"Sape mens dum virtutis sue securitate resolvitur, insidiantie adversario," &c.—GREG., in Moral.

DCCCCXCVI.—A child of God preserved by God, though never so much slighted by the world.

THEY that work in gold or silver let fall many a bit to the ground, yet they do not intend to lose it so, but sweep the shop, and keep the very sweepings safe, so that that which they cannot at present discover the finer brings to light. Thus, the world is God's work-house: many a dear child of God suffers and falls to the ground by banishment, imprisonment, sorrow, sickness, &c., but they must not be lost thus; God will search the very sweepings, and cull them out of the very trash and preserve them. What though they be slightly set by here in this world, and lie amongst the pots, no better accounted of than the rubbish and refuse of the earth, God will find a time to make them up amongst the rest of His jewels.

Fawcett's Sermon, Lond.

"Mundus Dei officina."—AUG.

Ps. lxviii. 17.

Mal. iii. 17.

DCCCCXCVII.—True knowledge never rests on the creature till it centres in God the Creator.

As the legend speaks historically (which is only true symbolically) of St. Christopher, that, before he was converted to the faith, he would serve none but the strongest. He had for his master a man of great strength and puissance, but a king subdued him; him he forsook for that king, but finding him to be overcome by a neighbour, he betook himself to that other pagan conqueror. This conqueror was also tyrannized over by the devil, to whom he was a mere slave, doing all his base commands; this he could not endure, but entered into service with the devil. For a while he admired the power of his new master, and what a dominion he exercised over the sons of men, but in a short space he found out his weakness also: so feeble was he and fearful of a piece of wood, he durst not pass by the cross, but when that stood in his way he must by all means back again. Now, the weary servant longed to know what this cross meant, that he might find a more potent lord. It was told him that Christ was the Lord of that ensign, and that the cross was His banner. Thither he flies, and there he found out a most mighty, yea, an almighty Master. So, true knowledge never rests on the creatures till it centre in the Creator, aims at none but the highest, and climbs from strength to strength, from height to height, till it appear before God in Zion; higher than riches in their treasury, than princes on their thrones, than stars in the firmament, fetching all her light and comfort from God in Christ Jesus.

Adams' Sermon, on 2 Pet.

Surius, in Vita.

Aloys. Lippoman, in Viti Fratrum.

"Hæc tota scientia hominis, scire, quia ipse nihil est," &c.—AUG., super Pet. lxx.

DCCCCXCVIII.—How it is that wicked men are said to hasten death.

BERNARDINUS SENENSIS, a devout man, tells of a stripling in Catalonia, being eighteen years of age, that, having been disobedient to his parents, fell to robbing; and being hanged on the tree, and there remaining for a spectacle to disobedient children, on the next morning, a formal beard and gray hairs appeared on him, as if he had been much struck in years; which, the people hearing of and wondering at the suddenness of the change, urging how young he was at his death, a grave, reverend father of the Church being then present, said that he should have lived to have been so old as he then appeared, had he not been disobedient. The devout man, it is probable, may be out in the story, but the other was in Tom. ii., in Dom. ii.

Quadragesimal Sermon, xvii.

"Cunctis stat terminus ævi,"—SEF.

Job xiv. 5.

Ps. xxxix. 4.

1 Sam. iv. 11.

Gen. xv. 16.

Ps. lv. 23.

at the application, for stat sua cuique dies (every man's days are determined), the number of his months is with God. He hath appointed him his bounds, that he cannot pass; there is a measure of his days in respect of God's prescience and providence; but, in respect of the course of nature, the thread of life, which might have been lengthened, is cut off by God's command for sin, as in the family of Eli and the people of the Amorites, not living half their days.

DCCCCXCIX.—How to be made like unto Christ.

Stapleton, *Prompt.
Moral.*

HE that intends to have his picture drawn to the life must not wrest and writhe his body this way and that way, but sit still, with a composed, settled countenance, having his eye fully set upon the painter; otherwise, the resemblance will be false and the work much misshapen. So, he that would have the image of Christ truly stamped on his soul must eye Christ, as He is the perfection of all graces; do as the prophet did by the Shunammite's child, lay his mouth to his mouth, his eyes to his eyes, his hands to his hands; say as he said, do as he did; "Sic oculos, sic ille manus;" propose Him as a pattern in all things imitable: otherwise, if he gaze upon the vanity of the creature, and spread his thoughts at large upon earthly things, there will be much of mammon, but little or no likeness of Christ appearing upon his soul.

2 Kings iv. 34.

Virgilius, in Æneid,
lib. ii.

M.—The certainty, not the time of our calling, to be so much looked into.

Fawcett's Serm.,
Lond., 1644.

John ix.

John ix. 10.

John ix. 15.

John ix. 24.

WHAT a deal of ado did the Pharisees make with the poor man that was born blind: first, his neighbours began with him, "How were thine eyes opened?" then the Pharisees asked him how he had received his sight. The poor man tells them that one called Jesus made clay and anointed his eyes, &c. After many questions, they bid him give God the praise, for they knew that that man Jesus was a sinner. "Well," says the poor man, "whether He be a sinner or not, that is more than I know; but so much I know for certain, that, whereas I was blind, now I see." It mattered not with him what the Man was that cured him, nor the place where, nor the time when; this he took notice of, that he was blind, but now he did see. So the question is not when or how any man is called of God; but the main will be whether he is yet called. A woman with child, if the babe stir in her womb, she takes no thought when it was that the child first quickened, but is glad that it is quickened. If a man can but see marks and signs of salvation within him, and perceive that the blessed Spirit of God hath wrought wonderfully on his soul, he may certainly conclude that he is called, let the time, place, and manner be never so uncertain.

MI.—Without faith, impossible to please God.

Esther ii. 4.

Adams' Exposit. on
2 Pet.

OF all the virgins presented to Ahasuerus, none was so pleasing as Esther. "Let the maiden that pleasest the king be queen, instead of Vashti." When that decree was published, what strife, what emulation, may we think, was amongst the Persian damsels that either were or thought themselves fair! Every one hoped to be a queen. But so incomparable was the beauty of that Jewess, that she was not only taken into the Persian court as one of the selected virgins, but had the most honourable place in all the seraglio allotted unto her. The other virgins pass their probation unregarded. When Esther's turn came, though she brought the same face and demeanour that nature had cast upon her, no eye saw her without admiration. The king was so delighted with her beauty, that, contemning all the others as vulgar forms, his choice was fully fixed upon her. Thus, faith is that Esther to which God holds out His golden sceptre. He is pleased with all graces; hot zeal and cool patience

* Sine fide pemo ad filium Dei numquam pervenire potest." &c.—AUG.,
de Fide ad Petrum.

please Him ; cheerful thankfulness and weeping repentance please Him ; charity in the height and humility in the dust please Him ; but none of them are welcome to Him, without faith in Christ Jesus. Heb. xi. 6.

MII.—All alike in death.

As trees, while they grow, are apparently known by their fruits, as to their several kinds, and so are commonly called by their names, but when once the axe comes amongst them, and they be felled, fired, and consumed, none can distinguish of their ashes : so, though men, whilst they live, do very much differ in office, title, place, and power, yet when they be dead and resolved into cinders, their dust admits of no separation, it can by no means be divided—as there is the like ashes of the shrub and the cedar, so the like dust of the king and the beggar. “Mors sceptrā ligonibus æquat (Death is the head of the levelling party) ; ” makes all men alike ; the mightiest have no more privilege than the meanest.

Alphons. ab Avendano, Moralitat. in Mait. v.

“Æquo pede pulsat pauperum tabernas,” &c.—HORAT.

MIII.—Ingratitude reproved.

AN empty bucket that is let down into a well doth, as it were, open its mouth to receive the water, but being drawn up full, sheweth its bottom only to the well that gave it ; the sea receives her moisture from heaven sweet and pleasant, but returns it salt and brackish ; the clouds, by the power of the sunbeams, are exhaled from the earth, but, being once mounted, they darken that air and obscure that sun that raised them ; the frozen snake in the fable stingeth him that refreshed it. Thus it is with all unthankful men, men ungrateful to God : He ladeth them daily with benefits and blessings, and they lade Him with sins and trespasses. God would have them to be righteous, but they will not part with their inventions. So ungrateful, so swinish are they, that, having acorns to feed on, mercies to encourage them, promises to support them, they will not so much as look up to the Tree, will not be thankful to God, that hath so richly provided them.

Stapleton, Prompt Morale.

“Adverte homo quia limus es et non sis superbus,” &c.
—BEZA.
Ps. lxxviii. 19.
Eccles. vii. 29.

MIV.—God's fundamental love of election and actual love of adoption, how distinguished.

It so falleth out sometimes that a great person of quality hath a purpose to marry a poor kitchen maid ; he provides her clothes and all things suitable for such a state. She, poor wretch, little dreams of any such matter—is in the kitchen about her drudgery, and it cannot be said but that he loves her still. Here, now, is an intentional love, a virtual and fundamental affection ; but there will be another manner of love when she comes to be his wife, and lie in his bosom. Thus wretched, sinful man, he is under wrath ; a very bond-slave of Satan ; in a sad condition by nature ; hath nothing in him that may deserve love ; yet God, intending to adopt him for His son, looks after him, and treasures him up in Christ Jesus. The poor sinner, all this while, knows little of it : he is not justified, because he is not called ; but when God shall be pleased to manifest Himself, by the operation of His blessed Spirit, the love of election, which was virtual and fundamental from all eternity, will break out, and he shall be actually adopted a child of God and heir of eternal salvation.

Fawcett's Serm.,
London, 1645.

Rom. viii. 30.

MV.—Faith the root of all graces.

THE root of a tree is a ragged and a jagged thing, no shape, no proportion, no comeliness in it, and therefore keeps itself in the earth, as unwilling to be seen ; yet all the beauty that is in the tree, the straightness of the bulk and body, the spreading fairness of

Adams' Exposit. on
2 Pet.

the branches, the glory of the leaves and flowers, the commodity of the fruits, proceed from the root; by that the whole subsisteth. So faith seems to some to be but a sorry grace, a virtue of no regard. Devotion is acceptable, for it honours God; charity is noble, for it does good to men; holiness is the image of heaven, therefore beauteous; thankfulness is the tune of angels, therefore melodious. But ad quid fides (what is faith good for)? Yes, it is good for every good purpose, the foundation and root of all graces. All the prayers made by devotion, all the good works done by charity, all the actual expressions of holiness, all the praises sounded forth by thankfulness, come from the root of faith; that is the life of them all. Faith doth animate works as the body lives by the soul. Doubtless, faith hath saved some without works, but it was never read that works saved any without faith.

"Fides radix est omnium virtutum, et quod super hoc fundamentum," &c.
—AMBROS., de
Cain et Abel.

MVI.—The minister's partiality in the reproof of sin condemned.

Cælius Rhodogin,
Van. Elect.

Featly's Serm.,
Lond., 1621.

THERE is mention made of a sort of people called Gastromantæ, such as speak out of their belly, so hollow, that a stander-by would think that somebody else spoke in the next room unto them. Just such are those biased ministers, the trencher chaplains of our days, that when they speak of sin—especially in great ones—they may be said to speak out of their bellies, not out of their hearts. A dinner, or a great parishioner, or a good dame, will make them shoot the reprehension of sin like pellets through a trunk, with no more strength than will kill a sparrow. Hence is it that there are so many no-sins, so many distinctions of sins, that, with a little of Jezebel's paint, Adam's weakness in regard of his wife is called tenderness; Abraham's lie, equivocation; Lot's incest and adultery, good nature; Noah's drunkenness, the weakness of age; Aaron and Solomon's idolatry, policy; oppression, justice; treason, religion; faction, faith; madness, zeal; pride, handsomeness; and covetousness, good husbandry: whereas sin should be set out in its right colours, and the sinner pointed out, as Nathan did David: "Thou art the man!"

2 Sam. xlii. 7.

MVII.—To be charitable Christians, and why so.

Stapleton, Prompt.
Moral.

"Disce ad singula dona gratias agere."
—BERN., super Canticæ.

IF a man should, at his own proper cost and charges, build a fair bridge upon some river, in a convenient place thereof, leading the ready way to some city or market town, can it be thought amiss if he should demand a small kind of tribute or pontage for horse or man that should pass over, whether it were to keep the bridge in repair, that so posterity might have the benefit thereof, or for the acknowledgment of so great a benefit, or for the satisfaction of the builder? Surely, it could not. Thus Christ Jesus, our blessed Saviour and Redeemer, hath, with the price of His own most precious blood, built a bridge of mercy to pass over, and is Himself become a new and living way for all repentant sinners to walk in, there being no other way, no other bridge for passage into heaven. It is but just, then, that something should be done on our parts—not that He hath any need, but because He looks for it—some tribute, something by way of acknowledgment, something as a toll-penny for the relief of His poor distressed members—with this assurance, that "elemosyna, viaticum in mundo, thesaurus in cælo (what we lay out in this world by way of charity shall be doubled in the next by way of retribution)."

MVIII.—Regeneration, the necessity thereof.

Skinner's Serm.,
Lond., 1623.

ONE bargained with a painter to paint him a horse, running as it were in a full career. The painter, having done his work, presents it with the heels upward. "Why," said the man, "I bespake the picture of a running horse, but thou hast brought me a horse kicking his heels!" "Oh, but," quoth the painter, "turn the frame, set the picture right, and then you shall find it to be a running horse, such a one as you bespake." Such is every son of man in his natural condition ; his head and his heart are all downward, grovelling on the earth, whilst his heels are kicking at heaven : but let the table be once turned, let but God come into his soul by the operation of His blessed Spirit, then there will be a renewing of the mind, then that tongue, which ere while was set on fire of hell, will become a trumpet of God's glory ; those hands which were once reached out to do wickedly will now work that which is honest ; those feet which were swift to shed blood will now walk in the paths of peace ; instead of an itching ear there will be an attentive ear ; instead of a wanton eye there will be a covenanting eye not to look upon a strange woman ; there will be a new will, new affections, new qualities, a new disposition—all new.

"Sunt res non tempora rerum observanda tibi."— MANT.

MIX.—A man of learning speaks little.

WHEN a rabbi, little learned, and less modest, usurped all the discourse at table, one, much admiring him, asked his friend in private whether he did not take such a man for a great scholar ; to whom he plainly answered : "For ought I know he may be learned, but I never heard learning make such a noise." So, when a modest man gave thanks to God with a low and submissive voice, an impudent critical gallant found fault with him, that he said grace no louder ; but he gave him a bitter reply : "Make me but a fool and I shall speak as loud as you, but that will mar the grace quite." Thus it is that the sun shows least when it is at the highest ; that deep waters run most silent ; but what a murmur and bubbling, yea, sometimes, what a roaring do they make in the shallows ! Empty vessels make the greatest sound, but the full ones give a soft answer ; profound knowledge says little ; and men, by their unseasonable noise, are known to be none of the wisest, whereas a man of parts and learning says little.

Adams' Exposit, on
2. Pet.

"Vir, loquitur qui paucal, sapit."

MX.—Death the end of all.

MAN is, as it were, a book : his birth is the title-page ; his baptism the epistle dedicatory ; his groans and crying the epistle to the reader ; his infancy and childhood the argument or contents of the ensuing treatises ; his life and actions are the subject ; his sins and errors the faults escaped ; his repentance the correction. As for the volume, some are in folio, some in quarto, some in octavo, &c. ; some are fairer bound, some plainer ; some have piety and godliness for their subject ; some, and they too many, are mere romances, pamphlets of wantonness and folly ; but in the last page of every one there stands a word, finis, and this is the last word in every book. Such is the life of man : some longer, some shorter, some stronger, some weaker, some fairer, some coarser, some holy, some profane ; but death comes in, like finis, at the last, and closes up all, for that is the end of all.

Fitz-Geffrey's
Serm., 1622.

"Mors ultima linea rerum est."— HORAT., l., Epist.
xvi.
Eccles. vii., 2.

MXI.—The incorrigible sinner's stupidity.

It is reported of silkworms that, at the noise of thunder, they are oftentimes terrified even unto death, insomuch that they which keep them are used to beat a drum amongst them, that they, being accustomed to the softer noise of the drum, may not be daunted with louder noise of thunder. Thus it is with incorrigible sinners of all sorts : they are so affected with the whisperings of worldly pleasures, so taken up with the jingling noise of riches, so delighted with the empty sound of popular applause and secular preferments, so sottish and besotted are they, that they are not sensible of God's anger against them. The very custom of sin hath so taken away the sense of sin, that they do not as much as hear that which all the world besides heareth with trembling and amazement, the dreadful voice of God's wrathful and everlasting displeasure.

Aldrovandus, Hist.
de Insectis, lib. 1., 2.

Stapleton's Prompt.
Moral.

"Consuetudo peccandi tollit sensum
peccati."—ISIDOR.

MXII.—Regeneration *the work of God's Spirit only.*Aldrovand., Lib.
de Quadruped.

Gesnerus.

"Nulla in disce-ndo mora est, ubi Spiritus doctor adest."—BEDA, in Luc., Hom. ix.

It is said of the bear, that, of all creatures, she bringeth forth the most ugly and misshapen whelps, but by licking them she brings them to a better form; yet it is a bear still. Thus, all of us are ugly and deformed in our inward man. It is true, good breeding, learning, living in good neighbourhood, may lick us fair, and put us into a better shape, but shall never change our nature, without the operation of the blessed Spirit. A man may be able to discourse of the great mysteries of salvation, yet not be changed; may repeat sermons, yet not be renewed; partake of the ordinances, yet not be regenerated: not any of these, nor all of these put together, will stand in stead till it hath pleased God to square them and fit them and sanctify them unto us by the blessed assistance of His Holy Spirit.

MXIII.—Scripture comfort, *the only true comforts.*Adams' Exposit. on et."Nihil in hac vita dulcius sentitur,
nihil avidius sumi-tur." &c.—HUGO,
Lib. de Anim.

It is storied of an ancient and reverend rascal, who, that he might by some demonstration win the people to look after Scripture knowledge, put himself into the habit of a mountebank, or travelling aqua-vitæ man, and in the market-place made proclamation of a sovereign cordial, or water of life, that he had to sell. Divers call him in, and desire him to show it; whereupon he opens the Bible, and directs them to several places of comfort in it: and, to say truth, there is the greatest comfort to be had, seeing it is the Word of the everliving God; the waters of life, which are to be thirsted after, whereby we may learn to live holy and die happy.

MXIV.—The deaths of friends and others not to be slighted.

Æsopus.

Fitz-Geffrey's
Serms., Lond., 1622."Miser homo, quare omni hora te non disponis!" &c.
BERN., in Serm.

THE frogs in the fable desire a king; Jupiter casteth a stock amongst them, which, at the first fall, made such a plunge in the water that, with the dashing thereof, they were all affrighted and ran into their holes; but seeing no further harm to ensue, they came forth, took courage, leapt on it, and made themselves sport with that which was first their fear, till at length Jupiter sent a stork amongst them, and he devoured them all. Thus it is that we make the death of others but as a stock, that somewhat at first affecteth us, but we soon forget it, until the stork comes, and we ourselves become a miserable prey. Do they who close the eyes and cover the faces of their deceased friends consider that their eyes must be closed, their faces thus covered? or they who shroud the corpse remember that they themselves must be so shrouded? or they who ring the knell consider that shortly the bells must go to the same tune for them? or they that make the grave, even while they are in it, remember that shortly they must inhabit such a narrow house as they are now a-building? Peradventure, they do a little, but it takes no deep impression in them.

MXV.—Prayer, is to be made unto God in Christ's name.

Gen. xlii.

Stapleton's Precept, Moral.Gen. xlviii.
Isa. xxxvii.
Job x.
Ps. lxxix.
Isa. lxlii.
Jer. xxxii.
1 Cor. xii. 31.

JOSEPH gave strict command unto his brethren, that if ever they looked for him to do them any good, or to see his face with comfort, they should be sure to bring the lad Benjamin, their brother, along with them. Thus, if ever we expect any comfortable return of our prayers, we must be sure to bring our elder brother, Christ Jesus, in our hearts by faith, and to put up all our requests in His name. They of old called upon God, using the names of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, three of God's friends; afterwards, they entreated God for His servant David's sake; others drew up arguments to move God drawn from the creation of the world and from His loving kindness. These were very good ways then, and very good to engage the great God of heaven to men; but unto us is showed a more excellent way, by how much the appellation of an only-begotten Son exceeds that of friend and servant, and the benefit of redemption excels that of creation and favour. "Dulce nomen Christi!" (Oh, the sweet name Jesus Christ!) "No man ever asked anything of God truly in that name but he had his asking." John xiv. 14.

MXVI.—To be mindful of death at all times.

THERE was once a discourse betwixt a citizen and a mariner: "My ancestors," says the mariner, "were all seamen, and all of them died at sea: my father, my grandfather, and my great-grandfather were all buried in the sea." "Then," says the citizen, "what great cause have you then, when you set out to sea, to remember your death, and to commit your soul to the hands of God." "Yea; but," says the mariner to the citizen, "where, I pray, did your father and your grandfather die?" "Why," says he, "they died all of them in their beds." "Truly, then," says the mariner, "what a care had you need to have, every night when you go to bed, to think of your bed as the grave, and the clothes that cover you as the earth that must one day be thrown upon you; for the very heathens themselves, that implored as many deities as they conceived chimeras in their fancies, yet were never known to erect an altar to death, because that was ever held uncertain and implacable." Thus, whether it be at sea or land, that man is always in a good posture of defence who is mindful of death; who so lives in this world as though he must shortly leave it; who concludes within himself, "I must die; this day may be my last day; this place the last that I shall come in; this sermon the last sermon that I shall hear; this Sabbath the last Sabbath that I shall enjoy; the next arrow that is shot may hit me; and the time will come (how soon, God knows) that I must lay aside this clothing of mortality and lie down in the dust."

Fawcett's Serm.,
Lond., 1646.

Cæsl. Rhodogin,
Var. Lect.

"Sera nimis vita est crastina."—MART.

"Sic mors ipsa quum venerit vincitur," &c.—GREG.,
Moral., lib. iv.

MXVII.—Scripture knowledge to be put in practice.

MUSICAL instruments, without handling, will warp and become nothing worth; a sprightly horse will lose his mettle by standing unbreathed in a stable; rust will take the sword that hangs by the wall; the cynic, rather than want work, would be still removing his tub. Thus, it is not God's meaning that any grace should lie dead in us, much less the knowledge of Divine truth; that should break out into practice: for happiness is not entitled to those that know, but those that do what they know.

Westfield's Serm.,
Lond., 1617.

"Me plus didicist qui plus facit,"—
JER., in Pr. xxii.

MXVIII.—God's omniscience.

PLINY makes mention of a silly bird, that, if she can but get her head into a hole, she thinks nobody sees her, and that all is safe, whilst she becomes a miserable prey to her common adversary. And this is the folly of many men amongst us, such as would be counted wiser than indeed they are; close politicians, that dig deep in their councils and draw the curtains over their deeds of darkness; subtle Machiavellians, that spin their mischievous design as fine as a spider's web, and many times under the veil of religion too; painted hypocrites, that, under the pretence of gravity, think they dance in a net unseen of all men; prostitute strumpets, that first sacrifice and then commit lewdness; soul dissemblers, that, under pretence of long prayers, devour widows' houses; and such as, with demure looks, think to deceive Christ Jesus Himself. But let such know, that God can find Jonah in the bottom of the ship, and Jeroboam's wife in her disguise; He sees and knows of the diversity of weights and measures in tradesmen's shops and warehouses, the least dash of an erring pen in the matter of accounts, the least sin of looseness; and, on the other side, our alms, though perhaps they make no great noise in the world, are in debenture with

Lipsius, in Plinii Paneg.

Edlin's Serm.,
Lond., 1653.

Aug., super Matt.
vi.
Prov. vii. 14.

Matt. xxiii. 14.

Jonah i.

1 Kings xiv. 6.

"Deo nihil est occultum."—COMIN.,
de Belle Neapolitano,
lib. iv.

Ps. lvi. 8.
Rev. iv. 6.

Him; He hath a bottle for our tears, a book for our deeds, whether good or evil; the whole world is to Him as a sea of glass, corpus diaphanum (a clear, transparent body): there is nothing hid from His eyes; so that, find but out a place where He sees not, then sin and spare not.

MXIX.—Worldly things cannot really help us.

Mine Her. Paw, 1652.

It was wittily painted, by way of emblem, upon the Dutch ambassador's coach: a woman sitting in a forlorn posture, close to the body of a tree, on the shady side, the sun shining out in the strength of its heat, with this motto, "Trunco non frondibus," intimating thereby that she was more beholden to the trunk than the leaves of that tree for succour. Thus it is that all good men make God only to be their support in the midst of danger, their refuge in time of trouble, the rock of defence and their strong tower, whereas others cleave close unto the leafy creature, trust in uncertain riches, put their confidence in an arm of flesh, and bear themselves high upon their friends in court, their preferments in the state, and such like miserable comforters, which will nothing avail them in the day of wrath, when they should have most need of them.

"Fallax est hic mundus, finis dubius exitus horribilis," &c.—PET. BLES.

MXX.—Whether it be lawful to desire death.

Salp. Sec., Hist.
Sacra.

It is written of Martyrius, that, being on his death-bed, he desired that God would be pleased to release him out of the miseries of this sinful world; but his auditors, standing by, said, "What will become of us and our poor souls when you are gone? your loss will be a great prejudice to us; you cannot conceive what hurt we shall receive by your death." "Well," says he, "if my life may be profitable to God's people, I will do anything He will have me do." He desires to live, so as it may stand with God's good pleasure; and a man may wish to die, for it is good or sinful so to do as the grounds are whereupon the desires are settled. It is an expression of faith to be freed from sin and to have a closer communion with God. Thus it is that the Bride in the Revelation says "Come," and the Spirit says "Come," and both the Spirit and the Church take hands together and say, "Come, Lord Jesus! come quickly." "No man," says Christ, "can see my face and live." "Oh, then," says the Church, "let me die, that I may see Thy face." But such is the frailty of man, that even strong desires and unadvised wishes are to be found amongst the people of God, such as wish for death, in regard of carnal ends: thus Elijah, because of Jezebel's frowns, cries out, "Lord, take away my life," &c., and Jonah, in a pettish humour, thinks it better to die than to live, not considering that Patience is the daughter of Hope and grandchild of Faith; so that he that believeth maketh no haste. "There is heaven," says Hope. "It is mine," saith Faith. "Yea, but," saith Patience, "I will wait till God's appointed time come."

Fawcett's Serm.,
London, 1646.

Rev. xxii. 20.

"Nonne mori satius, vitæ quam ferre pudorem?"— CLAUDIAN.
1 Kings xix. 4.

Jonah iv. 3.

MXXI.—Knowledge in political affairs very uncertain.

Adams' Exposit. on
2 Pet.
"Incerti quo sata ferant,"—VIRGIL.

THE CHIRURGEON that deals with an outward wound can tell whether he can cure it and guess in what time; but the physician that undertakes the cure of a fever can neither see the time of his patient's recovery nor assure him that he shall be recovered at all. The artisan, with his convenient shop and tools, can make up his day's work, if he be not hindered, but the merchant adventurer can promise to himself no such matter; he must have one wind to carry him out of the haven, another to carry him about to the land's end, and, perhaps, another to drive him to the place of traffic: so that he can promise nothing, neither for the time of his return nor the vending of his commodity, but as the wind and the weather and the mariners and the seas and the time of trade will give him leave.

"Anceps eventus rei."—AUL. GEL.
HOR.

Thus, the uncertainty of our knowledge in secular and political business doth appear; the most wise God hath hidden from us the event of things. Caliginosa morte premit. All politic successes are conjectural, not demonstrative, they stand in need of the concurrences of many things and causes which are casual, and of many men's minds which are mutable, and of many opportunities which are accidental, so that we cannot build upon them. There is no policy so provident, no providence so circumspect, but is subject to error and much uncertainty.

MXXII.—Sacramental bread and wine, how differenced from others.

AN instrument or conveyance of lands from one party to another, being fairly engrossed on parchment, with wax fastened unto it, is no more than ordinary parchment and wax: but when it comes once to be sealed and delivered to the use of the party concerned, then it is changed into another quality, and made a matter of high concernment. Thus, the elements of bread and wine are the same in substance with the other bread and wine, before and after the administration is past: the same in quality—the bread dry, the wine moist: the same in nature—the bread to support, the wine to comfort the heart of man; but being once separated (not by any spells or signing with the sign of the cross, not by any Popish, carnal, sensual transubstantiation, nor any Lutheran consubstantiation) from a common to a holy use, when Christ's name is set on them in regard of institution, consecration, operation, and blessing attending on them, then they become Christ's bread and God's wine, and the tables God's tables too—not the bread of the buttery, but of the Sanctuary; not the wine of the grape, but of the Vine Christ Jesus, sealing unto us the pardon and remission of our sins: so that in the right receiving thereof we must make it a work, not dentis, but mentis—not so much to look on the elements what they are, but what they signify; look through the bush and see God, through the Sacrament and see Christ Jesus, to our comfort.

Edlin's Serm.,
 Lond., 1652.

"Accedit verbum ad elementum et fit sacramentum," &c.
 —AUG., Tract. 80,
 in John.

"Sicut communis panis corporis est vita, sic panis iste supersubstantialis."
 &c.—ST. CYPRI-ANUS, de Euchar.

MXXIII.—Worldly things, their sudden downfall.

AMONGST many other significant devices, some beyond the seas have the picture of a man with a full blown bladder on his shoulders, another standing by and pricking the bladder with a pin: the motto, "Quam subito?" hinting thereby, the sudden downfall of all worldly greatness. How soon is the courtier's glory eclipsed if his prince do but frown upon him? And how soon the prince himself becomes a peasant if God give way unto it? How soon are the windy hopes of sinful men let out upon the least touch of God's displeasure? Riches, honours, preferments, if God be but pleased to blow upon them, are suddenly reduced to nothing.

Hollanders at Amsterdam.

"Res nullæ sta-biles sunt, quæ cum fluxu hujus temporis confluxibiles sunt," — ARISTOT.

MXXIV.—Magistrates called to do justice at all times.

It was a piece of good counsel that Mordecai gave unto Esther: she was fearful to go in to the king, because he had made a law, that whosoever came into the inner court without his leave should be put to death. But what says Mordecai? "What is it that troubles thee? Why dost thou shrink for fear? Who knows whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" So it may be truly said of all magistrates, of all that are in place of government, whether it be in Church or commonwealth, that they are in their places for such a time as this, that occasiones Dei nutus (occasions are God's beckonings). As it is said of a king of Persia, that he would many times alight off his horse only to do justice to a poor body: a good copy for magistrates to write by, to be ready to do justice and judgment at all times, upon all occasions, while they have time—that is, while they have

Volter's Serm.,
 Lond., 2619.

Esth. iv. 14.

Preacher's Travels,
 "Non differendo
 judicium, quousque marsupia eorum qui causantur exhau-riant." — ISIDOR, de Sum. Bmo., lib. iii.

season. They may have time to live in, but they may outlive the season to do good in : to work for God and act for Christ, to relieve the oppressed, and therein not to be overpoised by any power, or biased by any respects whatsoever.

MXXV.—All knowledge but in part.

Cælius.

Diog. Laert.

Baleas, de Script.

Plantaviti Bibliotheca Rabbini.

2 Sam. xvi. 23.

"Dun cognitionem universalem habemus, decipimur particulari."—ARISTOT., de Resolut., lib. ii.

1 Cor. xiii. 9.

AMONG the Romans, Nasica was called Corculum, for his pregnancy of wit ; among the Grecians, Democritus Abderita was called, not σοφός, but σοφία (not wise, but wisdom itself) ; among the Britons, Gildas was called Gildas sapiens (Gildas the sage) ; among the Jews, Aben Ezra was called Hechachan : they said of him, that if knowledge had put out her candle, at his brain she might light it again, and that his head was the throne of wisdom ; before him, among the Israelites, Ahithophel was the man, his counsel an oracle. Here, now, was a pack of wise men ; but why the Nile should overflow in the summer, when waters are at the lowest, or why the loadstone should draw iron to it, or incline to the pole-star, which of them, with all their knowledge, can give a reason for either ? And as in human, so in Divine knowledge : the most acute and judicious have and must acknowledge their ignorance and deplore their errors in divers points—we know but in part. Then, if he that learned his divinity among the angels, yea, to whom the Holy Ghost was an immediate tutor, did know but in part, it is well for us if we know but part of that part.

MXXVI.—To be deliberate in our prayers unto God.

White's Serm.,
London, 1644.

Acts and Mon.

"Non erga Deum afficitur qui aliud cogitat, aliud rogat."—THRYVERI Apoph., lxxv.

It is observable that when a man is to swim over some river, having thrown himself into the water, he passeth as far as he can by the strength of his first stroke, and then, being as it were at a stand, he fetcheth another stroke, and so a third, and a fourth, till he come to the place where he would be. So, in the matter of prayer, in our addresses unto God, we must do as that godly martyr of Christ, Mr. John Bradford, was said to do, not to ramble from one petition to another till he had brought his heart into a perfect frame of Prayer, so that every passage of prayer had its full work ; as, for instance, in the Lord's prayer, when a man shall say, "Thy kingdom come," and then shall be thinking with himself, "Oh, but if it should now come, what a case I am in, that am thus unprovided !" then, in the midst of these thoughts, say, "Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven," letting the tongue go on whilst the heart is on somewhat else—this is an error, a green wound easy to be cured, being one good thought instead of another, which is to be corrected by serious and deliberate attendance and careful dwelling on one particular till another be presented.

MXXVII.—Merit-mongers confuted.

King, Bishop of London, Serm. at St. Paul's before K.
James.
Gen. xi.

"Si vis excidere gratiâ, jacta tua merita."—AUG., in Pi. xxxi.

THOSE of the old world, to get them a name upon earth, made brick of their own devising, and built them a Babel, a tower that must reach up to heaven ; and when they had all done they had but brick for stone, and slime for mortar, and the end was confusion. And such there are who, to get them a name and an opinion of being more holy than other men ("Touch me not ; I am of purer mould than thou art," make brick of their own natural parts and inherent righteousness, to build up a Babel of merit that shall gain them the kingdom of heaven ; and when they shall have all done it is but the brick and slime of mortal corruption, and they can prognosticate to themselves no fairer end than that of Babel was—confusion.

MXXVIII.—Humility occasioned by the consideration of our former and present condition.

JACOB humbled himself when his brother Esau came against him; he knew himself to have been poor and in a low condition: "O Lord," says he, "I am not worthy of the least of all Thy mercies, and of all Thy truth, which Thou hast showed unto Thy servant: for with my staff I passed over this Jordan, and now I am become two bands." And are there not many in this great city that came hither with a stick in their hand, a frieze coat on their backs, and a little spending-money in their purses?—poor servants, then, God wot!—but now they have gotten two bands, wife and children, money and trading. The consideration of these things, how God hath dealt with them from time to time, in the time of sickness and sorrow, in the time of health and prosperity; how He hath brought them from one condition to another, from a condition of want to a condition of plenty, and from a condition of abundance to a condition of want again: I say, the consideration of these things, if they have any grace, is matter enough to humble them.

Fawcett's Serm.,
Lond.

Gen. xxxii. 10.

"Tanto quisque debet esse humilior," &c.—GREG.,
Homil. ix., in Matt.
xv.

MXXIX.—Profession to be joined with practice.

It is commonly seen upon those bells that hang out for signs, upon the one side is written, "Fear God;" on the other, "Honour the king." Aaron the high priest had upon his vestment bells as well as pomegranates. Oh that those bells might strike on both sides with a holy profession, which is one stroke: and a holy conversation, which is another stroke. While we only say we fear God and glorify Christ, all this while the bell doth but toll, it strikes but on one side; but when we come to honour the king, to do good to all men, which is the practice and exercise of holy works, then the bell rings out to God's glory: if otherwise, we shall be no better than dissolute choristers, that sing "Gloria Patri" in the choir, but chant "Carmina Bacchi" in the tavern. And, indeed, to have a good heart to God and a lewd life, as some suppose they may, and that, intus si rectè non laborandum (if all be well within, they need care for no more)—and so, if they wear holiness next their skin, no matter what profane stuff their lives be made of—this is not to join profession and practice together.

Adams's Serm.,
Lond., 1619.
Exod. xxviii. 34.

"Omnia virtus in actione consistit,"
—CICERO, de Offi.
ciii., lib. i.

MXXX.—Time to be well husbanded.

IN the country, if a man have a thousand acres of ground, he can then spare some of it to lie waste, so much for a bowling-green, so much for a tennis-court, so much for a court-yard, and so much for his mansion-house, with the appurtenances thereunto belonging; but let a poor man have but a hemp-pleck, a small burgage, or garden-plot, he cannot spare one foot of it, but looks to it and husbands it to the best advantage. And so ought we to make much of that little time which we have in this world—hoc est momentum. Eternity rides upon the back of time; then, we ought not to squander that little time away, aut malè, aut nihil, aut aliud agendo, so that the candle of our life burning low, we may not be like foolish children, play it out, and then go darkling to bed—comfortless to our graves.

Culverwell's Time
Well Spent.

"Utendum est estate, citò pede labitur ætas."—
OVID., iii., Art.

MXXXI.—The sad condition of Church and State not to be slighted.

WHEN the body of slaughtered Asahel was left in the highway side there was not a man who came by but stayed. When Jacob had the sight of Joseph's bloody coat he mourned, and would go down into the grave after him, refusing to be comforted. The showing of Cæsar's bloody robe in the market-place set all the Romans in a tumult. And is it possible that

2 Sam. ii. 32.

Gen. xxxvii. 35.

Sueton., in Vita
Cæsaris.

"Tu quibus ista legas, incertum est, lector oculilis.
Ipse quidem sic-cis scribere non petui." —
OVID.

any true-hearted Christian now living can, with dry eyes, behold the scissures and maims which every corner, both of Church and state, is subject to? to see the tattered rags and relics of a wounded, bleeding, dying Church? to see churches made dunghills, and the temple a stable for horses? Horresco referens! The stories of the ancients are full of examples of this nature; and, which is to be lamented, we were not, till of late years, unfurnished therewith.

M XXXII.—The great comfort of a good conscience.

Squire's Serm.,
Lond., 1639.

A PRISONER standing at the bar, in the time of his trial, seemed to smile when heavy charges were laid against him; one that stood by asked him why he did smile. "Oh," said he, "it is no matter what the evidence says, so long as the judge says nothing!" And, to speak truth, it is no matter what the world says, so long as conscience is quiet; no matter how cross the wheels go, so as the clock strikes right. Unspeakable is the comfort of a good conscience; inconceivable is the joy when God and a good conscience smile upon a man in the midst of reproach and trouble and false imprisonment; for those cannot be scandals where a good conscience speaks fair; that cannot be a prison where a good conscience is the keeper; but that is a sad case when there are clamours abroad and a noise within, when a man is outwardly smitten with bitter things and inwardly tormented with a guilty conscience.

"Conscientia bona,
hortus deliciarum,
thesaurus regis, au-la Dei," &c.—
HUGO, de Anima,
lib. ii.

MXXXIII.—Active Christians the only Christians.

Cicero, de Clar. Oratoribus et ad Attic.

Quintilianus Victo-rius, Var. Lect.,
lib. xviii., cap. 4.
Adams' Expositi. on
2. Pet.

EPHORUS, an ancient historian and scholar to Isocrates, had no remarkable thing to write of his country, and yet was willing to insert the name of it in his History, and therefore brings it in with a cold parenthesis: "Athens did this famous thing, and Sparta did that; and at that time my countrymen, the Cumins, did nothing." God forbid that England and Englishmen should be so recorded in ecclesiastical story as to have their names put in with a blank! Such a Church did thus nobly, and such a people suffered thus pitifully, and at that time the men of England did just nothing. To be more particular: Such a man did so much, and such a man gave so much for the glory of Christ and succour of poor Christians; and at that time thou didst nothing, thou gavest nothing. Thou professest thyself to be a Christian, to be an active Christian! There are not only walls upon earth, but a book in heaven, wherein the names of Christian benefactors are written: let it be thy care to find thy name there, otherwise it will be no more honour for thee to be put into the chronicle than it was for Pontius Pilate to have his name mentioned in the Creed.

"Convenit omni ratione et arte amantis patriam salutem ejus moliri."
—EURIPIDES.

MXXXIV.—Sin not consented unto excusable before God.

Deut. xxii. 25.

Basilius Monnerus,
de Matrim.

King's Lect. on Jerah.

"Haud est nocens, quicunque non sponte est nocens."
—SEN., Hercul.

Rom. vii. 23, 24.

Ametat. Minist.
Lond. in Lecur.

IN Moses' law it is provided that if a woman, being in the field, shall be forced by a man against her consent, and she cry out, the man shall be adjudged to death, but she shall be free, as having done nothing worthy of death. As it was well observed upon the rape committed by Tarquin upon Lucretia, that gallant Roman dame, "Duo fuerunt in actu, &c." (There were two in the act, and but one in the adultery)." So that sin which a man abhorreth from his heart and consenteth not unto, but, so far forth as infirmity and weakness of flesh give way, cannot properly be called his sin, but the devil's sin, it being the devil's rape upon the precious soul; for being tempted, he cries out unto the Lord for help, his heart smites him speedily, and he falls to repentance immediately; so that it is no more he, but sin that dwelleth in him, that ἑτερος νόμος (that other law in the members), that σῶμα τοῦ θανάτου (that body or remains of sin), according to which he is confident that God will not judge him, but according to the better and sounder part, which is that of the spirit most prevailing within him.

MXXXV.—Humility advanced.

THAT little humi repens, the grasshopper—the silliest of all creatures—is, for all that, advanced in the principal city, and in a principal street of that city, and a principal building of that street, and in a principal place of that building, as a golden object of magnificence to be gazed on. Such a thing is humility, that, like the violet, is poor in show, grows low by the ground, and hangs the head, as willing to live unseen, yet is never out of the way of preferment, is still upon the advance, as may be seen in the lives of Joseph, Moses, Mordecai, and many others, in all succeeding ages.

Royal Exchange, in London.

“Excelsa est patria, humilis est via; ergo qui querit patriam quid recusat viam.” —AUG., ad Discipulorum.

MXXXVI.—Negligent hearing of God's Word condemned.

IN the twelfth chapter of St. Luke's Gospel, you shall find Christ preaching an excellent sermon. One would think that, when He preached, all should be ready to hear. One of the company, in the midst of the sermon, thought Him too long, his mind being on something else. Whilst Christ was encouraging His disciples that, in the discharge of their duty, they should not fear the face of man, he runs upon His face with an impertinent demand: “Master,” says he, “speak to my brother, that he may divide the inheritance with me:” as if he had said, “My father died, and left me a portion; I would have Thee to set all down, and be an arbitrator betwixt us.” The motion was good, and might, in all likelihood, have wrought with Christ at another time; but now, in the midst of a heavenly sermon, to talk of an earthly inheritance was that which Christ reproved. Thus there are many that, though they do not ask downright questions of the minister, yet they sleep or gaze and prate out the sermon; they sit on their seats in the church, but their hearts are rambling out of the church. Like those that were buying and selling in the temple, they, whilst the minister is proposing the best bargain, the riches that are to be found in Christ Jesus, are trading with the devil about worldly contentment and earthly vanities; and that is the reason they benefit so little by what they hear, and have so little comfort in the performance of all other religious duties.

Luke xii. 14.

Fawcett's Serm., Lond., 1626.

Matt. xxi. 12.

“Nec retinent patulæ commissæ fideliter aures.” —HIERON., Ep. 18.

MXXXVII.—To persevere in goodness to the end.

THE philosopher being asked, in his old age, why he did not give over his practice and take his ease, answered, “When a man is to run a race of forty furlongs, would you have him to sit down at the nine-and-thirtieth, and so lose the prize? We do not keep a good fire all day, and let it go out in the evening, when it is coldest, but then rather lay on more fuel, that we may go warm to bed.” Thus, he that slakes the heat of zeal in his age will go cold to bed, and in a worse case to his grave. To continue in giving glory to Christ is no less requisite than to begin; though the beginning be more than half, yet the end is more than all. The God of all perfection looks that our ultimum vitæ should be His optimum gloriæ, that our last works should be our best works, that we should persevere in goodness to the end.

Adams' Exposit. on 2 Pet.

“Non progredi est regredi.”

“Finis coronat opus.”

MXXXVIII.—Prayer the only means to supply all defects.

IF a man lose all his personal estate and save his real, if he be robbed of all his goods and save his lands, he may buy more goods, and supply the loss with the income of his rents. Or suppose one that, being an able penman, should by his writing get fifty pounds per annum, and lending his supposed friend such a like sum should lose it, he would in a short time make it up again; but if his hand were cut off, there would be small hopes of any further earnings. Thus prayer is, as it were, the right hand, the only means to supply

White's Serm., Lond., 1652.

"Omnes medici pecuniis, Deus autem sola oratione placatur." — CHRYS., in Matt. ii.

all defects; it gets all, and makes up the loss of all. As a poor woman said, in her distress, "I have no friend, but I have a prayer, that will get favour with my God; so long as I can find a praying heart, God will, I am sure of that, find a pitying heart and a helping hand." And thus it is that, when all outward comforts fail and sorrows multiply on all sides, then it will be found that great is the benefit of prayer.

MXXXIX.—The faithful servants of God well rewarded.

Sutton's Military Sermon, 1617.

Esther viii. 15.

Ps. xxxiv. 10.

Judges xiv. 7.

1 Kings xvii. 6.

Acts xvi. 25.

2 Sam. v. 3-7.

WHEN a man hath spent himself in some great man's service, either he will not do him the good he can or cannot do him the good he would, or, if both willing and able, yet is ignorant what is best to do. Mordecai wears the king's apparel, rides upon the king's horse, with a royal crown on his head; what could be done more? Yes, all this, and much more, shall be done to him that serveth God; he shall be sure to have whatsoever is good. Imagine the happiness of Haman in his prince's favour, the contentment of Samson with his Delilah, the comforts of Elijah, preserved by ravens; the joy of Paul and Silas, visited by angels; the honours of David, advanced to a crown. Such honours, such pleasures, such comforts, such inward joys, such, and infinitely greater, lasting and everlasting happiness will God bestow upon all those that faithfully serve Him.

MXL.—Sins of infirmity, how to be known from other sins.

Westfield's Serm., Lond., 1628.

Jer. i. 5.

Rom. vii. 17.

A TRAVELLER, in his journey, thinks of nothing so much as his journey's end: if he stumble by the way, that is against his will and more than he intended; and if he chance to get a fall or to go out of his way, he rests not till he be up and in again. So, look but upon a hunter: he hath no design to follow his way at all, whether in the way or out of the way, his mind is upon the game; an archer bends his bow, delivers his arrow, and though it fall short or over, on one side or other, his aim was at the mark. Thus it is with the children of God: their aim is at heaven, their thoughts upon Zion, their looks towards Jerusalem, and their faces thitherward; and if there be any aberrations or turning aside, it is no more they, but sin, that dwelleth in them. Non sic impii non sic (it is not so with the ungodly): they have no such design as God's glory, the desire of their hearts is the satisfaction of their lusts and sinful pleasures; they aim at nothing else but sin, and so in the end reap the wretched fruit of their own wicked ways.

MXLI.—Christ the only object of the devout soul.

Adams' Exposit., on 2 Pet.

"Nihil aliud desiderat anima, nihil aliud a Deo querit, quam Deum ipsum." — BERN., Serm. de Divers. Affect. Anim.

A STATIONER, being at a fair, hung out the pictures or small printed counterfeits of men famous in their kinds; among which he had also the picture of Christ. Divers men bought according to their several fancies: the soldier buys his Cæsar, the lawyer his Justinian, the physician his Galen, the philosopher his Aristotle, the poet his Virgil, the orator his Cicero, and the divine his Augustine—every man after the addiction of his own heart; the picture of Christ hung by still, of less price than the rest. A poor chapman, that had no more money than would purchase that, bought it, saying, "Quando quisque Deum abstulit suum, &c." (Now every one hath taken away his God, let me have mine)." Thus, whilst the covetous repair to their riches, like birds to their nests; and the lustful to their brothels, like flesh-flies to the larder; the ambitious to their honour, like butterflies to a poppy; the strong to their holds, as snails creep into their shells; the learned to their arts, as bees to their hives; atheists to their sensual refuges, as dogs to their kennels; and politicians to their wits, as foxes to their holes;—the devout soul will know no other sanctuary, fix upon no other object, but Christ Jesus, not pictured in her chamber, but planted in the inner chamber of her heart.

MXLII.—God a just God, as well as a merciful God.

As the lion hath his paw to imprison, his voice to terrify, and his teeth to tear his prey, yet satis est prostrasse (commiserateth the woes of the prostrate) and suffereth no ravenous beast to devour that which he hath protected; the eagle hath his talons to strike, and his wings to shadow from danger; the leopard hath comely spots, but an ill-favoured countenance; the panther hath a sweet-scented breath, but a rotten, deceitful heart: thus God is just as well as merciful—the Lion of the tribe of Judah, that can as well encounter His foes with terror as entertain his friends with peace; He that threats to chastise, and favours to encourage; a terrible countenance to beget a dread of His might, and variety of mercies to breed a delight in His majesty; and whomsoever the beams of His bounty cannot warm into affection, the flames of His fury shall pursue to destruction.

Aldrich and, Plinius.

Dalton's Serm.,
Lond.

MXLIII.—The minister's duty.

It is reported of the nobles of Polonia, that, when the Gospel is read, they clap their hands upon their swords, and begin to draw them out, intimating, by that ceremony, their resolution to defend the faith and willingness to hazard their lives for the Gospel's safety. Thus God hath given every minister a sword to slay Agag and all his cattle, original impurity and all his droves of unhallowed thoughts: he must maintain the faith by preaching truth and confuting error, by commending virtue and disparaging vice, by confirming the weak and confounding the obstinate, by proving orthodox conclusions, approving innocency and goodness, improving labour and pains, reproving sin and profaneness: if he do otherwise, he is not præco, but prædo; not a pastor, but an impostor; not a keeper, but a deceiver of the people.

Bucholcer, in Chronol. Anno 965.

"Qui animarum curam pro Domino suscipit, ut errantes doceat," &c.—GLOS., super Prov. xi.

MXLIV.—God bringing order out of confusion.

PAUL and Barnabas continued a long time in the work of the ministry together; at last they fell out about a motion to visit the churches where they had formerly preached: Barnabas will by all means have Mark along with him. "No," says Paul, "that shall not be; because he was not at the planting of the Churches." One will not go without him, and the other will by no means go with him. The contention, at last, grows so high, that it comes to a non-communion; they departed asunder, one from the other: one went one way, and the other went another, and by this means the knowledge of God was more spread abroad, the Gospel of Jesus Christ further dispersed. "O felix contentio," &c., said a good old Christian (Oh, happy falling out of two, that was the falling in of so many unto Christ). And thus God, when His own time is, can bring good out of evil, light out of darkness, and order out of confusion, in making up the breaches and composing the differences both in Church and commonwealth.

Fawcett's Serm.,
Lond., 1647.
Acts xv.

St. Augustin.
"Dissociantur isti, sed ea occasione plures inveniuntur, et confirmantur in doctrina."—GUALTH., in Locum.

MXLV.—The lawfulness of stage-plays questioned.

WHEN one accused the comical poet, that he brought a lewd, debauched ruffian on the stage, and so gave bad example to young men, he answered, "True, I brought such a man on, but I hanged him before he went off, and so gave good example to young men." Thus it is to be supposed, that he that goes to see a play, intends not to see a truth, but a fable, a moral presented to his eye, that should convey some profitable document to his heart. But that any man should say he can learn so much good at a play as at a sermon, this is a wretched blasphemy, able to rot out the tongue of him that speaks it. Again, when a

Adams' Exposit.,
2 Pet.

Lucianus, de Sala, time.

tyrant objected to a player's sauciness, that he durst personally tax men on the stage, he made him this answer, "Be content; for while the people laugh at our foolery, they never mind your villainy." Thus, there are some that seek to defend stage-playing, saying, "Cities are populous, and where there are many men most commonly there are many lewd men; if their time were not spent so, it might in all likelihood be spent worse." But this is no argument to defend sin by sin, to prevent an evil not allowable by allowing an evil that is preventable. In a word, that which makes a man evil is his own evil mind.

"In omni re fide et intentione spectari de-bet."—POLYB.,
lib. i.

MXLVI.—Ministers to be painful in the discharge of their duty.

Usserius, de Ecdes.
Christ. Statu.

Gen. iii. 19.

"Vos quoque ab-esse prout jubeo, discedite ab aia."
—TIBUL., ii. 1.

THE Waldenses, in an apology of theirs, make mention of a better kind of abbey-lubber, qui ex sacerdote, agricola factus est (that of a priest, became a husbandman); and his reason was, because he found it written, "In the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat thy bread"—a strange humour. Had he so diligently discharged his calling as he ought, he never should have needed to have turned husbandman; he might have eaten his bread in the sweat of his brow and his brains too; but as, haply, he, so a number there are that live with such dry brows in the ministry that dry bread in another calling would yield them more comfort and content than all their fullness in the ministry, because they make no conscience to fulfil their ministry.

MXLVII.—Danger of distracted prayer.

Gen. xxiv. 2.

Fletcher's Serm.,
Lond., 1649.

"Despicuntur orationes leves, facili
curæ anxiam," &c.
—AMBROS., in Ps.

As long as Dinah stayed at home in her father's house she remained a chaste and beautiful damsel; but when a gadding fit came upon her, that she must range abroad to see fashions, Shechem, prince of that country, met with her, and forced her virginity. This is the right condition of every prayer that men put up unto God Almighty: so long as we commune betwixt God and our own hearts, and keep close unto Him, there will be a comfortable return made of that we pray for; but if, Dinah-like, our hearts must needs be roving after vanity, and taken up with the thoughts of worldly things, then it is no wonder if the devil, that prince of air, seize upon us, and lead us captive at his will; so that it were better not to have prayed at all than to have offered the sacrifice of such foolish and distracted devotion.

MXLVIII.—The danger of self-confidence.

Fox's Acts and Mon.

"Expediit multo benè timere quam malè timere," &c.
—AUG., de Sing.
Cleric.

It is storied of two men, named Denton and Wolsey, that the one was very fearful that he should deny the cause of Christ were he but called to make profession thereof. The other, which was Denton, showed a great deal of confidence, as being able to stand upon his own legs; but being both cast into prison, and put to the trial, Wolsey stands up for the cause of God, and having no other foundation but what was laid in Jesus Christ, suffers martyrdom; whilst Denton, for all his great show, played the renegado, and turned, like a weathercock, with the time. But it so fell out that he who would not willingly burn for religion was afterwards unwillingly burned, in the saving of his own house, then on fire. Thus, it is a very dangerous thing for any man to rely upon his own strength; the danger of self-confidence is very great—it hath but one foot to stand on, and therefore apt to stumble and catch a fall; whereas a child of God, just like a little child, will desire the hand of God's good guidance, if he be to pass over the bridge of any difficulty whatsoever.

MXLIX.—The devil's plot to root out learning.

1 Sam. xiii.
Edlin's Serm.,
Lond., 1652.

SAD was the condition of the Israelites under the tyrannical government of the Philistines, when they voted that there should be no smith in Israel, lest they should make them swords and spears; nay, when the lawful use of ploughs, coulters, axes, and mattocks—instruments of husbandry—were to be laid aside, except they would come to their forges to whet them. Such is and hath been the devil's policy, and of his instruments, such as Julian,* and the like, in all ages, to put out, if possible, the eyes of learning, and to dam up the fountains of good literature, lest men should make them swords and spears, furnish themselves with arguments and reasons, to confute and convince the Jesuitical doctrines, the atheistical practices, and schismatical opinions of such as are the grand sticklers and promoters of his diabolical kingdom.

* "Qui Christianorum illis literarum cultu interdixit," &c.—SOZOMEN., lib. v.

ML.—Ministers of God's Word to be constant in the preaching thereof.

ERNESTUS, duke of Luneburg, caused a burning lamp to be stamped on his coin, with these four letters, "A. S. M. C.," by which was meant, "Aliis serviens meipsum contero (By giving light to others, I consume myself)." Now, if he thought this to be the duty of a secular prince, how much more of a spiritual prophet, one that is set apart for the holy function of the ministry, to spend his strength in God's service, to preach in season and out of season, never to give over, but to run the race with cheerfulness, being constant unto the end, knowing that his labour shall not be in vain in the Lord.

Rerum Germ. Scriptores.

Acts xiii. 2.
2 Tim. iv. 2.

MLI.—The heart of man author of all good and bad actions.

APOLLODORUS dreamt one night that the Scythians took him and flayed off his skin, with an intent to boil him; and, as they were lifting him into the cauldron, his heart said unto him, "Εγώ σοι τούτων αἴτια" ("It is I that have brought thee to this sorrow; I am the cause of all the mischief that hath befallen thee). And it is most true that the heart of man is the forge where all our actions are hammered out at large; it is out of the abundance of the heart that the mouth speaks, either good or bad. The centurion had not readier servants at command than the heart hath upon all occasions; the eye, ear, tongue, hands, feet, knees, all of them move, and are at the heart's devotion.

Plutarchi Moralia.

"Plura machinatur cor uno in mento," &c.—HUGO, de Anima, lib. i.

MLII.—Custom of sin no excuse for the committing of sin.

It is said of a prisoner, that, standing at the bar, indicted for felony, he was asked by the judge what he could say for himself. "Truly, my lord," says he, "I did mean no hurt when I stole; it is an evil custom that I have gotten; I have been used to it ever since I knew anything." "Why, then," says the judge, "if it be thy custom to steal, it is my custom to hang up thieves." So, if it be any man's custom to swear upon every slight occasion, it is God's custom not to hold them guiltless that take His name in vain. Is it any man's custom to whore and be drunk, it is God's custom to judge them. Whatsoever the sin be, there is no pleading of custom to excuse it—as, that they meant no harm, it was against their will, &c. All the fig leaves that can be gathered, and sewed never so close, will not hide their nakedness from the eyes of heaven; God will certainly bring them to judgment.

Fawcett's Serm., Lond.

"Nil consuetudine pejus."—OVID, Art., lib. ii.

MLIII.—People's ingratitude to their minister condemned.

WHEN Homer had spent many lines in disparaging the body of Thyrsites, he briefly describes his mind thus: that he was an enemy to Ulysses, a wise and eloquent man. And there can be no more said of a bad man than this: that he is an enemy to his pastor. That is enough to brand him. "Væ illi qui minxerit in fontem (There is a curse pronounced against him that shall pollute the fountain)," cast aspersions on the minister, who, like Skinner's Serm., Lond., 1628.

1 Sam. xvi. 23.

"Occasiones ingratitudinis iavest-gantes."—BERN., in Die Fejunit.

David, is tuning his harp to drive away their melancholy, and they, like Saul, dart their javelins the whilst at his body. Whilst he is studying to apply the warm blood of Jesus Christ to their hearts, they are endeavouring to vex the best blood in his heart; he is taking care how to save their souls, and they—ungrateful men!—are troubled how they may vex and perplex his very thoughts, which are merely intended for their good.

MLIV.—Self-seeking men reproved.

David Pareus, in 1 Cor. iii. 6.

Ps. x. 4.

Cæd. Rhodogin,
ex Pausanias,
Acts v. 2.

Ps. lv. 2.

It is said of Hadrian VI., that, having built a stately college at Louvain, he set this inscription on the front, in golden letters: "Trajectum plantavit, Lovanium rigavit, sed Cæsar dedit incrementum (Utrecht planted me," for there he was born; "Louvain watered me," for there he was bred; "but Cæsar gave the increase)," who, from the ferula, brought him to the crosier—of a schoolmaster, made him Pope of Rome. A merry passenger, reproving his folly, underwrote: "Hic Deus nihil fecit (Here was no room for God to do anything)." Thus, God may be said not to be in all the thoughts of self-seeking men. They do not, with those ancients, preface to their works, Θεός, Θεός, but intervert a great part of the price; with that ill couple, turning God's glory into shame, loving vanity, seeking after lies; such as, in the original, will deceive their expectations: of which sort, by a specialty, is that smoke of popular applause, which, the higher it mounts, the sooner it vanisheth and comes to nothing.

MLV.—The true cause of Christian thankfulness.

Mars. Ficinus, in Vita.

2 Tim. i. 9.

Baily's Spiritual Marriages; a Sermon,
Lond.

Exod. x. 22, 23.

Judges vi. 40.

PLATO, looking through the dim spectacles of nature, gave thanks unto God for three things: first, that God had created him a man, and not a beast; secondly, that he was born a Grecian, not a barbarian; thirdly, that not only so, but a philosopher also. But Christians, that are better bred and taught, turn the stream of their thanks into another manner of channel: first, that God hath created them after His own image; secondly, that He hath called them out of the common crowd of this world, and made them Christians; thirdly, and more especially, that amongst those who bear the name of Christ He hath made them faithful ones—like a few quick-sighted men amongst a company of blind ones; like the light in Goshen, when all Egypt was dark besides; or like Gideon's fleece, only watered with the dew of heaven, whilst the rest of the earth was dry and destitute of His favour. Great cause of thankfulness, indeed!

MLVI.—Perjury attended by God's judgments.

Knoles' Hist. of Turks in the Life of Amurath II.

Oli sunt perjurorum vindicæ.—
JUST., Hist., lib. xiv.

VLADISLAUS, king of Hungary, one that professed Christ, covenanteth with Amurath, emperor of the Turks; articles are drawn up betwixt them; a peace is concluded for ten years. Vladislaus swears to the agreement, signs it as his act and deed, and delivers it to the emperor; but the Pope Eugenius, not well liking the business, dispenseth with the king's oath, whereupon provision is made for war, the Turk is met with a great army, the battle is joined. The service grew hot on both sides, and the Turk is worsted at the first, which Amurath, their emperor, perceiving, draws the articles out of his bosom, spreads them in the face of heaven, with these words: "O Jesu Christ! these men call themselves Christians, and they have sworn in Thy name not to have war upon us for ten years. If Thou be Christ, as they say, and we dream, show Thyself upon this people, in the breach of their covenant!" whereupon the battle turned, and there were eleven thousand Christians slain upon the place in that day. Thus it is that perjury hath ever been attended with God's judgments, who will not part with His honour, though it be in the midst of a company of infidels. Can a perjured man prosper? Was it ever heard that any false, forsworn, perjured wretch did prosper? And if he did, all that he got by it was put into a bag with holes: Witness Zedekiah. Where was it that the flying roll of curses light? Where? Where, but in the house of him that sweareth falsely? Perjury may be carried off smoothly here in this world, and walk up and down with an impudent face, but yet, for all that, judgment dogs it at the very heels; so that one may easily read the father's fault many times in the son's punishment, even to the ruin of posterity.

Ezek. xv. f.

Zech. v.

Jer. xxxiv.

"In prolem dila-târunt perjuri patris."—CLAUDIAN.

MLVII.—Swelling, big words of wicked men not to be regarded.

AFTER the defeat of that great armada, in '88, the Duke of Ossuna presented himself to the King of Spain, with a distaff at his side and a spindle at his back, instead of a sword and dagger. The king, hereby understanding that dux femina facti (a woman had foiled them), hastily stepped to the altar, and, taking a silver candlestick up in his hand, swore a monstrous oath that he would waste all Spain—yea, his whole Indies—to that candlestick, but he would be revenged on England. But—praised be God!—those high words were but the effects of his malice, without England's ruin; and had not a seasonable peace, not many years after, been concluded, he might, for all his far-stretched greatness, have been reduced to a kingship of oranges and lemons. And thus the swelling, big words of wicked men are not to be regarded. It were no living for any good man, if the hands of foul-mouthed men were as bloody as their hearts. Men and devils are under the restraint of the Almighty; neither are their words more high, or their designs more lavish, than their achievements be vain and their executions short. Like the reports of ordnance, they blaze and crack and smoke and stink and vanish away.

Adams' Serm. on
2 Pet.

An. Reg. R. Jac. I.

"Præter ostenta-tionem et ventosam jactantiam nihîl habent superbi."— PLIN.

MLVIII.—Men of self-ends condemned.

It was a sweet and savoury saying of Ecclapadius, "Nolui aliquid loqui vel scribere, &c. (I should be loth to speak or write anything that Christ should disallow)." He is that Master to whom every man must stand or fall. One good look from Him is beyond all vulgar acclamation. According to that of the apostle, "Not he that commendeth himself (nor he whom the world commends) is approved, but he whom the Lord commendeth." Reprovable, then, are the Gnostics of old, who gloried in themselves, and our modern Jesuits, who vaunt that the Church is the soul of the world, the clergy of the Church, and they of the clergy. And many amongst ourselves, that have, as our English Seneca said, "Eve's sweet tooth in their heads," would be more than they are, τις or ὁ (the man or somebody); such as are never well but when they are setting their good parts a-sunning, to gain the applause and admiration of the world; such as turn the perspective glass—see themselves bigger, others lesser than they are; sacrificing to themselves, as those Babylonians, and setting up and serving themselves of Christ and His service; as Judas and his successors, that rob Him of His rents and run away with His glory.

Melch. Adamus, in Vita.

2 Cor. x. 18.

Iren., lib. i., cap. 24.

Sand's Relation of West. Relig.

Bp. Hall.

Hab. i. 16.

MLIX.—Good Christians always thankful unto God.

It was an ancient custom amongst us, though now much slighted, upon every New-Year's Day, mutually to give and receive gifts, as lucky pledges of a hopeful year to come, according to that of the poet—

Buchananus Poemat.

"Mos vetus est Jani dare mutua dona calendis, Annus ut auspicio prosperiore fluat."

Yet good and faithful Christians are not contented to give thanks unto God only on the first day of the year, the first month of the year, the first week of the month, the first day of the "Ad singula dona gratias agunt."—

BERN., in Cant.

week, or the first hour of that day, but always, at all times, upon all occasions, they do but "think and thank." * God loads them daily with benefits, and they press Him daily with thanks: be it prosperity, they look upon it as a pledge of His favour; be it adversity, they entertain it as a trial of patience, still thankful.

* A motto often recited in Mercers' Chapel, London.

MLX.—Parents to be careful what they say in presence of children.

Fawcett's Sermon,
London.

ELIJAH was taken up to heaven in a fiery chariot, and having left Elisha behind him in his room, there was no want of mockers and jeerers in Israel, that were ready to laugh at any goodness, such as made themselves sport with the prophets of God, saying that Elisha should be taken up into heaven too; and this they did in the hearing of their children. No sooner was Elisha come to Bethel, but a company of children meet him, saying, "Go up, thou bald pate! go up, thou bald pate!" "Do as thy master did; thou must be in his room, forsooth; then thou mayest mount as he did." The prophet, hearing this, turned back and looked on them (it had been better for them if he had looked another way), and cursed them, whereupon there came forth two she bears out of the woods and tore forty-two of them asunder. Here was a company of ill-bred children: their fathers had, in their hearing, abused the prophet, and they, like ready scholars, were not long in taking out such a lesson, though they paid very dear for their learning. Let parents, therefore, be careful what they say or do in presence of their children: it cannot be imagined what large ears such slender pitchers have—how apprehensive, how imitable they are, especially in that which is bad.

2 Kings ii. 24.

"Corruptum vitiorum exempla domestica,"—JUV.

MLXI.—To beware of relapses in sin.

Adams' Exposit, on
2 Pet.

THE workman's first care is to lay the foundation sure, ne corruiat, lest it fall like the house built on the sands; the next, to perfect the roof, ne perpluat, that it do not rain through and rot the principals. The poet did put no less virtue into lueri than into querere; nor will the lawyer pass a conveyance with a mere habendum, but he will have a tenendum too; the physician ends not the cure of his patient with the cure of his disease, but, after all, minds the preventing of a relapse. And so must we, though we stand, take heed lest we fall, beware of relapses in sin. St. Peter's caveat ne excidatis is but an exposition of his Master's memores estote, both as fortifications against recidivation (backsliding). We may fall, therefore let us look to our standing; we may be led away—the devil will venture to try us—therefore let us not budge nor give him one foot of ground, but, if he beckons one way, be sure to take the other. He labours to trip up our heels, and it must be our care to take heed of falling; and as we desire to have our faith blessed into vision, our hope changed into fruition, our love into perfect comprehension, our repentance comforted with pardon, our charity crowned with glory, and all our services rewarded with eternal life, let us keep the graces of God's Holy Spirit ever in breath and motion, always in the ascendant, climbing higher and higher, till they come to the top of immortality; and as when rivers, towards their end, approach near unto the sea, then the tide comes and meets them, so, when the course of our piety draws near to the end of our life, God comes and meets us, comforts us with a taste of heaven before our death, and gives us, after death, the everlasting possession of it, through Jesus Christ.

2 Pet. iii. 17.

Luke xvii. 32.

Bargrave's Sermon, at Court, 1627.

"Omnia in actione virtus consistit,"—
CIC., Offic., i.

MLXII.—Excellency of the Scripture-phrase.

Cicero.

"EURIPIDES," saith the orator, "hath in his well-composed tragedies more sentences than sayings;" and Thucydides hath so stuffed every syllable of his history with substance, that the one runs parallel along with the other; Lysias's works are so well couched that you cannot take out the least word but you take away the whole sense with it; and Phocion had a special faculty of speaking much in few words; the Cretians, in Plato's time (however degenerated in St. Paul's), were more weighty than wordy; Timanthes was famous in this, that in his pictures more things were intended than deciphered; and of Homer it is said that none could ever peer him for poetry. Then how much more apt and apposite are these high praises to the Book of God, rightly called the Bible! As if it were, as indeed it is, both for fitness of terms and fullness of truth, the only Book to which (as Luther saith) all the books in the world are but waste paper. It is called the Word, by way of eminency, because it must be the butt and boundary of all our words; and the Scripture, as the lord paramount above all other words or writings of men collected into volumes, there being, as the Rabbins say, a mountain of sense hanging upon every tittle of it, whence may be gathered flowers and phrases to polish our speeches with, even sound words, that have a healing property in them, far above all filed phrases of human elocution.

Plutarch, in Vita Demetrii, Plato, de Leg., lib. i.
Tit. i. 12.
Xenophon, Memorabil., lib. i.

Com. in Gen. xix.

"Major est Scripturæ autoritas," &c.—AUG., in Gen.

2 Tim. i. 13.

MLXIII.—Christian apparelling.

THEY that put on the Lord Jesus are clothed with a fourfold garment:—1. With a garment of Christ's imputed righteousness; 2. With a garment of sanctification; 3. With a garment of protection; 4. With a garment of glory. The first garment may be called a winter's garment, quia tegit, because it covers us; the second, a summer's garment, quia ornât, because it adorns us; the third, a coat of armour, quia protegit, because it keeps us safe; the fourth, a wedding garment, quia admittit, because there is no admission to the Supper of the Lamb without it. The first three may be called our work-a-day suits, because we must put them on all the days of our lives; but the fourth, our holiday suit, because we must not put it on till the week of our pilgrimage in Baca be ended, and the Sabbath of our eternal rest in the New Jerusalem begun.

Daylie's Sermon,
Westm.

Matt. xxii. 11.

Ps. lxxxiv. 6.

MLXIV.—Changing of this life for a better no matter of grief.

IF a man should come to a merchant, and of two stones laid before him, the one false and counterfeit, the other true and precious, and laying down the price of the worse should get the better, would ye think the merchant had dealt hardly with him? No, he could not; but would rather admire his love and courtesy in the bargain. In like manner, there are two lives proposed to all men, the one temporal, the other eternal; both these He sets to sale, but He sells us the eternal. Why, then, like silly children, are we sad because we have received the best, it being a great favour to be taken from the evil to come?

Chrysostom, ad Populum Antiochen. xxxviii.

"Pretiosa morantur quam finis laborum, vitæ janua," &c.—
BERN., super Cant.

Cat. Test. Verit.
tom. ii.

Mat. Paris, in Vita Hen. III.

Sch. Munster's Cosmograph.

MLXV.—Drunkenness, whoredom, &c., the generality of them amongst us.

THERE is a tale of St. Bridget, that she heard the blessed Virgin say to her Son, "Rome is a fruitful land;" to whom He answered, "Sed zizanias tantum (Only fruitful of tares):" and as Hugo Cardinalis said of Innocentius, when he departed from Lyons, in France, that whereas there were four stews at his coming thither, he had left them but one—urbs sola lupanar; that one reached from one end of the city to the other. Thus it is that drunkards were heretofore as rare as wolves in England, now they are as common as hogs; whores were like owls, only night birds, now they keep open house, pay scot and lot with their honest neighbours; heretofore we had but some families of Papists, schismatics, and sectarians, now there are whole colonies, streets, lanes, and parishes of the brood of that spotted, harlot, and crooked generation.

MLXVI.—Ministers to preach plainly as well as learnedly, to the capacity of their hearers.

It is observable that the profoundest prophets accommodate themselves to their hearers' capacities, as of fishes to the Egyptians, droves of cattle to the Arabians, trade and traffic to the Tyrians. So our blessed Saviour tells His fishermen, that they shall be fishers of men; and after many plain parables to the people (as if the Father, the essential Word, had been at a loss for a fit word, familiar and low enough for our dull and shallow apprehensions), "Whereunto," saith He, "shall we liken the kingdom of Heaven?" Yea, the Evangelists spake vulgarly many times for their hearers' sakes, even to a manifest incongruity. In after ages, those two great lights of the Church, St. Augustine and St. Ambrose, the one confesseth that he was fain to use some words sometimes to those Roman colonies in Africa, where he preached, that were not Latin, as ossum for os, dolus for dolor, floriet for forebit, to the end they might understand him; and the other, remembering that he was a minister, stood not always upon the pureness of his style, but was far more solicitous of his matter than of his words. Thus, as children use money to jingle with, and men use flowers for sight and scent, but bees for honey and wax, not to gild their wings as the butterfly, but to fill their combs and feed their young, in like sort there are those that tip their tongues and store their heads, some for show and some for delight: but ministers, above all men, have these talents in trust, that therewith they may save themselves and those that hear them. They must condescend to the capacities of their hearers, stoop to the apprehensions of the meanest, become all things to all men, in St. Paul's sense, that they may win some: hence was that saying of a reverend bishop, "Lord, send me learning enough that I may preach plain enough."

Mark iv. 30.

Beza, in locum.

Brerew's Inquiries into Languages.

Lud. Vives, de Tractat. Disciplinæ, lib. ii. 3.

"Dehinc ad infirmitatem audientium descendere," &c.—GREG., Moral. super Job xxix.

1 Tim. iv. 16.

1 Cor. ix. 22.

Arth. Lake, Bath.

MLXVII.—The sinner's wilful blindness condemned.

THE lioness will not company with the lion, after she has been with the leopard, till she wash herself in water, unwilling that her adultery should be manifest by her scent; and the viper is so wise, that, before its union with the fish muræna, it first vomits and casts out all the pernicious and venomous poison that is within it; but oh, the wilful blindness of poor sinful man, by nature more adulterous than the lioness, more venomous than the viper, going a-whoring after every sort of vanity, full of hatred and malice, suffering strange lords to tyrannize over him without repugnancy—yea, and such cowardly lords, that if but resisted would flee from him; yet he gives way to them, not fearing that his disloyalty shall be perceived and revenged by his righteous Lord and Master, whose patience will at last break out into fury and break him, too, into a thousand pieces!

Aldrovand., de Quadruped.

Oppian, de Piscat. et Venat.
"O pectora cæca."
—LUCRET., de Nat. Rerum, lib. ii.

MLXVIII.—The hasty, unexpected death of friends not to be matter of excessive sorrow.

ABIJAH the prophet meets with Jeroboam's wife, and tells her that he was sent with heavy news, and with that especially, "Thy child shall die," and, which might add the more unto her sorrow, "Thy child shall die as soon as thou enterest thy foot into the city," so that she could not so much as speak to him or see him alive; and it was so, which was the occasion of a national mourning, there being in him bound up the hopes of Israel. And thus it is that many judge it very heavy tidings to hear of the early, untimely deaths of friends and acquaintance, that, like grapes, they should be gathered before they be ripe, and as lambs, slain before they be grown. But why should they judge so? Why take on so with grief and sorrow? It is true that tears are suitable to a house of mourning, so that moderation lends a napkin to dry up the excess of weeping. Consider, then, that nothing hath 1 Kings xlv. 6.

Stock's Funeral Sermon.

"Muliebrem tollit luctum."—HORAT., Ode xvi.

befallen them, but that which hath done, may do, and often doth betide the best of God's dear children. No man grieves to see his friend come sooner than ordinary, more speedily than usually others do, to be rich and honourable, or to see his friend or child outstrip others in learning and wisdom, to have that in a short time which others long labour for; why, then, should any man be troubled, but rather count it a matter of joy, when their children or friends, by death, obtain so speedily such a measure of spiritual riches and such a height of heavenly glory in so short a time. Besides, they have this benefit before those that live longer: they are freed from the violence of the wine-press that others fall into, and escape many storms that others are fain to ride through.

"Illi deplorandi sunt in morte, quos miseros infernus ex hac vitâ recepit," &c.—ISID., Ad Sum., Bona, lib. iii.

MLXIX.—Death, the meditation thereof, profitable to the soul's conversion.

THERE is a story of one that gave a young gallant a curious ring, with a Death's head in it, upon this condition, that, for a certain time, he should spend one hour every day looking and thinking of it. He took the ring in wantonness, but performed the condition with diligence: it wrought a wonder on him, and, of a desperate ruffian, he became a conscionable Christian. It were to be wished that men of all sorts would think more of death than they do, and not make that the farthest end of their thoughts which should always be the nearest thought of their end, but to spend some time fixedly every day on the meditation of death, and then, by God's grace, they would find such an alteration in their lives and conversations, that there would be gladness in the Church, peace in their own souls, and joy before the angels in heaven for their conversion.

Theod. Zuingeri, Theat. Hum. Vita, lib. xxvii.

"Nihil sic revocat à peccato, quam frequens mortis meditatio."—AUG., Lib. Exhortat.

MLXX.—The great usefulness of Scripture-phrase.

It is very remarkable how God Himself, the greatest Master of speech, and Maker of it too, when he spake from heaven, at the transfiguration of His Christ, our Jesus, made use of three several texts of Scripture in one breath, as in Matt. xvii. 5, "This is my beloved Son," "In whom I am well pleased;" "Hear ye Him." No doubt but God could have expatiated as He pleased, but this may reprove the curious queasiness of such nice ones as disdain at the stately plainness of the Scripture, and to show of what authority Scripture-phrase is with God. Happy, then, is that man, that minister, that can aptly utter his mind in pure Scripture-phrase, in that heavenly dialect, the language of Canaan; it is not the froth of words, nor the ostentation of learning (though useful in its time and place), nor strong lines, that will draw men up to heaven; but strong arguments and convincing downright truths, drawn out of the treasury of God's Word—as when a sermon is full of the bowels of Scripture, so that God and Christ may, as it were, seem to speak in the preacher.

Cartwright, in locum, Exod. iv. 11.

Ps. ii. 7.
Isa. xlii. 1.
Deut. xviii. 15.

Malcolmus, in Acta.

"Qui verè prædicat necesse est ut omne quod loquitur ad divinæ auctoritatis fundamentum revocet, et in cæ ædificium locutionis firmet."—GREG., Moral., lib. viii.

MLXXI.—Conversion of a sinner painfully wrought.

IF a woman cannot be delivered of her child, which she hath carried but nine months in her womb, without pain and peril of life, though she conceived it in great pleasure, we must not think, then, to be delivered of sin, which is a man, an old man, a man that we have carried about in our hearts ever since we were born, without any spiritual pain at all. The conversion of a sinner is no such easy matter: there must be the broken heart, the contrite spirit, the mourning weed, the pale countenance, the melting eye, and the voice of lamentation; pain for sins past, pain for the iniquities of the wicked, pain for the abominations of the land and place where they live, pain to see the distractions both of Church and state, and, finally, pain for their absence from their heavenly country. These are the pangs and throes of the second birth, the dolours that attend the conversion of a sinner.

Denison's Serm., Lond.

Ps. li. 17.

"Strangulat inclusus dolor atque cor æstuat intus," —OVID, Trist. v.

MLXXII.—The hypocrite characterized.

Deut. xiv. 5.

Plin., Nat. Hist.,
lib. viii., cap. 18.Corn. à Lépide, in Deut.

THERE is mention made of a beast, called by the best translators chamois, by some others cameleopard, a kind of camel, that hath a horse's neck, an ox's foot, a camel's head, and is spotted like a panther or a leopard. Just such are all hypocritical wretches: they have many shapes wherein to act the part of their deep dissimulation. If you look upon their devotion, they appear to be saints; in their dealings, you shall find them devils; oracles in their discourse, goats in the bed, snares at the board, heavy censurers of others for slight faults, boasters of their own goodness; the beating of whose pulse in matters of piety is unequal; in public actions hard, strong, and quick; in private matters weak, soft, and dull; shrinking in persecution: for painted faces cannot endure to come nigh the fire.

MLXXIII.—*Scripture knowledge and Scripture practice to go together.*Erasm., Colloquia.“Egens benignæ tantalus semper dapis.”—HORAT., Epid. xvii.“Bis meminit legis qui memor est
operis.”—BILLIUS, in Antholog. Sacra.

ERASMUS, in a dialogue, makes mention of a swaggering ruffian that would be thought a good Christian, whom he calls Cyclops Evangeliphorus, and says of him that he had hanging at his girdle, on one side, a New Testament, fairly gilt and embossed; on the other side, a bottle of rich sack. To convince him, he is asked what if he were tied to carry that bottle always at his girdle, and never to taste of it; or to taste it only, and never to drink it down; were not this a punishment as real as that of Tantalus' was poetical? But what if he did, as his manner was, drink soundly of it? Would it not then warm his heart, quicken his spirits, and cheer his countenance? Yes; but much more would that Book do so if he would but spiritually feed thereon, concoct, digest, and turn into nutriment in his life and conversation; otherwise, it was but a poor use and benefit that he made of his Bible, when one day, in a rage, he broke a fellow's head with it that inveighed against the Gospel. Thus, alas! to carry a Bible in our hands and not to have a lesson of it in our hearts, not to be mindful of the doctrine in our practice, were but to be like that ass that carries rich burdens and feeds upon thistles. In effect, a man knows no more than he does. Two things are the esse of a Christian—profession and practice of the truth. The best argument of our conversion is our good conversation. The apostles did not only preach heavenly sermons, but did gracious deeds, and thereby a whole book was written of them, called The Acts of the Apostles.

MLXXIV.—*Eloquence, if not affected, an excellent gift of God.*Beza, in locum.Niceph., Hist., lib.
viii., cap. 4.^{2a} Mark ii. 4.“Rostra disertus amat.”

Job xxxiii. 23.

Prov. xxv. 11.

Eccles. xii. 10, 11.

It was certainly a great fault in Spyridon, bishop of Cyprus, though otherwise a very godly man, that when Triphillius, his brother bishop, more eloquent, haply, than himself, was preaching on that text of the paralytic, “Take up thy bed, and walk,” where, instead of κράββατος, he read σκίμπος, the words being synonymous, not brooking that he should vary the least tittle of the text, though for another of the self-same signification, said unto him, “What art thou better than Christ Himself, who used the word κράββατος?” and thereupon rose up off his seat, and departed in great discontent. This was somewhat too much; for certainly there is some latitude, some Christian liberty, left wherein to expatiate. Eloquence, without all doubt, is a singular gift of God, if not affected, idolized, abused, and becomes no man better than a divine, whose part it is, by the tongue of the learned, to time a word and to set it upon its circumferences; to declare unto a man His righteousness, when not one of a thousand can do it like him; to seek to find out acceptable words, such as have goads and nails in them, being neither lecta nor neglecta (too curious nor too careless), because that God's holy things must be handled sanctè magis quam sciè (with fear and reverence), rather than with wit and dalliance.

MLXXV.—Profession, without practice, signifieth nothing.

WHEN we see an image stand still without motion, be it the effigy or portraiture of any emperor or king, or (if possible to be contracted within the bounds of human limits) the picture of some commonwealth exquisitely graven in metal or painted out in lively colours, we know that, for all the eyes and mouth and nose that it hath, it hath no life in it. So, when we see professors of religion without the powerful practice of godliness, and supreme officers of state without the administration of justice, we know, and can safely conclude, that the life of God is not in them; that they are not actuated by any divine principle within, but are mere idols and images of vanity.

Ycelle's Sermon at Court, 1621.

MLXXVI.—The heart of a true Christian restless without Christ.

THE sea works, the heavens move, the fire is active: only the earth stands still. Thus, the heart of man is always in motion, and never rests, sleeping or waking; it fancieth more in a moment than all the men in the world are able to compass in many years. Lust enticeth it, vanity possesseth it, curiosity leads it away, anger disquiets it, concupiscence polluteth it, pleasure seduceth it, envy torments it, sorrow and sadness vex and molest it. "Atque hi sunt manes quos patitur;" for, having set itself upon the right object, Christ Jesus, it is dispersed and scattered through many things, seeks for rest, and finds none till it return unto Him who is the True Rest indeed.

Bowyer's Sermon, Lond., 1631.

MLXXVII.—A busy-body described.

THE squirrel, as naturalists say, is a witty, nimble creature; and some write of her that, because she cannot swim well, when she would cross a brook, she gets a piece of the bark of a tree, puts it into the water, and herself into it, as in a boat, and then holds up her bushy tail instead of a sail, that so the wind may drive her over. A busy, active creature it is. And thus the pragmatistical busy-body hath an oar in every man's boat, an eye on every man's window; is here and there and everywhere but where he should be; is still busy, but never hath any thanks for his labour.

Olaus. Mag., lib. xviii., cap. 18.

"Aliena curando, et quæ nihil ad illum pertinent."—TERENT.

MLXXVIII.—God rewarding the least of faithful service done unto Him.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR, the tyrant, going upon God's errand, shall have Egypt as his pay for his pains at Tyre; and Simon of Cyrene, for that involuntary service he did our Saviour in carrying His cross, shall not only himself, but his two sons also, Rufus and Alexander, have a nail and a name in God's house better than that of sons and of daughters. How much more, then, will God gratify, graciously accept, and liberally reward the small offerings of His weak servants, when He sees them to proceed from great love! He takes goats'-hair from some hands as well as jewels, and two mites from a mean body in as good part as two millions from those that are more able, to note that a ready heart sets a high price with Him upon a low present. Doth Job serve God for nought? Doth any so much as shut the door or kindle a fire upon His altar unrewarded? They do not. God is a liberal Paymaster, and all His retributions are more than bountiful, even for the least of service that can be done unto Him.

Trapp's God's Love-Tokens, Ezek. xxix. 18.

Mark xv. 21.

Beza, in Isaiam.

*Job i. 9.
"Ante Dei oculos nunquam vacua est manus à munere," &c.—GREG., Mor. Mal. i. 10.*

MLXXIX.—God accepts the meanest of graces.

ABEL offers unto God the firstlings of his flock, and God had respect unto Abel and his offering. Though the earth was but newly cursed for the sin of man, yet God accepts the

Gen. iv. 4.

Leslie's Serm., at Glast., 1627.

first-fruits thereof, well knowing there were no such things in the offerer's power to perform but that which He had commanded the earth to yield. So shall those mean graces that are in us be accepted of God, though too, too much they savour of the naughtiness of our nature. And why so, but because they proceed from His special blessing, and are the work of His Spirit. A great comfort for such as feel in themselves reluctances and spiritual assaults, by reason of the corruptions and imperfections that cleave unto the best things they do !

MLXXX.—The name of God to be had in reverence.

Rayment's Serm.,
Lond., 1630.

JEHOVAH is a name of great power and efficacy, a name that hath in it five vowels, without which no language can be expressed ; a name that hath in it also three syllables, to signify the Trinity of Persons, the eternity of God, One in Three and Three in One ; a name of such dread and reverence amongst the Jews, that they tremble to name it, and therefore they used the name Adonai (Lord) in all their devotions. And thus ought every one to stand in awe, and sin not, by taking the name of God in vain ; but to sing praises and honour, to remember, to declare, to exalt, to praise, and bless it ; for holy and reverend, only worthy and excellent, is His name.

Ps. iv. & cxlviii. 13.

MLXXXI.—Slanderers discovered.

In Var. Hist.

Udall's Serm.,
Lond., 1439.

"Inimici famam non ita, ut nata est, ferunt."—PLAUT.

It is Ælian's observation, how that men, being in danger to be stung by scorpions, use to place their beds in water ; yet the politic serpents have a device to reach them. They get up to the top of the house, where one takes hold, the next hangs at the end of him, a third upon the second, a fourth upon the third ; and so, making a kind of serpentine rope, they at the last wound the man. And thus it is that, amongst scandalizers and slanderers, one begins to whisper, another makes it a report, a third enlargeth it to a dangerous calumny, a fourth divulgeth it for a truth. So the innocent man's good name, which, like a merchant's wealth, got in many years and lost in an hour, is maimed, and so secretly traduced, that it is somewhat hard to find out the villain that did it.

MLXXXII.—God only to be eyed in the midst of afflictions.

Gen. xxviii. 13.

2 Sam. xxi. 1.

Trapp's God's Love-Tokens.

Job i. 21.

"Ista ferenda tibi est, sic erat in falis."
—OVID., Fast.

1 Sam. vi. 9.

Matt. x. 30.

JACOB, when he saw the angels ascending and descending, inquired who stood at the top of the ladder and sent them. David, though he knew the second cause of the famine that fell out in his days to be the drought, yet he inquired of the Lord what should be the cause of that judgment. And Job could discern God's arrows in Satan's hand, and God's hand on the arms of the Sabæan robbers. So should we do in like case : see God in all our afflictions ; in the visible means see, by faith, the invisible Author ; and not look so much upon the malice of men or rage of devils, as if either of them were unlimited—not upon chance, as if that idol were anything in the world, or that things casual unto us were not fore-appointed by God, even to the least circumstance of the greatest or least affliction—to the falling of a hair from off our heads.

MLXXXIII.—Great sins attended by great judgments.

Ph. Nepotem, Im-peratorum Vitia.

WHEN Calais was taken from England by the French, in the time of Charles V., one asked the English, by way of scorn and derision, when they would win Calais again. A wise captain, hearing it, made this answer : "Cum vestra peccata erunt nostris majora, &c. (When your sins shall be greater than ours, then there will be large hopes of gaining Calais again)." And what, then, can we expect in this sinful land of ours? Were but our forefathers alive, they would blush to see such a degenerate posterity. Their sins were ignorance, ours presumption; theirs omission, ours commission: they were righteous in respect of us. Their hospitality is now converted into riot and luxury, their frugality into pride and prodigality, their simplicity into subtlety, their sincerity into hypocrisy, their charity into cruelty, their chastity into chambering, their modesty into wantonness, their sobriety into drunkenness, their church-building into church-robbing, their plain dealing into dissembling, their works of compassion into works of oppression. It is almost—if not altogether—out of fashion to be an honest man. Such and so great, so superlative, so ripe are the sins of this nation, that it is high time for the angel to put in his sickle and reap, for God to pour down the heaviest of His judgments upon us.

Hampton's Serm.,
Lond., 1626.

"Ingentia flagitia, ingentia supplicia," &c.—AUG.

MLXXXIV.—The mystery of the blessed Trinity inconceivable.

It is—though somewhat fabulously—recorded, that when St. Augustine was writing of the blessed Trinity, walking by the seaside, he saw a little child digging a hole in the ground, and, taking water with a spoon out of the sea, poured it into the hole. St. Augustine demanded of the child why he did so, and he answered, that he would lade the whole sea into it. "The sea," said he, "is too great, and the hole, the spoon, and the child too little." To whom the child replied thus: "Just so art thou, to write of the Holy Trinity;" and so vanished. Thus, whosoever thou art, canst thou empty the ocean of this great mystery into thy oyster-shell? Canst thou define how the Begetter should not be before the Begotten? Canst thou dream how generation and proceeding differ?—how there should be a Trinity in Unity and Unity in Trinity—Three in One and One in Three? This is a mystery of mysteries, not far to be dived into. It is impossible to sound the bottomless depth of such divine mysteries with the plummet of our short-lived and short-lined reason, or think to pierce the marble hardness of God's secrets with the leaden point of our dull apprehension; yet, so far as the Scriptures have revealed necessary to be understood, we may look into it. And, to be sure, he that hath two or three walks a day upon Mount Tabor, and, with holy Moses, converseth with God in Three Persons on the Horeb of both Testaments, shall find the peace of God the Father, the love of God the Son, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, to his eternal comfort.

Surius, in Vita
AUG., xxviii.

"Inquirere de Te-hitate perversa cu-riositas est; sed cre-dere et tenere sicut sancta Ecclesia, fides et securitas est."—
BERN., in Separat.
Serm.

MLXXXV.—A man to be wise for himself as well as for others.

WHEN an orator, with great store of wisdom, had bitterly declaimed against folly, and somewhat abused his auditors, it was afterwards replied upon him by one of them, "Sir, your discourse of folly may well be divided into three parts: one part you have declaimed against in all men, one part you have bestowed upon us, and the other part you have kept to yourself." Here was some wit in this: but when a man shall commend wisdom to all his hearers, and keep no part of it to himself for his own exercise, is it not great madness? For a man to have a full brain and an empty heart, a library of divinity in his head and not so much as the least catechism in his conscience, is as if one were to tell heads, and to number the company, and should forget to reckon himself. When an inheritance is to be divided among many children, will any co-heir set out the portions of the rest and forget his own? We say for temporal things, when a man spends or gives away all, it was but his kind heart; but in the distribution of things spiritual, to leave ourselves none argues not a kind, but a stupid heart. Heavenly knowledge is not lost by communicating; we may give all and keep all: Lord, enable us, therefore, to give so much as may make others rich in grace, and yet keep so much as may make ourselves rich in glory!

Adams' Exposit. on
2 Pet.

"Hoc non est par-ta tueri."

"Bonum sui dif-fusivum."—ARIST.

MLXXXVI.—To be patient under God's afflicting hand, and why so.

1 Sam. iii. 12.

Ps. xxxix. 9.

Trapp's God's Love-Tokens.

"Componite mentes. Ad magnæ virtutis opus magnosque labores."—LUCAN., Pharlat, lib. ix.

SAMUEL having told Eli of the destruction of his house, he said, "It is the Lord; let Him do what seemeth Him good." "I was dumb, I opened not my mouth," saith David, "because it was Thy doing." He knew that God's hand would be no further stretched out to smite than to save; that as He might do what He pleased with him, so He would not over do. "Pater est, si Pater non esset!" this cooled the boiling rage of the young man in Terence. Thus, let every man sit down with the like consideration, and say within himself, "Shall I not drink of the cup that my Father hath put into my hands? stand under the cross that He hath laid on my shoulders? stoop under the yoke that He hath placed on my neck? Bears and lions take blows from their keepers, and shall not I do the like from the Keeper of Israel? If I contend with my Maker, worse will come of it. I cannot ward off His blow, nor strengthen myself against His fire; I will therefore, with meekness and silence, buckle and bow under His hand, and not make my crosses heavier than He hath made them, by frowardness and impatience."

MLXXXVII.—*Sin of a destructive nature.*Cedreni Annales.

"Felix criminibus nullus erit diu."—AUSONIUS.

Shute's Serm., 1630.

WHEN Nicephorus Phocas had built a mighty strong wall about his palace for his own security, in the night-time he heard a voice crying out unto him, ὦ βασιλεῦ ὑψοῖς τέλει, &c., "O emperor, though thou buildest thy wall as high as the clouds, yet if sin be within it will overthrow all." And most true it is that all sin is of a destructive nature. What though our nation be in as good a posture as heart can wish, our navy ready, our ports and block houses well fortified, our coasts guarded, all our beacons watched, all our castles repaired, all our men armed, and our land environed with a wall of iron about it, yet if sin be within, if bribery, oppression, self-interest, hatred, malice, &c., be in the midst of us, like those traitors in the Trojan horse, any one of them will do more hurt in one night than ten thousand open enemies in ten years.

MLXXXVIII.—Man's happiness consisteth only in God's free election.

Gen. iv.

Simpson's Serm., Lond.

OF Adam's three sons, Cain, the eldest, was extremely wicked; of Noah's three sons, the youngest was wicked; of Terah's three sons, the middlemost was wicked. Thus, it is neither the elder nor the younger, neither birth nor parentage, age or condition, that can claim any interest in heaven, except they be elected of God before the beginning of the world. Happiness is not entailed upon any worldly relation, but he that hath made his election sure is a happy man.

MLXXXIX.—Glory to be given unto God only.

Gen. xli. 16.

Dan. ii. 23.

In Vita ejus, lib. iii., cap. 6.

"Haud equidem tali me dignor honore,"—VIRG.

Diog. Laert., in Vita.

PHARAOH ascribes much to Joseph, but Joseph quickly rids it off from himself, and sends it away to the right owner. So Daniel to Nebuchadnezzar: he blesteth God for the knowledge he hath, and so does not deny it, but he returns the praise to Him that gave it. David had his "Non nobis, Domine;" and it is written of St. Bernard, that, having done many wonders in France, he did thus put off all glory from himself: "I have learned in the Scriptures," saith he, "that signs are done, vel per fictos, vel per perfectos, ego nec fictionis, nec perfectionis mihi conscius sum; let them have a good opinion of me, but give all the praise to God." Thus it is the greatest and the highest part of divine wisdom to give God the glory of all our actions; it is His own, why should He not have it? As when Thales Milesius had imparted to some other philosopher an admirable discourse of heaven, he freed his scholar from all reward but this: that whensoever he divulged this secret,

"Tibi non ascripseris, sed me ejus repertorem predicaveris (The invention itself he was willing to communicate to others, but the honour of the invention he would keep to himself), ubi mea legis, me agnosce." We have received all our wisdom, strength, honour, and wealth from God; He requires no more but that we acknowledge the Author: "Ubi mei uteris, me agnosce (Take thou the comfort of them, give me the glory)." To do this, summa ratio docet, et Christianos decet; the whole world is a great book of God's mercy, every benefit is a lesson, and wheresoever we read it let us be sure that He may have the glory.

"Quid habes quod non receperis?"
1 Cor. iv. 7.
Bern., in Serm.

MXC.—Children to be begged of God by prayer.

It is a rabbinical observation, that there are four special keys which the Lord reserveth in His own power: first, the key of rain; secondly, the key of food; thirdly, the key of the grave; fourthly, the key of the heart; to which may be added, the key of the womb. Hence it is that Abraham, being childless, made his moan unto God; Isaac prayed for his wife, because she was barren; Hannah, Samuel's mother, poured out her soul when she had no child. This is the true course, this is the right way: first to the Lord, then to the means; and let all those that desire the blessing of increase seek it of God. It is He that openeth and shutteth the womb; the fruit of the womb is His reward; He maketh the barren woman to dwell with a family, and to be a joyful mother of children.

Plantavit, Florteg Rabbinicum.

Gen. xv.
Gen. xxv. 21.
1 Sam. i. 10.

Ps. cxxvii. 3.

Ps. cxlii. 9.

MXCI.—Parsimony, in times of public danger, condemned.

WHEN that imperial city Constantinople was besieged by Mahomet the Great, the good emperor did what he could to the utmost of his power for the defence of the place: sold the very Church-plate and all his own jewels to pay the soldiers; then, with tears in his eyes, besought his covetous subjects to lend him supplies. They pleaded poverty, protested they had it not, that they were grown poor for want of trade; and thus, for want of what they might have well spared, both they and their city were lost—a city of that great wealth, that it is a proverb amongst the Turks at this day, if a man grow suddenly rich, "He hath been at the sacking of Constantinople." Such was the state of Constantinople then, and such will be hereafter the condition of any place or people, when, like silly passengers, they shall more regard their trifling fardels than the ship they go in, fortius diligentes res suas, quam seipsos, loving their wealth more than themselves, more than their wives, their children, their country—nay, more than the Gospel itself, keeping their goods for their enemies to make merry withal, refusing to part with anything for their just defence. It is just with God that they should be exposed to all sorts of misery.

Knolcs' Hist. of Turks.

Willan, on Elitha's
Whib.

MXCII.—The devil's policy to defile the soul with sin.

It is said of the badger, otherwise called a brock or a gray, that the fox and he cannot agree together by any means, for the fox will have him out of his hole, and what he cannot compass by might he doth by sleight: the badger is no sooner gone out of his den to seek his food, but the fox goes in and defiles it, whereupon the badger, returning and smelling out the fox's baseness, leaves his den to him, who enters and brings up all his cubs there. Such is the policy of the devil to defile the soul of man: he goeth about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour. His main design is to throw Christ out of the soul, which is God's den, God's temple, God's house, and God's dwelling-place; but because he cannot put Him out by force, he therefore dealeth craftily, by defiling the soul with some noisome lusts, such as are a stink in the nostrils of God, whose pure eyes can endure no uncleanness, so that He, departing thence, the devil enters therein, bringing forth sin upon sin, till all be brought to shame upon shame, and in the end confusion of face for ever.

Bartholomæus, de Proprietat. Rerum.

Edlin's Serm.,
Lond., 1640.

MXCIII.—Reconciliation in God and Christ to be made sure.

A RUNGATE SON, leaving his father and living in foreign countries, was brought to want, and finding little charity among strangers, he was driven to work for his living. Industry brought in gains, and the sweetness of gain whetted industry. Soon he grew rich, became a merchant, and dealt in traffic with divers nations—among the rest, with some of that nation where his father lived. Hearing news how potent and opulent his father was grown, of his wealth and authority in the city, he resolves to steer his course thitherward. Four pieces of business he had in his head : one was, to congratulate with his friends and allies ; another, to be merry with his old companions ; the third, to gather up his debts ; the last and principal, to be reconciled to his father. Being arrived there, he follows the three former employments close, he fails in none of them ; but these did so wholly take up his time, that he quite forgot the main, the reconciliation to his father. The mariners on a sudden call aboard, the tide tarries for no man ; presently he must be shipped, and so leaves that business utterly undone. Thus, we are all strangers on earth ; our Father is the Almighty King of Heaven. We are charged but with four businesses here in this world : first, honestly to provide for ourselves and families ; secondly, to perform all just duties to our neighbours ; thirdly, to solace our hearts with the sober and thankful use of God's creatures ; fourthly, and chiefly of all, to serve our Maker in holy obedience, to acknowledge our sins with humble penitence, to get His pardon through the merits of His Son Jesus. Now, so it is that we are diligent in the rest, we heap up riches, we sate ourselves with pleasures, we are indulgent to our bodies ; but for the matter of most moment, that of greatest concernment, the pleasing of God, the saving of souls, &c., we are as negligent as if they were not things considerable. Death calls us aboard, carries us away in his deep bottom, and the main business we came about is left uneffected. We cannot but confess all this. Let us, then, amend it, and, whatever becomes of our riches, of our pleasures, of our bodies, let us be ure of our reconciliation made with God in Christ Jesus.

Wann's Serm. de Tempore.

"Unum necessarium sapissime oblitum."

Alphons. ab Averdano, in Matt.

Marc. de Pise, Encyclopadia Morali.

"Multi sunt qui minus diligenda magis diligunt," &c.—AUG.

MXCIV.—Husbands not to be uxorious.

JEROME reporteth, out of Seneca, of one that was so uxorious, that when he went abroad he would gird himself with his wife's hose-garter, and could not endure her out of his sight, and must by all means drink of that side of the cup that she drank of, as the poet said of Paris, "Et quâ tu biberas, hac ego parte bibi (Where thou layest thy lips, there will I drink also) ;" but the good old father concludes thus, "Sapientis vir judicio debet amare non affectu (A wise man must not love by fancy and affection, but by judgment and discretion)." Thus, as the proverb is, a man may love his house well, but not ride on the ridge of it ; he may delight in the beauty and accept of the person of his wife, and say of her as the friend of the spouse in the Canticles, "Oh, thou fairest among women !" but he may not idolize her ; he must not be so uxorious as Samson was, that was so besotted with foolish fondness to his wife, that he opened unto her the secrets of his heart, to his own confusion.

St. Jerome, adv. Jovinian. circa finem, lib. iv.

"Nunquam oportet virum sapientem mulieri remittere frænum." Cant. v. g.

MXCV.—Restitution, the necessity thereof.

THERE is a story of a man who gave much alms to the poor, who, walking one day very solitary, an angel met him, in likeness of a man, and, walking along with him, brought him at last to a deep valley, where was a pit burning with fire and brimstone, and therein three gibbets. Upon one of them did hang a man by the tongue, upon another a man by the hands, on the third hung no man at all. The good man, much marvelling at the strangeness of such a sight, asked the angel what the men were that hanged in those tormenting flames ? He told him, that he which hanged by the tongue was his grandfather, Speculum Exemplorum.

Anton. Dauronii Catech. Historialis.

who purchased the land and house wherein he now dwelt by false oaths, lying, and perjury, and was therefore hanged by the tongue; and that the other was his own father, who, by strong hand, kept that which his father before him had wickedly gotten; and that the third gallows was prepared for him, unless he made restitution: and so the angel vanished. The man, being left alone, went sadly home, and the next day sent for the true owners and restored the lands unto them: whereat his wife and children were much amazed, saying that he would make them all beggars. "Oh," says he, "it is better to beg a little while in this world, than to burn for ever in the world to come: better to lose house and lands here, than to be deprived of God and goodness hereafter." This may be a story, but the moral is good, and setteth out unto us that ill-gotten goods never prosper in the end, and that there is a necessity of restoring what hath been unjustly taken away. There are many stolen goods abroad, but few brought home to the right owners. Men's hands are like the fisher's stew (a store-pond), yea, like hell itself, which admits of no return; but let all men know, that ill-gotten metals are a strong bar to bolt heaven's gates against them, but when they are dissolved by a seasonable beneficence and restitution, those gates of glory fly open, to their eternal comfort.

Udall's Serm.,
1640.

"Vivitur ex rapto,"
—OVID.

MXCVI.—Riot and excess condemned.

THERE is an old apologue, how Honestum, Utile, and Jucundum would needs keep house together. Honestum was to govern all, Utile to provide for all, and Jucundum to dress or prepare all. They had a very great household, yet maintained their charge, relieved the poor, and laid up somewhat for their posterity. All things went sweetly on, while Cheerfulness was the cook, Thriftiness the caterer, and Honesty the steward. If any of the family were disordered, Honesty reformed them; if any lavish and unthrifty, Frugality recovered them; if any melancholy, Jucundum revived and cheered them. But after a while, this Jucundum, getting a little head, began to exceed in mirth, and fall out with Utile for short provision. He had invited a number of fiddlers, jesters, players, tumblers, dancers, and must have extraordinary cheer for them. Utile refused to allow it; Jucundum would have it; and the quarrel grew hot. While Honestum was called to moderate the matter, this rabble came in, took Jucundum's part, snatched the keys out of Utile's hands, ransacked the coffers, exhausted the treasures, turned Honesty and Thrift out of doors, sang, danced, and drank, and threw, as they say, the house out at the windows. Thus, the family broke; for just as Honestum and Utile went out, Beggary came in: only these two erected a new house, and repaired their estates; to whom, not long after, Jucundum came a-begging, but might not be admitted as one of the family, only was sent for sometimes to make them merry, and lived on their alms. The moral is easy: frugality is the best fuel of hospitality; riot and excess are condemned, whereby many a good family hath been ruined. Let all the rest take warning.

Adams' Exposit., m
2 Pet.

"Genetrix virtutum frugalitas."—
JUSTIN., lib. iii.

MXCVII.—How God may be said to will and nil the death and punishment of a sinner.

A MARINER in a storm would very fain save his goods, but, to save the ship, he heaves them overboard. A tender-hearted mother corrects her child, whereas the stripes are deeper in her heart than in its flesh. As it was said of a judge that, being to give sentence of death upon an offender, "Bonum quod nolo facio (I do that good which I would not):" thus God, more loving than the careful mariner, more tender than the indulgent mother, and more merciful than the pitiful judge, is willingly unwilling that any sinner should die. He punisheth no man as he is a man, but as he is a sinful man. He loves him, yet turns him over to justice. It is God's work to punish, but it is withal His opus alienum (His strange work), His strange and foreign act, not His eudochia (His good will and pleasure), His nature and property being to have mercy on all men.

Mercantili Horr.
Psitt.

Isa. xxviii. 27.

MXCVIII.—Morning prayers commended.

De Trugillo, Thesaur., Condemnat.

"Oratio matutina clavis dei," &c.

Prov. xxvii.

ST. ORIGEN, going to comfort and encourage a martyr that was to be tormented, was himself apprehended by the officers, and constrained either to offer to the idols or to have his body abused by a blackamoor, who was ready for that purpose; of which hard choice, to save his life, he bowed unto the idol. But afterwards, making a sad confession of his life, he said that he went forth that morning without making his prayers unto God, which, he said, he knew assuredly to be the cause of his falling into evil. And, to say truth, he that committeth not himself to God's good guidance in the morning may very well be without God's good blessing all the day after. The first thing that a man doth is to seek God, never think himself dressed till that be done. Let his soul have a morning's draught, as well as his body—I mean a morning prayer, to fence it against the infectious air of the world. Solomon tells the reason: "Who can tell what a day (a big-bellied day) may bring forth?"—whether judgment or mercy, good or bad? Therefore, to make sure work, pray to God in the morning, and then, come what will come, all shall be for the best.

MXCIX.—Faithful servants of God, the paucity of them.

Goddard's Serm.,
Lond., 1651.

"Quæque domui servis est plena superbia,"—JUVEN.

A GENTLEMAN, having but one servant, thought him overburdened with work, and therefore took another to help him. Now he had two, and one of them so trusted to the other's observance, that they were often both missing, and the work was not done. Then he chose another. Now he had three, and was worse served than before. Therefore he told his friend, "When I had one servant, I had a servant; when I had two, I had but half a one; now I have three, I have never a one." Thus God hath many servants, but little good service done. Men do so trust and thrust His work one upon another, that still it is not done. They say that many hands make light work, but it is usually seen that many hands make slight work. God's holy name is blasphemed: the hearer says, "Let the magistrate look to it;" the magistrate says, "Let the minister reprove it;" the minister says, "Let the hearer reform it;" the company says, "Let the offender himself answer it;" the offender says, "Curel nemo (Let no man mind it)." God hath so many seeming servants, that when His business comes to be done, not one of them can hardly be found that is faithful.

MC.—Men and women are not to wear each other's apparel.

De Virginitate, lib. ii.

De Mediavilla, Clavis
vii. Cali.

Lib. de Idolatria.

Lib. de Spectaculis.

THERE was never yet to be found any occasion lawful for the changeable use of men and women's garments but one, and that St. Ambrose speaks of. Thus it was: a certain virgin of Antioch, being condemned to the stews, because she would not sacrifice to the idols, prayed thus unto God: "Lord, Thou who couldst stop the mouths of lions against Daniel, Thou also canst bridle the raging lusts of men." And having thus prayed, there came in a soldier and changed garments with her, using these words: "Quasi adulter ingressus, si vis, martyr egrediar, &c. (I came in as an adulterer, and, if thou wilt, will go out as a martyr. Let us change garments; thy vesture shall make me a true soldier, mine shall keep thee a virgin. Take thee a habit which shall hide thy womanhood and consecrate my martyrdom.)" And by this means the virgin escaped, and saved her virginity. But such occasions as this seldom fall out: and certainly, for women, in masks and shows, to be apparelled as men, and men as women, hath been always a thing distasteful to those who are more sober-minded; as Tertullian condemneth it directly: "Nullum cultum à Deo male dictum invenio, &c.," saith he ("I find no apparel cursed of God but a woman's on a man, according to that of Deut. xxii. 5, especially in shows and plays"); further adding, out of another place, "Non autem falsum Author veritatis, &c. (The God of verity loves not falsity; everything that is counterfeit, before Him, is a kind of adultery)."

MCI.—Sorrow that is true, is for the most part, silent.

ST. BERNARD, bewailing Gerhardus the monk, and his dearest brother, saith: "At his death my heart failed me, sed feci vim animo; with much ado I dissembled my grief, lest affection should seem to overcome religion; and, whilst others wept abundantly, secutus ego siccis oculis invisum fumus (myself followed with dry eyes the happy hearse); by-standers with watery cheeks admiring, whilst they did not pity him, but me that lost him." Indeed, whereas tears and words fail, the blood leaveth the cheeks to comfort the heart, and speech giveth place to amazement. They are small miseries when he that hath them can presently tell the world of them. Sorrow that is true is, for the most part, silent. That observation of St. Peter is good, "Flevit, sed tacuit (He wept, but was silent)," as if his eyes would in some sort tell what his tongue could in no sort utter.

Serm. xxvi, 1st Cant.

"Ille dolet verè qui sine te to dolet."—OVID.

Ambrose, Serm. xlv.

MCII.—The known law of any nation to be the rule of obedience.

It was the observation of a wise, but unfortunate, peer of this nation, at the time of his trial before an honourable assembly, that if a man should pass down the Thames in a boat, and it be split upon an anchor, and a buoy not being set as a token that there is an anchor there, the party that owns the anchor should, by the maritime law, give satisfaction for the damage done; but if it were marked out, then he must come upon his own peril. And thus it is that the known laws of a nation are made the rule of obedience to the people: the plain law and letter of the statute, that tells where and what the crime is, and by telling what it is and what it is not shows how to avoid it; for were it under water, and not above, skulking only in the sense of some musty record, and not divulged, no human providence could avail, or prevent destruction.

Wentworth, Earl of Strafford, 1641.

"Lex à legendo quia publice debet legi."—ISIDOR.

MCIII.—No true cause of rejoicing in this world.

THERE is a story of a certain king that was never seen to laugh or smile, but in all places, amongst all persons, at all times, he was very pensive and sad. His queen, being much troubled at his melancholy, requested a brother of his that he would ask him what was the cause of his continual sadness. He did so. The king put him off till the next day for an answer, and, in the meantime, caused a deep pit to be made, commanding his servants to fill it half-full with fiery coals, and then caused an old rotten board to be laid over it, and over the board to hang a two-edged sword by a small slender thread, with the point downwards, and close by the pit to set a table, full of all manner of delicacies. His brother, coming next day for an answer, was placed on the board, and four men with drawn swords about him, and withal, the best music that could be had to play before him. Then the king called to him, saying, "Rejoice and be merry, O my brother! eat, drink, and laugh, for here is pleasant being!" But he replied and said, "O my lord and king! how can I be merry, being in such danger on every side?" Then the king said, "Look how it is now with thee; so it is always with me: for if I look about me I see the great and dreadful Judge, to whom I must give an account of all my thoughts, words, and deeds, good or evil; if I look under me, I see the endless torments of hell, wherein I shall be cast if I die in my sins; if I look behind me, I see all the sins that ever I committed and the time which unprofitably I have spent; if I look before me, I see my death every day approaching nearer and nearer unto my body; if I look on my right hand, I see my conscience accusing me of all that I have done and left undone in this world; and if I look on my left hand, I see the creatures crying out for vengeance against me, because they groaned under my iniquities. Now, then, cease henceforward to wonder why I cannot rejoice at the world, or anything in the world, Lawrence's Serm., Lond., 1624.

"Quocunque aspicio nihil est nisi," &c.—OVID, de Trist.

⁴⁴ Miscetur tristitia letis.—OVID.

but continue sad and heavy." Thus, did but men consider their estates, then would they find small cause to rejoice at anything which the world shall present as a thing delectable, but rather employment enough for Argus's eyes; yet all little enough to weep for the miserable estate wherein they stand, by reason of sin and wickedness.

MCIV.—Controversies, especially in matters of religion, dangerous.

ON the tomb-stone of the learned Sir Henry Wotton, late provost of Eton College, it is thus inscribed: "Hic jacet hujus sententiæ author: Pruritus disputandi fit scabies Ecclesiæ (Here lies the author of this sentence: The itch of disputation becomes the scab of the Church)." And very true. How is religion, in a manner, lost in the controversies of religion! for who is there that had not rather seem learned in the controversies of religion than conscionable in the practice of religion, and that sets not more by a subtle head than a sanctified heart? that had not rather disputare quam bene vivere (dispute well than live well)? So that distraction in religion becomes destruction of religion.

Curle's Serm. at Court, 1632.

MCV.—Daily examination of ourselves, the comfort of it.

• Sextius.

SENECA tells of a Roman* that kept his soul as clean as the best housewife keeps her house, every night sweeping out the dust and washing all the vessels, examining his own soul: "Quod malum hodie sanāsti? qua parte melior es? (What infirmity hast thou healed? what fault hast thou done and not repented? in what degree art thou bettered?)" Then would he lie down with, "O quàm gratus somnus, quàm tranquillus! (With how welcome sleep and how quiet rest do I entertain the night)!" And it were to be wished that all men would do the like: to keep a day-book of all their actions and transactions in the world, to commune with their own hearts, and not to sum up all their words and works in the day passed with an "Omnia bene!" as churchwardens were wont to do when they gave up their presentments; then would their nights' rest be quiet, and then might they lie down in safety, for God Himself would keep them.

Adam's Exposit. on 2 Pet.

MCVI.—Repentant tears purging the heart from pollutions of sin.

Erasmii Adag.

"Augeiæ bubile."—LUCIANUS.

De Mediavilla, Clavis Cæli.

"Lavant lachrymæ delictum."—AUG., super Luc., lib. ix.

THERE is mention made of a certain king who had an ox stall, which had not been cleansed for many years, and at last was grown so foul, that it was thought all the industry of man could not clean it in a lifetime. The king perceiving this, considered with himself, that if he could bring the river, which ran hard by his house, to run through it, then it would quickly be emptied. No sooner was this conceived in his mind, but he sets upon the work, and after much expense, both of labour and money, brought the river to run through the ox stall with a very swift current, so that in three days the house was cleared and all the filth removed. Thus the heart of man, like that Augean stable, is filled with rottenness and pollution, but if true repentant tears do but run through it with a forcible current, they will drive down all putrefaction and uncleanness before them; they are of a purging nature, that, as rain distilling from the clouds, clarifies the air, so they purify the heart, inasmuch that if the men of this world were truly persuaded of the great benefit of true repentant tears, they would not by any means be hindered from weeping.

MCVII.—Scandalous and seditious books and pamphlets fit for the fire.

GESILAUS, when he saw the usurer's bonds and bills set all on fire, said, "Nunquam unquam clariorem (I never saw a brighter or a better fire in all my life)!" And it were heartily to be wished that of all such scandalous, blasphemous, seditious books and pamphlets that are daily vended amongst us, such as are fraught full of nothing but pestilent and bitter malice, and the most shameless, desperate untruths that the devil, the father of lies, can help to invent, there were a fire made of them, as was of the books of curious arts, the flames whereof, perhaps, might expiate some part of the author's offences, which otherwise would one day help to increase their torment in hell fire.

Winton's Serm. at Court, 1631.

Acts xix. 19.

MCVIII.—Men easily drawn by their own natural corruption.

CALISTA, the strumpet, thus bragged against Socrates: "All thy philosophy cannot alienate one of my lovers from me, but my beauty can fetch many of thy scholars from thee." He made her this answer: "No wonder! for thou temptest men to the pleasing path of perdition, but I persuade them to the troublesome way of virtue." And it is observed that philosophers of divers sects turned to the Epicureans, but never did any Epicurean accept of any other sect of philosophy. Thus it is that men are easily drawn by their own natural corruption: men are naturally disposed to be evil, to be holy and good is the difficulty; we are all of us born sinners, there is much ado to make us saints. For corrupt nature to adhere unto a doctrine that holdeth out carnal liberty—facilis descensus—there is no more wonder in it, than for stones to fall downward or sparks to fly upward; but to mortify our earthly members, to deny ourselves, to forsake this present world, and cleave unto God, hic labor hoc opus est, this goes against the hair—fain would we be saints, but we are loth to be holy.

Ælian, Var. Hist. lib. xiii.

"Unicuique dedit vitium natura creatum."—PROPERT., lib. i., eleg. 23.

MCIX.—To be affected with the falling of others into sin.

ST. BERNARD makes mention, in one of his homilies, of an old man, who, when he saw any man fall into sin, wept and lamented for him. Being asked why he grieved so for others, answered, "Hodie ille, cras ego (He fell to-day, I may fall to-morrow)." Thus, if men could but be affected with the falling of others into sin, it would rather draw blood than joy from their hearts, not knowing how soon God may withdraw His grace from them, and suffer them to fall as foul as any other; besides, there is no greater sign of a reprobate than to laugh at sin and sinners; for he that can make wickedness his chiefest pastime, and the faults of others his greatest joy, is no better than the devil, who rejoiceth at the failings of God's children.

"Regia res est miseris succumbere lapsis."—HOMER., de Resurrect. Dom.

Laurence's Serm., Lond., 1624.

MCX.—The world to be contemned in regard of heaven.

THE eagle, a princely bird, of a piercing sight, a swift and lofty flight, mounts upwards, setting light by the things that are below, only condescending to any of these inferior things when necessity compels, not when superfluity doth allure. Such an eagle was Zaccheus, that left his extortion; Matthew, his toll-gathering; Peter, his all;—such as used this world as if they used it not, wherewith to supply their necessary wants and no further. Oh, happy change! when men leave all for Him who is worth more than all; though riches increase, yet they set not their hearts on them; though their estates be changed, yet they are not changed: their desire is not to be rich unto this world, but unto God; their bodies are below, but their hearts are above; their lives here, but their conversation is in heaven.

Aldrovand., Ornith.

Jansen, Harm. Evang., cap. 123.

St. Bernard, in Præfat. affix. Lib. de Conit., ad Eugen.

MCXI.—Christian modesty commendable.

It is a worthy observation that Paulinus, a good man, answered to Sulpitius Severus, when he wrote unto him to send him his picture: "Erubesco pingere quod sum, non audeo pin-

St. Augustin., Ep. viii.

"Modestia sanè deceat omnes omnium ordinum homines."—COMIN,
lib. 1.

Adams' Exposit. on
2 Pet.

gere quod non sum," modestly dispraising his own features ("I must blush," said he, "to picture myself as I am, and I scorn to picture myself as I am not"). Here was a modest man and a modest disposition well met: and it were heartily to be wished that the like frame of spirit were in the puff-paste Titulados of our times, rather to confess the unworthiness they have, than arrogantly to boast the worthiness they have not; pretending sanctity at the root of the tree, when no fruit but wickedness is seen on the branches; flattering themselves that their garments are of the holy fashion, their goings of the holy pace, their language of the holy style, and their hair of the holy cut, whilst the heart is all this while of an unholy metal MCXII.—Not to be daunted at afflictions.

Shute's Triumphs of Nepos.

Rogers' Serm.
Cant., 1633.

"Superanda omnis fortuna ferendo est."
—VIRG., Æneid,
lib. v.

It is related of that valiant commander, Sir Horace Vere, late Baron of Tilbury, that when in the Palatinate, a council of war was called, and there being debate whether they would fight or not, some Dutch lord said that the enemy had many pieces of ordnance planted in such a place, and therefore it was dangerous to fight, Sir Horace replied, "My lords, if you fear the mouth of a cannon, you must never come into the field." Thus it is that, in the service of God, men must not shrink or give back because of difficulties in the way; and though it oftentimes so falleth out that men fall into divers temptations, and those great ones too, so as to despair of God's mercies and to lay violent hands upon themselves, yet a Christian courage must not be daunted at any crosses or afflictions, but endure constant to the end; for God is faithful and just, and will not suffer any man to be tempted above what he is able to endure, nor lay any more upon him than what he shall be able to bear.

MCXIII.—The law bringing men to the sight of themselves.

Judges xvi. 3.

Loc. Com. Tit.
Antinom.
Rom. x. 4.
St. Augustin., con- tra Advers. Legit.,
lib. ii., cap. 7.
Matt. v. 17.

THE swans of Thames and Po, beholding with a retorted neck their goodly feathers, think themselves rare æves in terris; but when their black legs and feet are become the object of their sight, then they find that they are nigris cygnis simillimæ. So, when men behold their lives, in what they are commendable or tolerable, the pharisee himself is not more proud than they; when they hear of the two tables of God's commandments, they can carry them as easily as Samson did the gates of Gaza; but when they look into the glass of the law of God, they find their strength to be but as other men's: then goes the hand to the breast, and the word from the mouth, "O God, be merciful to me, a sinner!" "Away, then," as Luther once said, "with those Antinomian conceits, that the law need not be taught in the times of the Gospel!" It is confessed that Christ is the end of the law. What end? "Finis perficiens non interficiens (An end, not consuming, but consummating);" as Himself said, "I came not to destroy the law, but to teach and do it."

MCXIV.—The painful (painstaking) preacher's poverty the idle impropiator's plenty.

Valentine's Serm.,
Lond., 1633.

"Aselli ornantur phaleris dephalerantur equi."

BEEs make the honey and drones suck the hive. It is said in Job (chap. i., ver. 14), "The oxen were ploughing, and the asses feeding by them." What! oxen plough the ground, and asses reap the harvest? This is somewhat preposterous; yet so it is, that laborious oxen, painful (painstaking) preachers, spend their time in ploughing and preaching, and lazy asses, idle impropiators, eat up all their labours, being always feeding. Great revenues belong to the contemplative convent, while the devout and active preacher is a mendicant: the diligent preacher lives in want of necessaries, whilst the lazy impropiator swells in all abundance.

MCXV.—Every man to be persuaded of his own death.

Two ships meeting on the sea, the men in either ship think themselves standing still, and the other to be swift of sail, whereas they both sail onwards towards the port intended, but the one faster than the other. Even so men are as ships. See we an old man, with a staff in his hand, stooping downward: "Alas! poor old man," say we, "he cannot live long." Hear we a passing bell toll, there is one going out of the world. Visit we a sick friend, we think he can hardly live till morning. Thus, we think all other men are a-dying, and we only standing at rest; whereas, God knows it, they may go a little before, and we are sure to follow after. John outruns Peter to the sepulchre, but Peter is not far behind him. Let every man, then, be thus persuaded of himself, that he shall and must die. None can be so sottish as to be persuaded that they shall never die, yet (which is a sad thing) there is none so old but thinks he may live one year longer; and though, in the general, he say, "All must die," yet, in the false numbering of his own particular days, he thinks to live for ever.

Rogers' Serm.,
Cant., 1633.

"Ante omnia cogita fragilitatem pro-prium."—BERN.,
in Serm.,
John xx. 4.

MCXVI.—The great danger of any one sin unrepented of.

MANY planks, well pinned and caulked, make the ship to float; one, and but one, leak not stopped will sink it; one wound strikes Goliath dead, as well as three-and-twenty did Cæsar; one Delilah will do Samson as much spite as all the Philistines; one wheel broken spoils all the whole clock; one vein's bleeding will let out all the vitals, as well as more; one fly will spoil a whole box of ointment; one bitter herb, all the pottage; by eating one apple, Adam lost Paradise; one lick of honey endangered Jonathan's life; one Achan was a trouble to all Israel; one Jonah, if faulty, is lading too heavy for a whole ship. Thus, one sin is enough to procure God's anger, and too much for one man to commit; and if God, then, take an account of one sin, let men have a care of all sin.

Bugg's Serm.,
Lond., 1624.
Suctonius.

2 Kings iv. 40.
Gen. iii. 34.
1 Sam. xiv. 43.
Joshua vii. 25.

MCXVII.—Curses usually fall on the curser's own head.

DIogenes warned the bastard, when he saw him throwing stones at random among the people, to take heed he did not hit his own father. Such is the condition of all cursing men, such whose tongues run with great speed on the devil's errand, whose maledictions are shot out of their mouths just like fools' bolts, not regarding where they light, whereas many times they fall upon their friends, their children, and very often upon themselves; or like ill-made pieces, which, while men discharge at others, they recoil in splinters upon their own faces: so that, if every curse should stick a visible blister on the tongue, as it doth insensible ones on the soul, how many men's tongues would be too big for their mouths, and their mouths as an open sepulchre, full of rottenness and putrefaction.

Laert. Diog., in Vita.

"Nec enim lex justior ulla est."

MCXVIII.—To be always prepared for death.

It is reported of Sir John Burgh, a brave soldier, and a gentleman of a good family, who, receiving a mortal wound in the Isle of Rees, and being advised not to fear death, but to prepare himself for another world, answered, "I thank God, I fear not death: these thirty years together, I never rose out of my bed in the morning that ever I made account to live till night." A religious and Christian-like practice, well worthy imitation, that every day, when a man awaketh, he should commend himself to God's protection, whether he live or die; for, at the evening, none knoweth whether that night's bed shall be his grave or that night's sleep shall be his death: therefore, before his eyes do sleep, or his eyelids take any

Rogers' Serm.,
Cant., 1633.
Anno 1627.

"Vive memor mor-tis, uti memor sis et salutis."—AUBON.

slumber, or the temples of his head take rest, make his peace with God for all his sins, that, whether he live or die, he may live and die to the Lord, and Jesus Christ may be to him advantage.

MCXIX.—The sad condition of man falling away from God.

Gore's Serm.,
Lond., 1632.

Col. iii. 1, 2.

Phil. ii. 15.

2 Pet. ii. 20.

COMETS and meteors, that hang in the air, so long as they keep aloft in the firmament of heaven, they glitter and shine, and make a glorious and celestial lustre in they eyes of all beholders, but, if once they decline from that pitch, and fall down to the earth (as many times they do), they vanish and disappear, and come to nothing. Such is the case betwixt a man and his God: as long as a man holds in good terms with God, and sets his affections upon things above, so long will God cast His favour upon him, and he shall shine as a light in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation; but if once he decline from that pitch, and fall down from a godly conversation into an earthly, idle, ungodly disposition, it is a venture but his prosperity will fall away and his latter end grow worse than his beginning.

MCXX.—The madness of ministers, magistrates, &c., not to be guided by that counsel they give to others.

Oth. Melandri Joco Serio.

"Turpe est doctori cum culpa redarguit ipsum."

It is fabled of a madman, that, talking with a lean, meagre cook, he understood from him what dainty dishes he dressed for his guests; and hearing that they were all fat and fair liking, and thrived with it, he asked him why he did not feed on those meats himself, that he might be fat too. The cook answered, that, for his part, he had no stomach; but the madman replies, "Take heed how thou come near Bedlam; if the corrector find you, your punishment will be very sharp, for certainly you are madder than ever I was." Thus, it is no better than madness for ministers, magistrates, and others in place of eminency to give light to others, and walk themselves in darkness, to distribute portions of meat to the family and starve their own souls, to rescue others from the enemy and suffer themselves to be taken, to forewarn others of the pit whereinto themselves run headlong, to give good counsel to others and not to be guided by that counsel themselves.

MCXXI.—Christ nothing but love all over.

Pref. to Hist. of the World.

*Plantavicii Florileg.
Rabbinicum.*

"Christus amoris amor."—BILLIUS,
in Antholog. Sacra.

It is the observation of Sir Walter Raleigh, that if all the pictures and patterns of a merciless prince were lost in this world, they might all again be painted to the life out of the story of King Henry VIII. But, on the other side, the Jews had such a high esteem of Esdras, that if Mercy, Love, and Knowledge had put out their candle, at his brain they might light it again. Behold yet a greater than Esdras—Christ Jesus Himself! If all our love were extinguished, at His love we might easily re-kindle it. Not a word that He spoke, not a work that He did, not a passion that He suffered, but was an argument, a character of His love. He brought love, He bought love, He exercised love, He bequeathed love, He died in love—He is all love.

MCXXII.—Needful requisites to make up a profitable hearer of God's Word.

Acts and Monuments.

It is said of that princely Josiah, King Edward VI., that his carriage in the public service of God was such, that he constantly stood up at the hearing of God's Word, took notes, which he afterwards diligently perused, and wrought the sermon upon his affection by serious meditation. Thus, it is not a bare sitting under the ordinance, a mere formal hearing of the Word—thinking, as too many do, that when the sermon is ended all is done ; but there must be attention of body, intention of mind, and retention of memory, which are indispensably required of all Wisdom's scholars, and are the most needful requisites to make up a profitable hearer of God's Word.

Trapp, on Prov.

"Amis bonæ es, quæ libenter audit utilia," &c.—
BERN., Ep.

MCXXIII.—Friendship to be made with God in Christ Jesus.

THE men of Tyre and Sidon—two rich and ancient cities of Phœnicia, on the coasts of Syria—when they heard that Herod was displeased with them, and intended to make war upon them, they made friendship with Blastus, the king's chamberlain, and sought by all means possible to get into favour with him again. And why? "Because," said they, "our lands are nourished by the lands of the king." And this is our case : our lands, our lives, our liberties, and all that we have are nourished and sustained by the King of Heaven ; therefore, when we know that He is displeased with us—as justly He may, for, as David saith, we provoke Him every day—then let us do as they did : as they made a friend of Blastus, so let us make friendship with Jesus Christ, and desire Him to help us into God's favour and protection.

Gore's Serm.
Lond., 1633.

Acts xii. 20.

"Omnia habemus in Christo," &c.—
AMBROS.

Ps. lxxviii. 40.

MCXXIV.—Heaven ; men desirous to be there, but will not take pains to come thither.

SABELLICUS, in his History, brings in C. Flaminius playing upon Philoxomenes ; that he had "pulchras manus et pulchra crura, sed ventrem non habuit (he had goodly arms and strong thighs, but he had no belly)." He meant that Philoxomenes had brave and valiant soldiers, fair troops of horse and foot, but wanted that which is the sinews of war—he had no money to pay them. It may be inverted upon us, for we are all belly, full of appetite and desire to happiness, but we have neither hands nor feet ; we will neither move nor labour to attain to that happiness. We have fat desires, but lean endeavours ; fain we would be in heaven, but we will take no pains for it, nor seek the way to it. We make account to go up to heaven in a whirlwind, or, as passengers at sea, to be brought to the haven sleeping ; to win heaven without working ; to be crowned without striving ; to dine with the devil, and sup with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven. By all means we must die the death of the righteous, but by no means live the life of the godly—nay, if death do but offer to prefer us to heaven, we will none of it : we thank him heartily, we refuse him with deprecations, and fortify ourselves against him with antidotes and preservatives. So that it may very well be put to the question, "Where is our desire for heaven?" when we rather die necessitas vinculo, quam voluntatis obsequio ; instead of looking for it, we look from it, and then only pretend a faint desire to it, when we can make no other shift but that we must needs venture on it.

Adams' Exposit. ch 2 Pit.

Livius.

"O si, O si, otiosi."

"Non est ad astra mollis è terris via."
—SEN., Herc. Fur.

"Mortem optare, malum, timere pejus."—SEN., Ædip.

MCXXV.—To be charitable to the poor and needy.

THE Jews at this day, though out of their own country, and destitute of a Levitical priesthood, yet those that will be reputed religious amongst them distribute the tenth of their increase unto the poor, being persuaded that God doth bless their increase the more ; for their usual proverb is, "Decima, ut dives fias (Pay thy tithes, that thou mayst be rich)." "Nay," says Philo the Jew, "they came so willingly to give up their tithes unto God, as if they had been to have received a gratuity from men." If, then, there be such devout Jews, that, having neither house nor home, priest or temple, and without Christ in the Plantavit, Florileg.

Rab.

Philo, de Sacerdot.
Honora, lib. ii.

"Pa-patibus semper clementem porrige dextram."

Prov. iii. 9, 10.

world, so charitable to the poor, then how much more suitable will it be for Christians, who live in Gospel times, to relieve the poor members of Jesus Christ, to honour the Lord with their substance, freely expending it in pious and charitable uses, whereby their barns shall be filled and they made great gainers in the end.

MCXXVI.—Why God suffereth the dearest of His children to want outward things.

Theophrast., de Plantis, lib. iii.

"Semper Deus hic nos vulnerat, quis salutem perpetuam preparat."—ISID., Sollog., lib. i.

It is written of the pine-tree, that if the bark be pulled off it will last a long time, else it rots. So God sees that many a man, if he had his bark upon him, if he had the wealth of the world about him, a penny in his purse, and a friend at court, it would rot him, corrupt him, and make him worse; therefore God is fain to bark him and peel him, to keep him naked and bare and poor, that his soul may prosper the better; for, indeed, many times it so falls out, and a man shall find it so, that his soul prospers best when his body prospers worst.

MCXXVII.—Men to be compassionate one towards another.

Sabellicus, lib. viii., cii. 2.

Lælius, de Reipub. Rom.

De Mediavilla, Clav. David.

"Si doles condoleo," &c.—BERN., de Consolat. ad Eugen.

It was an act of Licinius, one of the Roman tribunes—whether more cruel or foolish, let the world judge—that when Christians were put to their torture, he forbade all the lookers-on to show the least pity towards them, threatening the same pains to them that did show it which the martyrs then suffered. His malice was greater than his power, for he could not hinder those from suffering with them that daily suffer in them. And this is the way that all Christians are to walk in; if they cannot, through disability, relieve others with their goods, which is the mercy of contribution, yet what can hinder their comfortable words to them, which is the mercy of consolation? or their prayers and tears for them, which is the mercy of intercession? or their pity and sensible sympathy of their grief, which is the mercy of compassion?

MCXXVIII.—The impartiality of death.

Halli, Chron. in Vita Hen. VI.

"Rigidum huc est et inevitabile mortis."—OVID, ad Livium.

In the reign of King Henry VI., there is mention made of Henry Beaufort, that rich and wretched cardinal, who, lying on his death-bed, and perceiving his time to be but short, expostulated with himself thus: "Wherefore should I die, being thus rich? If the whole world were able to save my life, I am able either by policy to get it, or by riches to buy it. Fie, fie!" said he, "will not death be hired? will money do nothing?" No; such is the impartiality of death, that ready money will do nothing: there is no protection against the arrest of death. So true is it, which one writeth wittily of the grammarian, of every son of Adam, that being able to decline all other nouns in every case, he could decline death in no case. Never was there orator so eloquent, nor monarch so potent, that could either persuade or withstand the stroke of death when it came.

MCXXIX.—Unhappy prosperity of the wicked.

Ps. xxxvii. 35.

Gore's Serm., Lond., 1633.

"Prosperum ac felix scelus."—SEN.

"Heu cæcæ mentis tunc factaque erura secundis."—SILIUS, Ital. l.

It is David's observation, that the wicked are in great prosperity, and flourish like a green bay-tree, which is well known to be green all the winter long; when oak-trees and apple-trees and all other far more profitable and fruitful trees do wither, decay, and shed their leaves, stand naked and bare, and look as if they were rotten and dead, then it is that the bay-tree looks as fresh and green as it were in the midst of the spring. So fares it with all wicked men: in such winter-times of the world as we are now in, they prosper, and God sends them no cross, nor disease, nor judgment to interrupt them, but lets them take their swing in the very height of their rebellions against Him : when many a poor Christian is fain to fast and fare hard, and go with many a hungry meal to bed, then it is that God suffers a company of flagitious villains, such as are mercatores humanarum calamitatum (that make merchandise of poor men's miseries), to have their will without control, and to thrive and have a great deal of outward unhappy prosperity.

MCXXX.—Heaven, the way to it through tribulation.

JONATHAN and his armour-bearer, being upon their march against the Philistines, were to pass betwixt two rocks, the one called Bozez, which signifies dirty ; the other called Seneh, which signifies thorny—a hard passage. But on they went, as we say, through thick and thin, and at last gained the victory. The Israelites were first brought to the bitter waters of Marah before they might taste of the pleasant fountains or the milk and honey of Canaan. And in vain shall any man expect the river of God's pleasures before he hath pledged Christ in the cup of bitterness : when we have pledged Him in His gall and vinegar, then He will drink to us in the new wine of His kingdom. He that is the Door and the Way hath taught us that there is but one way, one door, one passage to heaven, and that a strait one, through which, though we do pass with much pressure and tugging, having our superfluous rags torn away from us here, in the crowd of this world, yet we shall be happy. He that will be knighted must kneel for it, and he that will enter in at the strait gate must crowd for it—a gate made so on purpose, narrow and hard in the entrance, yet, after we have entered, wide and glorious, that after our pain our joy may be the sweeter.

1 Sam. xiv. 4.
Adams' Exposit. on
2 Pet.
Exod. xv. 23.
Luke xxii. 18.
John x. 7.
Matt. vii. 13.

"Itur ad aethereas per magna pericula
sedes."—VERINUS.

MCXXXI.—The Scriptures not to be played withal.

It was simply done of Cardinal Bobba, who, speaking in commendation of the library at Bononia—which, being a very spacious room, hath under it a victualling house, and under that a wine cellar—thought he had hit it in applying that text, "Wisdom hath built her house, hath mingled her wine, and furnished her table." The rudeness of this application did not in the least become the gravity of a red hat ; but let all such know that non est bonum ludere cum sanctis (there is no jesting with edge tools, no playing with the two-edged sword of God's Word). Is there no place but the font for a man to wash his hands in ? no cup but the chalice to drink healths in ? Certainly they were ordained for a better use, and the Scriptures penned for a better end, than to be played withal.

Roccha, Deo-ist.
Bibliothec. Vaticana.
Prov. ix. 2.
"Procul hinc, pre-cui este profani."
—OVID.
Fuller's Holy State.

MCXXXII.—Uncertain prosperity of the wicked.

A MAN that stands in lubrico, in a slippery place, as on ice or glass, shall have much ado to keep himself upright, though nobody touch him ; but if one should come upon him unawares, and give him a sudden jostle or a sudden rush, he hath no power in the world to uphold himself, but must fall, and that dangerously. And this is the case of wicked wealthy men, such as are laden with ease and honour ; such as are blessed, like Esau, with the dew of heaven and fatness of the earth ; such graceless ruffians as feast without fear, drink without measure, swear without feeling, live without God, thinking that they are ἀσάλευτα (immovable), and fastened on a rock that never shall be moved. But they are deceived. God, who knows their standing, tells us He hath set them in slippery places, and it will not be long ere He send some death, some judgment, some evil angel or other, to give them such a sudden jostle, such a sudden rush, that without great mercy on His part, and great repentance on their part, they must fall irrecoverably into the pit of hell for ever.

Gore's Serm.,
Lond., 1634.
"Tu quoque fac
timcas et quæ tibi læta videntur, dum
loqueris, fieri tristia posse puta."—
OVID.
Ps. lxxiii. 19

MCXXXIII.—Atheism will unman any man.

Inchini, Scala Cæli.

TAKE a dog and mark what generosity and courage he will put on when he is maintained by a man, who is to him instead of a god, or at least melior natura, whereby it is manifest that the poor creature, without the confidence of a better nature than his own, could never be so courageous. Thus it is with man: when he rolleth himself upon God, and resteth on His Divine protection, then he gathers a force and ability which human nature itself could never attain; but when, with the fool, he shall say in his heart (though he believes otherwise) that there is no God, then he destroys the nobility of man, for man is akin to the beasts by his body, and if he be not akin to God by his soul he is a base and ignoble creature. Atheism will unman any man, and deject anything that is the advancement of human nature.

Ps. xiv. 3.

MCXXXIV.—Riches, ill gotten, never prosper.

Trapp's Com. on Proverbs.

It is related of Tecelius, the pope's pardon-monger in Germany, that having, by sale of indulgences, scraped together a vast sum of money, and returning for Rome, was met and eased of his cash by an odd fellow, who, being afterwards apprehended and prosecuted as a felon, produced a pardon, not only for sins past, but sins to come, granted unto him by Tecelius himself, and, being thereupon acquitted by the judge, enjoyed the booty, which, being ill gotten, was as wickedly spent. And thus it is that ill-gotten goods seldom prosper: they have a poisonful operation in them, bringing up the good food together with the ill humours. He that hath any such hath but locked up a thief in his closet that will rob him of all that he hath: he may heap up silver as the dust, and prepare raiment as the clay: he may prepare it, but the just shall put it on, and the innocent shall divide the silver; for when a man, out of covetous desire of gain, shall make a marriage with mammon and give a bill of divorce to Jesus Christ, caring not which way nor how he scrapes up wealth, so as he have it, then it is just with God to blast his hopes and blow upon his estate, so that all shall come to nought.

Job xx. 15.

Job xxvii. 16.

"De male quæsitis vix gaudet," &c.

MCXXXV.—God only heareth and answereth the prayers of His people.

Luke xi. 5.

Gore's Serm., Lond., 1634.

"Precis est Justæ exauditor Deus solus."—MEN.

It is a pretty observation that St. Augustine makes out of the parable proposed by our Saviour, where he that knocked at midnight to borrow bread of his neighbour found all the whole family asleep; only the master of the house was awake, and he answered and opened and gave him that he craved, though it was an unseasonable time. Nullus de janitoribus respondit (none of all the porters, none of all the servants, none of all the children, made him any answer), they were all asleep; only the master was awake and heard when he called. Just so it fares with us when we knock and call at the doors of heaven for any mercy: none of all the prophets or apostles, none of the blessed saints departed, make us any answer. Alas! they hear us not; they sleep in peace and are at rest from their labours; only God Almighty, who is the Master and Maker of that blessed family, He, and only He, doth hear and answer at what time soever we cry unto Him. Call when we will, He is always awake to hear us.

MCXXXVI.—Happiness and blessedness the only things desirable.

Expuit. in ST. AUGUSTINE hath the story of a histrionical mountebank, that, to get spectators and money by them, promised to tell them the next day what they most desired. The theatre being full of people, and their minds full of expectation, what was the device? "Vili vultis emere et charè vendere (You would all buy cheap and sell dear)." But, by Mr. Mountebank leave, this holds not, for the good man, in a famine, will buy corn dear, and sell it to the poor cheap; and, on the other side, the unthrift will sell his inheritance cheap, and buy vanities at a very dear rate. Now, if he had told them, "Beati vultis esse (You would all be happy)," this had been a full satisfaction—blessedness is every man's desire. Now, whosoever hath the sun hath the light of the sun; he cannot want water that hath the fountain; and he that hath God shall be sure of blessedness. It is, therefore, every man's part to cleave to this blessed God, who will deliver him from sin and hell, which is blessedness begun, and bring him to salvation and heaven, which is blessedness consummate.

"Qui Deum habet, habent omnia."—AUG.

MCXXXVII.—The just reward of treachery and false dealing.

PHILIP, duke of Austria, paid the ambassadors of Charles IV.—who had betrayed their trust—in counterfeit coin, whereof, when they complained, it was answered that "false coin is good enough for false knaves." James I., king of Scots, was murdered in Perth by Walter, earl of Athol, in hope to have the crown: and crowned he was indeed, but with a crown of red-hot iron clapped upon his head, being one of the tortures, wherewith he ended at once his wicked days and devices. And Guy Faux, that Spanish pioneer, would have received his reward of five hundred pounds at an appointed place in Surrey, but instead thereof he had been paid home with a brace of bullets for his good service, if Justice had not come in with a halter by way of prevention. Thus, traitors have always become odious, though the treason were commodious. Let those kill-Christis and those state traitors, Sheba, Shebna, &c., all disturbers of present government, be never so industrious in contrivance, never so confident in the effecting of their treacherous designs,—let them plot on, whet their wits, beat their brains, associate, confederate, take counsel together, break vows, promises, and covenants, swear and forswear,—yet all shall come to naught; "toto errant cælo (they are heavenly wide)," quite out; they shall miss of their purpose, and meet with disappointment and the just judgments of God upon them and their posterity in the conclusion.

Pare!, Hist. Prov. Jan. Medul.

Boethii Hist. Scot.

In his examination before the L. L. of his Majesty's Council.

Ps. ii. 7.

Trapp's Com. on Prov.

"Quam brevis pœreunt ingentia causis imperium tanto quesitum sanguine;" &c.—CLAUD., 2. Rus.

MCXXXVIII.—The great danger of slighting Church assemblies.

ST. AUGUSTINE, out of the parable concerning the man who fell amongst thieves, and was wounded and left half dead, notes of him that he was going down from Jerusalem to Jericho. From the Church, I warrant you. Jerusalem was the Church of God, the Holy City; Jericho was a cursed place, branded with an ancient curse since the days of Joshua; and thither lay his journey: whereupon St. Augustine notes, "Si non descendisset, fortasse in latrones non incidisset (Had he not been descending and going downward from God and from His Church, peradventure he had not fallen into the hands of thieves);" God would have protected him, the Lord would have safe-guarded him, that no evil should have betided him; but because he was going from the Church to a cursed place, and like enough about a naughty business, therefore God gave him over. As many, therefore, as desire God's protection and blessing, let them resort to the Church to serve and seek Him.

Luke x. 30.

Gore's Serm., Lond.

Ps. lxxxvii. 3.
Josh. vi. 17.

"Templa petas supplex et venerare Deum."—LILIUS, de Moribus.

MCXXXIX.—Conversion of a sinner not wrought all at once.

SUPPOSE it now midnight, and the sun with the antipodes: he doth not presently mount up to the height of our heaven, and make it noonday; but first it is twilight, then the day dawns and the sun rises, and yet looks with weaker eyes before he shines out in his full glory. We do not to-day sweat with summer, and be shaken with the fury of the winter to-morrow; but it comes on with soft paces: the day grows shorter, the sun's force weaker, cold dews and white frosts precede the extremity of hardness. Now, it is most true that Adams' Exposit. on 2. Pet.

Christ is able, in a moment, of sinners on earth to make men saints in heaven, as He wrought upon that dying malefactor. Some may make sudden leaps, and of furious sinners become zealous professors in a trice. Of such we may be charitably jealous; yet non ad altum per saltum—holiness shoots not up, like Jonah's gourd, in a night. God is the God of order, not of confusion; and nature is not suffered to run out of one extreme into another, but by a medium. That ordinary way whereby men walk from the state of sin to the state of glory is the state of grace. So our conversion is by soft and scarcely sensible beginnings, albeit no part after part, yet degree by degree in every part, by gentle soakings in of goodness in every degree, by growing up to maturity and ripeness.

MCXL.—Not to answer one angry word with another.

Dio, in Vitâ Adriani. ADRIAN, the emperor, gave the crier great thanks who, when he was bidden to quiet the tumultuous people with an imperious Σιωπήσατε (Hold your tongues!), he held out his hand only; and when the people listened with great silence, as the manner was, to hear the cry, "Hoc verò, inquit, princeps vult,"—"This is that," said he, "the emperor requires of you, viz., to be silent." And this is the ready way to make all quiet: a soft answer pacifies wrath. It was Abigail's gentle apology that disarmed David's fury, and Gideon's mild and modest answer that stilled the hot and hasty Ephraimites. Lay but a flint upon a pillow, and you break it easily, but hard to hard will never do the deed. It is not the vieing one angry word with another: grievous words stir up strife; harsh and angry words cast oil upon the flame, set the passions afloat, and then fertur equis auriga, there is no hope, not one wise word to be expected.

MCXLI.—The completest armed man of war naked without God's protection.

Junius, in Iocum. It is said that Moses saw the people were naked after their great sin. How naked?
Exod. xxxii. 25. "Non veste sed gratia et præsidio Dei (They were naked, not so much for want of clothes, arms, and other furniture of war, as for want of grace, favour, and protection of God Almighty);" and no doubt, as one very well observeth, "si tunc irruissent hostes (if their enemies had then fallen upon them, they had most shamefully foiled them)." Then let those who are soldiers and men of war, if they desire that their warfare should prosper, and that God should cover their heads in the day of battle, let them be sure of the goodness of their cause, that their quarrel be pro veris et licitis (for things true and lawful), that they seek to God before they set upon their enemies; for let a man be never so well clothed, never so well armed and weaponed, if he be stripped of God's protection by sin, he lies naked and open to all disasters whatsoever.

MCXLII.—Works of mercy very rare to be found amongst us.

Harris's Serm., There is a kind of almanacs, such as stationers call blanks, full of letters red and black on the one side, but on the other side there is fair paper—a waste empty page, to write whatsoever a man pleaseth; though seldom it is that any word of God be there inserted. Such are the day-books that most men keep: on the one side you shall find, item so much spent upon pride, and so much played away at game; so much upon revenge, so much upon hawks, so much upon hounds, and so much upon something else that sounds somewhat near that way; but when it comes to a work of mercy—what hath been done for God, what for Christ, what for His poor distressed members, what for the advancement of religion, or any pious work or service—oh, then the book appears blancatus quasi lilius (a mere blank); ciphers, or little else to purpose, are to be seen in it.

MCXLIII.—Eloquence not to be abused.

EDWARD, duke of Buckingham, being dispatched with instructions from the court, came to the city of London, and there, at a common hall, spake largely on the behalf of that usurper, Richard III. But all the commendations that he got for his labour was, that no man could deliver so much bad matter in so good words and quaint phrases; "eloquentie satis, sapientie parum (that he showed a great deal of wit, but little wisdom in so doing)." Thus it is that the tongue was given to a better purpose. It was David's glory, and he used it accordingly. Eloquence, wisely ordered, is very commendable, and availeth much. "The tongue of the wise useth knowledge aright"—i. e., deals kindly with her, offers her no abuse by venting her unseasonably, and making her over-cheap and little set by. But eloquence abused fits the pulpit with words rather than matter, and makes others that—more is the pity—might better improve their education, instead of Christian lawyers, become heathen orators; so that it may well be termed the attorney-general, that makes a good cause seem bad, and a bad far better than in truth it is.

Sir Thomas More, in Vita.

Prov. xv. 2.

Cartwright, in Latin.
"Optima est eloquentia, quæ non ostentat ingenium docentis sed rem optissimam," &c.—AUG., in Simili.

MCXLIV.—The poor debtor's comfort.

THERE came a man of God to Amaziah, and forbids him that by no means he should take the Ephraimites into the battle against the Edomites, because God was not with them. "Oh, but then," says Amaziah, "what shall I do for the hundred talents which I gave them for their help?" (every talent of silver being worth £375, and that of gold £4500—a very considerable sum). "No matter," says the prophet, "cannot God give thee more than this?" So it may be said to all who tremble at the inundation of debt that is upon them, that are perplexed and entangled in a labyrinth of engagements, so that they can see no out-gate, no passage, no way to escape. God, if He be truly sought unto, can give a happy issue, more than the debt comes to—can do more than they are aware of. When they know not how to be delivered, when they know of no evasion, nor have any means or power in their view, let but earnest prayer be joined with frugality, skill, and industry, and they are sure to be delivered.

2 Chron. xxv. 9.

"Providebit Deus."

"In monte videbitur Jehovah."

MCXLV.—Works of mercy not to be put off from one to another.

IT is usual, that when men meet together at a tavern or alehouse, upon some occasions, by way of kindness, to drink or feast together, then happy is that man, when the reckoning is brought, that can be rid of his money first: "I'll pay," says one; "I'll pay," says another; "You shall not pay a penny," says a third, "I'll pay all," &c.; and so it grows sometimes very near unto a quarrel, because one man cannot spend his money before another. Thus in works of kindness and merry-making, but come to a work of mercy, how is it then? Is the money upon the table? Is every man ready to throw down, and make it a leading case to the rest of the company? No such matter; one puts it off to another: "Alas! I am in debt," says one; "I have no money about me," says another; then every finger is a thumb, and it is such a while before anything will be got out, that it would trouble any one to behold it. Then the question is not who shall be first, but who shall be last. A sad thing that, in way of courtesy, any man should be thus free, and when it comes to a work of mercy, thus bound up.

Harris's Serm., Lond., 1642.

"Quum nemini obtrudi potest itur ad inferiores."

MCXLVI.—God to be feared in His judgments.

IT is said of Queen Elizabeth, she was so reserved, that all about her stood in a reverent awe of her very presence and aspect; but how much more of her least frown and check, wherewith some of them, who thought they might best presume of her favour, have been so Camden's Elizabet.

suddenly daunted and panic-stricken, that they could not lay down the grief thereof but in their graves. One of these was Sir Christopher Hatton, lord chancellor, who died of a flux of urine, with grief of mind; neither could the queen, having once cast him down with a word, raise him up again, though she visited and comforted him in the time of his sickness. Oh, but when the lion roars, shall not the beasts of the forest tremble? Shall the judgments of God be abroad in the world, and the people not learn righteousness? Shall the frowns of any mortal wight be matter of discontent, and shall the angry countenance of the immortal God be passed by unregarded? It must not be. He that was, and is, wonderful, the Councillor, made it out for comfortable advice, "Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear Him which is able to destroy both body and soul in hell."

Amos iii. 8.

Isa. xxvi. 9.

Isa. ix. 6.

Matt. x. 28.

MCXLVII.—Conscience to be looked on as a register of all our actions.

Acts and Mon.

Carpenter's Sermon, Taunton, 1628."Conscientia est codex in quo pec-cata quotidiana scri-buntur."—BERN., in Cant.

It is recorded of that reverend martyr, Bishop Latimer, that he took especial care in the placing of his words before Bonner, because he heard the pen working in the chimney, behind the cloth, setting down all (it may be more) than he said. So ought we circumspectly to look to all our sayings and doings; for conscience, as a scribe or register, sitting in the closet of our hearts, with pen in hand, makes a diurnal of all our ways, sets down the time when, the place where, the manner how, things were performed, and that so clear and evident, that, go where we will, do what we can, the characters of them shall never be cancelled or razed out, till God appear in judgment.

MCXLVIII.—Trades and occupations, the wisdom of our forefathers in the invention and keeping them up.

Nash, Quaternio.

"Ingenuas didicisse fideliter artes, emol-lit mores, nec sinit
esse feros."—OVID.

It is observable that the Athenian commonwealth prospered so long as the people were in action and employment; but when they once tasted the pleasures of Darius' court and brought home Persian gold, they fell into wantonness, and so to nothing. Whilst the Assyrians did set forth themselves, they flourished; but when Sardanapalus (whom Boccace would have to be the first that brought idleness into the world) began to invert the course of nature, by turning days into nights, and nights into days, in riot and excess, then the commonwealth began to decline. And such was the condition of the Roman state, when they had vanquished the Carthaginians. It was, therefore, the great prudence of our forefathers to find out the knowledge of the liberal arts and sciences, and to institute mechanical trades and occupations, well knowing that it is action which gives a well-being to every living creature, that industry hath raised the most flourishing commonwealths out of the dirt, and idleness levelled them with the dust, and brought them to nothing.

MCXLIX.—Not to rejoice at the afflictions of others.

Acts and Mon.

JOHN DENLY, one of the martyrs in that Marian persecution, being set in the fire, with the burning flames about him, sang a psalm, whereupon Doctor Story commanded one of the tormentors to hurl a faggot at him, but, being hurt therewith upon the face that he bled again, he left his singing, and clapped both his hands upon his face. "Truly," said the scoffing doctor to him that threw the faggot, "thou hast marred a good old song." Yet so it happened, that this Story, after the coming in of Queen Elizabeth, being caught in a mousetrap at Antwerp, was hoisted away for England; and being questioned in parliament for many foul crimes, and particularly for persecuting and burning the martyrs, he denied not (still keeping up his jeering humour) but that once he was at the burning of a heretic at Uxbridge, where he cast a faggot at his face, and set a bush of thorns under his feet to prick him. But he was hanged at Tyburn for all his jesting (being just then new built three-square, after the manner of his three-cornered cap), and so made good that proverb of Solomon, "He that is glad at calamities shall not go unpunished." And thus, he that rejoiceth at the afflictions of others is sick of the devil's disease, ἐπιχαίρεκακία; and such were the Edomites, Ammonites, Philistines, and others of Sion's enemies, that heard of her trouble, and were glad of it. Such were David's adversaries, that wished him evil, and cried, "Aha, aha!" and such the Jews, that scoffed at Christ on the cross. But Job was of another spirit: he rejoiced not at the destruction of him that hated him. And so must all good Christians be; otherwise, He that sitteth in the heavens will have them also in derision, and laugh when their fear cometh.

Prov. xvii. 5.

Lam. i. 21.

Ps. xl. 15.

Matt. xxvii. 39.

Chap. xxxi. 29.

MCL.—Cares attendant on the kingly office and men in authority.

It was, no doubt, a sad experience that wrung those words from Cæsar's mouth, when any would name a mass of cares and crosses, "Cogita Cæsarem (Think upon Cæsar)." Ah! little do the shrubs, and they that live in the humble valley of private life, take notice of the loud tempests, or feel those incessant storms which beat upon the cedar, whose exalted top raises it nearer to the lightning and rage of the upper element; they look only upon the glittering matter of a diadem, and the lustre of the jewels set in it, and so apprehend somewhat that may delight the eye; but, could they understand how many cares are lodged and concentrated within the pale and circle of that crown, as a great king said once, "They would scarce take it up for their wearing, though it lay in their way." What are dignities but difficulties? and the rent of labour considered, the good man hath but a hard bargain of his honour. No wonder, then, if the wise man be, as it were, haled out of his privacy to such preferment; for he weighs the charge as well as the credit, the danger more than the gain, and knows his chair of state to be as fickle as Eli's stool, from which he may easily break his neck; that he must drink wormwood in a cup of gold, and lie in a bed of ivory, upon a pillow of thorns; so that he may well say of his glory as one said of his robe, "O nobilem magis, quam felicem pannum!" or as Pope Urban said of his rochet, that he wondered it should be so heavy, being made of such light stuff.

King, Cicentrenis, Inaugurat. Sermon, at Courti, 1640.

Henry IV., Rex
Angliæ.

"Honos onus."

"Sub tenui mem-brana dignitatis, multum latet mali."
—SEN., Ep. 115.

MCLI.—Prayer turning earth into heaven.

It is said of Archimedes, that famous mathematician of Syracuse, who, having by his art framed a curious instrument, that if he could but have told how to fix it, it would have raised the very foundations of the whole earth. Such an instrument is prayer, which, if it be set upon God and fixed in heaven, will fetch earth up to heaven, change earthly thoughts into heavenly conceptions, turn flesh into spirit, metamorphose nature into grace, and earth into heaven.

Venatorius, In Ep.
ad Senat. Norimberg.

MCLII.—To pass by the offences of our brethren.

DAVID was deaf to the railings of his enemies, and as a dumb man, in whose mouth was no reproof; Socrates, when he was abused in a comedy, laughed at it; when Polyargus, not able to bear such an indignity, went and hanged himself; Augustus slighted the satires and bitter invectives which the Pasquils of that time invented against him, and when the senate would have further informed him of them, he would not hear them. Thus the manlier any man is, the milder and readier he is to pass by an offence, as not knowing of it, or not troubled at it: an argument that there is much of God in him—if he do it from a right principle—who bears with our infirmities, and forgives our trespasses, beseeching us to be reconciled. When any provoke us, we use to say, "We will be even with him;"

Ps. xxxv.

Varinus.
Phavorinus.

Jelian.

Sueton., In Vita.

"Existimandus ille præstantissimus, injurias qui ferre novit plurimas."

"Si vindicare vis, sile, et funestum dedisti plagam."
—CHAS., in Matt.

but there is a way whereby we may not only be even, but above him, and that is—forgive him. We must see and not see, wink at small faults especially. “Qui nescit dissimulare, nescit vivere (He who cannot dissemble is not fit to live),” may, with some grains of allowance, pass current.

MCLIII.—Kingdoms and commonwealths, their successions from God.

Eutropii Hist.; lib. vii.

Fenestella, de Ma- gistr., cap. 4.

THE Romans, closing in with that permanent error of mankind, to mistake the instruments and secondary agents in God's purposes for the main efficient, were wont variously to distinguish the derivation of their empire—as by force, so Julius Cæsar was invested; by the senate's election, so Tiberius; by the soldiers, so Severus; and by inheritance, so Octavius Augustus. But most true it is that, to what means soever they imputed their emperors, were it birth or election, conquest or usurpation, it is God who gives the title to kingdoms and commonwealths by the first, and it is He also who directs and permits it by the last.

MCLIV.—The whole heart to be given to God.

Stapleton's Prompt.
Morale.

1 Cor. v. 7.

2 Cor. vi. 16.

1 Cor. vii. 29-31.

Cor., Cultus Omni- potentis Regis.
1 Kings iii. 26.

SOME great king or potentate, having a mind to visit his imperial city, the harbinger is ordered to go before and mark out a house suitable to his retinue; and finding one, the master of that house desireth to have but some small chamber, wherein to lodge his wife and children. It is denied. Then he entreats the benefit of some by-place, to set up a trunk or two, full of richer goods than ordinary. “No,” says the harbinger, “it cannot be; for if your house were as big again as it is, it would be little enough to entertain the king and all his royal train.” Now, so it is that every man's body is a temple of God, and his heart the sanctum sanctorum of that temple. His ministers are sent out into the world to inform us that Christ is coming to lodge there, and that we must clear the rooms, that this great King of glory may enter in. “Oh,” says the old man—carnal yet, but in part renewed—“give me leave to love my wife and children.” No, it cannot be; having wife and children, he must be as having none. Then he desires to enjoy the pleasures of the world. That is denied too. He must use this world as if he used it not. Not that the use of these things is prohibited; not that the comfortable enjoyment of our dearest relations is any way to be infringed; but the extraordinary affection to them, when they come into competition with the love that we owe unto God; for He will have the whole heart, the whole mind, the whole soul,—and all little enough to entertain Him, and the graces of His Holy Spirit, which are attendant on Him. “Nec mihi nec tibi, sed dividatur,” was the voice of a strange woman, and such is that of this present world; but God will take nothing to halves: He will have the whole heart or nothing.

MCLV.—The good Christian's comfort in time of the Church's trouble.

Schulteti Annales.

Calvini Ep. et Resp.,
P. 53

MARTIN LUTHER, perceiving the cause of the Church to go backward, puts pen to paper and writes to the Elector of Saxony, where, amongst other expressions, this was one: “Sciat celsitudo tua, et nihil dubilet, &c. (Let your Highness be sure that the Church's business is far otherwise ordered in heaven than it is by the emperor and states at Norimberg).” And “Gaudeo quod Christus Dominus est, &c. (I am glad that Christ is King, for otherwise I had been utterly out of heart and hope, upon the view of the Church's enemies),” saith holy Myconius, in a letter to Calvin. Thus, it staggers many a good Christian, at this day, to see Zion in the dust, the Church under foot, the hedge of government and discipline broken down, all the wild beasts of heresy and schism crept in; such as labour to root out true religion, to dethrone Christ, and to set up the idle fancies and enthusiastical conceits of their own fanatic brains; some crying out against the Church with those Edonites, "Down with it! Down with it, even to the very ground!" others casting dirt upon her harmless ceremonies. But let the Church's friends rest assured that God sees and smiles, and looks and laughs at them all; that the great counsel of the Lord shall stand when all is done; that Christ shall reign in the midst of His enemies; and that the stone cut out of the mountain without hands shall bring down the golden image with a vengeance, and make it like the chaff of the summer floor.

Ps. cxxxvii. 7.

Ps. ii. 4.
Prov. xix. 21

Dan. ii. 35.

MCLVI.—The sad condition of people under tyrannical government.

It was a just complaint of Draco's laws in Lacedemonia, that their execution was as sanguine as their character, for they were written in bloody letters; and the Romans lamented the cruelty of those tribunals where the cheap proscription of lives made the judgment-seat little differ from a shambles—a man made offender for a word; poor men sold for shoes; or as the Turks, at this day, sell heads, so many for an asper. Such is the condition of people under tyrannical government, under such as make low account of men's lives, who destroy where they might build hopes of amendment, and down with root and branch where they need but pare the leaf. Such, in discharge of their place, are governed more by custom than conscience, who take dark circumstance and lame surmise for evidence, rashly giving sentence and as precipitately proceeding to execution.

King's Inaug. Sermon at Court, 1640.

Isa. xxix. 21.

Amos ii. 6.

MCLVII.—Graces of God's Spirit not given in vain.

THE husbandman, the more he improves his ground, the greater crop he looks for; the completer the soldier is armed, the better service is required of him; the scholar that is well instructed must show great fruits of his proficiency. Thus, the earthly part of man soaks in the sweet showers of grace that fall upon it. The blessed Spirit of God puts upon us that panoplia (that whole armour of God); and the same Spirit teacheth us all things, leads us into all truth, and brings all things to our remembrance which Christ hath spoken for our good. Shall we, then, being thus manured, thus armed, thus instructed, not bring forth fruits in some measure answerable to so great indulgence? Shall such blessings of God be received in vain? It must not be. We may read these and the like expressions in Scripture: "Occupy till I come," "Give an account of thy stewardship," "To whom much is given much is required." What is the meaning? "Cum crescent dona, rationes etiam crescent donorum" (We must give an account, as well of graces received from God—whether they be those summer graces of prosperity, joy, and thanksgiving; or those winter graces of adversity, patience and perseverance; or the grace of humility, which is always in season—as of sins, of what kind soever, committed against Him)."

Stapletoni Prompt. Mor.

Eph. vi. 1.
John xiv. 26.

Luke xix. 13; xvi. 2, 12.

Greg., in Evang.
Hom. ix.

MCLVIII.—Sacrilege justly rewarded; to take heed of committing it.

It was a sudden and sad end that befel Cardinal Wolsey, whilst he sought more to please his sovereign than his Saviour; and the revenging hand of God pursued his five chief agents, who were most instrumental for him in his sacrilegious enterprise. One of them killed his fellow in a duel, and was hanged for it; a third drowned himself in a well; a fourth fell from a great estate to extreme beggary; Doctor Allen, the last and chiefest of them, being archbishop of Dublin, was cruelly slain by his enemies. "Utinam his et similibus exemplis," &c., saith the author of this story. I would men would take heed by these and the like examples how they meddle with things consecrated to God; for if divine justice so severely punished those that converted Church goods (though not so well administered) to better uses doubtless—and why? but because they did it out of selfish and sinful self-

Acts and Mon.

Schulteti Annales,
tom. ii.

"Quis enim laicos inipune putaret esse Deos?"— LUCAN.

interested principles and ends--what shall become of such as take all occasions to rob God, that they might enrich themselves? "Spoliantur ecclesiæ et scholæ," &c., was Luther's complaint of old (Parishes and churches are polled and robbed of their maintenance, as if they meant to starve us all).

MCLIX.—The comfortable resurrection of God's poor despised people.

Balcanquel's Serm.,
Lond., 1623.

"Par est, ut sicut omnis creatura lu-gubre doluit," &c.
—AUG., in Serm.
de Pasc.

WHEN we see one in the streets, from every dunghill, gather old pieces of rags and dirty clouts, little would we think that of those old rotten rags, beaten together in the mill, there should be made such pure fine white paper as afterwards we see there is. Thus, the poor despised children of God may be cast out into the world as dung and dross, may be smeared and smutted all over with lying amongst the pots; they may be in tears, perhaps in blood, both broken-hearted and broken-boned; yet, for all this, they are not to despair, for God will make them one day shine in joy, like the bright stars of heaven, and make of them royal, imperial paper, wherein He will write His own name for ever.

MCLX.—Conversion of a sinner matter of great rejoicing.

Gen. xxi. 8.

Stapletoni Prompt.
Moral.

"Majus de pecca-tore corversio, quam de justo stante gaudium," &c.—
GREG., Hom. xxxiv.

2 Cor. v. 17.

Eph. ii. 6.

It is observable that Abraham made a feast at the weaning of his son Isaac; not on the day of his nativity, not on the day of his circumcision, but on that day when he was taken from his mother's breast, from sucking of milk to taste of stronger meat. This made a festival in Abraham's family, and may very well make a feast in every true repentant sinner's heart: "Nascimur carnales, ab lactamur spirituales (We are all of us conceived and born in sin, and with our mother's milk have sucked in the bitter juice of corrupt nature);" but when it comes so to pass that, by the special illumination of God's Holy Spirit shining into our hearts, we are weaned from the things of this world, and raised up to those things which are at God's right hand, that we are new creatures, new men, &c., this hath always been matter of great rejoicing to the angels of heaven, and must needs be the like to every sinner that is so converted.

MCLXI.—Children's Christian instruction, the great benefit thereof.

Aldrov., de Quad- ruped.

"Si parentes boni bene instruant filios, ipsos serva-bunt."—CHRYS., in Heb.
Deut. vi. 7.

It is reported of the harts of Scythia, that they teach their young ones to leap from bank to bank, from rock to rock, from one turf to another, by leaping before them, which otherwise they would never practise of themselves, by which means, when they are hunted, no man or beast can ever overtake them. So, if parents would but exercise their children unto godliness, principle them in the ways of God whilst they are young, and season their tender years with goodness, dropping good things by degrees into their narrow-mouthed vessels, and whetting the same upon their memories by often repeating, Satan, that mighty hunter, should never have them for his prey, nor lead them captive at his will: they would not be young saints and old devils, as the profane proverb hath it, but young saints and old angels of heaven.

MCLXII.—The joys of heaven not to be expressed.

Dion. Carthusian., de 4 Nevisim., part iv., art. 10, in fine.

ST. AUGUSTINE tells us, that one day, while he was about to write something upon the eighth verse of the thirty-sixth Psalm, "Thou shalt make them drink of the rivers of Thy pleasures," and being almost swallowed up with the contemplation of heavenly joys, one called unto him very loud by his name, and inquiring who it was, he answered: "I am Jerome, with whom in my life-time thou hadst so much conference concerning doubts in Scripture, and am now best experienced to resolve thee of any doubts concerning the joys of heaven; but only let me first ask thee this question, Art thou able to put the whole earth and all the waters of the sea into a little pit? Canst thou measure the waters in thy fist? and mete out heaven with thy span? or weigh the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance? If not, no more is it possible that thy understanding should comprehend the least of those joys." And certainly the joys of heaven are inexpressible; so says St. Paul. The eye may see far; it may reach the stars, but not the joys of heaven: the ear may extend itself a great deal further than the eye, as to know the glory of all the monarchies that are past, the glory of all things that now are, and all the things that are foretold shall be, and yet our ears have never heard of anything like this joy: but the understanding apprehendeth things that are and are not, and by a divine power calleth things that are not as if they were (disputat de quolibet ente et non ente); it imagineth mountains of gold, and heaven to be a place of infinite joy, and yet the heart of man cannot comprehend this joy. Such are the great expressions of the impossibility of expressing it at all.

1 Cor. ii. 9.

"Hic locus est quem si verbis audacia detur," &c. —OVID, Mét., lib. i.

MCLXIII.—Love to be preserved with all men.

WHEN the King of Babylon sacked Jerusalem, it was observable that, whereas the priests might have had what they pleased, yet they preserved only the fire of the sanctuary, and hid that in a pit; because this fire, as it is said, came down from heaven upon the first Mosaical sacrifice, and was kept to that day. Thus must we do with love (that divine spark of a far greater flame, which, streaming from God, hath, by the illumination of His Holy Spirit from the beginning of the world, warmed the sons of men). "Above all these things," says the apostle, "put on charity, love friends, love enemies, love all;" "Amicum in Domino, inimicum pro Domino (Love our friends in the Lord, our foes for the Lord);" so that whatsoever else we do amiss, as in many things we sin all, admit the opinions and judgments of men be different from ours, yet let not us differ in affection, but keep up and maintain love one towards another.

2 Macc. i. 19.

"Dilige et fac quicquid voles,"—AUG., de Verb. Dom.

Col. iii. 14.

St. Augustin, Confess., lib. ix., cap. 4.

MCLXIV.—Every man to labour that he may be a new creature.

WE look upon guns and printing as new inventions: the former found out by Birchtoldin, the monk, in 1380; the other, by one Faustus, a friar, in 1446. Others say that John Gutenberg, a German, was the first inventor thereof; but, for certain, the first press was set up at Mentz, and the first book there imprinted was "Tully's Offices." Afterwards, one Conradus set up a press at Rome; Nicholas Jenson added much to the art; and William Caxton, a merchant, free of the Company of Mercers, London, propagated the same in England, in the reign of King Edward IV., having his work-house in the Sanctuary, near the Abbey of Westminster. Now, the author of the "Belgic Commonweal" will have one Laurence Jans, a rich citizen of Harlem, in the Low Country, to precede all these, and sets out the manner how: that he was walking forth one day into the neighbouring woods for recreation, and began to cut in pieces of wood the letters of his name, printing them on the back of his hand, which, pleasing him well, he cut three or four lines, which he beat with ink and printed them upon paper, wherewith he was much joyed, and determined to find out another kind of ink more fastening, and so with his kinsman, one Thomas Peters, found out another way to print whole sheets, but of one side only, which are yet to be seen in the said town. Yet, for all this, it is said that the Chinese had the use both of guns and printing long before we in these Western parts had any notice of them. Why, then, should Christians so eagerly hunt after novelties, when Solomon, by the Spirit of God, sends a peremptory challenge to all mankind, "Is there anything whereof it may be said, This is new?"

Funccii Chronologia.

Polyd., Virgil, de Invent. Rerum.

Zuinger, Theatrum Hum. Vitæ.

Belgic Commonwealth, p. 57.

Trapp, Comment. on Eccles.

Eccles. i. 10.

Isa. lxii. 2.
Eph. ii. 14.
Ps. xci. 11.
Isa. lxii. 11.
1 John ii. 8.
Heb. x. 20.
John xiv. 12.

Let every one, then, labour to get spiritual eyes, to behold the beauty of the new creature, the bravery of the New Jerusalem, get into Christ, that he may be a new creature, and so he shall have a new name, a new spirit, new alliance, new attendance, new ways, new work, a new commandment, a new way to heaven, and new mansions in heaven.

MCLXV.—Under-agents and instruments to be looked unto in matters of justice.

Carpenter's Serm., Taunton, 1623.

A CLOCK, let it be of never so good metal and making, will not strike orderly and truly, but much therein will be out of frame and fashion, if the lesser wheels, as well as the greater, keep not their due and regular motion. So, in the curious clockwork of justice, there will be many exorbitances (albeit the chief agents and movers therein be never so sound in their integrity) if the under-agents and instruments of justice (as witnesses in proving the action, councillors in pleading and prosecuting the cause, jurymen in sifting and censuring the evidences and allegations) do not also take care, and make conscience in discharge of their several duties.

MCLXVI.—Remedy against vain glory.

Pliny, Hist., lib.
iii., cap. 10.

"Spartan nactus hanc orna."

"Procul absit gloria vulgi."—TIBULL.

THE naturalists observe that the eagle, building her nest on high, is much maligned by a kind of venomous serpent, called parias, which, because it cannot reach the nest, makes to the windward and breathes out its poison, that so the air may be infected and the eagle's chickens destroyed; but, by way of prevention, the eagle, out of a natural instinct, keeps a kind of agate stone in her nest, which, being placed still against the wind, preserveth her young ones from infection. Thus, with the like care and industry, we must labour to preserve the honour of any good work that we do, keep up the credit of any religious act that we perform; and, lest the devil should taint them, and make us famam aucupari (to hunt after the applause of men), we must place Christ and the glory of God betwixt our good works and the noisome breath of man's flattery and commendations.

MCLXVII.—The sad condition of a worldly-minded man at the time of death.

Burrough's Serm. on Pr. xvii. 14.

Rogers, Treat. of Lev.

Jer. xvii. 11.

"Res suas cum mortuis divites," &c.—
GREG., Hom.

It is reported of a wretched rich man, who, when he heard that his sickness was deadly, sent for his bags of money, and hugged them in his arms, saying, "Oh, must I leave you! oh, must I leave you!" and of another, who, when he lay upon his sick bed, called for his bags, and laid a bag of gold to his heart, and then bade them take it away, saying, "It will not do; it will not do!" a third, also being near death, clapped a twenty-shilling piece of gold in his mouth, saying, "Some wiser than some; I'll take this with me, however." Now, if these men's hearts had been ripped up after they had been dead, there might have been certainly found written in them, "The god of this present world!" A sad condition, wherein may be seen the corruption of nature discovering itself. When men are so wedded to the things of this world that they do, as it were, incubare divitiis (sit hatching upon their riches), as the partridge upon her young (especially if gotten by their own industry), then they think much to be divorced from them by death, and to leave them to others, to whom many times they know not, and usually to them that will never give thanks for them.

MCLXVIII.—Not to regard what men say ill, if conscience say well.

It was a good saying of one, that in those days was known to be an able speaker, when he was to make his reply to some that had unjustly maligned him: "I will rest," said he, "henceforward in peace, in the house of my own conscience; and if I do any good deeds, it is no matter who knows them; if bad, knowing them myself, it is no matter from whom I hide them; they will be recorded before that Judge, from whose presence I cannot flee. If all the world applaud me and He accuse me, their praise is in vain." And thus let every man, in all his intents, projects, and ends, as a conscionable Christian, look to the Lord, as the Searcher of his heart and Regarder of his work, not caring for the howling of dogs, the slanderous reports of lewd and wicked men, so as the little bird within sings clear; not discouraging himself at whatsoever men think or speak of him and his doings, so as God and his conscience do approve them; nor contenting himself with men's approbation, when the testimony of God's Word and his own conscience gainsay them.

Secretary Cecil.

"Hic murus aheneus esto. Nil conscire sibi."—VIRG.

MCLXIX.—All sin to be repented of, and the reason why.

IF seven thieves shall enter a man's house, and, six of them being overcome, the seventh lie lurking in some secret corner, the master of that house cannot but sleep in danger; and a bird falling into a snare, or a mouse being taken in a trap, if the one be but held by the claw, or the other by the end of the tail, they are both in as much danger as if their whole bodies were surprised. Thus it is that all sin, and the least sin, must be repented of. Pharaoh, being smitten with many plagues, is willing at last to let the people go, so as they would leave their sheep and their cattle behind them. "No," says Moses, "that cannot be; all the flocks and herds shall go along with us, nè ungula quidem (not a hoof shall be left)." And Satan, like Pharaoh, would keep something of sin in us, which may be as a pledge of our returning to him again; though sin be taken away, yet he would have the occasions of sin to remain. "Leave gaming," says he, "but let not the cards and dice be burnt; thou mayest cease to be a fornicator, but do not pull out thy wanton eye; thou must not hate thine enemy, yet what necessity is there that thou shouldst love him?" This is the voice of Satan. But God bespeaks the sinner after another manner: He will have all sin to be repented of; non remanebit ungula (not so much as the occasion of sin shall remain); which, if it do, Satan will make a re-entry, and then the end shall be worse than the beginning.

Stapletoni Prompt. Morale.

Exod. x. 24-26.

MCLXX.—Public worship of God not to be entered upon without due preparation.

AMONGST many other rites and ceremonies of the Jews, it is related, that before the doors of their synagogues they had an iron plate, against which they wipe and make clean their shoes before they enter; and that, being entered, they sit solemnly for a season, not once opening their mouths, but considering who it is with whom they have to do. Thus it was of old; but of late, though they come to the synagogues with washen hands and feet, yet, for any show of devotion or elevation of spirit, they are as reverent, saith one that was an eye-witness, as grammar boys are at school when their master is absent. This is the Jewish garb of outward devotion, and it is to be wished that Christians were not faulty therein. As to the matter of preparation, how do most men and women rush into the public service of God, quam in haras sues (as hogs into their styes), without any preparation at all? "Keep thy foot," says Solomon, "when thou enterest into the house of God;" that is, keep thy senses and affections, with all manner of custody, from the mire of wicked and worldly pollutions; take up some time to trim up thy soul, and rush not out of the crowd of worldly Margarita, de Ritu-bus Judæorum.

Menochius, de Rep.

Sand's Relation of Relig. in West. Paris.

Eccles. v. 2.

Ps. lxxiv. 10.

employments into the Church of God ; come thither with the first, and stay there till the last, as door-keepers used to do, which, in David's estimate, was an office of high preferment. And then, when thou art there, let thy deportment be as in God's presence, being ready to hear and obey what shall be proposed for thy soul's good.

MCLXXI.—Man to be a sociable, communicable creature.

Bugg's Serm.,
Coventry, 1612.

Aristotle.

THE members of the body were made to do one another service ; the stones in an arched building were to support each other ; and woman was made to be a help meet to man, mutually communicating and participating weal or woe, for better or for worse. So should each man be one to another, ζῶον πολιτικόν, and not πολεμικόν (a rational, not a wrangling creature), to bear and forbear one another, to cast his garment over his brother's nakedness, and not to turn that sacred ditty, "Homo homini Deus," into that hideous voice and baleful croaking, "Homo homini demon ;" instead of helping one another, to destroy each other.

MCLXXII.—Papists and sectaries seducing their followers.

Polyænus, lib. ii.

Jewell, against Harding, in Preface.

PLUTARCH, in the "Life of Agesilaus," king of Lacedæmonia, maketh mention how that, being to draw his army into the field, and the better to embolden them to fight, with a certain juice wrote this word, victoria, in the palm of his hand ; and afterward, being at his devotions, as the manner of the heathens then was, he laid his hand so written closely and secretly upon the heart of the sacrifice, and printed on it the said word victoria, and immediately showed the same to his captains and soldiers, as if it had been written by the gods. The simple soldiers, not understanding the policy, and thinking the whole matter had been wrought by miracle, grew full of courage, not doubting but that their gods that had written victory would also give them victory. By the like policy, and to the like purpose, do the Papists and sectaries deal with their miserably seduced followers : what they cannot do by strength they make out in craft ; and what they want in reason they make up in words. Let Scripture be never so clear, arguments never so full, and authorities of fathers, councils, and learned men never so put against them, they cry "Victoria !" all is on their side ; it must be as they say, so that there is no truth like their gloss, and no presumption like their invention, whereby their followers are foully abused, whilst victory, not truth, is the thing that they contend for.

MCLXXIII.—Not the length, but the fervency, of prayer required.

Plutarch, in Vita.Contra Turrianum, lib. ii."Non tam multum, sed tam bene."

Eccles. v. 2.

Hosea xiv. 2.

It is said of Alcibiades, that he was λαλεῖν ἄριστος, λέγειν δὲ ἀδύνατος (one that could talk much, but speak little ; but, "O quam multa quam paucis (Oh, how much in a little) !" said Tully of Brutus's epistle. On the other side, "Corniculæ citius in Africa, &c. (That jackdaws are sooner to be found in Africa than anything of worth in the writings of Turrianus)," was the censure of Berengarius. So may we say of the publican's prayer, much more of the Lord's Prayer, set in flat opposition to the heathenish battologies and vain repetitions of some that would be held good Christians. It is not the length, but the strength of prayer that is required ; not the labour of the lip, but the travail of the heart, that prevails with God. The Baalites' prayer was not more tedious than Elijah's short, yet more pithy than short. "Let thy words, then, be few," saith Solomon, "but full—to the purpose." "Take unto you words," says the prophet, "neither over-curious nor over-careless, but such as are humble, earnest, direct to the point, avoiding vain babblings, needless and endless repetitions, heartless digressions, tedious prolixities, wild and idle impertinencies—such extemporary petitioners as, not disposing their matter in due order by premeditation, and withal being word-bound, are forced to go forward and backward, just like hounds at a loss, and, having hastily begun, they know not how handsomely to make an end.

MCLXXIV.—Division, the great danger thereof.

If two ships at sea, being of one and the same squadron, shall be scattered by storm from each other, how shall they come to the relief of each other? If, again, they clash together, and fall foul, how shall the one endanger the other, and herself too! It was of old the Dutch device, of two earthen pots swimming upon the water, with this motto, "Frangimur si collidimur (If we knock together, we sink together)." And most true it is, that if spleen or discontent set us too far one from another, or choler and anger bring us too near, it cannot be but that intendment or design, whatsoever it be, like Jonah's gourd, shall perish in a moment, especially if the viperous and hateful worm of dissension do but smite it.

Bugg's Serm.,
Coventry, 1618.

"In dissensione
nulla salus conspicitur."—Cass., Com.,
lib. v.

MCLXXV.—Desperation the complement of all sins.

THERE is mention made in Daniel's prophecy (chap. vii.) of four beasts—the first a lion, the second a bear, the third a leopard, but the fourth, without distinction of either kind or sex or name, is said to be very fearful, terrible, and strong, and had great iron teeth, and destroyed and brake in pieces, and stamped under his feet, and had horns, &c. Such a thing is desperation. Other sins are fearful and terrible enough, and have, as it were, the rage of lions and bears and leopards, to spoil and make desolate the soul of man; but desperation hath horns too—horns to push at God with blasphemy, at his brethren with injury, and at his own soul with distrust of mercy. Desperation is a complicated sin, the complement of all sins. The greatest sins are said to be those which are opposed to the three theological virtues, faith, hope, and charity: infidelity to faith, desperation to hope, hatred to charity; amongst which, infidelity and hatred, the one not believing, the other hating God, are in themselves worse: but, in regard of him that sinneth, desperation exceedeth them both, in the danger that is annexed unto it; for "quid miserius misero non miseranti seipsum (what can be more miserable, what more full, than for a poor miserable wretch not to take pity of his own soul)?"

King, in Yonab.

"Desperare, est in infernum descendere."—ISTID., de Sum. Bono.

Thom., Quæst. iii.
art. 3.

Augustin.

MCLXXVI.—A covetous man never satisfied.

It is said of Catiline, that he was ever "alieni appetens, sui profusus (not more prodigal of his own, as desirous of other men's estates)." A ship may be overladen with silver, even unto sinking, and yet compass and bulk enough to hold ten times more. So a covetous wretch, though he have enough to sink him, yet never hath he enough to satisfy him; like that miserable caitiff mentioned by Theocritus, first wishing ("mille meis errent in montibus agni") that he had a thousand sheep in his flock, and when he has them ("pauperis est numerare pecus") he would have cattle without number. Thus, a circle cannot fill a triangle, so neither can the whole world (if it were to be compassed) the heart of man. A man may as easily fill a chest with grace as the heart with gold. "Non plus satiatur cor auro quam corpus aura (The air fills not the body, neither doth money the covetous mind of man)."

Sueton. Cicero, pro
Cæle.

"Semper avarus eget."—HORAT.,
Ep., lib. ii.

Triapp., Cam. en Ecclès.

MCLXXVII.—A true child of God half in heaven whilst he is on earth.

Lorinus, Prefatis
Com. in Ecclies.

Phil. iii. 20.

Bugg's Se-m.,
I.c.d.

TENORIUS, archbishop of Toledo, making question whether Solomon were saved or damned, caused his picture to be drawn in his chapel, half in heaven and half in hell. Now, what was painted of Solomon imaginarily may be said of God's children truly: though they dwell upon earth, yet their burgess-ship is in heaven. Earth is patria loci, but heaven patria juris; just like Irishmen, that are dwellers in Ireland, but denizens of England—half in heaven, and half on earth: in heaven, by their godly life and conversation; in heaven, by reason of their assurance of glory and salvation; but on earth, by reason of that body of sin and death which they carry about them, having the flesh pressing with continual fight and oppressing with often conquest.

MCLXXVIII.—Hope in God the best holdfast.

Plutarch, Paral.,
cap. i.
Justinus, lib. ii.

Sabellicus, lib. iv.,
cap. 6.
Kling, on Jenab.

"Magna tamen
spes est in bonitate Dei."—OVID, de Pont.

FAMOUS is that history of Cynegirus, a valiant and thrice-renowned Athenian, who, being in a great sea-fight against the Medes, spying a ship of the enemy's well manned and fitted for service, when no other means would serve, he grasped it with his hands to maintain the fight, and when his right hand was cut off, he held close with his left, but both hands being taken off, he held fast with his teeth, till he lost his life. Such is the holdfast of him that hopes in God: dum spirat sperat (as long as there is any breath he hopes). The voice of hope is according to her nature: spes mea Christus (God is my hope). In the winter and deadeast time of calamity, hope springeth, and cannot die—nay, she crieth within herself, "Whether I live or die, though I walk into the chambers of death, and the doors be shut upon me, I will not lose my hope; for I shall see the day when the Lord shall know me by my name again, righten my wrongs, finish my sorrows, wipe the tears from my cheeks, tread down my enemies, fulfil my desires, and bring me to His glory!" whereas, the nature of all earthly hope is, like a sick man's pulse, full of intermission, there being rarely seen sperate miseri on the inscription, but is subscribed, cavete felices.

MCLXXIX.—An account of God's knowledge not to be made out by the wisest of men.

Camdeni Britannia.

"Cujus virtus totum
posse,
Cujus sensus totum nosce."—HILDE-BERT, Poemat.

Adamus, in Vita.

Rom. xi. 33.

THERE is a place in Wiltshire, called Stonehenge, for divers great stones lying and standing there together; of which stones it is said, that, though a man number them one by one never so carefully, yet that he cannot find the true number of them, but finds a different number from that he found before. This may serve to show very well the erring of man's labour in seeking to give an account of Divine wisdom and knowledge; for all his arrows will fall short if he have no other bow but that of reason to shoot in: though his diligence be never so great, his learning never so eminent, and his parts never so many, in making up the reckoning he will be always out, and not be ever able to say, as Martin Luther, when he had been praying in his closet for the good success of the consultation about religion in Germany, "Vicimus, vicimus (We have prevailed, we have prevailed)!" but rather cry out with the apostle, Ὁ βάθος, &c. ("O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways past finding out!")

MCLXXX.—A true child of God, being delivered out of the bondage of Satan, made more careful for the future.

Timberlake's Travels.

It is reported of the Turks, now inhabiting the (some time famous) city of Jerusalem, and having an old prophecy, that the city shall be retaken and entered at the very same place where formerly it was assaulted and conquered, have, in or near that breach, immured all passage, and prevented all probability of entrance again. "Ictus piscator sapit (The burnt child dreads the fire) ; " and a child of God, who, by Satan's malice and overreaching policy, is brought into sin, and, by God's mercy, brought out again, doth pass the remainder of his time more warily ; so that if Satan, his mortal enemy, have heretofore made assault upon his soul, be at the privy door of his heart, by sinful imaginations, he will be sure to keep his heart with all diligence ; if at the too, too open door of his lips, by filthy communication, he will not fail to set a watch before his mouth ; if at his ears, which often prove careless sentinels, by admitting and entertaining idle talk and slanderous reports, he will rather become a deaf man and hear not, than ever that raging and malicious enemy shall foil him at the like advantage.

"Exiguo percussus fulminis ictu. Fortior at posset," &c.—Ovid.

Prov. iv. 23.
Ps. cxli. 3.
Ps. xxxviii. 13.

MCLXXXI.—Riches, beauty, wisdom, &c., in comparison of God, are lying vanities.

AULUS GELLIUS writeth of a vain grammarian, that made himself very skilful in "Sallust's Works;" Apollinaris, to try his skill, met him on a day, and asked him what Sallust meant (if he were so expert in his writings as he professed himself to be) by saying of C. Lentulus that it was a question whether he were more foolish or vain. The interpreter made answer : "The knowledge I take upon me is in ancient words, not those that are common and worn threadbare by daily use; for he is more foolish and vain than Lentulus was who knoweth not that both these words note but one and the same infirmity." Apollinaris, not satisfied with this answer, makes further inquiry, and thereupon concludes that they were called foolish vain men, not such as the people held to be dullards, blockish, and foolish, but such as were given to lying and falsehood, such as gave lightness for weight and emptiness for that which hath not true substance. Thus it is that all the things of this world, described in that triumvirate of St. John, whether they be pleasures, riches, honours, &c., if they once come into competition with the honour of God, they are not only foolish, but lying vanities—such as the covetous man's wedge of gold, the arrogant man's industry, the politic statesman's brains, the confident man's strength, the ambitious man's honour—or anything else that displaceth God of His right, and carrieth out man's heart and hope after it, is a lying, deceitful vanity, empty as the wind, and as fleeting as the mist in the air.

Nect. Attic., lib. xviii., cap. 4.

King, on Jonah.

1 John ii. 16.

Job xxxi. 14.
Hab. i. 6, 7.
Ezek. xxviii. 4.
Isa. xxxvii. 24.
Esther vi.

MCLXXXII.—Joy in the midst of affliction.

It is storied of Andronicus, the old emperor of Constantinople, that all things going cross with him, he took a Psalter into his hand, to resolve his doubtful mind, and opening the same, as it were of that divine oracle to ask counsel, he lighted upon Psalm lxviii. 14 : "When the Almighty scattered kings, they shall be white as snow in Salmon," and was thereby comforted, and directed what to do for his better safety. Now, it is to be understood that Salmon signifies shady and dark ; so was this mount, by the reason of many lofty fair-spread trees that were near it, but made lightsome by snow that covered it. Hence, to "be white as snow in Salmon" is to have joy in affliction, light in darkness, mercy in the midst of judgment ; as, for instance, "In sorrow shalt thou bring forth," saith God to the woman : she shall have sorrow, but she shall bring forth—that is the comfort. Many are the troubles of the righteous—that is the sadness of their condition ; but the Lord will deliver them out of them all—there is their rejoicing. There is no sorrow, no trouble, no temptation that shall take any godly man, but he shall be as snow in Salmon ; God will not suffer him to be tempted above that he is able, but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that he may be able to bear it.

Knolcs' Turk. Hist., 164, citat. 2 Nicoph. Gregor. Hist.

De Muis, in locum.

Gen. iii. 16.

"Dolor hic tibi proderit olim," OVID, Amor., 2.

MCLXXXIII.—Reverent and devout behaviour to be used in the Church of God.

Hist. Genl. Eng.,
lib. v.

ADAMAN, in Bede, tells, in his discourse of holy places, from the mouth of a bishop who had been there, that in a church erected in that place, from whence our Saviour ascended, there rushed annually in those times a silent gale of wind from heaven upon Ascension-day, which forced all those it found standing to fall prostrate on the earth. The story may not be justifiable, yet it is ancient; and it were to be wished that, when we enter into the house, we needed no wind to blow us upon our knees, but that, falling down by the dejection of our bodies, we may rise up again by the exaltation of our souls. Besides, let all men take notice that he which comes thither, as he is without preparation, goes away as he was, without a blessing; and he that prays as if God were not there, when he hath prayed, shall find Him nowhere. We must enter all ear, while God speaks to us; all heart and tongue, whilst we speak to Him; because, if the heart go one way and the tongue another, if we turn God's house into an exchange or stew, by thinking on our gains and lusts, we defile not the temple, as Antiochus did, by painting unclean beasts on the doors without, but by bringing them within, into the body of the place.

Lawrence's Sermon,
Court, 1633.

Josephi Antiq.,
lib. xiii., cap. 16.

MCLXXXIV.—No promise to be made but with reference to God's good pleasure.

Raleigh's Hist. of Ireland.

1 Cor. i.

James iv.

PHILIP threatened the Lacedemonians, that if he invaded their country he would utterly extinguish them. They sent him no other answer back again but this word: "If;" meaning that it was a condition well put in, because he was never likely to appear against them. Thus, St. Paul promised the Corinthians to come by them in his way to Macedonia, and did it not; for he evermore added in his soul that condition, which no man must exclude, "If it stand with the pleasure of God, and He hinder me not;" so that, according to the old verse—

"Si, nisi, non esset, perfectum quidlibet esset."

King's Sermon on Jenab.

If it were not for condition and exception, everything would be perfect; but that cannot be: therefore every man hath his reserve of God's good will and pleasure, to back him in all his promises and undertakings in a good way. So that he who speaketh with condition, as relating to God's mind, may change his mind without suspicion of levity.

MCLXXXV.—All men to be highly affected with the name of Jesus.

Trapp's Com. on Matt.
Welse, in Acts and Mon.

Poems, in Preface.

Phil. ii. 9.

Cicero, in Verrem.

It is said of Johannes Mollius, whensoever he spake of the name of Jesus, his eyes dropped. And another reverend divine, being in a deep muse after some discourse that passed of Jesus, and tears trickling down abundantly from his cheeks before he was aware, being urged for the cause thereof, confessed ingenuously it was because he could not draw his dull heart to prize Christ aright. Mr. Fox never denied beggar that asked in the name of Jesus Christ; and religious Bucer never disregarded any, though different in opinion from him, in whom he could discern aliquid Christi (anything of Jesus Christ). "None but Christ!" says John Lambert at the stake; and "My Master!" says Mr. Herbert, that divine poet, as oft as he heard the name of Jesus mentioned. How, then, should our hearts rejoice, and our tongues be glad! and how should we be vexed at the deadness and dullness of our naughty natures, that are no more affected with the sweetness of the name of Jesus, a name above all names! Σωτήρ—"such a word," saith the heathen orator, "and so emphatical, that other tongues can hardly find a word to express it."

MCLXXXVI.—To attend upon God in His ordinances.

It is usual for ships to ride a long time in a roadstead, when they might be in the haven. And wherefore do they so? Wherefore, but that they may be in the wind's way, to take the first opportunity that shall be offered for their intended voyage. Even thus should all good Christians do: anchor, as it were, in the house of God—even when they seem to be becalmed, that they cannot stir and move themselves about holy duties as they were wont to do, yet even then they should ride it out, hearken what God will say to their souls, wait upon Him in the use of means, not in an anabaptistical frenzy, refusing to attend upon duty till the Spirit moves them, but look up unto God for life, and seek it from Him, in their attendance upon His holy ordinances.

Brinsley's Serm., 11
Yarmouth.

MCLXXXVII.—To see a minister in necessity, matter of great grief.

ANTIGONUS, seeing Cleanthes, a learned philosopher and a painful student, at his book, helping a baker to grind corn at the mill, said unto him, "Molis tu Cleanthe (What, Cleanthes, dost thou grind corn)?" "I?" says he; "I do so, or else I must starve for want of bread: if I do not labour, I must not eat." Antigonus, by this answer, noted a great indignity that those hands should be galled at the mill, wherewith he wrote such excellent things of the sun, moon, and stars. And it must needs be, then, matter of greater grief to any good Christian to see able ministers in necessity, to see what shifts they are driven to (almost like the Popish priests of old, that said dirges for their dinners), who are otherwise able to labour in the Word, and do the work of right good evangelists, idque vitæ sustentandæ causa (not to grow rich thereby, but to put meat in their mouths, and in the bellies of their distressed families).

Diog. Laert., m
Vita.

King's Leet., on Jedah.

MCLXXXVIII.—Baptism renounced by the lewdness of life and conversation.

THE Spanish converts in Mexico remember not anything of the promise and profession they made in baptism, save only their names, which many times also they forget; and in the kingdom of Congo, in Africa, the Portuguese, at their first arrival, finding the people to be heathens and without God in the world, did induce them to a profession of Christ, and to be baptized in great abundance, allowing of the principles of the Christian religion, till such time as the priests pressed them to lead their lives according to their profession, which the most part of them in no ease enduring, returned again to their Gentilism. Such renegadoes are to be found in the midst of us at this day, such as give themselves up to Christ quoad sacramenti perceptionem (by external profession), but when it comes once ad vitæ sanctificationem (to holiness of life), there they leave Him in the open field, forsaking their colours, renouncing their baptism, and running away to the enemy; so that baptism is not unto them the mark of God's child, but the brand of a fool that makes a vow and then breaks it; and better had it been that font-water had never been sprinkled on such a face, than that it should afterwards be hatched (marked) with such impudent impiety.

Brerewood's Enquiries, Acostæ, India Occi-
denti.

Abbot's Geography.

Eccles. v. 4.

MCLXXXIX.—Sinful prayers not heard by God.

A KING of the Saracens, by his ambassador, demanded of Godfrey de Bouillon, then in the holy war, how he had his hands tam doctas ad præliandum (so able to fight); who returned him this answer: "Quia manus semper habui puras, &c. (Because I never defiled my hands with any notorious sin)." Thus it is that men prosper not outwardly, because they

Max. Tyrius.

"Despiciunt orationes leves, diffi-dentes, inanes," &c.
—AUG., in Man.
vi.

look not to themselves inwardly; they pray, and speed not; they lift up their voice, but not holy hands; they pray, but they do not, with the Ninevites, turn every one from the evil of his way and from the wickedness that is in his heart: so that, regarding iniquity in their hearts, God will not hear their prayers. The loadstone loseth its virtue besmeared with garlic, and our prayers with sin: that is the only remora (obstacle) that stops our prayers under full sail to the throne of grace.

Squire's Serm.,
Linda, 1657.

1 Tim. ii. 8.
Jer. iii. 18.
Ps. lxxi. 18.

MCXC.—The blessed guidance of God's Holy Spirit to be implored.

MEMORABLE is that passage betwixt Elisha the prophet and Joash the king of Israel: he directed the hand of the King of Israel to shoot, and the arrow of God's deliverance followed thereupon; and then, so often as he smote the ground, by the appointment also of the prophet, so often, and no longer, he had likelihood of good success. Even so it is the Spirit that must direct our tongues and hearts in all that proceedeth from them, for where He ceaseth to be as a guide, there will that saying of the prophet certainly be verified, "Every man is a beast by his own knowledge." Hence was it that the good old Christians sang "Come, Holy Ghost, eternal God, Comforter of us all," &c.; and so must we, if ever we look for God's assistance to go along with our endeavours.

2 Kings xlii. 15-19.
King's Lect. on Jenab.

"Nulla in discendo mora est, ubi Spiritus sanctus doctrinæ adest."

Ps. lxxiii. 22.

Beda, Hom. ix. in Luc.

MCXCI.—Angels ministering unto God's people for their good.

IN the stories ecclesiastical, there is mention made of one Theodorus, a martyr, put to extreme torments by Julian the apostate, and dismissed again by him, when he saw him unconquerable. Ruffinus, in his history, saith that he met with this martyr a long time after his trial, and asked him whether the pains he felt were not insufferable. He answered, that at first it was somewhat grievous, but after awhile there seemed to stand by him a young man in white, who, with a soft and comfortable handkerchief, wiped off the sweat from his body (which, through extreme anguish, was little less than blood), and bade him be of good cheer, insomuch as that it was rather a punishment than a pleasure to him to be taken off the rack, since, when the tormentors had done, the angel was gone. Thus it is that the blessed angels of God have ministered from time to time to His people—in the days of their distress, it may be, bringing food to their bodies, as once to Elijah, but, certainly, comfort unspeakable to their souls, as to Jacob, Hagar, Daniel, Zacharias, Joseph, Cornelius, Paul, &c., and to our modern martyrs, in their prisons, at the stake, and in the fire. They pity our human frailties, and secretly suggest comfort when we perceive it not: they are as ready to help us as the bad angels are to tempt us: always they stand looking on the face of God, to receive orders for the accomplishment of our good, which they no sooner have, than they readily dispatch, even without weariness of flight.

1 Kings. xix. 5.—
Trapp's Exposit. on Matt.

"Angeli administerium pro nostra salute semper ministrant."—GREG.,
Hom.

Dan. ix. 21.

MCXCII.—Men are apt to be unthankful in prosperity.

IT is said to be the saying of Frederick, the emperor, concerning Signibird Flisk—afterwards called Innocent IV.—advanced by him to the popedom, "I have lost a cardinal, a friend, and have gotten a pope, a foe." It is to be feared that God may say the same of many men: so long as He kept them in a mean estate, they sought unto Him, and He had humble, thankful servants of them; but so soon as He raised them to prosperity, they kicked, and became unworthy, thankless wretches, forgetting themselves and the Rock from whence they were hewn, even God, their great and bountiful Benefactor.

Squire's Serm.,
Lond., 1656.

MCXCIII.—How it is that the strength of imagination prevails so much in matters of religion.

It is observable, that when some men look up to the rack, or moving clouds, they imagine them to have the forms of men, of armies, castles, forests, landscapes, lions, bears, &c., whereas none else can see any such things, nor is there any true resemblance of such things at all; and some, again, there are who, when they have somewhat of rolls and tumbles in their thoughts, think that the ringing of bells, the beating of hammers, the report that is made by great guns, or any other measured, intermitted noise, doth articulately sound and speak the same which is in their thoughts. Thus it is that a strong imagination or fancy becomes very powerful as to persuasion in the matters of God and religion. Hence it is, therefore, that most of those who are unlearned and unstable wrest the Scriptures, thinking they find that in them which, indeed, is not there to be found; persuading themselves that the Scripture represents to them such formed opinions, such and such grounded tenets, when, without all doubt, they do but patch and lay things together without any reason at all; from whence have proceeded the senseless dotages of heretics, visibly recorded by the ancients in older times, and of late the whimsical conceits of some dreamers, who have flown about in their most ridiculous papers, wherein they bring Scripture with them, but no sense, fancying the holy Word of God to strike, to ring, and chime to their tunes, to echo out unto their wild conceptions, and answer all their undigested notions.

Torshel's Design to Harmonize the Bible.

Fienus, de Viribus Imaginationis.

2 Pet. iii. 16.

Aug. Philastrius, de Hæresibus.

Jude 8.

MCXCIV.—Submission to the will of God in all things enjoined.

A PERSONAGE of some note, lying on his death-bed, was desired by some of his friends, then standing by, to speak some observable sentence, to throw out himself in some one good passage or other, to leave behind him one remarkable saying or other, so that, when he was dead and gone, they might remember both it and him. After a while, he spake unto them in the words of St. Peter: "Humble yourselves under the mighty hand of God, that He may exalt you in due time"—an excellent saying, and worthy to be received of all men: that in all straits, under all pressures whatsoever, men should lie down in the dust, submit themselves to the good will of God, and humble themselves under His mighty hand; and then, without all doubt, He will—not when they think it a fit time, but in His own due time, when it shall be most suitable for His glory, and most advantageous for their eternal welfare—ease and exalt them.

Cranford's Serm., Lond., 1649.

1 Pet. v. 6.

MCXCV.—Every day to be looked on as the day of death.

PUT the case that one man should give unto another many loaves of bread, conditioned that he should every day eat one; but if the party should come to know that in one of them lay hid a parcel of deadly poison, yet in which of them it was he should be utterly ignorant, oh, how careful would he be in tasting any of them, lest he should light upon that which might prove his fatal destruction! Thus it is that God hath given unto us many days—to some more, to some less—but in one of these He hath, unknown to us, conveyed the bitter sting of death, and it may so fall out that, in the very day of jovialness, in the day of our greatest rejoicing, a deadly cup of poison may be reached out unto us, Death, like an unbidden guest, may rush in upon us, and spoil all our mirth on a sudden. Oh, how watchful, how diligent should the consideration of these things make every one of us to be! To look upon every day as the day of our death, every breathing the last breathing we shall make; to think, upon the ringing of every passing bell, that ours may be next; upon hearing the clock strike, that there is one hour less to live in, and one step made nearer to our long homes, the house appointed for all living.

Alphons. ab Avendano, in Marr. xxiv.

"Mors in oīā.

MCXCVI.—It is grace, not place, that keeps a man from sinning.

Gen. xix. 30.

Gen. xiii. 7.

"Cælum non animum mutant."

It is said of Lot, that he removed from Zoar to a neighbouring mountain, and dwelt in a cave therein, which is shown to travellers at this day. Now it was that a hole in a hill could hold him and all his family, whose substance formerly was so great, the whole country could not afford room for his flocks and herdsmen, without striving with those of his uncle Abraham; and here it was that he was made drunken by his daughters' practice upon him, with whom he committed incest. So that it is grace, not place, can secure men's souls from sin, seeing Lot, fasting from lust in wanton and populous Sodom, surfeited thereof in a solitary cave; and whilst he carefully fenced the castle of Chastity, even to make it impregnable against the battery of foreign force, he never suspected to be surprised by the treachery of his own family.

MCXCVII.—Every peaceable frame of spirit and confident persuasion of God's love is not a sure testimony that such a one is in the state of grace.

Burgess's Sermon. on John viii. 54.

"Petrus dormit securus."

"Nihil hic nisi verba supersunt."

It is St. Paul's saying of himself, that he was alive without the law, i.e., he had great quietness and ease of mind; all things went well with him; he was cock-a-hoop (exulting), sound and safe; he thought himself in a sure and safe way. But, alas! this was his ignorance, his blindness; just like a man in a dungeon, who thinks himself safe when there are serpents and poisonous creatures round about him, only he doth not see them; or as a man in a lethargy feels no pain, though he be at the selfsame time near unto the gates of death. And such is the condition of many persons: they thank God they have no trouble; their soul is at much ease and quietness; they doubt not of God's favour and love unto them. Hence, in the midst of their afflictions, when they are but, as it were, peeping into the furnace of trial, they will say, "I thank my good God, this is His doing; I will submit thereunto," &c., when, alas! here is nothing but words, no assurance; and it may be said of such, as Christ of the Jews: "You say He is your Father, but you have not known Him;" so they know nothing, powerfully and practically, concerning the mercies of God in Christ Jesus.

MCXCVIII.—True comfort in the Word of God only.

Seneca, de Contritione ad Polybium.

Nero Cæsar.

"Fas tibi non est de fortuna tua conqueri, salvo Cæsare."

Calamy's Godly Man's Ark, Ep. Dred.

"Fas tibi non est conqueri, salvo Deo et promissionibus ejus."

SENECA, going about to comfort his friend Polybius, persuades him to bear his afflictions patiently—and why? but because he was the emperor's favourite—and tells him that it was not lawful for him to complain while Cæsar was his friend. Cold comfort was this—a poor cordial, God wot, to raise up a drooping spirit! Good reason, too; for Cæsar himself, a little while after, was so miserable, so destitute of all outward comforts, that he had not a friend to relieve him in the midst of his greatest extremity, much less was he able to help his friend. Oh, but the sure Word of God affords a better cordial, that which is true comfort indeed: it bids every true child of God not to be over-much dejected under the greatest of afflictions, because he is God's favourite, God's jewel, God's child, God's inheritance; it tells him that it is not lawful for him to complain while God is his Friend, his refuge, his rock of defence, his safeguard, his what-not in the way of relief and succour; and the promises of God are his rich portion and inheritance. So that, like Job, though he lose all that he hath, yet he loseth nothing, because he loseth not his God, in having of whom he hath all things.

MCXCIX.—God afflicting His children for the improvement of their graces.

Wottonus, de Diferentiis Animal.

It is reported of the lioness, that she leaves her young whelps till they have almost killed themselves with roaring and yelling; and then, at the last gasp, when they have almost spent themselves, she relieves them; and by this means they become more courageous. And thus it is that God brings His children into sadness, sorrow,—nay, even into the very deeps of distress. He suffers Jonah to be three days and three nights in the belly of a whale, David to cry out till his throat be dry, His disciples to be all the night in a great storm till the fourth watch; and then it is that He rebuketh the winds, and relieveth His children, by which means He mightily increaseth their patience and dependence upon Him, improveth their graces, and enlargeth their faith and hope in Christ Jesus.

Jonah i. 17.

Ps. lxi. 3.

Matt. xiv. 25.

MCC.—The readiness of God to pardon poor repentant sinners.

It was a custom amongst the ancient Romans, that when the judges absolved any accused person at the bar, they did write the letter A upon a little table provided for that purpose, i. e., "Absolvimus (We absolve him);" if they judged him guilty, they wrote C, i. e., "Condemnamus (We condemn him);" and if they found the cause difficult and doubtful, they wrote N L, i. e., "Non liquet (We cannot tell what to make of it)"—not much unlike unto the term Ignoramus, in our common law, which the grand inquest writes upon a bill of indictment, when they dislike the evidence as defective, or too weak to make good the presentment. But it is otherwise with the all-knowing God with whom we have to do. He cannot be said to be ignorant of the many sins wherewith we provoke Him daily. Abraham may be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not, but He knoweth us, and all things else; He knoweth us to be wretched and miserable; so that He may well write "Condemnamus," and doom us to perpetual torments with the devil and his angels; yet such is His mercy to poor repentant sinners, that He invites and woos them to come in, that they may be saved, and so ready to pass by offences, that, instead of "Condemnamus," He takes up the pen and writes "Absolvimus (My son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee)."

Ascon. Pedianus, in Orat. pro Milone.

Alex. ab Alexandro, Jen. Dierum, lib. lii., cap. 14.

Isa. lxi. 16.

Ps. lxxxv. 5.
Luke vii. 48.

MCCI.—How it is that ministers find so little success of their labours in preaching the Gospel.

As the husbandman, though he should be never so laborious in ploughing, sowing, and fitting the ground, though he be never so careful in providing precious and good seed, yet if the nature of the ground be barren, that it will bear no seed, or cause it to degenerate into cockle, all the labour is in vain; or as the gardener, though he water and dress never so carefully, yet if the tree be dead at the root, it is all to no purpose: so, though the ministers of God are very earnest in praying, preaching, informing, rebuking, yet, when the ground is barren, the tree dead at the root, if the people be of a froward and indisposed temper, if the god of this world hath blinded their eyes, that they do not see nor understand nor feel the power of God working upon their souls, what hope is or can there be of such a people?

Burgess's Serm. on Jer. xxiii. 22.

Augustin, in Pi. liiii., conc. 2.

MCCII.—Christ, the eternal Son of God, properly and significantly called the Word.

John i. 1.

FIRST, because His eternal generation is like the production of a word; for as a word is first conceived in the mind, and proceeds thence without any carnal operation, so the Son of God had His conception in the understanding of the Father, and proceeded thence without any corporal emanation. 2. As a word is immaterial and invisible—for no man can see verbum mentis (the word of our thought)—so Christ is immaterial and invisible, in regard of His Divine nature, for no man hath seen that at any time. 3. As a word, if you take it for verbum mentis, cannot be separated from the understanding, but as soon as there is ὁ νοῦς (the understanding) there must be ὁ λόγος (the word), so Jesus Christ, the second John Howe's Christ God-Man; a Serm., 1656.

Greg. Naz., Orat., li. Id., in Orat., xxxvi. John i. 18.

Zanchius, de 3 El. lib. v., cap. 8. 1 Cor. i. 24.

Person in the blessed Trinity, cannot be separated from the Father, but as soon as ever there was a Father—if it may be so spoken of eternity—there was of necessity a Son, and so He is co-eternal with Him. 4. As a word is not expressed till it be clothed with air and articulated by the instrument of speech, so the Word of God, which is the second Person in the Trinity, was not manifested to the sons of men until He was clothed in flesh and born of the Virgin Mary.

MCCIII.—True Christians are fruitful Christians.

Bp. Hall's Serm.,
Westm., 1614.

Look where you will in God's Book, you shall never find any lively member of God's Church, any true Christian, compared to any but a fruitful tree: not to a tall cypress, the emblem of unprofitable honour; nor to the smooth ash, the emblem of unprofitable prelacy, that doth nothing but bear keys; nor to a double-coloured poplar, the emblem of dissimulation; nor to a well-shaded plane, that hath nothing else but form; nor to a hollow maple, nor to a trembling asp, nor to a prickly thorn, nor to the scratching bramble, nor to any plant whatsoever whose fruit is not useful and beneficial; but to the fruitful vine, the fat olive, the seasonable sapling planted by the rivers of waters. Yet it is most true that the goodly cedars, strong elms, fast-growing willows, sappy sycamores, and all the rest of the fruitful trees of the earth—i. e., all fashionable and barren professors whatsoever—they may shoot up in height, spread far, show fair, but what are they good for? Yes, they may be fit for the forest, the ditches, the hedgerows of the world; not for the true saving soil of God's Israel. That is a soil of use and fruit; that is a place for none but vines, for trees of righteousness, fruitful trees, fruitful Christians. "He that abideth in Me bringeth forth much fruit," saith our Saviour.

Ps. xcii. 12, 13,
and i. 3.

"Arbores sylvæ ad fructificandum storiles, &c. Ad fructum velut ad ultimum finem omnes bonæ arboris partes ordinantur."—PET. BERCHOR.
John xv. 5.

MCCIV.—Christ making Himself and all that He hath over to the good of His Church and people.

Daniel's Hist. Eng.,
lib. i.

WE read in our "Chronicles," that Edmund, surnamed Ironside, in whom England was lost, and Canute, the first Danish king, after many encounters and equal fights, at length embraced a present agreement which was made, by parting England betwixt them two, and confirmed by oath and sacrament, putting on each other's apparel and arms, as a ceremony, to express the atonement (reconciliation) of their minds, as if they had made transaction of their persons to each other: Canute became Edmund, and Edmund, Canute. Even such a change, as it may be said, of apparel is betwixt Christ and His Church, Christ and every true repentant sinner; He taketh upon Him their sins, and putteth upon them His righteousness; He changeth their rags into robes, their stained clouts into cleaner clothing; He arrays them with the righteousness of the saints—that twofold righteousness, imputed and imparted: that of justification, and the other of sanctification: that is an under-coat, this is an upper; that clean and pure, this white and bright; and both from Himself, who is made unto them, not only wisdom, but righteousness, sanctification, and redemption. Yet further: He puts upon His Church His own comeliness, decks His Spouse with His own jewels, as Isaac did Rebecca; clothes her with needlework, and makes her more glorious than Esther ever was, in all her beauty and bravery; rejoiceth over her, as the bridegroom over his bride; yea, is ravished in his love to her, with one of her eyes lifted up to Him in prayer and meditation, with one chain of her neck, that very chain of His own graces in her.

Trapp's Exposit. on Zech. iii.

2 Cor. v. 19.

1 Cor. i. 30.

Cant. iv.

MCCV.—How it is that every man hath one darling sin or other.

Bedæ Axiomata Philosophiæ.

It is a maxim in philosophy, that though all the individuals of one kind agree in one specific nature, yet every one hath a particular difference, whereby it is distinguished from another; which is called heccietiy. And so it is that, though original sin be the seed of all kind of wickedness, and there cannot be an instance given of any horrid crime in the world but this would carry a man unto it, yet this poison in every man vents itself rather in one way than another, so that there may be many sins acted in common by all, yet several men have their several particular corruptions, their Delilahs, their beloved sins, which, like the prince of devils, command all other sins. As in every man's body there is a seed and principle of death, yet in some there is a proneness to one kind of disease more than another that may hasten death, so, though the root of sin and bitterness hath spread itself over all, yet every man hath his inclinations to one kind of sin rather than another; and this may be called a man's proper sin, his evil way, which, unrepented of, will inevitably draw down vengeance upon his head that hath it.

"Trahit sua quemque voluptas."—
VIRGIL.

Budge, s. s. v. in
Jer. xviii. 11.

MCCVI.—How to make a right use of God's promises.

It is said of Tamar, that when Judah, her father-in-law, lay with her, she took as a pledge his signet, bracelets, and staff; and afterwards, when she was in great distress, and ready to be burned as a harlot, she then brought out her staff and signet and bracelets, and said,—"By the man whose these are am I with child!" and thereby she saved her life. So must all of us do: in the time of health, study our interest in the promises of the Gospel; and in time of sickness, live upon that we have so studied. Then it is that we must bring forth the staff, the signet, and the bracelet, produce our evidences, rely and make use of the promises, as so many spiritual props and buttresses, to shore us up and keep us from falling into despair of God's mercies and love unto us in Christ Jesus.

Calamy's Godly Man's Ark, 1657.

"Obsignatis agendum est tabulis."— TERENTIUS.

MCCVII.—God looking upon His Church with a more special eye of providence.

THERE is much waste ground in the world that hath no owner; our globe can tell us of a great part that hath no inhabitant, no name but terra incognita (unknown); but a vineyard was never without a possessor. Come we into some wild Indian forest, all furnished with goodly trees, we know not whether ever man were there; God's hand, we are sure, hath been there, perhaps not man's; but if you come into a well-dressed vineyard or garden, there you may see the hillocks equally swelling, the stakes pitched in a just height and distance, the vines handsomely pruned, the hedgerows cut, the weeds cast out. Now, we are ready to conclude, as the philosopher did when he found figures, "Here hath been a man, and a good husband, too!" Thus it is that, as God's Israel, God's Church is a vineyard, so we may safely conclude that it is God's vineyard, God's Church, God's in a more special manner. It is true that there is a universal providence of God all over the world, but there is a more especial hand and eye of God over His Church; in it God challengeth a peculiar interest. Solomon may let out his vineyard to keepers, but God keeps His Church in His own hands; He may use the help of man, but it must be as tools, rather than as His agents: He works by them, they cannot work but by Him; so that, in spite of the gates of hell, His Church, His vine, shall flourish. Even so return, O God of hosts, look down from heaven, and visit this vineyard of ours, Thy Church, which Thy right hand hath planted, and the Branch which Thou hast made strong for Thyself!

Bp. Hall's Serm.,
Westm., 1634.

Cant. viii. 11.

"Ecclesia quæ per omnes gentes crescit in frumentis Dom. conservata est."—
AUG., in Ep. xlviii.

MCCVIII.—The sad condition of all impenitent sinners.

It is said of Antoninus, archbishop of Florence, that after he had heard the confession of a wretched usurer, he gave no other absolution than this: "Deus miseratur tui, si vult; et

In Summa Tit. de Mansuet. et Uu-rariis.

condonet tibi peccata tua, quod non credo, &c. (God be merciful to thee, if He please; and forgive thee thy sins, which I do not believe; and bring thee to eternal life, which is impossible;)” i. e., “rebus sic stantibus (if God doth not wonderfully work a strange conversion in his heart).” And such and so sad is the condition of every unregenerate man, every impenitent sinner; they are no other than bond-slaves of Satan, firebrands of hell, vessels of wrath, men without God in the world. No wonder, then, that as long as they continue in such a wretched estate, God ceases to be merciful unto them, denies them forgiveness of sins here in this life, and admission into His kingdom of glory hereafter.

Rom. ix. 23.

Eph. ii. 12.

MCCIX.—God, as He is a God of mercy, so He is a God of judgment, and therefore not to be provoked.

Trapp's Exposit. on Zaeb. i.“Læsa patientia fit furor.”

Ps. ii. 12.

Ps. xc. 11.

Heb. xii. 29.

NOTHING so cold as lead, yet nothing more scalding if molten; nothing more blunt than iron, and yet nothing so keen if sharpened; the air is soft and tender, yet out of it are engendered thunderings and lightnings; the sea is calm and smooth, but if tossed with tempests it is rough above measure. Thus it is that mercy abused turns to fury. God, as He is a God of mercies, so He is a God of judgment; and it is a fearful thing to fall into His punishing hands. He is loth to strike, but when He strikes He strikes home; if His wrath be kindled, yea, but a little, woe be to all those on whom it lights; how much more when He is sore displeased with a people or person! “Who knows the power of His anger?” says Moses. Let every one, therefore, submit to His justice and implore His mercy. Men must either burn or turn, for even our God is a consuming fire.

MCCX.—Promises of God, the excellency and comforts that are to be found in them.

Fox's Act. and Men.

1 Tim. i. 15.

Adamus, in Vita.

R. Bolton, of Kettering.

Mr. Edm. Calamy.

1 John iii. 14.

“Promissa sunt pabulum et anima fidei.”—AUG.

It is said of Mr. Bilney, that blessed martyr of Christ Jesus, that being much wounded in conscience by reason of the great sin he had committed, in subscribing to the Popish errors, he was much comforted by reading those words: “This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners,” &c. Thus was Beza supported under his troubles by the words of Christ (John x. 27—29). Mention is also made of one that was upheld under great affliction and comforted from that of Isaiah (Isa. xxvi. 3); of another, in the like condition, from that of the same prophet (Isa. lvii. 15); of a third, a young maid, upon the knowledge of a reverend divine, yet living, that went triumphantly to heaven, by the refreshing she found in that well-known text (Matt. xi. 28). Many, also, are the drooping spirits that have been wonderfully cheered by reading the eighth chapter of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, and by that text of St. John, in his first Epistle: “We know that we have passed from death to life,” &c. And thus it is that great is the excellency, transcendent the comforts, that are to be found in God's promises; they are the good Christian's Magna Charta for heaven, the only assurance that he hath to claim by. There is no comfort—no true, real, virtual comfort—but what is built and founded upon a Scripture promise; if otherwise, it is presumption, and cannot properly be called true comfort. The promises are pabulum fidei et anima fidei (the food of faith and the very soul of faith); they are a mine of rich treasures, a garden full of choice flowers, able to enrich the soul with all celestial contentments, and to sweeten the sourest of conditions. The truth is, there is no promise of God but, if He be pleased to enlighten us, and show us our interest in it, will afford a plentiful harvest of everlasting joy, and that which is true and real contentment indeed.

MCCXI.—The griping usurer and his broker characterised.

It is commonly known that the nether millstone stands or lies still, and stirs not; so the wretched, rapacious, griping usurer sits at home, and spends his time in a kind of diabolical arithmetic, as numeration of hours, days, and moneys, subtraction from other men's estates, and multiplication of his own, until he have made division between his soul and heaven, and divided the earth to himself, and himself—if God be not the more merciful—to a worse place. And for his broker, he is not much unlike the upper millstone, without which the nether may seem to be unserviceable—that is quick, stirring, and runs round. So he is still in action like the jackal, yelping before the lion for a prey; ever contriving how he may bring grist to the mill, money into the usurer's bank, and sorrow to his own soul. Hence is that phrase of the prophet, "grinding the faces of the poor," who, like corn, are ground to powder betwixt them. But let all such know that it were better for them if they endured all temporal punishment whatsoever, that a millstone were tied about their necks, and so cast into the bottom of the sea, than that both body and soul should be cast into hell fire for evermore.

Powell's Positions of Poetry, p. 48.

Isa. iii. 15.

Matt. xviii. 6.

MCCXII.—The danger of fleshly lusts to be avoided.

CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS hath a story that the first who found out fire was a satyr, a wild man, and, perceiving it to be a creature beautiful and resplendent, like a hot suitor, he offers to kiss it; but the fire, speaking to him, said, "Take heed, satyr; come not near me; for if thou dost, I shall burn thy beard." The meaning is, that unclean lust being a fire, which lustful hearts have found out, they are told if they meddle with it they are sure to be burnt by it. Can a man go upon hot coals, and not be burnt? take fire in his bosom, and his clothes not be consumed? go in unto a strange woman, and be innocent? come near such a she-fire, and not be singed? He cannot; it is impossible. He may tread upon coals, thinking to tread them out, but he will first tread the fire into his own feet; he may think to take fire in his bosom, and his clothes not be burnt; to embrace the conversation of a strange woman, and his chastity, the pure white garment of human nature, not be defiled; but he may, withal, think as well to fall into the bosom of hell fire, and there not be tormented for evermore.

In Admonit. ad Gentis.

Ambros., de Penit., lib. i., cap. 13.

"Edax libidinis flamma," &c.—BASIL., Lib. de Virginitate.

"Homo et mulier ignis et palca."—JER., in Ep. ad Dam.

MCCXIII.—A prudential piece of state policy for the continuance of peace.

MEMORABLE is that ingenious and honest contrivement of Pacuvius Calavius, a wise magistrate in Capua, who, perceiving the people to be much bent against the present government, and ready to break out into some outrage, made the senate acquainted therewith; and having thoroughly terrified them, by laying open the danger hanging over them, he promised, nevertheless, to deliver them all, and to set things at quiet, if they would freely put themselves into his hands, offering his oath, or any other assurance that they should demand, for his faithful meaning. They all agreed. Then, shutting the court, and placing a guard of his own followers about it, that none might enter it or issue forth without his leave, he called the people to assembly, and, speaking as much ill of the senate as he knew they would be glad to hear of, he told them that these wicked governors were surprised by his policy, and all fast, ready to abide what sentence they would lay upon them. Only thus much he advised them, as a thing which necessity required, that they should choose a new senator before they satisfied their anger upon the old. So, rehearsing the names of one or two senators, he asked what their judgment was of those. All cried out they were worthy of death. "Choose, then," said he, "first of all, some new ones into their places." Hereupon the multitude, unprovided for such an election, was silent, until at last some one or other adventured to name whom he thought fit. The men so nominated were utterly dis-

Livius, in Hist. Rom.

Sir Walter Raleigh's Hist. of the World, lib. xvi., cap. 13.

"Scinditur incertum studia in contraria vulgus."

liked by the whole assembly, either for some known fault, baseness, and insufficiency, or else because they were unknown, and therefore held unworthy. This difficulty in the new election appearing more and more, whilst more were to be chosen—the fittest men to be substituted having been named amongst the first, and not thought fit enough—Pacuvius entreated, and easily prevailed with the people, that the present senate might at this time be spared, in hopes of amends hereafter, which, doubtless, they would make, having thus obtained pardon for all offences past. Henceforth, not only the people, as in former times, honoured Pacuvius and esteemed him their patron, but the senate also were governed by him, to whom they acknowledged themselves indebted for saving all their lives. Here, now, was a prudential piece of policy, such as the sage and prudent some years since amongst us might have well improved, to the curing of many distempers, composing of much difference, and preventing of great disorders, whereby we were then become even so distracted, that England was called the Bedlam of Europe, and London the Bedlam of England.

"O fortunatos nimium, bona si sua novimus," &c.

MCCXIV.—How it is that age becomes truly honourable.

Philo, in locum.

Gen. xxv. 8.

"Canities tunc est venerabilis quando ea gerit," &c.—CHRYSOSTOM, Prov. xvi. 31.

PHILO, the learned Jew, noteth, that although many in the beginning lived to a great length of time, so that they more than trebled the years of Abraham, yet none is mentioned and named to have been an old man in the Scripture until Abraham, of whom it is said that he died in a good old age. Whereof Philo conceiveth the reason to be, because, though his years were fewer, his virtues were more, and because he was gone further in the way of righteousness, though his course was shorter in the way of life. And this it was that made his old age to be good, this it was that made it to be a crown of glory: for it is a reproach to be able to prove our old age only by numbers of years, and not by increase of knowledge and goodness; it being so, that age will never become truly honourable, nor the hoary head as a crown of glory, till it be found in the way of righteousness.

MCCXV.—To commit ourselves to God in all things, and to be thankful to His holy name.

"Unus jacet alter voro refert pilam," —CHRYS., Orat., viii.

Seneca, de Benefic., lib. ii., cap. 17. Prov. xvi. 3.

Nich. de Lyra, in Prov. xvi. 3.

In the play at tennis, it is observable that the one tosseth the ball, the other tosseth it back again, and so long it is that the sport handsomely continueth as the ball, tossed to and fro between the hands of both, doth not fall to the ground; and he is said to be the best player that doth not only skilfully and readily take the ball, but nimbly and expertly sends it back again. Thus it is that all of us are to reveal our works unto the Lord, to cast or tumble our works before the Lord, to put them over to the Lord; and whatsoever we do well, let Him have the praise and the thanks for it, not to let the ball of benefits fall to the ground, but bandy it back with a speedy return of submissive acknowledgement; for the true comfort of that which we have received will be happily continued so long as we shall return thanks for things which we have so received. And then it is, too, that we shall be looked on as good and worthy receivers, when we cast back praise and glory unto God, and speak good of His holy name.

MCCXVI.—The good of quietness and evil of contention.

Jermin's Exposit. on Prov. xvi. 3.

Look but upon a pleasant pond, full of sweet fish, how do they sport themselves up and down in it, and multiply continually unto a great increase! But let the sluice be once taken up, the fishes are quickly gone; the waters stay not till they be gone also; and nothing but mud and mire is left behind. So it is that, in a quiet life, the affairs and endeavours of men do prosper, and their estate is increased to plenty and abundance, so that they even bathe themselves in the comfort and contentments that they find therein; but let the waters of strife break in, the gap of contention be opened, all comforts fleet away, and usually the estate sinks lower and lower, until it be dried up to beggary and misery. Such is the good of quietness and the evil that attendeth upon contention: it is, therefore, good counsel to make up all breaches as soon as they do appear, or rather, by watchfulness, keep all so firm, that no breach may appear; for the evil of contention is a great deal better prevented than remedied.

Greg., de Cura Past., part. iii.,
adm. 15.

"Dimitte a quam caput jugiorum"
AMBR., Ep., lib. iii.

MCCXVII.—The sin of bribery condemned.

It is mentioned of Frederick, duke of Saxony, that, being offered a great mass of gold by the agents of Archduke Charles, even after he had given his voice to be emperor (and indeed made him emperor), he would not so much as look upon it; and when they were instant upon him, at the least to give them leave to bestow a largesse upon his gentlemen and followers, his answer was, that they might take something if they would; "but I tell you, and I tell them," said he, "that not one of them that taketh a penny shall stay one day in my-house." This was, now, a worthy heroical mind in him, but sooner praised than followed; and, as St. Bernard said in another case, "exemplum alterius sæculi (an example fitter for a less corrupt age than this wherein we live)." It is well, now, if nothing be given or promised beforehand: "The rulers love to say with shame, Bring ye;" "The judge asketh for a reward." Many are the Gehazies that run after rewards; many, like Samuel's two sons, turn aside after lucre, and take bribes to pervert judgment; but, where is the man that, like Samuel, can say, "Whose ox have I taken, or whose ass have I taken, or whom have I defrauded, whom have I oppressed, or of whose hands have I received any bribe to blind mine eyes therewith?"

Erasmus, in Apoph.

De Considerat., lib.
iv.

Hos. iv. 18.
Micah vii. 3.

"Acceptio mune-rum causa perversi tendi judicii."
GREG., in locum,
1 Sam. viii. 3.

1 Sam. xii. 3.

MCCXVIII.—Commendable silence.

It was the wisdom of Sulpitius Severus, who, being deceived by the Pelagians, and acknowledging the fault of his loquacity, was careful of silence afterwards unto his death; and good reason too, says St. Jerome, "ut peccatum quod loquendo contraxerat, tacendo penitus emendaret (that the sin which he had committed by over-speaking might be amended by holding his peace ever after)." Thus, it may be, and often is, the infirmity of the wisest to be too hasty in speech, to be somewhat too forward in their expressions; it must, therefore, be their wisdom to shut the doors of their lips, to be wary of what they say, and to be more silent and watchful over themselves for the time to come.

In Catalogo Virorum Illustrium.

MCCXIX.—The distemper of sin not easily cured.

It is said of Nero's Quinquennium, that it was such, that, in the excellency thereof, as to the point of government, few of his predecessors did ever equal him; yet, at last, that which glittered so much did not prove to be true gold. He fell into courses most exorbitant, and, amongst the rest, so shameless in his bribery and extortion, that he could not pass an office but he must be well paid for it before the seal was gotten, and then, as a trumpet of his own baseness, cry out to the party, "Seis quibus sit opus (Thou knowest what I have need of)!" And thus it is that, when men are distempered with sin, habituated and, as it were, rooted in sin, they are not very easily cured. It is a difficulty to be weaned from the sweet breasts where sin hath a long time suckled, or to be divorced from those criminal courses to which a man hath once espoused his affections. Vices oftentimes become usages, and a practised sinner is even incorrigible.

Sueton., in Hist.

"Procul differre cunctos principes,"
&c.

"Vitamores fiunt."
—GREG.
Jer. iv. 14.
Ezek. xiii. 7.

MCCXX.—Men to stand up for the credit of their places.

In Vita ejus.

"Quadragesima annis vix priores duas literas alphabeti A B percepit," &c.—
ÆGID. CORROZE-
TUS, de Dilecti Me-morabil.

Reeve's God's Plea for Nineveh.

LOUIS XI., of France, desiring to thrust an abbot injuriously out of his place, commanded him cedere (to give up his right), and to yield up the possession to one that he should nominate; the abbot, thinking the king to have no absolute power to dispose of Church rights without some high crime or the party's voluntary consent, resolutely told him that he had been forty years learning the two first letters of the alphabet, A B, that is, how to be made an abbot, and he should be forty years longer before he should learn the two next letters, C D, by which he meant cede, that he could not understand how to yield up an abbotship so easily. Thus it is that, the greater men are, the greater care ought they to have in keeping up the credit of their places; be as great as their parentage and pedigrees, ties and titles; be as great as their great Creator hath made them to be; and as God hath had the bringing of them forth, let not the devil have the bringing of them up; as they tender their dignities, leave them as dignities; lose not a cubit of their stature, embezzle not their stock, lose their birthright, not to be inferior to themselves, as some in these days are, who have such a lethargy, vertigo, or palpitation of the heart, that they have forgotten everything that should be near and dear unto them, and even tremble to be their own propugnators (defenders).

MCCXXI.—The great mystery of the hypostatical union in Christ shadowed out by way of similitude.

Just. Mart., in Expositi, Fides.

Basil., in Nativitate.

Alex. Alens, Sum.
Theolog., p. 3, q. 75,
mem. 1, art. 1.

Damascen., de Fide Orthodox., lib. iii.,
cap. 11.

Field, on the Church,
lib. v., cap. 12.

Roberts, Mysterium et Medulla Biblio-rum, lib. iv., cap. 6, Aphor. ii., Posit. 1.

MANY are the similitudes used by both ancient and modern writers to illustrate the mysterious union of God and man in one person of Jesus Christ our Mediator: as that of the body and soul making but one man; of the primordial light in the first creation and of the body of the sun, in which that light was afterwards seated, both making one luminary; of a sword fired and enflamed; of one man having two accidental forms or qualities, as skill in divinity and physic; of a scion or branch grafted into a tree. But these, and some others, have been long since noted as defective in one part or other: that, therefore, of the mistletoe in the oak, or in the apple-tree, seemeth to hold out the best; for—

1. The apple-tree and mistletoe are two perfect and different natures in one tree, the mistletoe wanting no integral part that belongs to mistletoe. So the Godhead and Manhood are two perfect and different natures in one Person, in one Christ our Lord.
2. The mistletoe never had a separate and distinct subsistence of its own, but only subsisteth in union with the apple-tree, which sustaineth and maintaineth it. So the human nature of Christ never had any distinct and separate subsistence of its own, but, from the first conception, subsisted in union with the Divine subsistence.
3. The apple-tree and mistletoe are so one tree that their two different natures are neither confounded together nor changed one into another, to make up a third nature, but are so individually united that, retaining their different natures, they are but one tree. So the two natures of Christ are, without confusion or commutation, united in one Person, and yet still retain their real differences.
4. The apple-tree and mistletoe, though one tree, yet having different natures, bear different fruits, as apples and berries. So the Godhead and Manhood of Christ, though but one Person, yet, being different natures, perform distinct actions peculiar to each of them. Lastly. As we may truly say, by reason of this union, this apple-tree is a mistletoe and this mistletoe is an apple-tree; and consequently this mistletoe beareth apples and this apple-tree beareth berries. So we may truly say, by reason of the personal union in God and man, in Christ, this Son of Mary is the Son of God and this Son of God is the Son of Mary; the Son of God was crucified, and the Son of Mary created heaven and earth.

MCCXXII.—Rich men to consider their beginnings, and be thankful.

It was the saying of Chrysostom to Gaynas, the Arian bishop: "Cogita quo cultu transieris Histriam, et quibus nunc utaris vestibus, &c. (Bethink thyself in what poor attire thou didst once pass through Histria, and how richly thou art now apparelled).'" So let all such as are advanced in the world's eye, such as are arrived at great estates, such as heretofore not worthy to sit with the dogs of the flock are now seated with princes, consider the simple weeds, perhaps, that were once upon their backs, and how God hath given them change of apparel! what a small flock they had once to begin withal, and how God hath conveyed unto them hidden treasures! what minims they were once in the world, and what grandees they are now become! that, whilst others have poverty, they have prosperity! whilst others are empty, they are full! whilst others have a narrower border, theirs is enlarged! whilst others have neither means nor meat, their portion is fat and their meat plenteous! When, therefore, they eat in plenty and are satisfied, let them praise the name of the Lord their God, who hath done wonderfully for them, and say with David, "All that we enjoy cometh of Thine hand, and all is Thine own!"

Erasmus, in Vita Chrysostomi.

"Quantum mutatus ab illo."

Joel ii. 26.

1 Chron. xxix. 14.

MCCXXIII.—Slothfulness and lukewarmness in religion forerunners of evil to come.

It is said of Alexius Comnenus, that when, upon the day of his inauguration, he subscribed the creed in a slow, trembling manner, it was an ominous sign to all what a wicked man he would prove, and how nigh the ruin of the empire was at hand; and when Philip, the last king of Macedon, a little before the great battle which he fought with Flaminius, stepped upon the top of a sepulchre to make an oration to his soldiers, it foretold a sad event of the issue of the battle. Thus, we who have violated the faith, and are come to such a slothfulness and lukewarmness in performance of religious duties, it doth presage that our very inwards are corrupted and the foundations of our welfare shaking; we who have trod upon the heads of so many famous martyrs, who first conveyed unto us our faith and worship, it is a kind of prediction that this at last will be fatal to our Church. There is time yet to amend, but how long God knows; it is to be hoped that our sins have not yet made God to abhor the excellencies of Jacob, nor left us naked before the Lord. We have yet much in our keeping; all is not gone: let it be our care to preserve what is left, and be thankful for what we have in the present enjoyment.

Nicetæ, Hist., lib. i.

Plutarch, in Flaminio.

Reeve's God's Plea for Nineveh.

MCCXXIV.—Man's great vanity in proposing to himself long life.

WHEN God revealed to Nebuchadnezzar how little a while his empire was to last, he showed him a statue of divers metals: the head of gold, the breast silver, the belly brass, the legs iron, the feet clay, and a little stone descending from the mountains dashed the statue in pieces. But instead of taking this as a forewarning of his end, and to have it still before his eyes, he made another statue of gold from top to toe, which is held to be a durable and lasting metal; so that the more God sought to undeceive him, the more was he deceived with his vain hopes. And this is a fit resemblance of that which daily happeneth unto us; for God advising us that, in the midst of all our magnificent structures and costly edifices, that of our body, our best building, is but reared up of a little dirt, a house of clay, that daily moulders away, and will be, ere long, reduced to little or nothing, yet our idle thoughts and vain hopes imagine it to be of gold, to be built of strong and lasting materials, which cannot be, when, as man's life is so short, that it is no more than to go out of one grave into another, out of the womb of our particular mother into that of the earth, the common mother of us all. Dust we are, and to dust we must return.

Dan. ii. 31-35.

Nazianzen.

"Congestum cepite culmen."

"Tanquam mors nulla sequatur."

"Palvis et umbra sumus."

Gen. iii. 19.

MCCXXV.—How it is that a prudent man may lawfully comply with the times.

Plinii Nat. Hist.,
lib. viii., cap. 21.

"Non cursum eun-dem sed portum," Sc.,—Litt., Polit.,
lib. iv.

It is said of the ycale, a certain wild beast in Ethiopia, that he hath two horns of a cubit long, which he can in fight move as he list, either both forward, to offend, or both backward, to defend, or the one forward and the other backward, to both uses at once. So should wise men apply their counsels and actions to the times, and either put forth the horns of their power or pull them in, as occasion offers; yet with this caution, that, as the mariner changeth his course upon the change of the wind and weather, but still holdeth his purpose of getting into the harbour, so should all prudent men, statesmen especially, as upon every new occasion they alter their sails and veer another way, they should still make their course point to the public good and safety, not once minding their own private benefit or advantage.

MCCXXVI.—The difference betwixt a good and bad memory.

Basil., in Bibl. S. S.
Patrum, tom. i.,
ser. 2.

Fonseca, Serm. in Die Cinerum.

As the stomach is the storehouse of our corporal food, and, keeping therein our present meat, the body takes from thence its sustenance, whereby its life and being is maintained, so the memory is the stomach and magazine of the soul, and sets before our eyes the obligation wherein we stand, the good which we lose, and the hurt which we gain; and representing thereunto the species and shapes of things past, they sometimes work that effect as they would have done had they been present themselves; whence is engendered the love of God, which is that good blood wherewith the soul is nourished. And then, again, as from the disorder and disagreement of the stomach painful diseases do arise, and divers infirmities hang upon the body, so, from the forgetfulness of our memories, rise those manifold disorders and distempers in the soul, such as deaden the graces of the Spirit and flat the motions thereof, bringing the soul into a labyrinth of perplexity, until God be pleased to bring such things into mind again as may relieve it.

MCCXXVII.—Oath or covenant-breakers not to be trusted.

"Summum crede nefas," &c.,—JUV.,
Sat. x.

"Pronum est supe-ror censurere testes,"—ID., Sat.
xiii.

THE laws Divine and human have left no such bond of assurance to tie and fasten one to another as that of an oath or covenant, which is to be taken in sincerity and kept inviolably. But, seeing the deprivation of our nature hath perverted these laws and abused this lawful act, by equivocations and mental reservations, making it like a gipsy's knot, fast or loose at their displeasure, or like a tragedian's buskin, equally fitting each foot, the law of state prescribes us this remedy, to trust no man of noted falsehood and duplicity but upon good caution. And good reason too; for he that hath passed the bounds of modesty and made no religion of oath or covenant for his proper advantage never after makes scruple in his cauterized conscience to offend in like sort as often as like occasion shall be offered.

MCCXXVIII.—The unresolved man's inconstancy.

Plinii Nat. Hist.,
lib. ii., cap. 103.

THE river Novanus, in Lombardy, at every midsummer solstice, swelleth and runneth over the banks, but in mid-winter solstice is clean and dry. Such is the nature of men unresolved, to several fortunes: they swell in the sunshine of their prosperity and look big in the days of their advancement, but when storms of danger and troubles arise they are dried up with despair and hang down their heads like a bulrush; for a mind unprepared for disaster is unfurnished to sustain it when it cometh: he that soareth too high in the one fortune sinketh too low in the other. Insolent braving and base fear are individual and inseparable companions ; but the resolved man is ever the same, even in the period of both fortunes.

MCCXXIX.—The truly noble soldier.

THE Getulian captive (as Pliny relateth the story) escaped the danger of being devoured by many lions, through her humble gesture and fair language, as saying unto them, that she was a silly woman, a banished fugitive, a sickly, feeble, and weak creature, a humble suitor, and lowly suppliant for mercy. As, therefore, the lion is the most noble of all the beasts of the forest, who never shows his force but where he finds resistance, "satis est prostrâsse (do but yield, and he is quiet)," such is every truly noble soldier, every generous soldier (the most honourable of all other professions), who holds it as great a glory to relieve the oppressed as to conquer the enemy that is in arms against him.

Nat. Hist., lib. viii., cap. 10.

"Régia res est succurrere lapsis."—OVID.

MCCXXX.—How it is that the self-conceited, vain-glorious man deceives himself.

It is usually so, that the vain-glorious man looks upon himself through a false glass, which makes everything seem fairer and greater than it is ; and this flatulous humour filleth the empty bladder of his vast thoughts with so much wind of pride, that he presumes that Fortune, who hath once been his good mistress, should ever be his handmaid. But let him know that the wings of self-conceit, wherewith he towereth so high, are but patched and pieced up of borrowed feathers, and those impeded (united), too, in the soft wax of uncertain hope, which, upon the encounter of every small heat of danger, will melt and fail him at his greatest need ; for Fortune deals with him as the eagle with the tortoise : she carries him the higher, that she may break him the easier. It would be, therefore, good advice, that, in the midst of his prosperity, he would think of the world's instability, and that Fortune is constant in nothing but inconstancy.

"Forlique manebô, Quis neget hoc ?"
OVID.

Dallin ton's Aphorisms

"Et tantum constans in levitate sua est."

MCCXXXI.—How it is that children are very hardly drawn from their natural inclinations.

Do but set the eggs of divers fowls under one hen, and, when they are disclosed, the kite will be ravenous, the dove harmless, the duck will be paddling in the water, and every one will be prosecuting its natural inclination and condition. Or take the youngest wolf-whelp, employ the greatest art, use the utmost skill that may be, to make it gentle and loving, and you shall find it but labour lost, a thing altogether impossible ; for it will never be forced or entreated from its natural curstness (malignity) and cruelty. Thus, it cannot be denied but that education hath a considerable power to qualify ; breeding in a good family may civilize, but never nullify the proper nature of any thing or person. It is, therefore, the duty of parents earnestly to pray that God would be pleased to infuse such souls into their children as may be endued with sweet and gracious inclinations ; if otherwise, to use all fit means to temper the worst, not presuming to effect an absolute extirpation thereby, but by the miraculous power of Him who can make from bitter fountains to flow sweet and pleasant waters—from the worst nature, the best of grace and goodness.

Daily Observations by a Perien of Honour.

"Naturam expellat furca licet usque,"
&c.

MCCXXXII.—The different conditions of men in the matter of society laid open.

Capell's Observat.
Divine, Moral, &c.

DIVERS and sundry are the conditions of men in society, but three are most remarkable—i. e., the open, the concealed, and the well tempered betwixt these. As for the first, they are of so thin a composition, that a man, by a little converse, may see as easily through them as if they were made of glass, for in every discourse they are ready to unbosom their thoughts and unlock the very secrets of their hearts. The second sort are so tenacious, so reserved, and closely moulded, that they seem like those coffers that are shut so fast that no discovery can be made where they may be opened—so close, that as they are of less delight for society, so of less hazard to be trusted. But the last and best composed are like some cabinets that are not with difficulty unclosed, and then discover unto you many things pleasant and profitable, but yet so cunningly devised, so artificially contrived, that there will be some secret box that neither your eye nor wit can take notice of, wherein is deposited a most proper and incommunicable treasure, something that will give grace and much advantage to those that have it.

"Nec retinent patalia, &c. Vox fauces heret."

"Opportuna loquitor."

MCCXXXIII.—Ministers to be accountable unto God for what they have received.

Gee's Serm.,
Lond., 1624.

As by the law of nature reddere depositum doth bind every such fiduciary, engage every such trustee, not to use the pledge deposited as his own proper goods, but to be accountable for it and restore it when it shall be called for—if otherwise, he is guilty of injustice and violating those dictamina rationis (the very principles of natural reason)—so it is with the treasures of God's truth, committed to the hands of His ministers: they must acknowledge themselves to be but depositarii (trusted as pledge-keepers), not as proprietaryi (lords and masters of it), for they are to be responsible in that great day of general audit how they have discharged their trust.

"Liberè enim et juxta veram fidem Christum prædicantes," &c.—ST.
AMBROS., super
1 Cor.

MCCXXXIV.—How it is that the people, as to the generality, are incompetent judges of the preacher and his doctrine.

Granger's Serm.,
Lond., 1616.

It is related of a certain bishop, that at a visitation preached a very godly sermon, and withal so learned and plain, that he descended to the capacity of the meanest hearers. He was thereupon very much commended for his grave gesture, for his distinct and sober delivery, for his fatherly instructions, speaking plainly and familiarly, as a father to his children; not so earnest and vehement and hot as many young novices are, &c. For their minister, he was but a youngling, and as good as nobody in comparison of him, and if they had but such a preacher they would give I know not what to enjoy him. This great and general commendation was signified to the bishop in private, who, to make trial of the people's judgment, came the next year after, in the attire of an ordinary and poor minister, offering himself to be their preacher, it being noised abroad that their own was upon his remove to another place. The bishop, having gained the pulpit, purposely chose another text, differing from his former in words, but not in matter, so that, in a manner, he preached the very self-same sermon; but the same persons that did so much commend him before did now as much discommend him, and said that he had no good gesture, but a heavy kind of moving his body; that he bended too much forward and stood not upright, that he was nothing ripe and ready in his delivery, that he could be no scholar, because he was so plain spoken; that almost any man might make as good a sermon, that it differed little from ordinary talk, that he enforced not nor followed his exhortations with the vehemency and "Populus maledicentia delectatur,"

—PINDARUS.

"Sævitque animis ignobile vulgus," —VIRGIL., Ætid.

earnestness of spirit, and that his words had no life in them to stir up the attention or move the affections of the hearers ; that none of them would give a penny for his maintenance, and that they would have another kind of preacher than he or they would have none. Here, now, was the same sermon preached, but here not the same people that heard it ; the first sermon cried up, the second cried down, yet still the same sermon ; the preacher much commended at the first delivery and as much discommended at the second, yet still the same preacher. Hence it is that the generality of people are not to be looked on as fit and competent judges of the preacher and his doctrine, for they are usually led by passion, not by discretion ; so that oftentimes they commend they know not what, and discommend they know not whom.

"Multitudo ex iustis certissimo sumit animos."—LIVII Decad. 1. lib. vi.

MCCXXXV.—How it is that, at the second coming of Christ to judgment, the frame of the world shall not be consumed but repaired new.

As when that gold or silver is cast into the furnace and so tried in the fire the substance remaineth, but the dross is that which only perisheth, so, in the last day, the fire of the judgment shall consume and abolish the corruptible and drossy quality of the creature, but the substance (being subtilised and refined) shall abide and continue. What though that τὸ σχῆμα τοῦ κόσμου (the fashion of the world) pass and be scourged away by the fire of that general conflagration, yet the matter and substance shall remain : the heavens indeed shall pass away with a noise or rushing, or shrink together like a scroll of parchment ; the elements, like lead, shall melt with heat ; and the earth, with the works that are therein, shall be burnt up : yet the world shall not be consumed to nothing, but only transchanged into a new form, and converted to a Sabbatical and better use. God, out of the very ashes of it, will produce a new world, even a new heaven and a new earth, wherein shall dwell righteousness.

Draxe's Sermon, Lond., 1612.

1 Cor. vii. 32.

Ps. cii. 12.

2 Pet. iii. 13.

MCCXXXVI.—To be warned by the miseries of others.

As some schoolmasters have used that discipline to correct the children of great persons whose personal correction they find reason to forbear, by correcting other children in their names and in their sight, and have by this means so wrought upon good natures, that they have amended what was amiss at present and taken more care for the future : thus the Jews were by God corrected, in the punishment of the Egyptians, for the ten plagues of Egypt were as Moses's ten commandments to Israel. And so it is that other men's harms ought to be our arms, every judgment that falls upon another should be as catechism to us by way of instruction ; when judgments are abroad in the world, shall not the people learn righteousness ? Shall the lion roar and the beasts of the forests not tremble ? Shall God's hand lie heavy upon others, and we stand by, as idle spectators, nothing at all minding what is done ? Shall our very next neighbour's house be on fire and we look on as men unconcerned in the danger ? It cannot, it must not be. There is, without all doubt, the same combustible stuff, the same, if not greater, sins lodged in our hearts, and the same punishments hovering over our heads ; it is, therefore, high time to look about us.

Donne's Sermon at Court, 1625.

"Aliena pericula cautum."

"Paries cum proximus ardet."

MCCXXXVII.—Repentance not to be put off till old age.

WINTER voyages are very dangerous and uncertain, by reason of the north wind, which is then let loose upon the earth ; and, sure, he were not wise who might take his journey in the summer, yet, by delaying his opportunity, would expose himself to the dirty deepness of the way and inclemency of the weather in winter. Now, so it is that old age is man's winter : witness that snow which covers his head, more cold and lasting than the Russian King's Sermon at Court, 1626.

"Periculosum est et interitui vicinum."—AMEROS., Lib. de Pœnitent.

frosts, which the raging dog-star can scarcely thaw ; and youth is his summer, wherein the better temper of the air, the clearness of his sky, wherein fewer clouds, less storms to hinder his prospect to heaven, promise a successful voyage. Can it be thought, then, that God, who preceded all time, will take it well at our hands to be put back unto the last minute of time ? How can He, who requires the first-fruits of our lands, be content with the latter harvest of our lives ? How can He, who expects a sacrifice of sweet smell, but distaste our unsavoury zeal, when, for a fragrant flower, we present Him with a dry stalk and withered branch—the lees of our old age for the vintage of our youth ? Yet, by the way, this is not to prejudicate a gray-headed repentance, though the younger must needs be preferred : that may be true, but this more safe ; a man may hope well of the one, but believe better of the other.

"Pœnitentia sera tarò vera."

MCCXXXVIII.—In all deliverances, spiritual and temporal, to give God the glory.

Socras Hist. Ec-
cles., lib. vii., cap.
23.
TemplumOratorium.

Reusner, in Symbol.
Cæs. Rot., Cæs. ii.

Ps. iii. 8.

Isa. xxxviii. 20.

Jonah li. 9.

THEODOSIUS, being told of the wonderful overthrow of the usurper John, his adversary, he and all his followers resorted to the Temple, where they passed over the day with praise and thanksgiving, acknowledging that God, by His arm, had cast down that tyrant ; and Flavius Heraclius, being delivered from Cosroe, the king of the Persians, and the kingdom freed from tyranny, did, in the height of his triumph at Byzantium, openly praise God for his delivery, and, the more to show his thankfulness, did cause to be stamped on his coin, with his own image, these words : Λόξα ἐν ὑψίστοις Θεῷ, &c. (Glory be to God in heaven, because He hath broken the iron doors, and hath delivered the holy kingdom of Heraclius). And thus must all of us do, if we be freed from persecution, from a sword power, from a government tyrannical. Let us confess, with David, that salvation is of the Lord. If we be brought from the jaws of death and the gates of the grave, or recovered from some mortal disease, let us say, with Hezekiah, "The Lord was ready to save me ;" or if, like so many brands snatched out of the fire, we be brought from the deep of destruction, the very gulf of hell, let us acknowledge, with Jonah, that mercy and salvation is of the Lord. In all deliverances, spiritual and temporal, let God still have the glory.

MCCXXXIX.—Self-conceitedness in matters of religion condemned.

Lev. xxi. 20.

Loc's Bliss of Brightest Beauty, 1614.

Prov. xxx. 12.

Isa. xxiv.

In Lib. ad Novatian.

Ulys. Aldrovand., Ornitholog.

It was, in the Levitical law, so ordered by God, that he who had a blemish of white in his eye was debarred from the priesthood, and compared to the owl, of whom the naturalists yield the reason that she cannot see in the day-time, because of the exceeding great whiteness she hath in her eyes, which so scattereth the sight, that the optics thereof cannot perfectly discern the objects. And such are all those who are self-conceited of themselves in matters of religion, who are pure in their own eyes, wise and prudent in their own sight, yet are not washed from their filthiness ; who stink in the nostrils of all who come near them : such as the Novatians, of whom St. Cyprian speaketh, "qui aurum se pronunciant (who pronounce themselves to be pure gold)." "But if they be gold," saith he, "it is then that gold in quo delicta populi Israelis, &c. (in which the sins of the people of Israel are denoted)." They are but golden calves, or rather, golden asses. It is better, therefore, to be at sea, tossed with a tempestuous storm, in the ship with those who humbly profess themselves to be sinners, than on the shore with the rabble of those who justify themselves, and are so self-conceited of their own graces, that they think no one good enough to be their fellow.

MCCXL.—The wrath of God to be appeased by timely repentance.

SEASONABLY and timely came in the provision of Abigail, when, for her husband's churlish behaviour, David, in his wrath, had girded his sword upon his thigh, and threatened destruction to his whole household. She delayed not the time, but made haste and went out to meet him, with asses laden with frails (baskets) of resins, bottles of wine, and sheep ready dressed, to appease his wrath; which David took so kindly at her hands, that he forgot his anger, and gave order that she should be returned in peace and safety to her husband and family. So it is that David's Son, according to His humanity, and David's Lord, according to His divinity, even David the King of kings and Lord of lords, the great God of heaven and earth, is angry with every son of man, for his unthankful and ungrateful behaviour towards Him. He hath bent His bow and whetted His arrows, girded His sword on His thigh, and—which is much to be feared—hath already drawn it out to punish us. Let us, then, by a seasonable and timely repentance, go out and humbly meet Him in the way; and as Abigail had her asses laden with fruit, so let us have our bodies laden with repentance and contrition—even these bodies of ours, which have been too, too long porters to carry the heavy burthen of sin and wickedness; and as she had her bottles of wine, so let us have our eyes as two bottles, nay, rather two fountains of tears, to bewail the sadness of our lost condition; and as she had her sheep ready dressed, so let us have our hearts ready prepared and addressed to serve the Lord, and then the Lord will say unto us, as David did to Abigail, "Return again unto your houses in peace; be of good cheer, your sins are forgiven you."

1 Sam. xxv. 18-20.

Gheast's Serm.,
Lond., 1609.

"In tribunal mentis tue ascende contra te," &c.—AUG.,
In Lib. de Utilitat.
Agend. Punit.

MCCXLI.—Rash, inconsiderate service or worship of God condemned.

It is observed by physiognomists, that the most courageous and discreet men have not the speediest pace, but rather a quiet, decent, and settled kind of gait; whereas a hasty pace is looked on as a certain sign of a rash, foolish, and illiberal man. Thus it is that rashness is not altogether so hurtful in other business as it is most dangerous in God's service and the duties of religion. All rashness must be banished from God's service; it must not be any sudden work—yea, rather, it is such a business as requireth our exactest care, our greatest attention, our best wits, nay, wisdom itself, to go about it. The greatest care we can take is not enough; hence is that charge of the apostle: βλέπετε (See to it); have a care; take heed that you walk ἀκριβῶς (circumspectly), warily, exactly; not as fools, but as wise—i. e., to do the service of God advisedly; to walk decently and orderly, εὐσχημόνως (with a comely pace), and that with another caution, too, ὡς ἐν ἡμέρᾳ (as in the day-time), when all men see us, that so we may not be ashamed of what we do.

Aristot., Ethic. ad Nicæ., &c.

Adamant., Physiog.,
lib. ii., cap. 28.

Ephes. v. 15.
1 Thess. iv. 12.

Rom. xiii. 13.
Browning's Serm.
of Reverence in God's House, 1636.

MCCXLII.—Faith, though weak, yet rewarded; and why so.

THEY that did look on the brazen serpent but with one eye, yea, but with half an eye, were as well and as fully cured of the deadly stings of the fiery serpents as those that beheld it with both. And again, suppose that a prince be disposed to bestow on sundry and several malefactors a pardon of grace, or some precious jewels (as signals of his civil respects) unto mere beggars, is not the one as fully acquitted from his offences, and the other made as actually rich by the possession of such jewels, though but received with a palsy-shaking hand, as they that receive them with one that is more strong and lusty. Even so the case is here: Hast thou (whosoever thou be) but a dimmish, darkish faith, a weak, waterish eye of faith; yet, for thy comfort, if it be such a one as doth look up to Christ, and only to Him, for salvation—such a hand as doth reach out unto Christ, and the pardon of sins offered in and by Him, and dost clasp it about Him with all thy feeble strength—make not doubt but that thou art justified in the sight of God, and dost stand clearly acquitted from

Baile's Mirror of God's Mercy, on John iii. 16.

"Tarda solet magnis rebus inesse fides,"—OVID, Ep. xvi.

all thy sins, and shalt be healed from the deadly stings thereof; for it is the possession of the jewel, not the strong holding of it, that made those beggars rich; and the king's pardon relieveth none but such as are willing to accept of it, and plead to it; and so it is not our strong or weak faith that is our righteousness and full discharge before God, but Jesus Christ and His obedience—that is it that doth all. This only is required on our part, that we accept of Christ offered in the Gospel, and rely on Him for full righteousness and redemption; all which a weak and feeble faith doth as truly and entirely (if not more) as the strongest—nay, which is yet more for the comfort of such as are weak in faith, and cannot yet in an express and explicit manner believe on Christ, they have Christ, and enjoy Him unto righteousness, and the pardon of all their sins and transgressions committed.

"Non opus est verbis, credite rebus ait,"—OVID, Fast. iv.

MCCXLIII.—All must die.

THE heathen usually compared the sons of Adam to counters, the game at chess, and stage plays, because that counters have their several places and use for a time, but, in the end, they are jumbled into a heap. In a game at chess, some are kings, some bishops, some knights, &c., but, after a while, they all go into one and the same bag. On the stage, one is in his rags, another in his robes; one is the master, another is the man; and very busy they be; but, in the end, the play ends, the bravery ends, and each returns to his place. Such, and no other, is the estate of man: either weeds or flowers, and both wither; whether trees good or bad, both die; as dieth the wise, so the fool; rich men die, and poor too; death is unavoidable, life and death take turns each of other; the man lives not that shall not see death, be he king with Saul, a prophet with Jeremiah, a wise Solomon, a foolish Nabal, a holy Isaac, a profane Esau: be he of what rank soever, he must die—nay, let there be a concurrence of all in one, let Samuel, both a good man, a good minister, a good magistrate, have as many privileges as are incident to a man, yet can he not procure a protection against death; his mother may beg his life, but none can compound for his death; so sure it is that all must lie down in the dust and die.

"Longius aut propius mors sua quemque manet."—PROPERTIUS.

MCCXLIV.—Why it is that we must be charitable to all men.

IT is written of that Moses Atticissans (Plato), that when he did give alms to a poor profligate wretch, his friends much admired that he, Θεῶς Plato, the great divine philosopher, would take pity on such a wretched miscreant; but he, like himself, in such misty days as those were, made answer, "Humanitati non homini, &c. (I show mercy on the man, not as he is wicked; but as and because he is a man of my own nature)." His answer was good and warrantable; for if we consider our first parents, we shall find ourselves bound (though è longinquo), by the same obligation to do good unto all men. There is neither Jew nor Grecian, bond nor free, male nor female, but all are one in Jesus Christ; neither Indian, whether of the East or West, neither barbarian of Morocco nor inhabitant of Monomotapa, but all are brethren, whom, as we have opportunity, we must embrace with charity; such as are true saints, with joy for their sanctification; those that are not such, in the judgment of charity, with hearty and earnest supplications to the great God of heaven and earth for their true and timely conversion to the faith, that is to be found only in the Lord Jesus.

Plutarch, in Apoph.

"Sanguinis conjunctio devincit homines charitate."—TULLIUS.

Gal. iii. 28.

Symnier, Sp. Poet. for Sen. 1629.

MCCXLV.—Not to grieve or be troubled at the world's discourtesies; and why so.

SUPPOSE a man, by birth noble, and by revenues rich, that, as travelling homewards through a foreign country, should be waylaid, fall into the hands of thieves and villains, Bain's Miracle of God's Love, on Jehn iii. 16.

and by them be robbed of his money, and stripped of his rich and courtly apparel, and, besides that, have many indignities and base unworthy affronts put upon him, and yet should pass by all as little or nothing concerned in the business—and why so, but because he considers that he is not in his right ubi, he hath no long time to abide with such wretched people, and that, if he can but make some shift for a time, till he come to his own country and place of abode, there he shall have his friends about him, moneys, and all things necessary to supply his want and necessities—the same is our case: why should any of us grieve and be troubled at the world's discourtesies, at the reproaches and wrongs that are put upon us by the world and worldly men; for (had we but so much faith as to believe it) we have a heavenly home and an eternal life by Christ prepared for us, at the which, when we once arrive, we shall be sure to meet with friends enough, even God, His blessed saints and angels, who will honour us; riches and treasures inestimable, that will store us; joy and glory unspeakable, that will for evermore refresh us.

MCCXLVI.—To regulate our wills by God's will.

If a man lay a crooked stick upon an even level ground, the stick and ground ill suit together, but the fault is in the stick; and, in such a case, a man must not strive to bring the even ground to the crooked stick, but bow the crooked stick even with the ground. So it is between God's will and ours: there is a discrepancy and jarring betwixt them; but where is the fault? or rather, where is it not? Not in the will of God, but in our crooked and corrupt affections; in which case, we must not, like Balaam, seek to bring God's will to ours, but be contented to rectify and order the crookedness of our wills, by the rectitude and sanctity of the will of God, who must be the Ruler and Moderator of our will; for which cause we are to cry out with David, "Teach me, O Lord, to do Thy will!" and with the whole Church of God, in that pattern of wholesome words, "Fiat voluntas tua (Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven);" never forgetting that, too, of Christ Jesus Himself, in the midst of His agony and bloody sweat, "Non mea, sed tua fiat voluntas (Father, not my will, but Thine be done)."

St. Augustine, in Ps. xliv. 6.

Ps. cxliii. 10.

Luke xxii. 42.

MCCXLVII.—To appear before God in all humility, how high soever our condition be.

It is observable of Rebecca, that all the way of her journey she was mounted on a camel and rode amongst the servants, but when she had once set her eye upon Isaac, then she lighted down from the camel and put herself into a posture of all humble and low obeisance. So must the men of this world do: however it be that many of them bear up their heads on high, stand upon the upper ground of riches and preferment, and are therefore bold and careless, not so much as once minding those that are below them, yet, when they come into the Lord's presence, and are to deal with the great God of heaven and earth, then they are to come down from their camels, fall down and kneel before the Lord their Maker, and be as humble, lowly, and vile in their own eyes as possibly may be Rudinius, in Gen. xxiv.

"Templa petas supplex."

Smith, on Lord's Prayer.

MCCXLVIII.—How it is that faith is the first act of repentance.

As a prisoner that lies in hold for debt, if a man should come unto him and promise him that he would take order to pay his debts, and thereby discharge him of his imprisonment, he first believes that he is both able and willing so to do it, then he hopes for it, and lastly, he is, as it were, dissolved into love, ravished with the thoughts of such an unexpected relief, and therefore seeketh to do all things that may please him—so it is with a Stock's Doctrine of Repent.

"Nemo rectè possit pœnitentiam agere nisi qui speraverit," &c.—AMBR., de Pœnit., lib. i., cap. 1.

repenting convert : he first believes that God will do what He hath promised, that is, pardon his sins, and take away his iniquities : then he retheth, that what is so promised shall be performed ; and from that, and for it, he leaves sin, forsaketh his old course of life, which was displeasing, and, for the time to come, maketh it his work to do that which is pleasing and acceptable in His sight.

MCCXLIX. — The comfortable art of spiritualizing the several occurrences of the world and observing God's providences therein.

White's Treat. of the Power of God's will.

Matt. vi. 26.

St. Augustine, Factio, Dering, Holton, &c.

Hall's Art of Divine Meditation.

It is storied of Mr. Dod, a painful (pains-taking) preacher in his time, that intending to marry, but being troubled with fears and cares how he should be able to live in that condition, in regard that his incomes were but small, enough only to maintain him as a single man; looking out of the window and seeing a hen scraping for food, to cherish her numerous brood about her, thought thus within himself, "This hen did but live before it had the chickens, and now she lives with her little ones;" upon which he added this thought also, "I see the fowls of the air neither sow nor reap nor gather into barns, and yet my Heavenly Father feeds them." Thus did he, and thus many of God's servants have done before him; and thus did our blessed Lord and Saviour Himself, who took occasion of the water fetched up solemnly to the altar from the well of Shiloah, on the day of the great Hosannah, to meditate and discourse of the water of life. And so must all of us do, get this sweet and comfortable art of spiritualizing the several occurrences in the world, and observing the providences of God therein, drawing, like the bee, sweetness from every flower, and turning everything that we hear or see into holy meditation; the omission whereof cannot be without the neglect of God, His creatures, ourselves. The creatures are half lost if we only employ them, not learn something of them; God is wronged, if His creatures be unregarded; we most of all, if we read this great volume of the creatures, and take out no lesson for our own instruction.

MCCL. — Men hardly drawn out of old customs and forms in religious worship.

Heylin's Cosmog-raphy.

"Aden à teneris animabus inchoanest." — VITRO-
GEO., lib. II.

It is reported of the King of Morocco, that he told the English ambassador, in King John's time, that he had lately read St. Paul's Epistles, which he liked so well, that were he to choose his religion, he would embrace Christianity: but, saith he, every one ought to die in the faith wherein he was born. So it is with many amongst us: they are persuaded they ought, and are resolved they will, live and die in those customs and ways wherein they were born; and so they may do—nay, so they must do—provided that such customs and forms, whereunto they seem to be so fast glued, be according to the pattern in the mount, the revealed will of God; but it is to be feared that such are more addicted to customs than Scriptures, choosing rather to follow what hath been, though never so absurd and irregular, than consider what should be, though never so orthodox and uniform.

MCCLI. — The great love of Christ to be at a high esteem, and why so.

William Parla-ment.

"Magnæ amoris amoris."

There is a story of an elephant, who, being fallen down and unable to help himself or get up again, by reason of the inflexibleness of his legs, a forester coming by helped him up, wherewith the elephant (a creature otherwise docible enough by the very instinct of nature) was so affected, that he tamely followed the man up and down, would do anything for him, and never left him till his dying day. Now so it is, that if there be such love expressed by brute beasts to those that have done them any good, should not we much more love and prize Christ, who hath done so much for us? For we were fallen and could not recover or help ourselves, and Christ hath lifted us up and redeemed us with His own most precious blood, when we were even lost and undone. Let us, then, think nothing too much to do, too great to suffer, too dear to part withal, for such a Christ, such a Saviour, who thought nothing too much to do, or too grievous to suffer, that so He might accomplish the work of our redemption. He left heaven for us, let not us think it much to lose earth for Him : He came out of His Father's bosom for us, let not us be unwilling to leave father, or mother, or friends, or anything else for Him ; He underwent sufferings, reproaches, afflictions, persecutions, yea, death itself, for us, let not us repine at or be impatient under any trouble or misery we shall meet with here in this world for His sake, but still be praising, blessing, and magnifying the love of God in Christ Jesus, who hath done so much for us.

Love's Wrath and Mercy, a Sermon on 1 Thess. v. 9.

MCCLII.—Faith to be preserved as the head of all graces; and why so.

It is observed that the serpent is, of all things, most careful of his head, because he well knows, though he be cut and mangled never so much in the body or any part of it, yet if his head be but whole, it will cure all the wounds of the other members. And such wisdom ought all of us to have : to labour, above all things, to keep our head, our faith, whole and sound—to make sure of that, whatsoever we do : because if anything else receive a wound, if any other of our graces have, as it were, even lost their spiritual strength and vigour, faith will renew them again ; but if this once suffer shipwreck, it would cost many a sigh, many a tear, many a groan in the spirit, before it be recovered again : for, without it, all other graces decay and perish, and are as in a winter condition of barrenness without it, yet, if it do but appear, there will be a spring tide of all spiritual blessings whatsoever.

Ulysses Aldrovand., de Serp.

"Serpens minium curat si corpus incidatur," &c.—CHRYSOST., Hom. xxiv., in Matt.

MCCLIII.—Troubles and vexation of spirit not to be allayed by wrong means and ways.

It is said of Cain, that being in trouble of mind and terror of conscience for his bloody sin of fratricide, he went to allay it by building a city ; and there was no way to drive away Saul's melancholy but by David's tuning of his harp. Thus it is with most people : when they are under trouble of mind or vexation of spirit, they use sinful and wrong means to quiet themselves ; they run to merry meetings, to music, to building, to bargaining, to buying and selling ; but they run not to God on the bended knees of their hearts, who is the only speedy help in such a time of need. It cannot be denied but that a merry meeting, music, or the like, may allay the trouble of mind for awhile, but it will recoil with more terror than before : a sad remedy, not much unlike to a man in a fever, who lets down cold drink, which cools for the present, but afterwards increaseth the more heat ; or like a man rubbing himself with nettles, to allay the sting of a bee ; or not much unlike to one that hath his house a-falling, and takes a firebrand to uphold it, whereby the building is more in danger.

Gen. iv. 17.

"Ede, bibe, lude, post mortem nulla voluptas."

MCCLIV.—Prosperity will discover what a man is.

It is said of Pius Quintus, so called, that when he was a mean man he was looked on as a good man ; but when he came to be a cardinal, he doubted of his salvation ; and when a pope, he despaired of it. So hard a thing is it for a good man to use a prosperous estate well. Prosperity is that which will tell you what a man is ; it will soon find him out : give him power, and he will soon show what grace is in him ; put him into an office, and he will presently be seen in it. Hence it is observable, that the same word that

"Vix Pius intus."

"Magistratus indicat virum."

"Non facile est æquâ commoda mente pati."— OVID, Art. ii.

signifies prosperity, שְׁלוֹת (shalvat), in the Hebrew, is rendered by the Arabic, investigatio, and by the Septuagint, ἐξέτασις (inquisition, or examination), to make a strict search, or to examine thoroughly: so that, whereas adversity tries but one grace, that is, patience, prosperity will try all graces; it will try a man's love, whether he love God or the world; it will try his zeal, whether at a dead lift he will venture Christ or his estate; it will try his hope, whether it be on heaven or earth; it will try his charity, whether it be at home or abroad; it will try the whole man, and suddenly discover to the world what mettle he is made of.

MCCLV.—God's ends and man's ends as to the persecution of His Church, the vast difference betwixt them.

Whitaker's Serm.,
Westm., 1647.

A PHYSICIAN letteth a man blood by the application of leeches, and they suck much blood from him; but the physician's ends are one thing, and the leeches' ends are another thing: the leech draweth blood from the man only to satisfy itself; but the physician letteth the man blood to cure his distemper. Such is the difference between God's ends and wicked men's ends, in the persecution of His own people: God, by suffering His own Church and people to be persecuted, it is for to purge away their evil distempers of sin and security, or whatsoever it is that may offend, that thereby He may make His people better by their afflictions; but wicked and ungodly men, by troubling the Church, it is for to destroy them, and root them out, that they may be no more a people, to accomplish their own wicked designs, and to satisfy their rage and malice upon them, in their utter ruin and overthrow. These are their ends, but God hath other ends; as Joseph said to his brethren, "You did intend me hurt, but God did intend me good." So it may be said concerning all ungodly, wicked men: they do intend evil against the Church and people of God, but God intends His people good: they intend to persecute and destroy, but He intends, maugre all their contrivements whatsoever, to preserve, keep, and continue His Church to the end of the world. Let the Church's enemies plough never so deeply, and make furrows on the backs of God's people never so long, yet God's ends are grace and mercy and peace to do them good in the latter end.

"Sæpe tulit lassus uccus amarus opem."—OVID, Amor.
Gen. l. 20.

"Magna est veritas et prævalebit."

MCCLVI.—The serious confession of one sinner to another may be the conversion of one and the other.

Eusebius, in Hist.
eccl., lib. iii., c. 32.

"O! m' meminisse dolebit."

"Numen confessus aliquod patet."—
OVID.

James v. 16.

It is related of St. John the Evangelist, that being upon his return from Patmos to Ephesus, after the death of Domitian, he was set upon by a company of thieves, amongst whom was a young man, their captain; to him St. John applied himself, by way of wholesome counsel and advice, which took so good effect, that he became a new man and was converted, and went thereupon to all his fellow-thieves and besought them, in the name of Jesus Christ, that they would not walk any longer in their former wicked ways. He told them withal, that he was troubled in conscience for his former wicked life, and earnestly entreated them that, as they tendered the eternal welfare of their own poor souls, they would now leave off their old courses, and live more conscionably for the time to come. The counsel was good and well taken, so that many of those great robbers became great converts. Thus it is that one sinner's confession of his faults to another may happily prove the conversion of one and the other. Hence is it that the meaning of that apostolical precept, "Confess your faults one to another," is made out by some interpreters to be, that those that have been partners together in sin, they should go one to another, and seriously confess their sins to each other. He that hath been a drunkard, let him go to his companion, and tell him that he is troubled in mind because of his former excess; and let the unclean person go to his partner in sin, and tell her God hath troubled his conscience for his lust; and it may be this may awaken her conscience too, so that she may bethink herself of her wicked courses, and be converted.

MCCLVII.—The not laying of the Church's troubles to heart reprobable.

It is worth the taking notice of, how that when the Holy Ghost doth reckon up the tribes of Israel for their renown, as, "Of the tribe of Judah were sealed twelve thousand, of the tribe of Reuben were sealed twelve thousand," &c., but if you mark the enumeration, you shall find one tribe left out, and that is the tribe of Dan. And why is it so? Much ado there is to find out the reason of God's omission of that tribe: one reason is, and that a true one too, because this tribe made a defection from the true worship of God, and fell to idolatry; another reason there is, and that probable enough, because they did not lay to heart the calamities of God's Church; for when the other tribes were jeopardising their lives in the highest places of the field, they remained in ships, and let the rest of the tribes shift for themselves; they would not lose their trading so, they would follow their merchandizing. And for this it was that God sets a brand of obloquy upon them, in not allowing them so much as a name amongst their brethren and companions. And thus reprobable are all they, too, that lay nothing of the Church's calamities to heart. Let religion sink or swim, the Gospel stand or fall, the Church of God prosper or prosper not, they are but as so many Gallios, they care for none of all these things; like the tribe of Dan, they remain in their ships, at their trades, at their bargaining, buying, and selling; though the Church's sorrows come on never so fast, they look on as altogether unconcerned, not in any way contributing to the support thereof.

Rev. vii.

Judges xviii. 30.

"E terra spectantes naufragium et de mari judicantes Achivos." — ERASM., in Adag.

MCCLVIII.—Heaven the poor saint's comfortable inheritance.

VALENS, the emperor, threatened St. Basil, that let him go whither he would, yet he should neither by sea nor land be safe from his power. "Well," said the good man, "be it so. For all the emperor's rage, I shall be either in heaven or under heaven." And in the like manner, there was a cardinal threatened Luther that there should not be a place left for him in all the empire of Germany wherein he should be free from danger. "Oh," saith Luther, smilingly, "if earth cannot keep me safe, heaven shall." Thus it is that many of the dear servants of God, such as, perhaps, have no place in the world wherein to put their heads, or such as heretofore had better accommodations, but are now glad to live in poor cottages, smoky houses, &c., or such as, it may be, are driven to and fro by sea and land, as having no abiding-place of rest or safety, where to repose themselves. Yet here is their hope, here their comfortable assurance, that, maugre the malice of men and devils, they shall be either in heaven or under heaven; though they have no abiding-place on earth below, yet they have one prepared for them eternally in the heavens above.

Niceph., in Hist. Eccl.

Sleidan, in Com.

"Locum virtus habet inter astra, — SEN., Hercules.

MCCLIX.—The not growing in grace reprov'd.

LOOK but upon a company of ants or pismires, how busy they are about a mole-hill; how they run to and fro, and weary themselves in their several movings, yet never grow great, but as to the slender proportion of their bodies are still the same. And such are many Christians in these days, many professors in our times, who go from one ordinance to another, and yet make little progress or increase in religion; such as run from one church to another, from one preacher to another, and, it may be, from one opinion to another, but never grow up to the true grace and in the true knowledge of the Lord Jesus.

Love's Gr. with in Grace.

2 Pet. iii. 18.

MCCLX.—Whilst we are here in this world to provide for heaven hereafter.

THERE is mention made of a nation that used to choose their kings every year, and whilst they were in their annual government they lived in all abundance of state, had all the fullness Sparta.

"Implentur veteris Bacchi," &c.

their hearts could wish ; but when the year was once over, all their pomp and glory were over too, and they banished into some obscure, remote place for ever. One king, hearing this, being called to rule over that nation, made such full use of his time, that the year wherein he reigned as king he was not lavish in spending his revenues, but heaped up all the treasure he could get together, and sent it before him to that place whither he should be banished, and so in that year of his government made a comfortable provision for all his life-time afterwards. Thus it is that God hath given to every one of us a time to live here in this world, and but a little time at the most ; it may be not a week, not a day, not an hour. It will be, then, the greatest part of our wisdom, that whilst we are here in the way to salvation, and suck at the breasts of those ordinances that may feed us to eternal life, and draw at those wells called in Scripture the wells of salvation, now to lay up for the time of our banishment, before we go hence and be no more seen, and be sure that whilst we are in this world to provide for heaven hereafter.

"Se casus componit ad omnes, quum vi-derimus aliquem servum Dei providere," &c.—AUG.,
in Lib. de Serm.
Dom. in Mon.

MCCLXI.—As we are called Christians, to bear up ourselves like Christians.

Plutarch, in Vita.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT, when he was invited to run a race amongst the common multitude, gave them this answer : " Were I not the son of a king, I should not care what company I kept ; but being the son of a prince, I must employ myself in such company as is suitable to my birth and breeding." Thus stood he, then, upon the honour of his family, and would not disgrace his princely nature so far as to be familiar amongst the vulgar rabble. And thus must every one of us do. We have each of us a race to run—for so the ways of Christianity are called. We are as Alexander was, kings and princes in all lands. Now, so it is, that sin, as a vagabond and loose companion, would seek to converse with us. The devil's aim is that we should mix ourselves with such lusts and such sins as he presents unto us. Lust would have our hearts, and sin would have our affections : both of them strive to be familiar with us ; but let us answer them from a noble and generous mind, as Alexander did, that we will not so abase and dishonour ourselves as to mix or join ourselves with the base and common things of this world, but stand upon the honour of our spiritual birth, and do nothing that may any way be dishonourable to the excellency of our high calling in Christ Jesus.

"Non nati, sed facti sumus Christiani."

"Delinquendi materia debet præscin-di." — CYPRIAN, lib. i., ep. 2.

Paul, iii. 14.

MCCLXII.—To take especial care for the soul's safety.

Bernardin, Senensis, de Morte Gloriosa.

It is observable, that if merchants venture a great or most part of their estates at sea, where there may be hazard in the voyage, they will run speedily to ensure a great part of their commodities. And thus should all of us do. This body of ours is the ship ; the merchandize and freight in this ship is no less than our most precious souls. Glory celestial is the port whereto we would arrive, but many dangers there are in the way ; storms and tempests of temptations are on every side : we may chance to run upon the rocks of presumption, or sink into the quicksands of despair. What is, then, to be done ? By all means go to the insuring office ; let us run to the testimony of Christ's Spirit in our own spirits ; and by the evidence of word make it out clear unto us, that the ship shall be safe, the commodity brought secure to the haven ; that ship, body and soul, and all shall anohor safely in heaven, there to rest with Christ in glory for evermore.

MCCLXIII.—Idleness the very inlet to all temptations.

Greenham, in his W'rk.

It was the speech of Mr. Greenham—some time a painful (painstaking) preacher of this nation—that when the devil tempted a poor soul, she came to him for advice, how she might resist the temptation, and he gave her this answer : " Never be idle, but be always well employed ; for in my own experience I have found it, when the devil came to tempt me, I told him that I was not at leisure to hearken to his temptation, and by this means I resisted all his assaults." Thus must all of us do ; when the devil comes to tempt any of us, say, " I am not at leisure to lend an ear to thy temptations ; I am otherwise employed ; I am in the work of my God, busied in the work of my lawful calling, and taken up with the thoughts of God's blessings thereupon." Then he will never be able to fasten upon thee ; for so it is, that he never gets advantage of any man or woman but either when they are out of God's way, or idle, or have their hands in some sinful action, then it is that they do even tempt the tempter to tempt them, and lay themselves open to a world of sin and wickedness.

" Non vacat exiguis rebus adesse," &c.

" In promptu causa est desidiosus erat."
—OVID.

MCCLXIV.—Action the very life of the soul.

WHILST the stream keeps running it keeps clear ; but if it comes once to a standing water, then it breeds frogs and toads and all manner of filth. The keys that men keep in their pockets and use every day wax brighter and brighter, but if they be laid aside and hang by the walls they soon grow rusty. Thus it is that action is the very life of the soul : whilst we keep going and running in the ways of God's commandments, we keep clear and free from the world's pollutions ; but if we once flag in our diligence, and stand still, oh, what a puddle of sin will the heart be ! how rusty and useless will our graces grow ! how unserviceable for God's worship ! how unfit for man's, by reason of the many spiritual diseases that will invade the soul ! Just like scholars, that are for the most part given to a sedentary life, whose bodies are more exposed to ill humours than any others ; whereas, they whose livelihoods lie in a handicraft trade are always in motion and stirring, so that the motion expels the ill humours, that they cannot seize upon the body. So in the soul : the less any man acts in the matter of its concernment, the more spiritual diseases and infirmities will grow in it ; whereas, the more active and industrious men are, the less power will ill distempers have upon them.

Drexellii Zodiacus Christianus.

" Emollit otium vires, sicut rubigo ferrum."

" Omnis virtus in actione consistit."
—CIC., Offic., i.

MCCLXV.—The true repentant sinner's encouragement, notwithstanding all his former wickedness.

It is very observable, in the genealogy of Christ, that there are but four women mentioned (it being not usual to mention any), and the blessed Spirit of God sets a mark of infamy upon them all. The first is Tamar (Matt. i. 3) : she was an incestuous woman, for she lay with her father-in-law (Gen. xxxviii. 18). The second is Rahab (verse 5) : she was a harlot (Heb. xi. 31). The third is Ruth (verse 5) : she came of Moab, the son of Lot, by incest, begotten of his own daughter (Gen. xix. 37). The fourth is Bathsheba (verse 6) : she was guilty of adultery. And why was this done, but for the comfort of the most infamous sinners to come to Christ, and to take notice, for their better encouragement, that though they have been above measure sinful, yet, by their conversion to God and aversion from sin, by a serious and hearty repentance, all infamy of their former ways is quite taken away, and their names entered in the book of life and eternal salvation,

Love's Zealous Christian.
Matt. xi. 12.

" Suprema pericula semper, dant veniam culpæ."— CLAUDIAN,
Eutrop., ii.

MCCLXVI.—Not to be troubled at the prosperity of the wicked, and why so.

Would it not be accounted folly in a man that is heir to many thousands per annum that he should envy a stage-player, clothed in the habit of a king, and yet not heir to one

De Carbone, Interior Flame.

foot of land?—who, though he have the form, respect, and apparel of a king or nobleman, yet he is, at the same time, a very beggar, and worth nothing. Thus, wicked men, though they are arrayed gorgeously, and fare deliciously, wanting nothing, and having more than heart can wish, yet they are but only possessors: the godly Christian is the heir. What good doth all their prosperity do them? It doth but hasten their ruin, not their reward. The ox that is the labouring ox is the longer lived than the ox that is put into the pasture; the very putting of him there doth but hasten his slaughter; and when God puts wicked men into fat pastures, into places of honour and power, it is but to hasten their ruin. Let no man, therefore, fret himself because of evil-doers, nor be envious at the prosperity of the wicked; for the candle of the wicked shall be put into everlasting darkness: they shall soon be cut off, and wither as a green herb.

"Prospera hujus mundi asperitatem habent veram."—AUG., in Matt., Serm. xxix.

Ps. xxxvii. 1, 2.

MCCLXVII.—Godly and wicked men, their difference in the hatred of sin.

Inchini, Scala Cæli.

As it is with two children, the one forbears to touch a coal, because it will black and smut his hand; the other will not by any means be brought to handle it, because he perceives it to be a fire-coal, and will burn his fingers: thus, all wicked and ungodly men, they will not touch sin because it will burn; they may be, and often are, troubled for sin, but their disquietness for sin ariseth more from the evil of punishment, the effect of sin, than from the evil that is in the nature of sin; they are troubled for sin, but it is because sin doth destroy the soul, and not because sin doth defile the soul; because God pursueth sin, and not because He hates sin; more, because it is against God's justice that is provoked, than because it is against the holiness of God which is dishonoured; because God threatens sin, not because God doth forbid sin; because of the hell for sin, not because of the hell in sin. But now, on the other side, all good and godly men, they hate and loathe sin, because it is of a smutting and defiling nature, because it is against the nature of God, because God loathes and hates it, more because it is against God's command than because God doth punish it; not because of the damning power of sin, but because of the defiling power of sin, &c.

"Oderunt peccare mali formidine peccati."

"Oderunt peccare boni virtutis amore."

MCCLXVIII.—Custom in sin causeth hardness in sin.

Sedgwood's Serm., Westminster, 1644.

Look but upon a youth when he comes first to be an apprentice to some artificer or handicraft trade: his hand is tender, and no sooner is he set to work but it blisters, so that he is much pained thereby; but when he hath continued some time at work then his hand hardens, and he goes on without any grievance at all. It is just thus with a sinner: before he be accustomed to any evil way, conscience is tender and full of remorse, like a queazy stomach, ready to keck (vomit) at the least thing that is offensive; oh, but a continued custom, and making a trade of sin, that is it which makes the conscience to be hard and brawny, able to feel nothing. As it is in a smith's forge, a dog that comes newly in cannot endure the fiery sparks to fly about his ears, but being once used to it he sleeps securely: so, let wicked men be long used to the devil's work-house, to be slaves and vassals to sin, the sparks of hell-fire may fly about them, and the fire of hell flash upon their souls, yet never trouble them, never disturb them at all; and all this ariseth from a continued custom in a course of evil.

"Consuetudo peccandi tollit sensum peccati."

MCCLXIX.—The more a man is now troubled for sin the less shall he be troubled hereafter, and why so.

Drexellii Gymnasium Pannicti.

It is well known, that if a landlord take a great fine at the first coming into the house, he doth take a less rent for the future. Thus, as landlords deal with their tenants, so God with His people : He puts them to a great fine at the first ; He makes sin cost them many a tear, many a night's trouble, many a day's disquiet, many a sigh, many a groan in the spirit ; but here is the comfort : the greater the fine, the lesser the yearly rent ; the more a man is troubled for sin at the present the less fear and perplexity shall be his portion hereafter, for he shall have the joy and comfort of believing ; he shall have the more perfect peace at his death ; so that when he comes to die he shall have little else to do but to lie down and die, committing his soul into the hands of a faithful Creator and Redeemer.

"Dolor hic tibi proderit olim."

MCCLXX.—How it is that the singling out of one beloved sin makes way to a full sight of all sin.

WHEN Christ went about to bring the woman of Samaria to remorse and sorrow for sin, He singled out one sin amongst all the rest, and told her, "Thou art an harlot ;" and the Scripture gives us this hint, that the singling out of that one sin so far opened her eyes, that she saw all other sins ; whereupon she said, "Lo ! behold the Man that hath told me all that ever I did !" And yet Christ told her only of her adultery. So let every one of us take notice, that the singling out of one beloved sin makes way to the full sight of all sin. Let us examine, then, what is that Delilah, that darling sin, that we play withal, and hug so much in our bosoms. Single out but that, and the coast will be so clear, the mists and fogs of darkness so much expelled, that we shall have a distinct view of all the sins that ever we committed—not a general and confused apprehension of sin, which only brings in a general humiliation of sin, and hath, without the great mercy of God, been the undoing of many a precious soul for ever.

John iv. 17.

John iv. 29.

MCCLXXI.—Assured Christians must be patient Christians.

It is mentioned that, in the time of that Marian persecution, there was a woman who, being conveyed before Bonner—then bishop of London—upon the trial of religion, he threatened her that he would take away her husband from her : saith she, "Christ is my husband." "I will take away thy child." "Christ," saith she, "is better to me than ten sons." "I will strip thee," saith he, "of all thy outward comforts." "Yea, but Christ is mine," saith she, "and you cannot strip me of Him." The thoughts of this bore up the woman's heart ; spoil her of all, and take away all, yet Christ was hers, and Him they cannot take away. Thus, when the soul lives in the assurance of God's love, and of its calling to grace and glory, it cannot but make a man very patient to endure with cheerfulness whatsoever of opposition he shall meet with here below. There is a remarkable phrase in that of the prophet : "The inhabitants of Zion shall not say, I am sick ; the people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity." A strange passage ! He doth not say they were not sick, but the text saith they should not say so. And what is the reason ? Why should the people forget their sorrows, and not remember their pains ? This was it : the Lord hath forgiven them their iniquities. The sense of pardon took away the sense of pain. And thus should all of us walk, to show that trouble cannot daunt us nor any way startle us, but, as assured Christians, to be patient under all sufferings whatsoever.

Fox's Acts and Monuments.

"In tormentis beatus est sapiens."—LACTANTIUS, Instit., lib. iii. Isa. xxxiii. 24.

"Sæpe levant penas," &c.

MCCLXXII.—Worldly-mindedness a great hindrance to the comfortable enjoyment of spiritual graces.

WHAT the philosophers say of the eclipse of the sun, that it is occasioned by the intervening of the moon between the sun and our sight, is true in this case : if the world get between Christ, the Sun of righteousness, and our sight, it will darken our sight of Jesus Christ, and bring eclipses upon our comforts and graces. Again, those men who dig deep into the bowels of the earth, they are oftentimes choked and stifled by damps that come from the earth. So it is with Christians: those who will be ever poring and digging about the things of this world, it is a thousand to one that if from worldly things a damp doth not arise to smother their comforts and quench their graces. Lastly, a candle, though it may shine to the view of all, yet put it under ground, and, though there be not the least puff of wind, the very damp will stifle the light of the flame. And so it is that men may shine like candles in their comforts, yet bring them but under the earth, and a clod of that will stifle their candle, will damp their spiritual comforts, and bereave them of those joys that are in themselves unspeakable.

Aristoteles, Cyprian, Lect., John Magirus. "Mundi amor et Dei pariter in uno corde habitare non possunt."—CYPR., de Adv., xii.

MCCLXXIII.—God so ordereth it, that few or none of His people live and die without assurance of their salvation.

Bolton's Instruction for Conforming Afflicted Conscience.

It is reported of one Mrs. Honeywood, a famous professor of God's truth, and one who, for many years together, lay under the burthen of a wounded spirit, and was much troubled in mind, for the want of her assurance as to the matter of salvation, that at length there came a minister to her, who endeavoured to settle her hopes and comforts in Jesus Christ; and, urging promises of the Gospel unto her, she took it with a kind of indignation and anger that he should offer to present any promises to her, to whom, as she thought, they did not belong; and, having a Venice glass in her hand, she held it up, and said, "Speak no more to me of salvation, for I shall as surely be damned as this poor brittle glass shall be broken against the wall!"—throwing it with all her force to break it. But it so pleased God that, by a miraculous providence, the glass was preserved whole. The minister, seeing this, made a happy use of the accident, took up the glass, and said unto her, "Behold! God must work a miracle for you before you will believe." And from that day, saith the story, she was a woman very strong in the assurance of God's love and favour. Thus did God indulge the infirmity of His poor despairing servant at that time; and rather than that any of His people, now or hereafter, shall live or die without assurance of their salvation, He will work it even by a miracle, or some unusual, extraordinary way, to them altogether unknown.

"Qui nihil protest sperare, desperet ni-hil."—SEN., Medea.

"Dabit Deus his quoque finem."—
VIRGIL.

MCCLXXIV.—Grace in the heart is certain, though the feeling thereof be uncertain; and how so.

*Love, on Withdrawing of the Spirit,
Gen. vi. 3.*

As the air is sometimes clear, and sometimes cloudy; the sea sometimes ebbing, sometimes flowing—ebbing in our comforts, as well as flowing in our graces; or as the trees of the field, sometimes flowering, green, and growing, another time naked, withered, and, as it were, even dead: so are all Christians in the feeling of their graces. Their apprehension of graces is subject to much change, though their graces be not so, for grace in itself is certain and unchangeable. All the devils of hell cannot pluck one believer out of God's hand. "Those whom Thou hast given Me I will keep," saith Christ, "and none shall take them from Me." The foundation of God stands sure, though our knowledge that we build upon that foundation be not sure to us; the Lord knoweth who are His, though we do not; and hence it is that, though grace itself be an unshaken foundation, yet our feeling of grace is not so, but subject to many alterations and changes.

*Abbot, contra Pet.
Beritium, de Amis-sione Gratie.*

John xvii. 12.

2 Tim. ii. 19.

MCCLXXV.—The great danger of taking up a false persuasion of our effectual calling.

*Lud. de Carbo, de subspiciis Cognitione,
lib. ii., cap. 3.*

As a man who is in a pleasant sleep dreams that he is a king, hath loyal and obedient subjects about him, a large revenue, with a treasury full of gold and silver, yet, when he awakes, behold the man is a very beggar, and hath nothing;—just such is a man that takes up a false persuasion of his effectual calling, when (God knows) he is not called at all. Or like a man that is asleep upon the mast of a ship, he is in a golden dream, and his thoughts are all upon kingdoms and thousands which he seemeth to have already in possession; but, happily, or rather unhappily, in that very moment wherein he solaceth himself in his imaginary happiness, a storm ariseth, the ship is in danger to be overwhelmed, and the man is tumbled into the sea, and so drowned. Thus it is with many men and women: they nourish golden dreams, and have very strong hopes that heaven is theirs and Christ theirs, whereas, alas! they do extremely befool themselves, being all this while upon the very brink of hell, and so are tumbled in before they be aware.

Prov. xxv. 18

MCCLXXVI.—Sin committed with deliberation, premeditation, &c., greatly provokes the Spirit of God.

As it is with a friend, if you give him a blow peradventure, or strike him by chance, though he may be very angry and take it ill at the first, yet, when he shall understand that it was done against your will, he is soon pacified; but if he perceive that you plot and contrive his death, that makes him look about him, and resolve that he will never come into your company any more. Thus it is with the blessed Spirit of God: when He sees thee fall into sin unadvisedly and inconsiderately, He will not withdraw from thee for this; but if He perceive that thou dost waylay Him, dost deliberate and contrive sin, this highly provokes Him, if not for ever, yet for a long departure from thee. Hence it is that a deliberate will, to sin without the act, is more sinful than the act of sin without a deliberate will: as in the case of St. Peter, that man does worse who purposeth to deny Christ, though he never do it, than St. Peter who did actually deny Christ, and never intended it. Let every man, therefore, look to his purposes and deliberations; for if he sin deliberately and advisedly, the Holy Ghost is highly provoked, and he is upon the very next step to the sin of those against whom the prophet prays, "Lord, be not merciful to those that sin maliciously!"

Rich. de Media-villa, in Proverbia Celsi.

"Tale erit opus tuum, qualis fuerit intentio tua."— ISIDOR., in Sibilis.
gullis, lib. ii.

MCCLXXVII.—Reprobate and regenerate men; their different enjoyment of the motions of the Holy Spirit.

"WICKED men," says one, "partake of the Spirit as cooks do of the meat they dress: they taste as much only as will relish their palates, but do not eat so much as will fill their bellies, whereby nature may be strengthened and refreshed." But the regenerate are as the invited guests: they not only taste the meat, but also make a full meal thereof. Wicked men, they have but a taste only; they are just like men going by an apothecary's shop: they may smell the sweet scents of his pots, but it is the sick patient that gets benefit by his cordials. Thus it is with the wicked: God may and doth give them tastes of His Spirit, but they have not so much as will do their souls good thereby; it is only the godly that have the saving participations of grace here and shall be sure of the fullness of glory hereafter.

Bolton, serm. P. 1.

Heb. vi. 4.

"Summis tantum labris pitiscare."

Phil. i. 11.

MCCLXXVIII.—The motions of God's Spirit in wicked men tend to outward formality.

It is reported of one that could fast seven days in a monastery, but not half a day in the wilderness, who, being asked the reason, he gave this answer, "When I fast in the monastery, I feed upon vain-glory and the applause of men, but not so in the wilderness." It is

In *Speculo Exam-
plorum*.

"Herodes devotionem promittit, sed gladium acuit," &c.—L. ak 70, 1, 6, Matt. ii.

Aldrovandi Ornithologia.

just so with many professors: the motions of God's Spirit in them are such as tend to formality, such as put them upon outward and visible good, but never upon inward and secret duties, as to examine their hearts, to watch over their ways, and to keep close communion with God in secret. As it is said of the nightingale, that, if it see a man listening, it will sing the more sweetly: so they are better to men than they are to God, and devouter in the church than they are in the closet; they are for good things done in public, not in private; so as men applaud them, they care not what or who it is that disallows them.

MCCLXXIX.—How it is to be understood that the Holy Spirit dwelleth in us.

Charron, Trait Veritez.

"Spiritus Dei habitat in nobis, quia regit gubernat et sanctificat."—PAREUS, in locum.

1 Cor. vi. 19.

2 Tim. i. 14.

THE sun that is in the firmament, we are wont to say, is in such a part of the house or in such a window; but when we say so, we do not mean that the body of the sun is there, but only that the light, heat, or influence of the sun is there. So, though the Scripture telleth us that the Holy Ghost, or Spirit, dwelleth in us, the meaning is, not that the essence or Person the Holy Ghost is in us (as the Familists would have it), but only the motions and graces of the Spirit are there, guiding, governing, and sanctifying our words and works, which otherwise, of themselves, would be but vain and foolish; the meaning, therefore, of those two places in the apostle, "Ye are the temple of the Holy Ghost," and "The Holy Ghost dwelleth in you," are not literally, but metaphorically to be understood, as many other expressions of the like kind in the Book of God are to be.

MCCLXXX.—To take heed of smaller sins as bringing on greater.

Low, on Willing drawing of the Spirit.

"Noli contemnere venialia quia minima sunt," &c.—AUG., de Doctr. Chordit.

THERE is a story of a young man who was tempted by the devil and his own wicked heart to commit three sins—as, to kill his father, lie with his mother, and to be drunk. The two former he would by no means do, as being things abhorrent to nature; but (thought he) I will yield to the last, because it was the least, which was enough: for, being drunk, he killed his father and ravished his own mother. Here, now, were two horrid, ugly sins, murder and incest, ushered in by one that was not of so deep a dye. It concerns us, then, to take heed of falling into lesser sins, they being as inlets to greater. A little thief put in at the window may open the doors for stronger and greater to come in; a wedge, small and thin in one part, makes way for a greater; and little sins will draw us on to greater. Our own hearts will prompt us to all sin at first, but will labour to draw us on by degrees from lesser sins to greater, from sins less obnoxious to sins more scandalous, until we be become abominable therein, and so, without God's mercy, perish everlastingly.

MCCLXXXI.—Corruption of nature left even in the most regenerate men, to humble them.

Aldrovandi Ornithologia.

Gesnerus, de Quadruped.

God hath so ordered it in nature, that creatures of the greatest excellency should have some manifest deformity, whether it be in birds or beasts. Among birds, the peacock, a bird of the gayest feathers, yet it hath the foulest feet; the swan, a bird of the whitest feathers, yet of the blackest skin; the eagle, a bird of the quickest sight and of the highest flight, yet the most ravenous among birds: and among beasts, the lion, the goodliest of all the woods, yet the most fierce and cruel; the fox, most subtle, yet a creature of the foulest smell. Thus God hath ordered it even amongst the creatures irrational, and thus it is with His own people in respect of grace: though they have many excellent endowments and gifts, yet He suffers some corruptions of nature in them, to humble them; so that humility, the best of graces, comes from the worst root, our sin; and pride, the worst of sins, comes from the best root, our grace; which caused that saying of Mr. Fox, the martyrologist, that his graces hurt him more than his sins—meaning, that many times he was proud of his gifts, but humbled by reason of his sins and natural infirmities.

"Superbia etiam recte factis est cavenda."—AUG., de Natura et Gratia.

MCCLXXXII.—Not to consult with God's secrets, but His revealed Word.

It was a good saying of Mr. Bradford, that famous martyr of Christ Jesus, that a man should not go to the university of predestination until he were well grounded in the grammar school of obedience and repentance. And most sure it is, that we are not to consult with God's secret decrees, but with His revealed Word: "Secret things belong to the Lord our God, but revealed things to us and our children for ever." We are not to look to the decrees of God, and upon them—either to do or not do our duty—but we are to look to His revealed will, which bids us be conversant in holy duties of religion and godliness; we are not to search the secret records of heaven, but the revealed will of God, which is able to make us wise to salvation.

The Martyr's Letters.

Deut. xxix. 29.

"Quæ Deus occulta esse voluit non sunt scrutanda."—PROSPER., de Pœnit. Gent.

MCCLXXXIII.—The consideration of mercies formerly enjoyed an excellent means to bear up our spirits under present afflictions.

THERE is a story of a man, aged fifty years or thereabouts, who lived forty-eight of that time and never knew what sickness was; but so it was, that all the two last years of his life he was sickly, and impatient under it; yet at last he reasoned the case thus with himself: "The Lord might have given me forty-eight years of sickness and but two years of health, yet He hath done the contrary; I will, therefore, rather admire the mercy of God in giving me so long a time of health, than repine and murmur at Him for giving me so short a time of sickness." And thus must all of us consider, that we have had more mercies in our life to cheer us up than we have had crosses to discomfort us. What though the Lord doth now visit us with sickness, we have had more years of health than of sickness; what though this or that comfort be taken from us, yet we have a great many more left us still. Hence is that advice of the wise man, "In the day of adversity, consider." What must we consider? That God hath set the one against the other—that is, though we are in afflictions now, yet He hath given us mercies heretofore, and, it may be, will give us prosperity again; He hath balanced our present afflictions with former mercies, so that, if we should set the mercies we have enjoyed against the present afflictions we suffer, we should soon find the tale of our mercies to exceed the number of sufferings, be they of what nature or quality soever imaginable.

Love, in Withdrawing of the Spirit.

"Neque enim ignari sumus ante malorum, O passi graviores," &c.—VIRG., Æneid. i.

Eccles. vii. 14.

"Memento juvabit."

MCCLXXXIV.—Not to mourn excessively for the loss of any worldly enjoyment whatsoever; and why so.

It is related of a minister of God's Word, that, visiting a neighbour, whose child lay a-dying, he endeavoured to comfort her; but she, being much grieved and dejected with sorrow, would by no means be comforted. The minister said unto her, "Woman, why do you sorrow so much? Pacify yourself. If your child should live, it may be so that God might make it a scourge and vexation to you, by taking wicked and sinful courses." She answered that she did not care if her child did recover, though he were hanged afterward. This son of hers did recover, and was afterwards executed for some villainy committed. Now, let any one judge whether it had not been a greater mercy, and a thousand times better Love's Christian's Directory.

"Mitigat vim doloris considerata æquitas ferientis."
—GREG., in Mor.

Gen. xxxv. 18.
2 Sam. xii. 16.

for her, to have seen him buried before her, than that he should have come to such an unhappy end. Thus it is that that comfort which any of us all shall so excessively mourn for the want of maybe would have proved a greater cross and trouble, should but God have continued it still unto us, whether it be the loss of life or estate, of a loving wife, or an only son—as it was in Rachel's case, and in David's, that if God had given him the life of his child, it would have been the living monument of his shame, and all that knew the child might have said, "Yonder goes David's bastard!" the consideration whereof should allay and take off the edge of all excess of sorrow for the loss of any temporal comfort, any worldly enjoyment whatsoever.

MCCLXXXV.—Not to be troubled at afflictions, because God intends good by them.

Moulin, de l'Amour de Dieu.

Gen. I. 20.

"Post afflictiones, vita tranquillior."
—NAZIAN., in Orat. de Cypriano.

SUPPOSE a man very much in debt, and in such need of money that he knew not well how to subsist without throwing himself upon the sad charity of others, who might, if they had but hearts, possibly relieve him, should go to some especial intimate friend and make known unto him the lowness of his condition, and crave relief accordingly. Now, if this friend of his (which is somewhat strange) should go presently to his chest and take out a considerable bag of money and throw it at him, and, in the throwing of it, break his head, or give him some slight scar, can it be imagined that he would take it unkindly? No, certainly. Thus it is that every affliction that God is pleased to lay upon us shall work for our good. We may say as Joseph did to his brethren, "Though you intended all this for my hurt, yet God intended and turned it for my good, and will work benefit and advantage to me by it, and promote my spiritual good; that, as afflictions do abound, my consolations in Christ shall abound much more!"—every affliction, like Jonathan's rod, having honey on the top; and therefore let us bear them patiently.

MCCLXXXVI.—How to know whether we are more grieved for sin than for worldly sorrow and trouble.

De Mediavilla,
Clavis David.

WHEN a man is brought to a low condition and a great decay in the world, so that his trade is quite fallen and his stock spent; now, if such a man be more troubled for his sin than that brought him to so low an ebb in the world, than for the affliction and trouble itself, then he will not commit a sin to repair and make up his losses, though he did know assuredly that the committing of such a sin would make up all again. As in the story of a nobleman, whose son and heir was supposed to be bewitched, and, being advised to go to some wizard, or cunning man (as they are called), to have some help for his son, that he might be unwitched again, he answered, "Oh, by no means; I had rather the witch should have my son than the devil." But if a man make no conscience to avoid or remove an affliction, if he will break the hedge of a fair command to avoid the foul way of some heavy affliction, it is a sign that he mourns more for the cross that lies upon him than for his sins and trespasses, and that he never grieved so much for his corruptions as for his corrections.

MCCLXXXVII.—Worldly crosses turned into spiritual advantages.

Love's Christian's Directory.

As little children, when they see a heap of beautiful and sweet roses lying upon a table before them, and their mother goes and puts them in a mortar, and therein beats them all to pieces, the children cry out, and think the mother spoils them, though she does it merely to make a conserve of them, that they may be more useful and durable: thus it is that we think we have comforts like beds of roses ; yet, when God takes them from us, and breaks them all to pieces, we are apt to conceive that they are all spoiled and destroyed, and that we are utterly undone by it, whereas God intends it to work for our greater benefit and advantage. Rom. viii. 8.

MCCLXXXVIII.—How to become true possessors of riches.

POSSESSIONS and riches of this world are like a rose in a man's hand : if he use it gently, it will preserve its savour and its scent and colour a great while ; but if he crush it and handle it roughly, it loseth both its colour and sweetness. Thus, if a rich man use and employ his wealth well, he will possess it the longer ; but if he set his heart too much upon it, he will quickly lose it : he may possess it, but by no means must he let his wealth possess him. If riches increase, he must not set his heart upon them ; his eye or hand or tongue may be upon them, but not his heart : his money must come no nearer his heart than his hands. Hence was that saying of the heathen : "Rebus non me trado, sed commodo (I may lend myself, but I will not give myself to my wealth) ;" and so must all of us do if ever we intend to become true possessors of worldly riches and endowments. "Aurum erogare bonum est reponere malum," &c. Raven, in Serm. Ps. lxxii. 10.

Seneca, in Lib. de Beneficiis.

MCCLXXXIX.—All worldly comforts transitory.

It was a custom in Rome, that when the emperor went by upon some grand day in all his imperial pomp, there was an officer appointed to burn flax before him, crying out : "Sic transit gloria mundi !" which was purposely done, to put him in mind that all his honour and grandeur should soon vanish and pass away, like the nimble smoke raised from that burning flax. And it was a good meditation that one had, standing by a river side : says he, "The water which I see now runs away, and I see it no more ; and the comforts of this world are like this running water, still gliding and running away from us." So, most true it is that all men, and such as do most indulge themselves with those bitter-sweets that the world doth or can present, they are but like smoke, that soon vanisheth away ; transitory, either ebbing or flowing, never at any certain ; but fleeting and fading, coming to us with sparrows' wings, slowly, and with much difficulty, but flying away with eagles' wings, hardly discoverable which way or how they took their flight on such a sudden : it must, therefore, be our care so to use this world as if we used it not, for the fashion of it passeth away ; and seeing we cannot enjoy the comforts thereof any long time, let us use them well to God's glory, who gave them, and not abuse them to our own prejudice. Lazius, Com. Reip. Rom.

"Fallax est hic mundus, finis dubius exitus horribilis."—BLESEN-SIS.

1 Cor. vii. 31.

MCCXC.—How it is that a man may be said to abuse the lawful comforts of this life.

It is a good observation that is made upon that place of Job xxxviii. 22, where God thus challengeth Job : "Hast thou entered into the treasures of snow, or hast thou seen the treasures of the hail ?" where the Commentator noteth out that all the comforts of this world are but like the treasures of snow. Do but take a handful of snow, and crush it in your hands, it will melt away presently ; but if you let it lie upon the ground it will continue for some time. And so it is with the things of this world : if you take the comforts of this life in your hands, and lay them too near your hearts in affection and love to them, they will quickly melt and vanish away from you ; but if you leave them in the proper place, and do not set an inordinate affection upon them, they will continue the longer with you : as if you should line a garment with linen, it would do very well ; but if you line it with pitch or glue, Calvinus, in Iacum that will stick fast to the body, and in all likelihood spoil both the garment and the man who wears it. So, when the world is glued to your hearts, it spoils the comforts of all the mercies that you enjoy; and so it may be said, that the otherwise lawful use of them is abused when they are either used too affectionately in making gods of them, or being too eagerly bent in the gaining of them.

"Ante oculos tibi pono Deum, sed neque beatus ; sic mundi subito fracta cupido ruet."

Billius, in Antholog.
Sicera.

James iv. 13.

MCCXCI.—The things of this world vain and uncertain.

It is an observable note that a learned man hath upon the names of the two first men that ever were born into the world, Cain and Abel; whence, saith he, we may learn a very good lesson, and that from the very interpretation of their names: Cain signifies possession, and Abel, vanity; to show that Adam and Eve, who had all the world before them, did see nothing but vanity in all their possessions. And it were well if the sons and daughters of Adam, who have a great deal less of the world than Adam had, would not set their hearts so much upon the vanities and uncertainties thereof, being such as perish with the using, such as are gone before we have almost any hold of them; like a flock of birds, that no man can say they are his own, though they sit in his yard; so vain, uncertain, flitting, fading, are all the things, all the comforts of this world, be they whatsoever they are, whatsoever they can be.

Lippomannus, in Catena Pat.

Col. ii. 22.

"Ecce mundus, qui diligitur fugit."
—GREG., in Homil.

MCCXCII.—Present occasion of time to be made use of.

THE sun, by its annual revolution, makes the day and the year; the moon, by her lunar course, draws up the months and quarters; the Pleiades and Hyades make the seasons of the years; and the Dog-star brings in the heat of the summer. And all these do labour, by their ordinary passages, to show us that precious Tò Nûn (the present occasion of time), this very moment, which is yet ours, and ought to be made use of accordingly: extreme sottishness were it, therefore, to defer the practice of wisdom till the next opportunity, and to procrastinate repentance upon the groundless hope of a few uncertain days. Yet, for our comfort, there is this privilege in the nature of time, that though that which is past cannot be recalled again, yet it may be redeemed by the double diligence of the wise. Hence it is that the penitent redeemer of time may be lively set out in Medea, with two contrary affections appearing in his face: on the one side, sorrow for the lamentable loss of that occasion which is past; and on the other side, joy for the redemption of opportunity present.

Symmer, Spirit.
Poëte for Zion.

Plin., Nat. Hist.,
lib. xxxvii., cap. 9.

"Tolle moras semper noceat differe."
—LUCANUS.

Eph. v. 15.

MCCXCIII.—The sick man's sorrow.

As a traveller who rides a tired horse is utterly disappointed, and cannot reach but with much difficulty the end of his journey: so by sickness this body of ours is deprived of all cheerfulness and activity, and our souls so far frustrated, that they can neither receive that good nor do that good which otherwise they would perform. Such is the sick man's sorrow, that no man knows it but he who feels it. What a disadvantage it is to the soul to be so ill lodged in a ruinous body! being even stifled within itself for want of motion; and move it cannot, for want of organs, but very lamely, because the understanding is clouded, memory weakened, judgment dazzled, phantasy distracted, affections distempered, and, in brief, the whole frame of nature disjointed, that, like broken bones, it can neither rest nor move. Nor is the stroke only upon natural actions, but upon moral also. In diseases chronical, the body becomes lazy, listless, neutral, that it hath no mind to pray, no stomach to feed, no heart to do anything of itself; and, in diseases more acute, is so taken up and

Harris's Hexachab's Recovery.

"Quam male con-veniant."

"Malum contristi-vum, affectus vi-tiant actionem."
—GALENUS.

transported with pain and anguish, that it minds nothing but what cannot be had, as sleep, ease, &c. Hence may be put that difference betwixt sick and sound as the heathen put between poor and rich : the healthful man may walk when he will, eat when he will, sleep when he will, work, play, fast, feast, ride, run when he will ; but the sick man must travel, eat, drink, sleep when he can : he is not his own to command ; he is deprived of himself. He hath wit, but not the use of it, memory, but not the benefit of it ; so that he is almost turned into an image. He hath eyes, and scarcely sees ; ears, and hears not ; mouth, and speaks not ; feet, but walks not ; nay, which is more, those senses and parts which let in comfort to the sound occasion the sick man's trouble. The sight of his cups, glasses, boxes, makes him sick ; the smell of his meat, sick ; the taste of his drink, sick ; the least noise offends him, the least air pierces him ; his bed tires him, his chair troubles him ; his friends disquiet him ; their absence offends him, so does their presence ; their silence troubles him, so doth their talk. Somewhat he would have, but he cannot tell what. To be short, he is not well, and therefore nothing is well about him.

Diogenes.

"Atque hi sunt manca quos patitur."

"Mille mali species," &c.—OVID.

MCCXCIV.—True saving faith, though never so weak, is all in all.

As a dim, dazzling (wavering) eye that looked on the brazen serpent in the wilderness was of more avail to a poor Israelite, then stung with a fiery serpent, than any use that could possibly be made of all his other members—little could the swiftness of his feet, strength of body, nimbleness of hands, volubility of tongue, quickness of the ear, or anything else have prevailed, had there not been an eye to have looked on it : so, without faith, we lie dead in sins and trespasses, and cannot but perish of the mortal stings which Satan hath blistered us withal ; so that, had we perfect repentance, sound knowledge, and sincere love, not one of them, nor all of them together, could possibly cure us, if there were not faith to apprehend Christ for our satisfaction and a propitiation for all our sins. It is only faith in Christ—a true faith, though a weak, dim-sighted faith—that, looking up to the typified serpent, Christ Jesus, can cure our wounded, sin-sick souls, and make us here to live unto God, and hereafter in all happiness with Him.

Bain's Mirror of Mercy.

Eph. ii. 1.

"Fides est radix virtutum omnium."
—AMBROS., in *Lib.
de Cain et Abel.*

MCCXCV.—God only to be sought unto for safety in the time of imminent distress.

THE poet, describing the manifold mercies of Æneas, that Trojan prince, in his long and weary voyage, sheweth the great peril that he and his company were in, and the great speed they made to escape the danger of the cruel Cyclops, who, together with their gigantic army, mustered on the shore, as strong as so many sturdy oaks and tall as lofty cedars, whose very countenances threatened death and destruction to all who came near them. It was then no time for them to stay there, but high time to hoist up the sails, nimbly to betake themselves to their oars, and, rather than the giants should offer violence to them, to lay violent hands on their tackle, and so quit a dangerous coast, that could promise nothing but mischief. So, the only way that we have to prevent any imminent danger which, by our sins, we draw upon our heads daily, and such as are even at the shore, ready to assault us—nay, such as have already even boarded these our poor brittle barks of mortality—is, swiftly to sail away in the waters of unfeigned repentance, and every man of us to betake himself speedily to the oars of true contrition and invocation to Almighty God, and to row painfully in the sea of our sinful hearts, seeking and never giving over till we are upon the Rock of our defence and have found the God of our salvation.

Virgil.

"Precipites metus acer agit," &c.

Strabo, in *Lib.
Geograph.*

"Validis incumbere
remis."

MCCXCVI.—The abundant love of Christ in dying for our sins.

Aldrov., in Ornithol.

It is said of the pelican, that beholding her young ones to be slain by the serpent, much thirsting after their blood, she is so much grieved, that she beats her sides with her own wings in such a manner, that the blood issues abundantly, which, being as yet warm, falleth upon the young ones so slain, and restoreth them to life again. Thus the soul of man, being the true bird of paradise—for there was her nest first built by God—having, as it were, her lively blood sucked out by that old serpent, the devil, Christ became that heavenly Pelican, who, with the wings of His love and mercy, shed out of His most precious side His dearest heart-blood to revive us, that we might live for ever.

MCCXCVII.—How it is that the hypocrite deceives himself in seeking after God.

Fulgens, ex Plin., lib. viii., cap. 11.

"Quid magis est vanum quam justum nomen habere," &c.

Biblii Antholog.

Gen. iv. 3.

1 Kings xxi. 9.

1 Kings xxi. 27.

Matt. xxvi. 49.

Lucas xxi. 21.

Acts v. 24

It is said of Parrhasius and Zeuxis, that the one deceived his fellow-painter with the picture of a sheet, and the other deceived birds with his counterfeit grapes. Thus the hypocrite, whose devotion is like a shadow, something in show but nothing at all in substance, deceives himself with a sheet or shadow of holiness, thinking that to be current which is but counterfeit and those to be true grapes which are but mere pictures of grapes. And thus going about to seek the Lord with outward holiness and external behaviour, not with internal purity and sanctity of the heart, he may well be said to offer sacrifice with Cain, and yet have no good zeal; fast with Jezebel, and yet not leave his sins; humble himself with Ahab, yet have no true repentance; lament with the tears of Esau, yet not be sorry for his sins; kiss Christ with Judas, yet have no love in his heart; pray with the Pharisee, yet have no devotion; present an oblation with Ananias, yet keep the best part from God, which is his heart; and thus, after all his seeking, find God in justice to condemn him, not in mercy to save him.

MCCXCVIII.—Men covering their sins with specious pretences reproved.

Gen. iii. 7.

"Prodigus vult se credi liberalem, avarus diligentem, temerarius fortem," &c.—PROSPER., de Vita Contem., lib. iv.

As when Adam had tasted of the forbidden fruit, he espied his own nakedness, poverty, and how that he was miserably fallen, for remedy whereof he went about to hide it with fig-leaves, and so shroud himself amongst the trees of the garden: so it is that too, too many of Adam's sons now living go about to cloak their sins with the fig-leaves of their foolish inventions, and to hide their treacherous designs in the thicket of their wicked imaginations, covering their vices with the cloak of virtue. And hence it comes to pass that murder is accounted manhood; pride looked on as decency; covetousness as frugality; drunkenness as good fellowship, &c.

MCCXCIX.—Miseries attendant on the haters of God's people.

Bain's Mirror of Mercy.

As, in princes' courts, they are looked on but as silly, shallow-brained men that possess open and mortal hatred to the greatest favourites of the king—nay, in so doing, they take the right way to ruin themselves and families—whereas such as are politically wise, and intend to raise themselves to fortune, will be sure to observe the favourites, love them, and insinuate into their acquaintance: so it is a most sottish folly in men of the world to hate God's people, in whom His graces are most apparent; for the Lord will look upon them as enemies to Himself, so that they shall want many a blessing from the King of heaven, which the prayers of the godly would otherwise obtain for them; yea, many plagues, much sorrow will light upon them in this respect: but if they ever intend to be wise for their souls, and bodies too, it is their best way to love and embrace, with all kindness, such as are the Lord's people; which, if they do, God will take it as a token of love to Himself, and they shall be sure to have their reward in the kingdom of heaven.

MCCC.—All out of order.

It is observed of the Romans, that in the time of their civil wars some followed Cæsar, and they were the weakest; some Pompey, and they were thought the wisest; some Crassus, and they were accounted the worst of all. So now it is that some follow the flesh, and are led by the corrupting allurements thereof; some are favourites and minions of the world, carried away with its glittering preferments; some are mere factors for the devil, fulfilling his crafty and cruel designments: all of them set on work under the command of this cursed triumvirate, and that so intently, that everywhere there is a consumption of grace, through the corruption of sin. Piety complains that she is sick, charity very near dead; good works buried, prayer and preaching neglected; honesty and sobriety derided, justice and equity abandoned; truth and plain-dealing imprisoned, faith and a good conscience banished. As for religion, men delight rather to argue and discourse of it than seriously to reduce the principles thereof into practice and action; much form of godliness there is, but little power thereof amongst us. "Totus mundus in maligno positus (All is out of order)."

Lazius, de Rebus Gestis Romanorum.

Carpenter's Con-sensable Courtian.

"Maluit disputare homines quàm vivere."

MCCCI.—The excellency of godly sorrow for sin.

As water that runs through mines hath a tincture and touch of them, or as a vessel that is seasoned with some exquisite liquor will a long time after retain the scent, and smell of that which was poured into it: so sorrow that is for sin meets with much in us by which accidentally it becomes hurtful, but in itself is, as all other graces, for the perfection of nature, and so far from being an oppression of it, that, in the judgment of some wise men, it is not altogether improbable but that it shall be in heaven; for if our memories abide there, to recollect the ways of this life, and our understanding, and will be fully taken up in the sight and fruition of God, then it is considerable that, since a little sight and taste of God in the world do work sorrow for sin, whether an abundant sight and full taste will not also do it in heaven, when a man shall remember his sins against so good a God, whom he hath offended.

Simond's Case and Cure of a Deseried Soul.

"Dolor hic tibi proderit."

MCCCII.—Evil company a great hindrance in the ways of God.

As one, that is a suitor to a woman, and being very earnest in the prosecution of his love, if another should come and tell him that he knows something of the woman, by way of ill report, some impediment or other, the man, hearing this, is presently taken off, and the suit ceaseth: so it is with many a man who begins to be a suitor to religion. Fain he would have the match made up, and he grows very hot and violent in the suit, and falls a-working his salvation; but then there comes some of his old comforts, and they tell him that they know something of religion that is of ill report; as that there must be much of strictness and mortification, that he must never see good day more; and hereupon he is discouraged, and the match broken off; so that evil company, like the water in a smith's forge, quenquencheth the iron, be it never so hot, and cooleth the affections Godward, be they never so ardent.

Watson's Unum Necessarium.

"Melius est habere malorum odium, nam consortium."
—BERN.

MCCCIII.—The difference betwixt a spiritual and worldly man in the ways of God and goodness.

It is observable that, in the courts of kings and princes, children and ruder people are much taken with pictures and rich shows, and feed their fancies with the sight of rich hangings and fine things; but the wise and grave statesman passeth by such things, as not worthy taking notice of—his business is with the king. Thus it is that, in this world, most men stay in the outer rooms, and admire the low things of the world, and look upon them as pieces of much excellence; but the spiritually-minded man, whose eye, desire, and ways are unto God, looketh over all these things that are here below—his business is with God. Let them dote upon the world that are in love with it: whom hath he in heaven but God? and there is none upon earth that he desireth besides Him.

"Discite in hoc mundo supra mundum esse et si copius geritis, voliet in vobis alie, interior."—AMEROS, de Virginii.

Ps. lxxiii. 25.

MCCCIV.—Parents to be careful in the education of their children.

JULIAN the Apostate had two great scholars, Mardonius and Maximus, to his tutors, but, being profane heathens and scoffers at the Christian religion, they laid the foundations of that desperate apostasy whereby he fell from Christ to the devil. Thus, he that begets a fool, or, by careless breeding, maketh one, hath been the author of his own sorrow, and his child's also, who may have just occasion to cry out at the last day, "Parentes sensimus parricidas (Our parents have been our parricides)!" It must, therefore, be the care of all parents so to provide for the breeding up of their children unto wisdom as that they forget not the chief thing, to have them seasoned with the knowledge and fear of God, which is the only true wisdom.

Ennappius, in Maxim. Sozomen, lib. v., cap. 6.

Prov. xxiii. 15.

"Probum parentem esse oportet qui pratum suum prohibere." &c.—PLAUT.

Job xxviii. 28.

MCCCV.—Excellency of the knowledge of Jesus Christ above all human learning whatsoever.

THEMISTOCLES, though he was ignorant of music, yet knew he how to govern a state; and a believer, though he be ignorant of all other learning, yet by the knowledge of Christ only will be a blessed man; whereas all the learning in the world without will leave a man miserable. To know the whole creation, and to be ignorant of the Creator; to know all histories and antiquities, and to be unacquainted with our own hearts; to be good logicians to other purposes, and in the meantime to be cheated by Satan with paralogisms in the business of our own salvation; to be powerful orators with men, and never to prevail with God; to know the constellations, motions, and influences of heavenly bodies, and have still unheavenly souls; to know exactly the laws of men, and be ignorant and rebellious against the laws of God; to abound with worldly wisdom, and be destitute of the fear of God, which makes wise to salvation—is all but a better kind of refined misery: the devils have much more than all this comes to, and yet are damned. We must study, therefore, to improve our learning unto the use and furtherance of holiness, to better our minds, to order our affections, to civilize our manners, to reform our lives, to adorn and render our profession the more amiable, to consecrate all our other endowments as spoils unto Christ, to lay our crowns at His feet, and make all other abilities and acquirements handmaids unto His glory. When learning is thus a servant unto godliness, godliness will be an honour unto learning.

Augustin, in Epist. xxxvi.

"Quid miri erodit ingenium per illas doctrinas, agile." &c.—AUG., Confess., lib. iv., cap. 16.

Lib. i., cap. 8.

Reynolds' Sermon, of Human Learning, &c., 1657.

MCCCVI.—How it is that we must follow the things that make for peace.

As Christ is set forth in the Scripture to be a Leader, a Man of war, a Captain, a Lion of the tribe of Judah, the victorious tribe, so is He as a Prince of peace too: honoured at His birth with the style of Immanuel, a name of peace; crowned in His baptism with a dove, the emblem of peace; being in the building caput anguli (a corner stone), the place of peace; coming into the world with a song of peace; going out of the world with a legacy of peace: in one word, a perfect Moses—the meekest man, and yet the mightiest warrior; a true David, a man much versed in battle, and yet made up all of love, sending a sword in one place, and sheathing up a sword in another; careless of offending in case of piety, and tender of offending in case of liberty. Thus He, and thus His Church too, Salem, a place of peace; Jerusalem, a vision of peace, and yet therein a fort, and an armoury for shields and bucklers. And such must all of us be, like Nehemiah's builders, with a trowel in one hand but a spear in the other hand; to be at enmity with the vices, but at peace with the persons of all men; to be sure to distinguish concerning persons and concerning things—as to compassionate the weak but withstand the obstinate. And for things, though the heathen man spake truly, "Nihil minimum in religione," yet we know our blessed Saviour distinguished between mint or cummin and the great things of the law; and the apostolical synod, between things necessary and unnecessary; and St. Paul, between meats and drinks and the kingdom of God, and at another time between the foundation and superstructures of religion. And this is the only right way to follow the things that make for peace.

Rom. xii. 18. Heb. ii. 10. &c., v. 2.

Exod. xv. 3.
Rev. v. 5.
Judges i. 2.
Isa. ix. 6.
Eph. ii. 14.
Matt. i. 23; i. 16.
Rom. x. 15.
Luke ii. 14.

"Pax cum personis, bellum cum vitiis."

Gal. v. 1.
Val. Max.
Matt. xxiii. 23.
Acts xv. 28.
1 Cor. iii. 10, 11.

MCCCVII.—How it is that war there may and must be in the Church of God, but not contention.

It is recorded of Meletius and Peter, bishop of Alexandria, both confessors of the Christian faith, both martyres designati, and condemned ad metalla for their profession, who, upon a very small difference, touching the receiving of the lapsi into communion, fell unto so great a schism, that they drew a partition between each other in prison, and would not hold communion in the same worship of Christ, for which, notwithstanding, they jointly suffered. This dissension of theirs did the Church of God more hurt, by causing a great rent and sect among the members thereof, than any persecution the enemy could have raised. Now, so it is, that war there may be and must be in the Church—war, in a spiritual sense; war with its principalities and powers and spiritual wickednesses: for the Church is militant, and hath weapons of spiritual warfare given of purpose to resist enemies, and a sword that Christ came to send against all dangerous errors of mind or manners. But, for all this, contention and inward jars there must not be, and that for this very reason, because there is war, open war with foreign and potent adversaries, such as Satan and all other enemies of the Church are, who, by the advantage of intestine commotion, would save themselves the labour of drawing the sword, and become rather spectators than parties in the contest. Greatly, therefore, doth it concern every man in his place, all men in their several orders, to put to all their power, prayers, interests, for preserving the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, that in nothing they give offence to the Church of God; but rather be willing to silence and smother their private judgments, to relinquish their particular liberties and interests, to question and distrust those domestica judicia (as Tertullian calls them), their singular conceits and fancies, than to be in any such thing stiff and peremptory against the quiet of the Church of God—the weak to be humbled and tractable; the strong to be meek and merciful; the pastors to instruct the ignorant, to reclaim the wandering, to convince the froward with the spirit of meekness and compassion; the people to obey, honour, and encourage their ministers by their docile and flexible disposition, to suspect their own judgment, to allow their teachers to know more than they; not to hamper themselves, nor to censure their brethren, nor to trouble their superiors by ungrounded scruples or uncharitable prejudices, or unquiet and in the end uncomfortable singularities; to take heed of strife, vain-glory, and pride in their own conceits; to have such humble judgments as that they can be willing to learn any, though unwelcome truth; to unlearn any, though darling error; have such humble lives

Epiphaz. Heron, lxviii.

Zuingerus, in Theat.
Hum. Vitæ.

Greg. Naz., Orat.
v. 35.

"Apud veros Dei
cultores, etiam bella parata sunt."— AUGUST., in Lib.
de Verbo Dei.

Οἰκταῖσι λογισμοῖ.
—CHRYSOS., Hem.
in Gen. iv.

and purposes, as that they can resolve to obey with duty, whatsoever they are not able with reason to gainsay: and thus it is, that war may be in the Church, but not contention and jarring.

MCCCVIII.—Difference of judgment hath, and ever will be, in the minds of men; and why so.

THERE was never any instrument so perfectly in tune in which the next hand that touched it did not amend something, nor is there any judgment so strong and perspicacious, from which another will not in some things find ground of variance. See we not, in ancient Churches, those great lights in their several ages at variance amongst themselves? Irenæus with Victor, Cyprian with Stephen, Jerome with Austin, Basil with Damasus, Chrysostome with Epiphanius, Cyril with Theodoret. Desired it may be, but hoped it cannot, that in the Church of God there would be no noise of axes and hammers, no difference in judgments and conceits; for while there is corruption in our nature, narrowness in our faculties, sleepiness in our eyes, difficulty in our profession, cunning in our enemies, δυσνόητα, hard things in the Scripture, and an envious man to superseminate, there will still be τὸ ἐτέρως φρονοῦντες, men that will be differently minded. In this hard necessity, therefore, when the first evil cannot be easily avoided, our wisdom must be to prevent the second, that where there is not perfection yet there may be peace—that dissensions of judgment break not forth into disunion of hearts, but that, amidst the variety of our several conceits, we preserve still the unity of faith and love, by which only we are known to be Christ's disciples.

Eusebius, Sozomen, Nicephorus.

Islid., Pelusi., lib. ii., ep. 90.

Aug., Ep. cv.

Jewel against Harding, Art. 8.

MCCCIX.—Men not to be censurers of one another.

IT was an old trick of the Gentiles (as Gregory, Nazianzen, Arnobius, and Minutius tell us) to object illiterateness unto the Christians, but a very unfit way certainly it is for Christian men, amongst themselves, to refute adverse opinions, or to insinuate their own, by their mutual undervaluing of each other's parts and persons, to censure every one for dull and brutish who in judgment varieth from their own conceits. If, then, they must needs be censuring, let them look to what is wanting in themselves, and to what is useful in their brethren: the one will make them humble, the other charitable, and both peaceable.

"Studiorum rudes, litterarum profani,"
&c.

"Hoc est fastidium vestrum," &c.—
ARNOB.

MCCCX.—The joyful coming of Christ Jesus in the flesh.

WHEN Solomon was made king, they did eat and drink with great gladness before the Lord; and at the solemn inaugurations of such kings and princes, the trumpets sound, the people shout, the conduits run wine, honours are dispensed, gifts distributed, prisons opened, offenders pardoned, acts of grace published, nothing suffered to eclipse the beauty of such a festivity. Thus it was at the coming of Christ Jesus in the flesh: wise men of the East brought presents unto Him, rejoicing with exceeding great joy. The glory of God shines on that day, and a heavenly host proclaim that joy. John the Baptist leapeth in the womb, Mary rejoiceth in God her Saviour, Zacharias glorifieth God for the horn of salvation in the house of David, Simeon and Anna bless the Lord for the glory of Israel; and after, when He came to Jerusalem, the whole multitude spread garments, strewed branches, cried before Him and behind Him, "Hosanna to the Son of David; Hosanna in the highest!" and the Psalmist, prophesying long before of it, said, "This is the day which the Lord hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it!"

1 Chron. xxix. 24.
Reynolds's Serm.,
Lond.

Joseph., Antiquit.,
lib. vii.
Matt. ii. 70. 11.

Turnebi Advocatar.,
lib. xxiv.
Luke ii. 14.

Luke i. 41-47.

Matt. xxi. 9.

Ps. cxviii. 24.

MCCCXI.—Hard to be drawn from custom in sin.

WATER may be easily dammed up, but no art or industry can make it run backward in its own channel. It was by a miracle that the river Jordan was driven back: and it is very near, if not altogether a miracle, that a man accustomed to do evil should learn to do well; that the tide of sin, which before did run so strong, should be so easily turned; that the sinner, who before was sailing hellward, and wanting neither wind nor tide to carry him, should now alter his course and tack about for heaven, hic labor, hoc opus est (this is a work indeed, and that a hard one too). To see the earthly man become heavenly, to see a sinner move contrary to himself, in the ways of Christ and holiness, is as strange as to see the earth fly upward, or a bowl run contrary to its own bias.

"Naturam expellas furca licet," &c.

"Difficile est, longum subito deponere amorem."—TIBUL.

MCCCXII.—The commodity and discommodity of learning.

As the juice of the same earth is sweet in the grape but bitter in the wormwood, or as the same odour is a refreshment to the dove but a poison to the scarabæus: so the same learning, qualified with charity, piety, and meekness, may be admirably useful to edify the Church, which, with pride, contempt, and corrupt judgment, may be used unto harmful purposes. As the philosopher speaks, "Nothing is more dangerous than wickedness in armour." Hence is it that Satan hath usually set on work the greatest wits in sowing errors in the Church, as Agrippina gave Claudius poison in his delicatest meat, or as thieves used to pursue their prey with the swiftest horses: so the devil made choice of Licentius, a man of rare parts, but a corrupt mind; wherein Satan would fail of his end if men would make no other use of their gifts and learning than to make them as engines and instruments for the more happy promoting of piety and pure religion.

Basil., Hexam.,
Hom. v.
Nyssen, in Cant.

Arist., Rhet.

Aug., ad Licentium,
Ep. lxix.

Ep. cxix.

MCCCXIII.—Holiness an excellent thing.

ALEXANDER coming with his army against Jerusalem, Jaddus, the high priest, went out of the city to meet him, adorned with his priestly robes, an upper garment of purple embroidered with gold, and a golden plate on the fore side (front side), wherein the name of God was written: the sight was so grave and solemn, that the emperor fell to the ground, as reverencing the name that was thereon inscribed. Thus it is that in holiness there is such a sparkling lustre, that whosoever behold it must needs be astonished at it—nay, even those that oppose it cannot but admire it. Holiness is an excellent thing, a beautiful thing, it carries a graceful majesty along with it, whosoever or in whomsoever it is truly and sincerely professed.

Gellius.

Quintus Curtius.

"Pietati summa tribuenda laus est."— SOLINUS.

MCCCXIV.—The least man in the ministry not to be contemned.

As in a building, some bring stones, some timber, others mortar, and some perhaps bring only nails—yet these are useful, these serve to fasten the work in the building: thus the Church of God is a spiritual building. Some ministers bring stones—are more eminent and useful; others, timber; others, less—they have but a nail in the work; yet all serve for the good of the building. The least star gives light, the least drop moistens, the least minister is no less than an angel, the least nail in the ministry serves for the fastening of souls unto Christ. There is some use to be made even of the lowest parts of men; the weakest minister may help to strengthen one's faith. Though all are not apostles, all are not evangelists, all have not the same dexterous abilities in the work, yet all edify; and oftentimes so it cometh to pass, that God crowns his labours, and sends most fish into his net, who, though he may be less skilful, is more faithful, and though he have less of the brain, yet he may have more of the heart, and therefore not to be contemned.

1 Cor. x. 19.

Watson's Artisanship, Charter.

1 Cor. xii. 29.

MCCCXV.—The minister and magistrate to go hand-in-hand together

Chambliss's The Minister's Flower.

"Quam bene concordant."

Speed's Chronicle.

It is reported of Queen Elizabeth, that, coming in her progress into the county of Suffolk when she observed that the gentlemen of the county who came out to meet her had every one his minister by his side, said, "Now I have learned why my county of Suffolk is so well governed: it is because the magistrates and ministers go together." And most true it is, that they are the two legs on which a Church and state do stand; and whosoever be he that would saw off the one, cannot mean well to the other. An anti-ministerial spirit is an anti-magistratical spirit. The pulpit guards the throne; he but once persuaded to take that away, and you give the magistrates' enemies room to fetch a full blow at them—as the Duke of Somerset, in King Edward VI.'s days, by consenting to his brother's death, made way for his own by the same axe and hand.

MCCCXVI.—The great danger in commission of little sins.

Watson's Christian's Charter.

P. 1. 22.
"Nunc si domum
habuerim, edificabo mihi domum, &c.—
Nunc, si, &c. Domus
Mort. xiv. 25."

WHAT is less than a grain of sand: yet, when it comes to be multiplied, what is heavier than the sands of the sea? A little earn multiplied reacheth high; so a little sin, unrepented of, will damn us, as one leak in the ship, if it be not well looked to, will drown us—little sins, as the world calls them, but great sins against the majesty of God Almighty, who doth accent and enhance them, if not repented of. One would think it no great matter to forget God, yet it hath a heavy doom attending on it. The non-improvement of talents, the non-exercising of graces, the world looks upon as a small thing; yet we read of him who hid his talent in the earth—he had not spent it, only not trading it—is sentenced. Such and so great is the danger of the least sin whatsoever!

MCCCXVII.—The worldling's inordinate desires; and why so.

G. Bousquet's expositio
dom. edulcor. amara, etiam amara, &c.

Psalm 2.

"Sic cupimus, ut non habeamus, &c.—
Nunc, si, &c. Domus
Mort. xiv. 25."

THE countryman in the fable would needs stay till the river was run all away, and then go over dry-shod; but the river did run on still, and he was deceived in his expectation. Such are the worldling's inordinate desires: the deceitful heart promiseth to see them run over and gone, when they are attained to such a measure, and then they are stronger and wider, more impotent and unruly than before: for a covetous heart grasps at no less than the whole world—would fain be master of all, and dwell alone, like a wen in the body, which draws all to itself. Let it have never so much, it will reach after more; add house to house, and field to field, till there be no more place to compass. Like a bladder, it swells wider and wider, the more of this empty world is put into it. No bounders, so endless, so inordinate are the corrupt desires of worldly-minded men!

MCCCXVIII.—To beware of masked, specious sins.

Plutarch, de Vice.

"Parcebat, ut dicitur—A.D. 1771."

It is said of Alcibiades, that he embroidered a curtain with lions and eagles, the most stately of beasts and birds, that he might the more closely hide the picture that was under, full of owls and satyrs, the most sadly remarkable of other creatures. Thus Satan embroiders the curtain with the image of virtue, that he may easily hide the foul picture of sin that is under it—sin, that, in the eye of the world, is looked on as grace, coloured and masked over with zeal for God, good intentions, &c.; such as hath a fine gloss put upon it, that it may be the more vendible: wherein the devil, like the spider, first the weaves her web, and then hangs the fly in it, so he helps men to weave the web of sin with specious shows and religious pretences, and then he hangs them in the snare, and sets all their sins in order before them.

MCCCXIX.—No true happiness to be found in the best of creatures here below.

SOLOMON, having made a critical inquiry after the excellency of all creature comforts, gives this in as the ultimate extraction from them all: "Vanity of vanities; all is vanity." And have not all of us great experience how loose the world hangs about us? If you go to the creature to make you happy, the earth will tell you that happiness grows not in the furrows of the field; the sea, that it is not in the treasures of the deep; cattle will say, "It is not on our backs;" crowns will say, "It is too precious a gem to be found in us; we can adorn the head, but we cannot satisfy the heart." It is true that these worldly, earthly things can benefit the outward and the natural man, but to look for peace of conscience, joy in the Holy Ghost, inward and durable comfort, in anything which the world affords, is to seek for treasure in a coal-pit—a thing altogether improbable to be found there.

In Libro Ecclesiast.

"Fallax est hic mundus, finis dubius," &c.—PET BLENIS.

MCCCXX.—How it is that faith challengeth a superiority above other graces.

TAKE a piece of wax and a piece of gold, of the same magnitude: the wax is not valuable with the gold; but as this wax hangs at the label of some will, by virtue of which some great estate is confirmed and conveyed, so it may be worth many hundred pounds. So faith, considered purely in itself, doth challenge nothing more than other graces—nay, in some sense, it is inferior, it being an empty hand; but as this hand receives the precious alms of Christ's merits, and is an instrument or channel through which the blessed streams of life flow to us from Him, so it doth challenge a superiority over, and is more excellent than, all other graces whatsoever.

Watson's Christian's Charter.

"O thesaurus omnibus opulentior fides," &c.—AUG., Lib. de Virgin.

MCCCXXI.—Men not living as if they had souls to save reprov'd.

SOCRATES, in his time, wondered, when he observed statuarys, how careful they were, and how industrious, to make stones like men, and men, in the meantime, turning themselves into very blocks and stones. The case is ours: men walk not as men who have souls to be saved; many walk as if they had nothing but bellies to fill and backs to clothe, fancies to be tickled with vanity, eyes and ears to look after pleasure, brains to entertain empty notions, and tongues to utter them. As for their souls, they serve them to little other purpose than as salt to keep their bodies from stinking.

Diog. Laert., in Socrate.

"Tanquam mors nulla sequatur."

MCCCXXII.—Honour and greatness, the vanity of them.

It was foretold to Agrippina, Nero's mother, that her son should be emperor, and that he should afterwards kill his own mother; to which Agrippina replied: "Occidat modo imperet (Let my son be so, and then let him kill me, and spare not);" so thirsty was she of honour. Alas! what are swelling titles but as so many rattles, to still men's ambitions! And what is honour and greatness in the world? Honour is like the meteor, which lives in the air—so doth this in the breath of other men: it is like a gale of wind, which carries the ship; sometimes this wind is down—a man hath lost his honour, and lives to see himself entomb'd; sometimes this wind is too high—how many have been blown to hell while they have been sailing with the wind of popular applause! So that honour is but magnum nihil, a glorious fancy (Acts xxv. 23). It doth not make a man really the better, but often the worse; for a man swelled with honour (wanting grace) is like a man in a dropsy, whose bigness is his disease.

Suetonius, in Vita.

"Honor est in honorante non in honorato."

Μετὰ πολλῆς φαντασίας.

MCCCXXIII.—Present time to be well husbanded.

Diosc. Laert., in
I. Lucie.

Firke Aboth.

Luke xix. 42.

"Nemo vestrum parvi existimet tempus," &c.—BERN.

As it is observed of the philosopher, that, foreseeing a plentiful year of olives, he rented many olive-yards, and by that demonstrated that a learned man, if he would aim at worldly gain, could easily be a rich man too. It is noted as an excellent part of wisdom to know and manage time, to husband time and opportunity; for, as the rabbi said, "Nemo est cui non sit hora sua (Every man hath his hour)," and he who overslips that season may never meet with the like again. The Scripture insists much upon a day of grace (2 Cor. vi. 2; Heb. xiii. 15). The Lord reckons the times which pass over us, and puts them upon our account (Luke xiii. 7; Rev. ii. 21, 22): let us, therefore, improve them, and, with the impotent persons at the pool of Bethesda, step in when the angel stirs the water. Now the Church is afflicted; it is a season of prayer and learning (Micah vi. 9; Isa. xxvi. 8, 9); now the Church is enlarged, it is a season of praise (Ps. cxviii. 24). I am now at a sermon, I will hear what God will say; now in the company of a learned and wise man, I will draw some knowledge and counsel from him; I am under a temptation, now is a fit time to lean on the name of the Lord (Isa. l. 10); I am in a place of dignity and power, let me consider what it is that God requireth of me in such a time as this is (Eph. iv. 14). And thus, as the tree of life bringeth fruit every month (Rev. xxii. 2), so a wise Christian, as a wise husbandman, hath his distinct employments for every month, bringing forth his fruit in its season (Ps. i. 3).

MCCCXXIV.—Frequent meditation of death, the great benefit thereof.

Dyctis Cret., lib. ii.

Plutarch, de Capien-da ab Hostibus Utilitate.

Ps. xxxix. 1.

"Vive memor quam sis avi brevis."

It is said of Telephus, that he had his imposthume opened by the dart of an enemy who intended him hurt. Roses, they say, are sweetest which grow nearest unto garlic; so the nearness of an enemy makes a good man the better: and therefore the wise Roman, when Carthage, the emulous city of Rome, was destroyed, said, "Now our affairs are in more danger and hazard than ever before." When Saul, David's enemy, eyed and persecuted him, this made him walk more circumspectly, pray more, trust in God more; he kept his mouth with a bridle while the wicked were before him. A hard knot in the wood drives a man to the use of his wedges; a malicious enemy, who watcheth for our halting, will make us look the better to our ways. And so it is that death, by the nearness thereof, and by the frequent meditation thereupon, makes us more careful of our great account, more solicitous to make our peace with God, to wean our hearts from worldly and perishing comforts, to lay up a good foundation for the time to come, that we may obtain eternal life, to get to a city which hath foundations, whose Builder and Maker is God.

MCCCXXV.—The great difference betwixt life natural and life spiritual.

Exod. xvi. 20.

Col. iii. 4.

Ezek. xlvii.

"Hæc brevis est illa perennis aqua."

John x. 10.

THE ordinary manna which Israel gathered for their daily use did presently corrupt and breed worms; but that which was laid up before the Lord, the hidden manna in the tabernacle, did keep without putrefaction. So our life, which we have here in the wilderness of this world, doth presently vanish and corrupt; but our life which is kept in the tabernacle, our life which is hid with Christ in God, that never runs into death. Natural life is like the river Jordan, empties itself into the Dead Sea; but spiritual life is like the waters of the sanctuary, which, being shallow at the first, grow deeper and deeper into a river, which cannot be passed through—water continually springing and running forward into eternal life: so that the life which we leave is mortal and perishing, and that which we go unto is durable and abounding.

MCCCXXVI.—Men not to hasten their own deaths, but submit to the will of God ; and why so.

It is observable that when, of late years, men grew weary of the long and tedious compass in their voyages to the East Indies, and would needs try a more compendious way by the North-West passage, it ever proved unsuccessful. Thus it is that we must not use any compendious way ; we may not neglect our body, nor shipwreck our health, nor anything to hasten death, because we shall gain by it. He that maketh haste (even this way) to be rich shall not be innocent ; for our times are in God's hands, and therefore to His holy providence we must leave them. We have a great deal of work to do, and must not, therefore, be so greedy of our Sabbath-day, our rest, as not to be contented with our working-day, our labour. Hence it is that a composed frame of heart, like that of the apostles, wherein either to stay and work, or to go and rest, is the best temper of all.

Reynolds's Sermon, Northampton.

Prov. xxviii. 20.

Ps. xxxi. 15.

Phil. i. 21.

MCCCXXVII.—Assurance of God's love the only comfort.

It is commonly known that those who live on London Bridge sleep as soundly as they who live at Whitehall or Cheapside, well knowing that the waves which roar under them cannot hurt them. This was David's case, when he sang so merrily in the cave of Adullam, "My heart is fixed, my heart is fixed ; I will sing and give praise." And what was it that made him so merry in so sad a place ? He will tell you (verse 1), where you have him nestling himself under the shadow of God's loving wings of protection ; and now well may he sing care and fear away. Thus it is that a man, persuaded and assured of God's love unto him, sings as merrily as the nightingale with the sharpest thorn at his breast, lies at ease on a hard bed, sleeps quietly over the floods of trouble and sorrow, nay, of death itself, and fears no evil.

Gurnall's Christian
in Complete Armour.

Ps. lviii. 7.

"*Hic murus ahe-neus esto, nil con-
scire sibi,*" &c.

Ps. xxii. 4.

MCCCXXVIII.—A faithful, modest friend very hard to be found.

THERE are some drugs very wholesome, but very bitter, good in the operation, but unkind in the palate : as the common saying is, "wholesome, but not toothsome." Such are some friends in the world, real in their love, but morose in their expressions of it, that a man is almost afraid of their very kindnesses. But to meet with a man who shall be as full of sweetness as fidelity, whose love is not like a pill, that must be wrapped in something else before a man can swallow it, but whose candour and serenity make his love as amiable as useful to his friend ; so that he may very well be said to deserve the character given to one of the Roman emperors, "Neminem unquam dimisit tristem :" of such a disposition, made up of love and sweetness, of such a balsam nature, that is all for healing and helpfulness.

MCCCXXIX.—The good names of God's people, though now obscured, yet hereafter will be cleared.

EVEN as it was with Christ, the Jews rolled a great stone upon Him, and, as they thought, it was impossible He should rise again ; but an angel came and rolled away the stone, and He arose in a glorious, triumphant manner : so it shall be with the people of God. Their good name oft lies buried, a stone of obloquy and reproach is rolled upon them ; but at the day of judgment, not an angel, but God Himself, will roll away the stone, and they shall come forth from among the pots, where they have been blacked and sullied, as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold. Now it is

Watson's Christian's Charter.

Ps. lxxviii. 23.

Things New and Old; or, that many of them are called the troublers of Israel, seditious, factious, malignants, rebellious, and what not; but a day is shortly coming when God Himself will proclaim their innocency, for the name of a saint is precious in God's esteem. It is like a statue of gold, which the polluted breath of men cannot stain; and though the wicked may throw dust upon it, yet, as God will wipe away tears from the eyes of His people, so He will wipe off the dust that lies upon their good names; and a happy day must that needs be when God Himself shall be the saints' Compurgator.

MCCCXXX.—Men to be thankful for the little strength of grace that God affordeth.

Exod. xv. 1.

Gurnall's Christian in Complete Armour.

As soon as ever Moses, with his army, was through the sea, they strike up, before they stir from the bank-side, and acknowledge the wonderful appearance of God's power and mercy for them, though this was but one step in their way. A howling wilderness presented itself unto them, and they not able to subsist a few days with all their provision, for all their great victory; yet Moses, he will praise God for this handsel of mercy. Now, this holy man knew how to keep credit with God: so as to have more was to keep, touch, and pay down his praise for what was received. Thus it is with thee, O thou poor, weak, trembling Christian! If thou wouldst have fuller communications of Divine strength, own God in what He hath already done for thee. Art thou weak, bless God thou hast life. Dost thou, through feebleness, often fail in duty and fall into temptation, mourn in the sense of these, yet bless God that thou dost not lie in a total neglect of duty, out of a profane contempt thereof, and that, instead of falling through weakness, thou dost not lie in the mire of sin through the wickedness of thy heart. Art thou not of that strength of grace to run with the foremost and hold pace with the tallest of thy brethren, yet art thou thankful that thou hast any strength at all, although it be but to cry after them whom thou seest to outstrip thee in grace. This is worth thy thanks, though it be but a little strength of grace that God is pleased to afford thee.

MCCCXXXI.—True, real friendship very hard to be found.

"Amicus certus in re incerta."

Aristotle.

THE friendship of most men, in these days, is like some plants in the water, which have broad leaves on the surface of the water, but scarce any root at all; like lemons, cold within, hot without; full expressions, empty intentions; speak loud, and do little; like drums and trumpets and ensigns in a battle, which make a noise and a show, but act nothing—mere friendship in pretence and compliment, that can bow handsomely, and promise emphatically, and speak plausibly, and forget all. But a true, real, active friend, whose words are the windows of his heart, σύμβολα παθήματα (the notifiers of his affections)—such a friend is rare and hardly to be found.

MCCCXXXII.—How it is that the preaching of the Gospel is of a double and contrary operation upon different persons.

Brinsley's Emblems of Jesus Christ.

EVEN as it is with the proclamation of a prince, which he sendeth out to his rebellious subjects, wherein he maketh offer not only of pardon, but of grace and favour, to those who will lay down their arms and come in, showing themselves loyal and obedient, but, on the other hand, threateneth extremity of punishment to those who shall yet stand out; now, this proclamation, with the same breath, breatheth out both life and death—life to those who will hearken to it (which is the main end and intent of proclaiming it), but death to those who oppose themselves against it : even so it is with the evangelical proclamation, the preaching of the Gospel. It reacheth out life and death after the same manner—life to penitent believers, who readily accept the offers of grace and mercy there tendered, but death to obstinate and rebellious sinners, who reject them. To the one it is εὐωδία, to the other κακωδία ; to the one a savour of life unto life, to the other a savour of death unto death ; to believers the morning star, bringing the light of grace here and of glory hereafter ; to others the evening star, leading to everlasting darkness. Not that it is so in itself, being in its own nature the Word of Life ; but accidentally it becometh so to them, through their unbelief and rejection of it.

2 Cor. ii. 16.

Rev. xxii. 16.

John iii. 18.

MCCCXXXIII.—Tongue, the heart's interpreter.

WHEN the pump goes, we shall soon know what water is in the fountain, whether clear or muddy ; when the clapper strikes, we may guess what metal is in the bell : thus the tongue of man becomes the interpreter of his heart ; the inward motions of the mind have vent at the mouth, as sparks from a furnace, and the soul's conceptions are brought out by its busy midwifery. The tongue is the key that unlocks the heart's treasury, out of whose abundance it speaks ; so that the corruption of men's minds, not much unlike the inflammation of a fever, ordinarily breaks forth and blisters upon the tongue. He that is rotten in his heart is commonly rotten in his talk, and as evil words corrupt good manners, so they also discover corrupt manners. The foul stomach betrays itself in a stinking breath, and a wicked heart in wicked communication ; but where grace is in the heart, it will manifest itself in holy, heavenly, and savoury speeches.

"Quotidiana for-nax lingua," &c.—
AUG., Confess.,
lib. x.

Matt. xii. 34.

Meriton's Eplst., 10 Keyner's Government of the Tongue.

MCCCXXXIV.—The sin of bribery condemned.

It is reported of Sir Thomas More, then Lord Chancellor of England, that when two great silver flagons were sent him by a knight that had a suit depending in chancery (though gilded with the specious pretence of gratuity), he sent them back again filled with his best wine, saying, "If your master likes it, let him send for more ;" and when his lady, at another time, offered him a great bribe in the behalf of a suppliant, he turned away with these words, "Gentle Eve, I will none of your apple." An upright man he was in the place of judicature, and it were to be wished that all those who succeed him on the bench were, not almost, but altogether like him in the matter of justice distributive ; but so it is (and which is to be lamented), the rulers love to say with shame, "Bring ye !"—their right hands are full of bribes ; they are ready to transgress for a piece of bread ; they love gifts and follow after rewards, and, like the horse-leech's daughter, they cry "Give, give !" so that, by woeful experience, the balance of equity is tilted too, too often on the one side, and the cause of the poor outvied with power and greatness.

Young, on Philan- gurke Massia.

Hosea iv. 18.
Ps. xxvi.
Prov. xxviii. 21.
Isa. i. 23.
Prov. xxx. 15.

MCCCXXXV.—No man free from temptations.

A COUNTRYMAN was riding with an unknown traveller (whom he conceived honest) over a dangerous plain—"This place," said he, "is infamous for robbery ; but, for my own part, though often riding over it early and late, I never saw anything worse than myself." "In good time," replied the other ; and presently demanded his purse, and robbed him. Thus it is that no place, no company, no age, no person is temptation-free. Let no man brag that he was never tempted, let him not be high-minded, but fear, for he may be surprised in that very instant wherein he boasteth that he was never tempted at all.

Fuller, on Christ's Temptat.

"Sub dulci merite venena latent."— OVID, Amor. i.

MCCCXXXVI.—The Holy Scriptures to be made the rule of all our actions.

Cromerus, lib. vi.

Gerson, in Orat. ad R. Gallie.

Sedgwick's Serm., Lond., 1648.

It is written of Boleslaus, one of the kings of Poland, that he still carried about him the picture of his father, and when he was to do any great work or set upon any design extraordinary, he would look on the picture and pray that he might do nothing unworthy of such a father's name. Thus it is that the Scriptures are the picture of God's will, and therein drawn out to the very life. Before a man enter upon or engage himself in any business whatsoever, let him look there, and read there what is to be done, what to be undone; and what God commands, let that be done; what He forbids, let that be undone: let the balance of the Sanctuary weigh all, the oracles of God decide all, the rule of God's Word be the square of all, and His glory the ultimate of all intendments whatsoever.

MCCCXXXVII.—Charity rewarded to the full.

Zuingerus, in 7 beat. Hum. Pim.

Clark's Serm., 1655.

"Benefacere homini, est beneficium magnum apud Deum deponere." — CHRYST., Homil. in Gen. Prov. xi. 24.

THERE is a story of a certain godly and charitable bishop of Milan, who, journeying with his servant, was met by some poor people who begged an alms of him: the bishop commanded his man to give them all the little money that he had, which was three crowns; but his servant, thinking to be a better husband for his master, gave them but two crowns, reserving the third for their expenses at night. Soon after, certain noblemen meeting the bishop, and knowing him to be a good man and one that was liberal to the poor, commanded two hundred crowns to be delivered to the bishop's servant for his master's use. The man, having received the money, ran with great joy and told his master of it: "Ah," said the bishop, "Si enim tres dedisses, trecentas accepisses (What wrong hast thou done to me and thyself! for if thou hadst given those three crowns, as I appointed thee, thou shouldst have received three hundred)." And most true it is, that such open-handed and such open-hearted Christians have more than once God's word of promise for such ample retribution. Bounty is said to be the most compendious way to plenty; neither is getting, but giving, the best way to thrift: for, in works of charity, our scattering is our increasing; no spending, but a lending; no laying out. but a laying up.

MCCCXXXVIII.—Why it is that they who have the strongest graces are subject to the strongest corruptions.

Love's Lect. on 2 Tim.

Plinius.

Ulyss. Aldrovandus.

2 Cor. xii. 7.

"Quantum quis crescit in gratia," &c.—BERN., in Cant., Serm. iii. 1 Tim. i. 15.

It is observable in nature, that those creatures which have the most excellency in them have something also of defect and deformity in them, as if the God of nature did it to keep them humble, in a posture, as it were, of condescension: the peacock hath glittering feathers, and yet black feet; the swan hath white feathers, but under that a black skin; the eagle hath many excellencies, quick sight and high flight, but yet very ravenous; the camel and elephant are great and stately creatures, but of a deformed shape. So it is in the state of grace: God doth suffer some strong and unsubdued lusts and corruptions to remain in the dearest of His children (and that even in such who have not only truth, but strength of grace in them), the messenger of Satan to buffet them, and a thorn in the flesh to let out the imposthumated matter of pride out of their hearts, whereby they become more condescending to the weak, less depending upon their own righteousness, and so are brought to think better of others than themselves—yea, to judge themselves the least of saints, and greatest of sinners that may be.

MCCCXXXIX.—Grace and goodness to be highly esteemed even in men of the lowest condition.

THERE is mention made of an ancient king who made a great feast, and invited a company of poor people who were Christians, and he bade his nobles also. Now, when the poor Christians were come, he had them up into the presence-chamber; but when the nobles came, he set them in the hall. Being thereupon demanded the reason, he answered, "I do not this as I am their king here, for I respect you more than them; but as I am king of another world, I must needs honour these as God's dear children, and such as (though dejected now) shall be kings and princes with me hereafter: and I would have you esteem of them according to their worth, and show it." And so, without all doubt, great is the worth of true Christians. A pearl upon a dunghill is worth stooping for, and a gracious man or woman (though outwardly clothed with rags) worth looking after. Sure it is that God looks on them as His jewels, as a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people, His delight, His chosen ones, His dear children, and what not. It much concerns us, then, to set a true value upon them, make a true estimate of them, and (as much as in us lieth) to be mindful of them, comfortable to them, and willing on all occasions to do them good.

Aloys Nuvarini
Tractat, Evangel.

Greg. Naz., in Orat. xvi., de Pauperum Amore.

Mal. iii. 17.

1 Pet. ii. 9.

Tyt. ii. 14.

Prov. xi. 20.

Matt. v. 9.

MCCCXL.—Love, unity, and peace the best supporters of kingdoms, commonwealths, &c.

THERE is mention made of a dispute betwixt Mars and Pallas, which of them should have the honour to give the name to the city of Athens; at length it was resolved that he should give the name who could find out that which might most conduce to the benefit of the city. Hereupon Mars presents them with a stately horse, which signified wars, divisions, tumults, &c.; but Pallas came in with an olive-branch, the emblem of peace, love, and unity. The city chose Pallas to be their guardian, rightly apprehending that love, unity, and peace would make most to their prosperity and safety. And, questionless, great must needs be the happiness of that nation, kingdom, or commonwealth where they are made supporters: love and unity to cement all affections, and peace to compose all differences that can be found amongst them.

Bodin's Methodus
Hist., cap. 6.

"Nihil perniciosius reipub. quam di-visio, nihil melius quam unio."—
PLATO, de Leg.

MCCCXLI.—Self-seekers reproved.

IT is reported of one Cnidius, a skilful architect, who, building a sumptuous house, or watch-tower, for the king of Egypt, to discover the dangerous rocks by night to the mariners, caused his own name to be engraven upon a stone in the wall in great letters, and afterwards covered it with lime and mortar, and upon the outside of that wrote the name of the king of Egypt in golden letters, as pretending that all was done for his honour and glory. But herein was his cunning: he very well knew that the dashing of the water would, in a little time, consume the plastering, as it did, and then his name and memory should abide and continue to after generations. Just thus there are many in this nation of ours who, in their outward discourse and carriage, pretend to seek only the glory of God, the good of His Church, and the happiness of the state; but if there were a window to look into their hearts, we should find nothing there written but self-love, self-interest, and self-seeking. Many such would be found out who, instead of loving God to the contempt of themselves, love themselves to the contempt of God; many who seek their own, and not the things of Jesus Christ; or, which is as bad, if not worse, who seek their own under the hypocritical pretence of seeking the things of Jesus Christ.

Ptolemaeus.

Plinius. Ælian.

Calamy's Ep. Dcd.
in Serm., Lond., 1655.

Phil. ii. 21.

MCCCXLII.—How it is that men are so much mistaken in the thoughts of long life.

Fuller's Serm.,
Lond., 1652.

-- Nihil ita decipit, quàm cum ignorent
homines spatia vivendi."--JEROME,
Ep. LXXIX.

IT fareth with most men's lives as with the sand in a hypocritical hour-glass : look but upon it in outward appearance, and it seemeth far more than it is, because rising up upon the sides, whilst the sand is empty and hollow in the midst thereof, so that when it sinks down in an instant, a quarter of an hour is gone in a moment. Thus it is that many men are mistaken in their own account, reckoning upon threescore and ten years, the age of a man, because their bodies appear strong and lusty. Alas ! their health may be hollow ; there may be some inward infirmity and imperfection unknown to them, so that death may surprise them on a sudden.

MCCCXLIII.—The generality of men nothing mindful of death.

Morison's Travels.

" Quotidie morimur, quotidie commutamur et tamen æternos nos esse credimus."--JER.,
ad Hebræos.

THERE is a bird, peculiar to Ireland, called the cock of the wood, remarkable for the fine flesh and folly thereof : all the difficulty to kill them is to find them out, otherwise a marksman may easily dispatch them. They fly in woods in flocks, and if one of them be shot the rest remove not but to the next bough, or tree at the farthest, and there stand staring at the shooter till the whole covey be destroyed ; yet, as foolish as this bird is, it is wise enough to be the emblem of the wisest man in the point of mortality. Death sweeps away one, and one, and one—here one and there another—and all the rest remain no whit moved or minding of it, till at last a whole generation is consumed and brought to nothing.

MCCCXLIV.—Beloved sins hardly parted withal.

Vine's Serm.,
Westm., 1650.

" Hic labor hoc opus est."--VIRG.,
Rom. vi. 12.

LOOK but upon a rabbit's skin, how well it comes off till it come to the head, and then there is haling and pulling, and much ado before it stirs. So it is that a man may crucify a great many lusts, subdue abundance of imperfections, and may perform many good duties, and all this while come smoothly off ; but when it comes once to the head, to the Delilah, the darling, the bosom-beloved sin, then there is a tugging and pulling, great regret, loth to depart ; but if God have any interest in such a soul He will pull the skin over his ears, and either break his neck or his heart, before that any such sin shall reign in his mortal body or have any dominion over him.

MCCCXLV.—The wicked rich man's sad condition at the time of death.

Drexellus, de Damnatarum Regis, lib. v.

" Extremos currit mercator ad In-dos."

IT is observable, that a sumpter-horse, or a pack-horse, which all the day long hath gone noddling with abundance of treasure, hath at night all taken from him, and been turned a-grazing, or put into a stable, so that all the benefit he hath gained by it is, that he hath only felt the weight of it, and probably got a galled back for his labour. Thus, many rapacious, wretched rich men, such as are little better than pack-horses, who all their life long carry the things of this world, lade themselves with thick clay, rise early and late, and eat the bread of carefulness to get a little pelf, and a galled conscience to boot, are on a sudden either for ill using or ill getting their wealth, turned, unless God be more merciful, into a filthy stable, into hell, where their pay is everlasting torment.

MCCCXLVI.—Conscience spoils the wicked man's mirth.

Fuller, en Christi's Triumph.

THERE is a story of one who undertook in a few days to make a fat sheep lean, and yet was to allow him a daily and large provision of meat, soft and easy lodging, with security from all danger, that nothing should hurt him : this he effected by putting him into an iron grate, and placing a ravenous wolf hard by in another, always howling, fighting, scenting, scratching to come at the poor sheep, which, affrighted with this sad sound and worse sight, had little joy to eat, less to sleep, whereby his flesh was suddenly abated. And thus it is that all wicked men have the terrors of an affrighted conscience constantly not only barking at them, but biting of them, which spoils all their mirth, dis-sweetens their most delicious pleasures with the sad consideration of the sins they have committed and punishment they must undergo when, in another world, they shall be called to an account for what they have done here in flesh.

" Multa miser timeo, quia feci multa proterve."

MCCCXLVII.—Satan's subtlety in laying his temptations.

AN enemy, before he besiegeth a city, surroundeth it at a distance, to see where the wall is the weakest, best to be battered ; lowest, easiest to be scaled ; ditch, narrowest to be bridged, shallowest to be waded over ; what place is not regularly fortified ; where he may approach with least danger, and assault with most advantage. So Satan walketh about, surveying all the powers of our souls, where he may most probably lay his temptations, as whether our understandings are easier corrupted with error or our fancies with levity, or our wills with frowardness, or our affections with excess, &c.

Fuller, ut antea.

" Diabolus quando decipere quenquam tentat, prius natu-
ram." &c.—HUG.,
lib. ii.

MCCCXLVIII.—How it is that soul and body come to be both punished together.

It is mentioned of two travellers that walked together to the same city, whereof the one was wise, the other foolish, and when they came where two ways met, the one broad and fair, the other straight and foul, the fool would needs go the broader way ; but the wise man told him, though the narrow way seemed foul, yet was it safe and would bring them to a good lodging, and the other seeming fair was very dangerous, and brought them to a desperate inn ; yet, because the fool would not yield to any reason, but believed what he saw with his eyes rather than what he heard with his ears, the wise man, for company's sake, was contented to go the worse way ; and, being both robbed by thieves, detained in their company, and at last apprehended with the robbers and carried before the magistrate, these two began to accuse one another, and each to excuse himself. The wise man said he told his fellow the dangers of that broad way, and therefore he only was to be blamed, because he would not yield unto his counsel ; but the fool had so much wit to reply, that he was a very silly creature, and knew neither the way nor the dangers of the way, and therefore he was to be excused and the wise man to be condemned, because he would follow such a fool's counsel ; whereupon the judge, having heard them both, condemned them both : the fool, because he refused to follow the counsel of the wise ; and the wise man, because he would not forsake the fool's company. So it is that, when the soul, which is the wise man, and doth know the dangerous issues of the ways of death and sin, and the pleasant fruits of virtue and goodness, will, notwithstanding, follow the vain delights of foolish flesh, and walk in the paths of unrighteousness, no marvel if the righteous Judge condemn both body and soul together.

Prosper, *de Bonis
Timoribus*, lib. ii.

" Pares culpæ, pares poenæ."

Williams's Serm.,
Westm.

MCCCXLIX.—A blessed thing to have riches and a heart to use them aright.

It is credibly reported of Mr. Thomas Sutton (the sole founder of that eminent hospital commonly known by his name), that he used often to repair into a private garden, where he

Fuller's Church Hist. of Britain, 1611.

poured forth his prayers unto God, and, amongst other passages, was frequently overheard to use this expression, "Lord, Thou hast given me a liberal and large estate, give me also a heart to make good use thereof," which at last was granted to him accordingly. And thus, without all doubt, a great blessing it is for any man to have riches and a heart to use them aright, to be rich as well in grace as in gold, rich in good works as great in riches, not so much a treasurer as a steward, whose praise is more to lay out well than to have received much; otherwise he may have riches, not goods, not blessings; his burden would be greater than his estate, and he richer in sorrows than in metals.

Bp. Hall.

MCCCL.—The great danger of use in jesting at religion and piety.

WHEN Julian the Apostate had received his death wound, he could not but confess that the fatal arrow which shot him came from heaven, yet he confessed it in a phrase of scorn, "Vicisti Galilæe (The day is Thine, O Galilean)!" and no more; not as he should have said, "Thou hast accomplished Thy purpose, O my God, O my Maker, O my Redeemer!" but in a style of contempt, "Vicisti Galilæe!" and no more. And thus it is that many who have used and accustomed their mouths to oaths and blasphemies all their lives have made it their last syllable and their last gasp to swear they shall die. And others there are, too, that enlarge and ungird their wits in jesting at religion and goodness—but what becomes of it? They pass away at last in negligence of all spiritual assistances, and scarcely find half a minute betwixt their last jest here in this life and their everlasting earnest in that which is to come.

Naclerus Marcell., in Hist. Tripartit.

Donne's Serm.,
1627.

MCCCLI.—Service of God perfect freedom.

As a man that buyeth freehold land, though he pay dear for it, yet it is accounted cheaper and a far better purchase than if he had laid out his money upon that which is held by copy of court-roll—and why so? Because it freeth him from many services and duties which copyhold land is obliged unto, all which the lord of the manor may justly challenge according to custom—so it is that the service of God is perfect freedom, and will free a man from all other services whatsoever: so that, be but a true servant of God, whosoever thou art, thou art free indeed—free from the service of sin and Satan, and free from all those domineering lusts that would fain be ruling in thy mortal body; but, on the contrary, if thou be not a true servant of Jesus Christ, thou shalt be a slave to everything besides Him. Either thy belly will be thy god or thy gold will be thy god; pleasures, profits, preferments, all that is besides God, will put in to make up a god; and then, "O quam multos habet ille Dominos qui unum non habet (How many lords must that man needs have that hath not God for his Lord and Master)!"

Calamy's Serm.,
Westm., 1644.

"Bonus etiam si serviat liber est,"
Eccl.—AUG., de Civitat. Dei, lib. iv.

Jerome, in Ep. ad Simplicianum.

MCCCLII.—The excellency of resolution in the cause of God.

EXCELLENT is the story of St. Basil, who, when the emperor sent to him to subscribe to the Arian heresy, the messenger at first gave him good language, and promised him great preferment if he would turn Arian, to which Basil replied, "Alas! these speeches are fit to catch little children withal, who look after such things; but we that are nourished and taught by the Holy Scriptures are readier to suffer a thousand deaths than to suffer one syllable or tittle of the Scripture to be altered." The messenger, offended with his boldness, told him he was mad. He answered, "Opto me in æternum sic delirare (I wish I were for ever thus mad)!" Here was a stout, resolved Christian, who, Luther-like, opposed all the world of contradiction; and such another was Nehemiah, who met with so much opposition, that, had he not been steeled by a strong and obstinate resolution, he could never Theodoret.

Hist. Tripartit., lib.
vii., cap. 36.

"Qui totius orbis impetum sustinuit,"
—SLEDAN.

have rebuilt the Temple but would have sunk in the midst of it ; such a one was David, who would not be hindered from fighting with Goliath, though he met with many discouragements ; and it is heartily to be wished that God would make us all such—i. e., resolved Christians—to put on divine fortitude and Christian resolution, which, if we do, it will make us like a wall of brass, to beat back all the arrows of strong persuasion that can be shot against us, like an armour of proof against all the Anakims and Zanzummins, Scyllas and Syrens' temptations on the right hand and on the left—like the angel that rolled away the stone from before the door of the sepulchre, it will enable us to remove the great mountains of opposition that lie in our way, or else to stride over them—yea, like the ballast of a ship, will keep us steady in the cause of God and His Church, who would otherwise be but δύψυχος, like those mentioned by the apostle, men of double minds, unsettled and unstable in all our ways.

James i. 8.

MCCCLIII.—God's omniscience necessarily demonstrated from His omnipresence.

SUPPOSE we in our thoughts a sphere of infinite greatness and efficacy, whose centre is everywhere and circumference nowhere, it must necessarily follow that whatever thing or things be besides this sphere must needs be within it, encompassed by it, and contained in it ; and all things existing within this sphere, it will follow that there can be no action nor motion but this sphere will perceive it. Such is God, a sphere of infinite being, who filleth all things that He hath made, as spirits, bodies, things above and below, things in heaven and earth, all ; that encompasseth all things, is above all things, and sustaineth all things ; neither doth He fill them on the one side and encompass them on the other side, but by encompassing doth fill them, and by filling doth encompass them ; and by sustaining He is above them, and being above them He doth sustain them : then it must needs be that God, who thus filleth, encompasseth, and sustaineth all things, doth also know all things.

"Nihil agi posse quod ab illo, non sentiantur."—MONT., in Hist. Nat.

Aug., de Fide, Lib. ad Petron.

MCCCLIV.—To be zealous for the honour of Jesus Christ, as He is the eternal Son of God.

IN the days of Theodosius, the Arians, through his connivance, were grown very bold, and not only had their meetings in Constantinople, the chief city of the empire, but would dispute their opinions etiam in foro ; and no man could prevail with the emperor to lay restraints upon them, because, saith the historian, he thought it nimis severum et inclemens esse. At length comes to Constantinople one Amphilochius, bishop of Iconium, a poor town, an honest man, but no great politician for the world ; he petitions the emperor to restrain the Arians, but in vain. Next time he comes to the court, finding the emperor and his son Arcadius (whom he had lately created joint emperor) standing together, he doth very low obeisance to the father, but none to the son, yet coming up close to him, in a familiar manner stroketh him on the head, and saith, "Salve mi fili (God save you, my child) !" The emperor taking this for a great affront, being full of rage, bids turn the man out of doors ; as the officers were dragging him forth, he, turning to the emperor, saith, "Ad hunc modum existima, O imperator, &c. (Make an account, O emperor, that thus, even thus, is the Heavenly Father displeased with those that do not honour the Son equally with the Father) !" which the emperor hearing, calls the bishop back again, asks him forgiveness, presently makes a law against Arianism, forbids their meetings and disputations, constitutâ penâ. Here was a blessed artifice by which the zeal of this emperor was suddenly turned into the right channel, and he was taught by his tenderness over his own honour and the honour of his son, to be tender over the honour of God and His Son Christ Jesus. Now, so it is that much of Arius is at this day in England, and more than ever was since the name of Christ was Theodoret, lib. v., cap. 18.

Cedreni Hist., in Vita Theodosii Imp.

Newcomen's Sermon, Westm., 1647.

known in England, yet it is much hoped and heartily wished for, that as there hath been some actings for God, that men may no longer impunè wickedly and pertinaciously blaspheme His glorious essence and attributes, so to show the like zeal for the glory of His eternal Son and Spirit, this being the will of God, that all men should honour the Son as they honour the Father. He that honoureth not the Son honoureth not the Father.

MCCCLV.—Politicians spoiled in the height of wicked designs.

Edlin's Serm., 1656.

Isa. xxix. 15.

"Parturiunt montes," &c.

As the potter's clay, when the potter hath spent some time and pains in tempering and forming it upon the wheel, and now the vessel is even almost brought to its shape, a man that stands by may, with the least push, put it clean out of shape, and mar all on a sudden that he hath been so long a-making: so is it that all the plots and contrivances of lewd and wicked men, all their turnings of things upside down, shall be but as the potter's clay; for when they think they have brought all to maturity, ripeness, and perfection, when they look upon their business as good as done, on a sudden all their labour is lost, the designs they travail so much withal shall be but as an abortive birth, for God, who stands by all the while and looks on, will, with one small touch, with the least breath of His mouth, blast and break all in pieces.

MCCCLVI.—Consideration of God's omnipresence a strong motive to Christian confidence.

Newcomen's Serm.,
Westm., 1647.

"Quid dignum tanto feret hic promissor?"

"Cave Deus videt."
—BERN.

2 Cor. ii. 17.

THERE is a story of that holy martyr of Jesus Christ, Bishop Latimer, that having in a sermon at court, in Henry VIII.'s days, much displeased the king, he was commanded next Sunday after to preach again and make his recantation. According to appointment, he comes to preach, and prefaceth his sermon with a kind of dialogism in this manner: "Hugh Latimer, dost thou know to whom thou art this day to speak? To the high and mighty monarch, the king's most excellent majesty, &c., who can take away thy life if thou offend; therefore take heed how thou speak a word that may displease;" but as it were recalling himself, "Hugh, Hugh," saith he, "dost know from whence thou comest, upon Whose message thou art sent? And Who is it that is present with thee and beholdeth all thy ways? Even the great and mighty God, who is able to cast both body and soul into hell for ever: therefore look about thee, and be sure that thou deliver thy message faithfully," &c.; and so comes on to his sermon, and what he had delivered the day before confirms and urgeth with more vehemency than ever. Sermon being done, the court was full of expectation what would be the issue of the matter. After dinner, the king calls for Latimer, and, with a stern countenance, asked him how he durst be so bold as to preach after that manner. He answered, that duty to God and his prince had enforced him thereunto, and now he had discharged his conscience and duty both in what he had spoken, his life was in his majesty's hands. Upon this the king rose from his seat, and, taking the good man from off his knees, embraced him in his arms, saying he blessed God that he had a man in his kingdom that durst deal so plainly and faithfully with him. Thus, did but all men, especially ministers, preachers of the Word, such as are immediately employed by God, seriously take notice of His omnipresence, and continually remember how His eye is always upon them, oh, how diligent, how confident, how abundant would it make them in the work of the Lord! how faithful, how courageous, how unbiassed! how above the frowns and smiles of the greatest of the sons of men, &c.!

MCCCLVII.—The consideration of God's omnipresence to be a dissuasive from sin.

It is well known what Ahasuerus, that great monarch, said concerning Haman, when, coming in, he found him cast upon the queen's bed, on which she sat : "What," saith he, "will he force the queen before me in the house?" There was the killing emphasis in the words "before me." Will he force the queen before me? What! will he dare to commit such a villainy, and I stand and look on?" Thus it is that to do wickedly in the sight of God is a thing that He looks upon as the greatest affront and indignity that can possibly be done unto Him. "What!" saith He, "wilt thou be drunk before Me? swear, blaspheme before Me? be unclean before Me? break My laws before Me?" This, then, is the killing aggravation of all sin, that it is done before the face of God, in the presence of God; whereas the very consideration of God's omnipresence, that He stands and looks on, should be as a bar, a remora, to stop the proceeding of all wicked intendments—a dissuasive rather from sin than the least encouragement thereunto, Ester. vii. 8.

MCCCLVIII.—Courts of judicature to be free from all manner of injustice.

It is said of that famous Athenian judicature, where once Dionysius sat as a judge, and thereupon called the Areopagite, that they did excel so much in authority, that kings laid down their crowns when they came to sit with them; that they were of such integrity, that they kept their court and gave judgment in the night and in the dark, that they might not behold the persons who did speak; lest they should be moved thereby, they only did hear what was said. Here it was that the pleader must not use any poem nor make any rhetorical expression to move the affections, so that the people did bear as much reverence to the sentences and decrees promulged there as they did to their sacred oracles. Such was the strictness, such the justice of that though then heathen council, that it may very well serve as a mirror to look in, as a pattern for the imitation, and as a copy for the most Christian courts of judicature to write by; for were but causes evenly weighed in the balance of Justice, there would not be so much complaining of the often tilting on the one side or the other as now there is; were men but Christian lawyers, they would not be so often looked on as heathen orators; were laws but justly put in execution, the sword would not so often be borne in vain: neither would great ones bear down those that are less, nor mighty ones confound the mean, but all would be subservient to the Supreme, serviceable and respectful one to the other.

Aul. Gell., lib. xii.

Valer., lib. ii., cap. i.

MCCCLIX.—Ministers advised in the method of profitable preaching.

As the physician himself gives not health, but only gives some helps to bring the body into a fit temperament and disposition, so far as to help and strengthen nature: so the preacher cannot be said to give knowledge, but the helps and motives by which natural light, being excited and helped, may get knowledge. And as he is the best physician who doth not oppress nature with a multitude of medicines, but pleasantly, with a few, doth help it for the recovery of health: so he is the best preacher, not that knoweth how to heap up many mediums and arguments to force the understanding, rather than to entice it by the sweetness of light, but he that, by the easy and grateful mediums which are within reach or fitted to our light, doth lead men, as by the hand, unto the truth, in the beholding or sight of which truth only knowledge doth consist, and not in use of arguments. Hence it is that arguments are called reasons by a name of relation to truth—and why so? but because they are a means for finding out of truth and discovery of error.

Baxter's Saints' Eternal Rest.

Gibieuf, in Præfat. lib. ii. de Libert. civit. ex Aquinate, p. 1, q. 117.

"Non tam eleganter dicentes quam utilia docentes sunt audendi."—ZENO.

MCCCLX.—Fear of hell to be a restraint from the least sin.

Dan. iii. 6.

THE passage in Scripture is well known how Nebuchadnezzar erected a golden image, with this terrible commination, that whosoever would not fall down and worship it should be cast into the fiery furnace. This, now, was so terrible to every one that heard it, that unless it were three or four, there were none that did resist: the very fear of a fiery furnace made them do anything. And shall not, then, the fear of those eternal flames, the fear of that great day wherein God shall reveal all wrath, without any mercy, to the wicked man, shall not this turn him out of the ways of sin? Shall not this make him with bitterness bewail his former lusts, and to hate those bitter-sweets of pleasure which erst he so much delighted in, saying with Jonathan, "I have tasted a little honey, and I must die!" "I have had a little pleasure of sin, and I must be damned for evermore"?

MCCCLXI.—*Daily amendment of life enjoined, to the making up of the new creature.*Plutarch, in Theses.Alex. ab Alexan-dro, lib. iii., cap. 1.

Rom. xiii. 14.

Isa. v. 18.

Hosca xii. 1.

Edlin's Serm. on 2 Cor. v. 17,
Lond., 1656.

2 Cor. v. 17.

Eph. v. 24.

Ps. xl.
Ezek. xxiii. 31.
Rev. xxi. 2.

It is said of Argo (the then royal sovereign of the Asiatic seas), that being upon constant service, she was constantly repaired, and as one plank or board failed, she was ever and anon supplied with another that was more serviceable, insomuch that at last she became all new, which caused a great dispute amongst the philosophers of those times, whether she was the same ship as before or not. Thus it is that, for our parts, we have daily and hourly served under the commands of Sin and Satan, made provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof, drawn iniquity with cords of vanity, and sin, as it were, with a cart rope, and daily, like Ephraim, increased in wickedness, insomuch that there are not only some bruises and brushes, but, as it were, a shipwreck of faith and all goodness in the frame of our precious souls. What, then, remains but that we should die daily unto sin and live unto righteousness, put in a new plank this day and another to-morrow, now subdue one lust and another to-morrow, this day conquer one temptation and the next another, be still on the mending hand; and then the question needs not be put whether we be the same or not. For old things being put away, all things will become new: we shall be new men, new creatures; we shall have new hearts, new spirits, and new songs in our mouths; be made partakers of the new covenant, and at last inheritors of the New Jerusalem.

MCCCLXII.—God's great patience, *notwithstanding man's provocations.*Bolton's Serm. on 2 Sam. xxiv. 10.

SUPPOSE a man should come into a curious artificer's shop, and there with one blow dash in pieces such a piece of art as had cost many years' study and pains in the contriving thereof. How could he bear with it? How would he take on to see the workmanship of his hands so rashly, so wilfully destroyed? He could not but take it ill and be much troubled thereat. Thus it is that as soon as God had set up and perfected the frame of the world, sin gave a shrewd shake to all; it unpinned the frame, and had like to have pulled all in pieces again; nay, had it not been for the promise of Christ, all this goodly frame had been reduced to its primitive nothing again. Man by his sin had pulled down all about his ears, but God, in mercy, keeps it up; man by his sin provokes God, but God, in mercy, passeth by all affronts whatsoever. Oh, the wonderful mercy—oh, the omnipotent patience of God!

MCCCLXIII.—How it is that there may be partial desertions of spiritual grace in the souls of God's dearest children, but never total nor final ones.

As it was with Samson, when his locks were cut off his strength was gone, and therefore, though he thought to go out and do great things, as formerly he had done, yet, by woeful experience, he found there was no such matter—he was become even as another man : so it is with the best and dearest of God's children. When God is gone, their locks are cut, their strength is gone, as not lying in their hair; yet this is but a partial, a temporary, not a total and final desertion of Divine assistance and spiritual grace in the soul; for God may forsake a man in respect of His quickening presence, and leave a man to such barrenness, flatness, deadness of his spirit, for a time, that the soul cannot pray, hear, meditate, do anything as formerly it hath done. And God may forsake a man, too, in respect of His comforting presence. He may eclipse his joys, damp his comforts, withdraw the beams of His countenance, and leave him in darkness and trouble, yet, for all this, God never forsakes such a man in respect of His supporting presence: then it is that, in the saddest condition, in the darkest night, in the stormiest day, the soul hath support from Him. As He told St. Paul, so He tells all men, all of the election of grace, all that love and fear Him, His strength shall be seen in their weakness, and His grace is sufficient for them—i. e., sufficient to bear them up in the trial, and sufficient to bring them out of all trials whatsoever.

Bolton's Love of Christ to His Spouse; a Sermon on Cant. iv. 9.

Ps. lxxxviii.

Job, David, Heman.

MCCCLXIV.—Complete Christian duty.

It was the speech of Mr. Bradford, that he could not leave a duty till he had found communion with Christ in the duty, till he had brought his heart into a duty frame; he could not leave confession till he had found his heart touched, broken, and humbled for sin, nor petition till he had found his heart taken with the beauties of the things desired, and carried out after them; nor could he leave thanksgiving till he had found his spirit enlarged and his soul quickened in the return of praises: just like that of St. Bernard; who found God in every duty, and communion with Him in every prayer. This was true, sincere, complete Christian duty. And thus it is that the soul taken with Christ desires converses with Him in prayer, in hearing, and meditation; and such, too, is the genius of a soul taken up with Christ, that duty doth not content it if it find not Christ in the duty; so that if the end of a duty hath left it on this side Christ, it hath left it so far short of true comfort.

Fox's Acts and Mon.

Isa. lviii. 9.

MCCCLXV.—Directions for both strong and weak in faith how to demean themselves as to the matter of God's providence.

WE may read that Ulysses, when he was to pass the coast of the Syrens, caused his men to stop their ears, that they might not be enchanted by their music to destroy themselves; but for himself, he would only be bound to the mast, that though he should hear, yet their musical sounds might not be so strong as to allure him to overthrow himself by leaping into the sea. Thus, there are some of God's people who are weak in the faith, so that when they see God's outward proceedings of providence seemingly contrary to His promises, they are apt to be charmed (enchanted, in a bad sense) from their own steadfastness; it were, therefore, good for them to stop their ears, and to shut their eyes to the works, and look altogether to the Word of God: but for those that are strong, such as in whom the pulse of faith beats more vigorously, they may look upon the outward proceedings of God; yet let them be sure to bind themselves fast to the mast, the Word of God, lest, when they see the seeming contrariety of His proceedings to the promise, they be charmed from their own steadfastness to the wounding of their own most precious souls and weakening the assurance of their eternal salvation.

Rhodog., Lect. Antiq., lib. xxviii.

Bolton on God's Wonderful Working for His Church and People; Sermon on Exod. xv. 11.

MCCCLXVI.—How it is that the strength of imagination persuades so much out of the way in matters of religion.

Torsbell's Design to Harmonize the Bible, 1647.

Pienus, de Viribus Imaginat.

Philastrius, de Hereticis, Jude 8.

It is observable, that when some men look up to the rack, or moving clouds, they imagine them to have forms of men, of angels, of armies, of castles, forests, landscapes, lions, bears, &c., where none else can see such things, nor is there any true resemblance of such shapes; and some there are, too, that when they have somewhat rolls and tumbles in their thoughts, they think that the ringing of bells, the beating of hammers, the report that is made by great ordnance, or any other measured, intermitted noise, doth articulately sound and speak the same which is in their thoughts. Thus it is that a strong imagination or fancy becomes very powerful as to persuasion in the matters of God and religion; hence it is that most of those who are unlearned and unstable wrest the Scripture, thinking they find that in it which indeed is not there, persuading themselves that it representeth to them such and such formed opinion, when, questionless, they do but patch and lay things together without any reason at all; from whence have proceeded the senseless dotages of heretics in older times, and of late in the ridiculous papers of some dreamers that have flown about, and bring Scripture with them, but no sense, fancying the Holy Word of God to strike, to ring, or chime to their tunes, to echo out unto their wild conceits, and join with them in their rude undigested notions.

MCCCLXVII.—How it is that so many deceive themselves in their not rightly searching the Scriptures.

Drexell's Gymnasium Patientia.

Archimedes.

As the apes in the story, finding a glowworm in a very cold night, took it for a spark of fire, and heaped up sticks upon it, to warm themselves by, but all in vain; so do they lose their labour who, in the warrantable search of Divine truth, busy themselves about sounds of words and incoherent Scripture sentences, when, partly from depravedness of mind, partly from ignorance, partly from instability, suddenness, and haste, they take a snatch, and run away with that which looks somewhat like the sense of Scripture, and so deceive their own souls, crying out, like the mathematician in Athens, "I have found—I have found it!" when, indeed, they have found nothing to the purpose, nor anything to the true information of themselves or others in the ways of God and goodness.

MCCCLXVIII.—The subtle hypocrite.

Fulgorus, lib. viii., cap. xi., ex Plinio.

"Rapido gestans sub pectore vultum."—PERS., Sat. v.

THERE is mention made of Parrhasius and Zeuxis, a pair of excellent painters in those times, that being upon trial of their skill how to excel each other in the matter of their art, Zeuxis drew out a bunch of grapes so fair and well coloured that the birds came and pecked at them, to the great admiration of the beholders, even as if they had been of a natural and lively growth. And the expectation was great what it could be that Parrhasius should draw to outdo so exquisite a piece of workmanship. He thereupon falls to his pencil, and makes upon his table the resemblance of a white sheet, tacked up with four nails, one at each corner, so artificially, that, being offered to view, Zeuxis bade him take away the sheet, that they might see the excellency of his art that was behind it; whereupon it was adjudged that Parrhasius had gone beyond him in so doing: and but good reason too, for the one had only deceived silly birds, but the other had put a trick upon a knowing artist himself. And so it is with the close, reserved hypocrite: such is his subtlety, that he doth not only delude silly birds—poor ignorant souls, but knowing men—experienced Christians, and, if it were possible, the very elect themselves. He can compose his forehead to sadness and gravity whilst he bids his heart be wanton and careless, and, at the same time, laugh within himself to think how smoothly he hath cozened the believing beholder.

MCCCLXIX.—The danger of immoderate zeal against those of another judgment; and how so.

THERE is in the nature of many men a certain θερμότης, a heat and activeness of spirit, which then principally, when conversant about objects divine and matters of conscience, is wonderfully apt, without a due corrective of wisdom and knowledge, to break forth into intemperate carriage and to disturb peace. It was zeal in the women who persecuted St. Paul, and it was zeal in St. Paul, who persecuted Christ before he knew Him; for as the historian saith of some men, that they are "sola socordia innocentes," bad enough in themselves, yet do little hurt, by reason of a phlegmatic and torpid constitution indisposing them for action, so, on the contrary, men there may be—nay, without all doubt, some there are—who, having devotion, like those honourable women, not ruled by knowledge, and zeal, like quicksilver, not allayed nor reduced unto usefulness by wisdom and mature learning, may be, as Nazianzen saith they were in his time, the causes of much unquiet; insomuch that truth itself hath been stretched too far, so that by a vehement dislike of error on the one side, men have run into an error on the other, as Dionysius Alexandrinus, being too fervent against Sabellius, did lay the grounds of Arianism; and Chrysostom, in zeal against the Manichees, did too much extol the power of nature; and Illyricus, out of a hatred of the Papists lessening original sin, ran another extreme to make it an essential corruption, &c.

Is. Casaub., Exercit. in Baronium, xiv., sect. 6.

Acts xiii. 50.

Phil. iii. 6.

Tacitus.

"Spiritus magni magis quam utiles," —LV., Dec., lib. x.

Basil., Ep. xli.

Acosta, de Hieronymo citante Rivet, in Pi. xvi.

Sext. Senens., in Proemio, lib. v.

MCCCLXX.—The all-sufficient goodness of Christ Jesus.

ALL the good things that can be reckoned up here below have only a finite and limited benignity: some can clothe, but cannot feed; others can nourish, but they cannot heal; others can enrich, but they cannot secure; others adorn, but cannot advance; all do serve, but none do satisfy. They are like a beggar's coat, made up of many pieces, not all enough either to beautify or defend. But Christ is full and sufficient for all His people. He ascended on high, that He might fill all things, that He might pour forth such abundance of Spirit on His Church as might answer all the conditions whereunto they may be reduced; righteousness enough to cover all their sins; plenty enough to supply all their wants; grace enough to subdue all their lusts; wisdom enough to resolve all their doubts; power enough to vanquish all their enemies; virtue enough to cure all their diseases; fullness enough to save them, and that to the utmost. Over and besides, there is in Christ something proportionable to all the wants and desires of His people: He is bread, wine, milk, living waters, to feed them; He is a garment of righteousness, to cover and adorn them; a Physician to heal them, a Counsellor to advise them, a Captain to defend them, a Prince to rule, a Prophet to teach, a Priest to make atonement for them, a Husband to protect, a Father to provide, a Brother to relieve, a Foundation to support, a Root to quicken, a Head to guide, a Treasure to enrich, a Sun to enlighten, and a Fountain to cleanse; so that as the 'one ocean hath more waters than all the rivers of the world, and one sun more light than all the luminaries in heaven, so one Christ is more all to a poor soul than if it had the all of the whole world a thousand times over.

Reynolds's Joy in the Lord; a Sermon, Lond.

Eph. iv. 10.

"Omnis mihi copia, quæ Deus meus non est, egestas est." —AUG., Confer., lib. xiii., cap. 8.

"Non bonus angelus, sed Bonum Bonum." —Id., de Trin., lib. viii., cap. 3.
John vi. 5, 7, 48.
Rev. xix. 11.
Matt. ix. 12.
Isa. ix. 6.
Heb. ii. 10.

MCCCLXXI.—Men easily taken off from their holy profession, upon removal of judgment, condemned

JOSEPHUS tells us that the sons of Noah, for some years after the flood, dwelt on the tops of high mountains, not daring to take up their habitation on the lower ground, for fear of being drowned by another flood; yet, in process of time, seeing no flood came, they ventured down into the plain of Shinar, where their former modesty we see ended in one of the boldest, proudest attempts against God that the sun was ever witness to—the building of a tower whose top should reach up to heaven. They who, at first, were so maidenly and fearful as not to venture down their hills, for fear of drowning, now have a design to secure themselves against all future attempts from the God of heaven Himself. Thus it is oft seen that God's judgments leave such an impression in men's spirits, that awhile they stand aloof from their sins, as they on their hills, afraid to come down to them; but when they see fair weather continue, and no clouds gather towards another storm, then they can descend to their old wicked practices, and grow more bold and heaven-daring than ever. Oh, how nice and scrupulous are they while the smell of fire is about them, and the memory of their distress fresh! They are as tender of sinning as one who comes out of a hot, close room is of the air; they shrink at every breath of temptation. But, alas! how soon, upon the least remove of judgment, are they hardened to commit those sins without remorse, the bare notion of which, but a little before, did so trouble and afflict them!

In Lib. Antiquitatis Psalmic.

Gen. xi. 2.

"In minimis cauti, in maximis negli-gentes."—JER., de Hom. Perfect.

MCCCLXXII.—Humility appeaseth God's anger.

Sueton., in Vita.

It was a high piece of ingenuity and clemency in Augustus Cæsar, who, having promised, by proclamation, a great sum of money to any one who should bring him the head of a famous pirate, did yet, when the pirate—who had heard of this—brought it himself to him, and laid it at his foot, not only pardon him for his former offences against him, but reward him for the great confidence that he had in his mercy. And thus doth God: though His wrath be revealed against all sin and unrighteousness, yet when the soul itself comes freely and humbles itself mightily before Him, His anger will be soon over, neither will He stretch forth His arm to strike such a soul, that giveth so much glory to His mercy.

"O sancta venerabilisque humilitas," &c.—AUG., in Serm. de Superbia.

MCCCLXXIII.—Pleasures of sin, the miseries of them.

Purchas's Pilgrimage.

Sin's pleasure is like the pleasure which a place in the West Indies affords them who dwell in it: there grows in it most rare, luscious fruit, but these dainties are so sauced with the intolerably scorching heat of the sun by day, and the multitude of a sort of creatures stinging them by night, that they can neither well eat by day nor sleep by night, to digest their sweetmeats; which made the Spaniards call the place Comfits in Hell. And truly, what are the pleasures of sin but such comfits in hell? There is some carnal pleasure they have, which delights a rank, sensual palate; but here is the misery of it: they are served in with the fiery wrath of God and stinging of a guilty, restless conscience; so that the fears of the one, with the anguish of the other, are surely able to melt and waste away that little joy and pleasure they bring to the sense of any man who shall enjoy them.

"Impia sub dulci melle venena latent."—OVID, Amor. viii.

MCCCLXXIV.—The people of God to be at peace one with another; and why so.

Gen. xiii. 7.

THE unseasonableness of the strife betwixt Abraham's herdsmen and Lot's is aggravated by the near neighbourhood of the heathens to them: "And there was a strife," saith the text, "between Abraham's herdsmen and the herdsmen of Lot's cattle; and the Canaanite and the Perizzite dwelt in the land." Now, to fall out whilst these idolators looked on, this would be town-talk presently, and put themselves and their religion both to shame. And it may, for our parts, be very well asked, "Who have been in our land all the while the people of God have been scuffling?" Even those who have curiously observed every uncomely behaviour amongst us, and told all the world of it; such as have wit and malice enough to make use of it for their wicked purposes. They stand on tiptoe to be at work, only we are not yet quite laid up and disabled (by the soreness of these our wounds, which we have given ourselves) from withstanding their fury. They hope it will come to that, and then they will cure us of our wounds by giving one, if they can, that shall go deep enough to the heart of our life, Gospel and all. Let us, then, consider where we are, and among whom. Are we not in our enemies' quarters, so that, if we fall out, what do we else but kindle a fire for them to warm their hands by? It is an ill time for mariners to be fighting when an enemy is boring a hole in the bottom of the ship. The sea of their rage will weaken our bank fast enough; we need not cut it for them. Then, to close up all, shall Herod and Pilate put us to shame? They clapped up a peace to strengthen their hands against Christ; and shall not we unite, then, against a common enemy—such a one as seeketh to raise himself by our uneven and unkind quarrelling amongst ourselves?

"Papistæ, Rapistæ."

"Tunc tua res agitur."

Luke xxiii. 12.

MCCCLXXV.—The emptiness of all worldly delights without Christ.

As a cup of pleasant wine, offered to a condemned man in the way to his execution; as the feast of him who sat under a naked sword, hanging perpendicularly over his head by a slender thread; as Adam's forbidden fruit, seconded by a flaming sword; as Belshazzar's dainties, overlooked by a handwriting against the wall: such are all the empty delights of the world—in their matter and expectation, earthly; in their acquisition, painful; in their fruition, nauseous and cloying; in their duration, dying and perishing; in their operation, hardening, effeminating, leavening, puffing up, estranging the heart from God; in their consequences, seconded with anxiety, solicitude, fear, sorrow, despair, disappointment; in their measure, shorter than that a man can stretch himself on, narrower than that a man can wrap himself in; every way defective and disproportionable to the vast and spacious capacity of the soul of man, as unable to fill that as the light of a candle to give day to the whole world. Nothing but emptiness attends them all, unless they be found in Christ Jesus.

Damocles.

Gen. iii. 7, 24.

"Delitiæ cadunt et prætereunt, vulnerant et trans-eunt."—AMBROS.

MCCCLXXVI.—People to show love to their ministers in the vindication of their credits.

It is said of Constantine, that he was a great honourer of the ministry, and so unfavourable in the entertainment of any complaint against them, that he would not read any accusations brought in against them, but did burn them; and it was a law amongst the Egyptians, that if a man found another in the hands of thieves, and did not deliver him when it was in his power, he was condemned to die. So it is that ministers fall too, too often among thieves, who would rob them of their good names, and labour much to clip their credit, that so they might weigh the lighter amongst the people; nay, it is counted by some a piece of their religion neatly and handsomely to defame the minister. And some there are, too, who would be thought more modest, who, though they do not raise a report, yet they can receive it as a welcome present; but all this is contrary to that apostolical rule, 1 Tim. v. 19. If others seek to rob them of their good names, we are to seek to deliver them; if others clip their credits, let us put some grains into the scales, that they may weigh the heavier; if they open their mouths to God for us, let us not shut our mouths in their just defence; if they labour to save our souls, let us be forward to save their credits.

Eusebius, in Vita

MCCCLXXVII.—Every man to be wise for himself, as well as for others.

As shell-fishes, which breed pearls for others to wear, but are sick of them themselves; as a Mercury statue, which shows the way to others, but stands still itself; or as a whetstone,

In Lib. Moralium.

Prov. ix. 12.

Purchas's Pilgrimage.

Ps. i. 3

Gen. vi. 14.

Luke x. 41.

which sharpeneth the knife, but is blunt itself : thus many men, like Plutarch's lamie, have eyes for abroad, but are blind at home ; are wise for others, but not for themselves. "If thou be wise," saith Solomon, "be wise for thyself." It is not enough for a man to do good to others, though he could to all, if he remain an enemy to himself : he must be like a cinnamon-tree, which lets not out all its sap into leaves and fruit, which will fall off, but keeps the principal part of its fragraney for the bark which stays on ; like a tree planted by the water side, which, though it let out much sap to the remoter boughs, yet is specially careful of the root, that that be not left dry. And, to speak truth, what profit would it be to a man if he could heal and help all the sick men in the world, had all the angels to be his friends, and have still God for his enemy ? if he could save others, and then lose his own soul ? to be like the ship (Acts xxvii.), broken to pieces itself, though it helped others to the shore ? or like those who built the ark for Noah, and were drowned themselves ? This is to have the cares of Martha upon him on the behalf of others, and never mind that one thing of Mary, the care of his own salvation.

MCCCLXXVIII.—Neglect of the main duties of Christianity reproved.

Gurnall's *Christian
in Complete Armour.*

SUPPOSE a master, before he goes forth, should charge his servant to look to his child and trim up the house handsomely against he comes home, but when he returns, will he thank this servant for sweeping his house and making it trim, as he bade him, if he finds his child, through negligence, fallen into the fire, and so killed or crippled ? No, sure. He left his child with him as his chief charge, to which the other should have yielded, if both could not be done. Thus, there hath been a great zeal of late amongst us about some circumstantial of God's worship ; but who is it that looks to the little child, the main duties of Christianity ? Was there ever less love, charity, self-denial, heavenly-mindedness, or the power of godliness to be found than in this sad age of ours ? Alas ! these, like the child, are in great danger of perishing in the fire of contention and division which a perverse zeal in less things hath kindled amongst us.

MCCCLXXIX.—Pleasures of righteousness not discerned by unrighteous men ; and how so.

Contr. Zuingerus, in Theat. Hum. Vita."Quantum mortalia pectora cæcæ noc-tis habent."—
OVID, Mét., lib. vi.

Prov. xiv. 10.

THE Roman soldiers, when, at the sacking of Jerusalem, they entered the Temple, and went into the sanctum sanctorum, seeing no images there, as they used to have in their own idolatrous temples, gave out, in a jeer, that the Jews worshipped the clouds. And thus, because the pleasures of righteousness and holiness are not so gross as to come under the cognizance of the world's carnal senses, as their brutish ones do, therefore they laugh at the saints, as if their joy were but the child of fancy, and that they do but embrace a cloud instead of Juno herself, a fantastic pleasure for the true ; but let such know that they carry in their bosom what will help them to think the pleasures of a holy life more real, and that the power of holiness is so far from depriving a man of the joy and pleasure of his life, that there are incomparable delights and pleasures peculiar to the holy life which the gracious soul finds in the ways of righteousness. And no stranger intermeddles with his joy. The truth is, they lie inward, and therefore it is that the world speaks so wildly and ignorantly of them.

MCCCLXXX.—God's different disposal of His blessings.

Gurnall's The Christian in Complete Armour.

WHEN a prince bids his servants carry such a man down into the cellar, and let him drink of their beer and wine, this is a kindness, from so great a personage, to be valued highly ; but for the prince to set him at his own table, and let him drink of his own wine, this, no doubt, is far more. Thus it is that God gives unto some men bona scabelli, great estates, abundance of corn and wine and oil, the comforts of the creature, yet, in so doing, He entertains them but in the common cellar—they have none but carnal enjoyments; they do but sit with the servants, and in some sensual pleasures they are but fellow-commoners with the beasts: but for His people, they have the bona throni, His right-hand blessings; He bestows His graces on them, beautifies them with holiness, makes them to drink of the rivers of His pleasures, and means to set them by Him, at His own table, with Himself, in heavenly glory. Ps. iv. 7.

Ps. xxvii. 8.

MCCCLXXXI.—The increase of atheism amongst us at this day.

It is reported to have been the saying of Mr. R. Greenham—a good man in his time—that he feared atheism rather than popery would be England's ruin. Had he lived in our dismal days, he would have had his fears much increased. Were there ever more atheists made and making in England since it was acquainted with the Gospel than in the compass of some few years past? There is reason to think there were not. When men shall fall so far from profession of the Gospel, and be so blinded, that they cannot know light from darkness, righteousness from unrighteousness, are they not far gone in atheism? This is not natural blindness, for the heathen could tell when they did good and evil, and see holiness from sin, without Scripture light to show them. No; this blindness is a plague of God fallen on them, for rebelling against the light when they could see it; and if this plague should grow more common—which God forbid!—woe then to England! Shute's Serm.,
London, 1624.
"Victa jacet pietas."—OVID, Met.,
lib. i.
Rom. ii. 14.
John iii. 19.

MCCCLXXXII.—Men to be willing to have their sins reproved; and why so.

THERE WAS a foolish—it may be said cruel—law among the Lacedemonians, that none should tell his neighbour any ill news befallen him, but every one should be left, in process of time, to find it out themselves. And it is to be supposed that there are many amongst us who would be content if there were such a law that might tie up ministers' mouths from scaring them with their sins, and the miseries that attend their unreconciled state. The most are more careful to run from the discourse of their misery than to get out of the danger of it, are more offended with the talk of hell than troubled for that sinful state that shall bring them thither. But, alas! when, then, shall the ministers show their love to the souls of sinners? When shall a loving man have a fitting time to tell his friend of his faults, if not now, in the present time? And why? Because that hereafter there remain no more offices of love to be done for them. Hell is a pest-house; there cannot be written so much on the door of it as "Lord, have mercy on them who are in it!" Nay, they who now pray for their salvation, and weep over their condition, must then, with Christ, vote for their damnation, and rejoice in it, though they be their own fathers, husbands, and wives they shall see there tormented. Plutarch's Moralia.
"Auris bona est que libenter audit utilia."—BERN.
Ps. vi. 5.

MCCCLXXXIII.—The great danger of not reconciling ourselves unto God.

SIR THOMAS MORE, whilst he was a prisoner in the Tower, would not so much as suffer himself to be trimmed, saying there was a controversy betwixt the king and him for his head, and till that was at a happy end he would be at no cost about it. Let us but scum off the froth of his wit, and we may make a solemn use of it; for, certainly, all the cost we bestow upon ourselves to make our lives pleasurable and joyous to us is but mere folly, till it be decided what will become of the suit betwixt God and us, what will be the issue of the Camden's Remains.
"Nil placidum est sine pace Deo, nec munus ad aëram," &c.—MANTUAN.

controversy that God hath against us, and that not for our heads, but souls, whether for heaven or hell. Were it not, then, the wisest course to begin with making our peace? and then we may soon lead a happy life. It is said, "He who gets out of debt grows rich." Most sure it is that the pardoned soul cannot be poor, for as soon as the peace is concluded a free trade is opened between God and the soul. If once pardoned, we may then sail to any port that lies in God's dominions, and be welcome; where all the promises stand open with their treasure and say, "Here, poor soul, take full lading in of all precious things, even as much as thy faith can bear and carry away!"

MCCCLXXXIV.—Ringleaders of faction and schism, their condition deplorable.

De Mediavilla, Progress. Cælestis.

In Vita ejus, per Anonymum.

Gurnall's Christian in Complete Armour.

WHAT would the prince think of that captain who, instead of encouraging his soldiers to fall on with united forces as one man against the common enemy, should make a speech to set his soldiers together by the ears amongst themselves? Surely, he would hang him up for a traitor. Good was Luther's prayer: "A doctore glorioso, à pastore contentioso, et inutilibus quæstionibus liberet Ecclesiam Deus (From a vain-glorious doctor, a contentious pastor, and nice questions, the Lord deliver His Church)!" And we, in these sad times, have reason to say as hearty an amen to it as any since his age. Do we not live in a time when the Church is turned into a sophister's school, where there is and hath been such a wrangling and jangling, that the precious truths of the Gospel are lost to many already, whose eyes are put out with the dust these contentions have raised, and they have at last fairly disputed themselves out of all their sober principles, as some ill husbands who light among cunning gamesters, and play away all their money out of their purses. Woe, then, to such vile men, who have prostituted the Gospel to such devilish ends! God may have mercy on the cheated souls, to bring them back to the love of the truth, but for the cheaters, such as have been the ringleaders in faction and schism, they are gone too far toward hell that we can look for their return.

MCCCLXXXV.—When it is that a man is said to thoroughly forsake his sin.

Gurnall, ut supra.

"Delinquendi materia debet præscindi." — GREG., Moral., lib. v.

Hos. xiv. 8.

EVERY time a man takes a journey from home about business, we do not say he hath forsaken his house, because he meant, when he went out, to come to it again. No; but when we see a man leave his house, carry all his goods away with him, lock up his doors, and take up his abode in another place, never to dwell there more, this man may very well be said to have forsaken his house indeed. Thus it is that every one of us is to forsake sin, so as to leave it without any thought of returning to it again. It were strange to find a drunkard so constant in the exercise of that sin but sometimes you may find him sober, and yet a drunkard he is, as if he were then drunk. Every one hath not forsaken his trade whom we see now and then in his holiday suit. Then it is that a man is said to forsake his sin, when he throws it from him and bolts the door upon it, with a purpose never to open any more unto it. "Ephraim shall say, What have we to do any more with idols?"

MCCCLXXXVI.—Mortification, the excellency thereof.

Beyerlinck, in Theatre Magno Condonatorum.

THERE is mention made of one of the Catos, that in his old age he drew himself from Rome to his country-house, that he might spend his elder years free from care and trouble; and the Romans, as they did ride by his house, used to say, "Iste solus scit vivere (This man alone knows how to live)." What art Cato had to disburthen himself, by his retirement, of the world's cares is altogether unknown; but most sure it is, that a man may go into the country, and yet not leave the city behind him—his mind may be in a crowd, while his body is in the solitude of a wilderness. Alas! poor man, he was a stranger to the Gospel: had he been but acquainted therewith, it could have shown him a way out of the crowd of all worldly employments, even in the midst of Rome itself, and that is, by mortifying his heart to the world, both in the pleasures and troubles thereof; and then that high commendation, that he alone knew how to live, might have been given him without any hyperbole at all; for, to speak truth, he only knows aright how to live in the world who hath learnt to die in the world: such is the excellency of mortification.

Col. iii. 2.

MCCCLXXXVII.—Consideration of the brevity of life to work the heart of man to contentment.

If a traveller hath but enough to bring him to his journey's end, he desires no more. We have but a day to live, and perhaps we may be now in the twelfth hour of that day; and if God give us but enough to bear our charges till night, it is sufficient; let us be content. If a man had the lease of a house or farm but for two or three days, and he should fall a-building and planting, would he not be judged very indiscreet? So, when we have but a short time here, and Death calls us presently off the stage, to thirst immoderately after the world, and pull down our souls to build up an estate, were it not extreme folly? Therefore, as Esau said once, in a profane sense, concerning his birthright, "Lo! I am at the point to die, and what profit shall this birthright do to me?" so let us all say, in a religious sense, "Lo! I am even at the point of death, my grave is going to be made, and what good will the world do me? If I have but enough till sun-setting, I am content."

"Quid opus est ad brevem vitam longis opibus."—HYPER.

"Brevis est vita," &c.—AUG.

Gen. xxv. 32.

MCCCLXXXVIII.—The Scripture discovering Satan and sin in its colours.

It is reported that a certain Jew would have poisoned Luther, but was happily prevented by his picture, which was sent to Luther, with a warning from a faithful friend, that he should take heed of such a man when he saw him, by which he knew the murderer, and so escaped his hands. Thus it is that the Word of God shows us the face of those lusts which Satan employs to butcher our precious soul. "By them is Thy servant forewarned," saith David. Let a man be but careful to read the Word of God with observation, and in it he shall have the history of the most remarkable battles that have been fought by the most eminent worthies of Christ with Satan, that great warrior, against their souls; how Satan hath many times foiled them, and how they have recovered their lost ground. In it you shall have all Satan's cabinet councils opened. There is not a lust which you are in danger of, not the least sin which presseth down, but you have it described and laid open in its proper colours; not the least temptation which the Word doth not arm you against, &c.

Adamus, in Vita.

Ps. xix. 11.

"Scriptura schola est celestis, eruditio vitalis," &c.—CASSIODOR., super Ps. xv

MCCCLXXXIX.—Satan's policy in keeping us off from timely repentance.

As the paper which came to Brentius from a senator, his dear friend, took him as he was at supper with his wife and children, and bade him flee, cito, citius, citissimè, which he did, leaving his dear company and good cheer: so must we do from our dearest bosom sins, or we may repent our stay when it is too late; for Satan labours to wile us off with delays. Floating, flitting thoughts of repentance he fears not. He can give sinners leave to talk what they will do, so he can beg time, and by his art keep such thoughts from coming to a head, and ripening into a present resolution. Few are in hell but thought of repenting before they came there; yet Satan so handled the matter, that they could never pitch upon the time in earnest when to do it. If ever, therefore, thou meanest to get out of his clutches, cū, citius, citissimè, fly out of his doors and run for thy life, wherever this warning finds thee! Stay not, though in the midst of thy joys with which thy lusts shall entertain thee!

In Vita ejus, ut superd.

Justinianus, de Vita Monastica, cap. 14.

MCCCXC.—Men, through spiritual pride, preferring one preacher before another reprovèd.

Gurnall, ut antea.

ZANCHY tells of one in Geneva, who, being desired to go hear Viretus, who preached at the same time with Calvin, answered his friend, "If Paul were to preach (Relicto Paulo Calvinum audirem), I would leave Paul himself to hear Calvin." Now, can it be imagined that pride in the gifts of another should so far transport any man as to the very borders of blasphemy; yet so it is, and so it hath been of old—one was of Paul, another of Apollos; and now one for this preacher, another for that. It is not every sermon, though wholesome food, nor every prayer, though savoury, will go down; they must have a choice dish, that must have an exquisite haut-gout (high relish) for their curious palates. And are such ever like to get good by preaching? Thus pride makes them take parts and make sides as they fancy one preacher to excel another; so that pride destroys love, and love wanting, edification is lost. The devil hath made foul work in the Church by this engine; it is high time to look about us.

1 Cor. iii. 4.

"Prudens auditor omnes libenter audit," &c.—CHRY-SOST., in Heb.

MCCCXCI.—The weakness of a Christian without Christ.

Fox's Martyrol.

It is said of one Mr. Benbridge, that, being at the stake ready to suffer martyrdom, his heart failed him, so that he thrust the faggots from him, and cried out, "I recant! I recant!" yet this man, when reinforced in his faith, and endued with power from above, was able, within the space of a week after that sad foil, to die at the stake cheerfully. Thus the stoutest champions of Christ and for Christ have been taught from time to time how weak they are if Christ steps aside; or if He should withdraw His grace, and leave them to their own cowardice and unbelief, they would soon show themselves in their own colours.

"Qui pro nobis mortem semel viciit," &c.—AUG.

MCCCXCII.—Men seeking after the vanities of all worldly things reprovèd.

SOLOMON had more variety of all worldly things, and more wisdom to improve it, than any now have, and he made it his business critically and curiously to examine all the creatures, and to find out all the good which was under the sun; and the product and result of all his inquiries amounted at last to a total made up of all cyphers of mere wind and emptiness, "Vanity of vanities, vanity of vanities; all is vanity." So he begins his book, and, to show that he was not mistaken, so he concludes it. And so it is, that whereas many seek for joy out of the broken cisterns of the creatures, as in secular wealth and greatness; others in sensual pleasures, feasting, gaming, luxury, excess; some in titles of honour, others in variety of knowledge; some in stately structures, magnificent retinue, goodly provisions; others in low, sordid, and brutish lusts; unto all whom may be said, as the angel unto the woman, "Why seek ye the living amongst the dead?" or, as Samuel did unto Saul, "Set not thy mind upon asses; there are nobler things to fix thy desires upon."

"Vanitas vanitatis; omnia vanitas." Eccles. i. 12.

"Nihil est in vita durable; non opes, non imperium," &c.

Luke xxiv. 5.

1 Sam. ix. 20.

MCCCXCIII.—The true Christian's desires are all for heaven.

It was a notable speech of Erasmus, if spoken in earnest, and his wit were not too quick for his conscience, "Nihilo magis ambio opes et dignitates, quam e-lumbis equus graves sarcinas:" he said he desired wealth and honour no more than a feeble horse doth a heavy cloak-bag. Thus every good Christian ought to be of his mind; and, indeed, all the Christian hath or desires as a Christian is heavenly. The world is extrinsical, both to his being and happiness; it is a stranger to the Christian, and intermeddles not with his joy or grief. Heap all the riches and honours of the world upon a man, they will not make him a Christian; heap them on a Christian, they will not make him a better Christian; again, take them all away, let every bird have his feather, when stripped and naked he will be still a Christian, and, it may be, a better Christian than otherwise he would have been.

In Vita, præfixa Operibus.

*Ps. xxxviii.
Job vi.*

MCCCXCIV.—Men to keep up the credit of their names.

It is observed by an ingenious divine, that the name of John is next to the name of Jesus; it was God that first gave them both, John and Jesus signifying as much as grace and salvation: John prepared the way to Jesus, hinting out thus much unto us, that there is no way to salvation but by grace; John's name was an honour to him, nor was John a disgrace to his name; he both was and was 'called gracious. But so it is, that many of us (by our bad manners) slander and belie our good names: we have fair appellations and filthy conditions—nay, have nothing to betoken us Christians but the name; usurping the style whereof we want the truth; so contrary are our lives to our callings, and titles of our persons so unlike the works of our profession. What skilleth it to be called Clement, Urbane, Pius, and yet to be cruel, uncivil, evil? to be called Christian, Prudence, Grace, Faith, and yet to be unchristian, unwise, ungracious, unbelieving? Let us not, therefore, be a scandal to our calling, nor a reproach to our names, but let us be mindful of our vow and duty so oft as our names are mentioned, and as ready to answer to our faith as to our names.

Gaule, in hls Vltius Speculation of John Baptist's Nativity.

*"Nomina cum re consentiant."—
PLATO, de Sapient.*

"Conueniunt raro nomina," &c.

MCCCXCV.—Negligence in the ways of God reproved.

THERE is mention made of a prince in Germany, who, being invaded by a more potent enemy than himself, yet from his friends and allies (who flocked in to his help) he soon had a goodly army, but had no money (as he said) to pay them—but, the truth is, he was loth to part with it; for which cause, some went away in discontent, others did not vigorously mind his business, and so he was soon beaten out of his kingdom, and his coffers (when his palace was rifled) were found to be thwacked with treasure. And thus was he ruined, as some sick men die, because unwilling to be at cost to pay the physician. Now so it is, that few or none are to be found but would be glad if their souls might be saved at last; but where is the man or woman who makes it appear by their vigorous endeavour that they mean in earnest? What warlike preparation do they make against Satan, who lies between them and home? Where are their arms, where their skill to use them, their resolution to stand to them, and conscionable care to exercise themselves daily in the use of them? Thus to do is a rarity indeed: if wouling and wishing would bring them to heaven, then they may likely come thither; but as for this diligence in the ways of God, this circumspect walking, this wrestling and fighting, this making religion our business, they are far from these, as at last, in so doing, they are like to be from heaven.

Reverum Germanicarum Vet. Script.

*"Omnes sumus in minimis cauti, in maximis negligentes."
—JEROME, de
Hop. Perfecta.*

"O si, o si, otiosus."

MCCCXCVI.—*No way to happiness but by holiness.*Gurnall's Christian in Complete Armour.

ONE fitly compares holiness and happiness to those sisters Leah and Rachel: happiness, like Rachel, seems the fairer (even a carnal heart may fall in love with that), but holiness, like Leah, is the elder and beautiful also, although in this life she appears with some disadvantage, her eyes being bleared with tears of repentance and her face furrowed with the works of mortification; but this is the law of that heavenly country, that the younger sister must not be bestowed before the elder. We cannot enjoy fair Rachel, heaven and happiness, except we first embrace tender-eyed Leah, holiness, with all her severe duties of repentance and mortification. If we will have heaven, we must have Christ; if Christ, we must like His service as well as His sacrifice. There is no way to happiness but by holiness.

"Non est ad astra mollis."

MCCCXCVII.—*Men deluded by Satan in not taking the right notion of sin.*Drexelius, de Militia Christiana.

IT is with men in sinning as it is with armies in fighting: captains beat their drums for volunteers, and promise all that list pay and plunder, and this makes them come trowling in; but few consider what the ground of the war is, or for what. Thus Satan enticeth men to sin, and giveth golden promises of what they shall have in his service, with which silly souls are won; but how few ask their souls, "Whom do I sin against? What is the devil's design in drawing me to sin?" Shall I tell thee? Dost thou think it is thy pleasure or profit he desires in thy sinning? Alas! he means nothing less; he hath greater plots in his head than so. He hath by his apostasy proclaimed war against God, and he brings thee by sinning to espouse his quarrel, and to jeopard the life of thy soul in defence of his pride and lust; which, that he may do, he cares no more for the damnation of thy soul than the great Turk doth to see a company of his slaves cut off for the carrying on of his design in the time of a siege. If, therefore, thou wilt not be deluded by him, take the right notion of sin, and labour to understand the bottom of his bloody design intended against thee.

"Sine permissione Dei, diabolum nocere non posse cognoscas," &c.—GREG., Moral, lib. ii.MCCCXCVIII.—God's love to His children in the midst of spiritual desertions; and how so.

Gen. xlii. 7.

Exod. ii. 6-10.

Hos. xi. 8.

As Joseph, when he spake roughly to his brethren and made them believe he would take them for spies, still his heart was toward them, and he was as full of love as ever he could hold—he was fain to go aside and weep; and as Moses' mother, when she put her child into the ark of bulrushes and went a little way from it, yet still her eye was towards it—the babe wept, and the mother wept too: so God, when He goes aside as if He had forsaken His children, yet He is full of sympathy and love towards them; it is one thing for God to desert, another thing to disinherit. "How shall I give thee up, O Ephraim!" This is a metaphor taken from a father going about to disinherit his son, and while he is going to set his hand to the deed his bowels begin to melt and to yearn over him: though he be a prodigal child, yet he is a child—"I will not cut off the entail!" So saith God: "How shall I give thee up? Though Ephraim hath been a rebellious son, yet he is My son; I will not disinherit him." God's heart may be full of love when there is a veil upon His face; the Lord may change His dispensation towards His children, but not His disposition: so that the believer may confidently say, "I am adopted, and let God do what He will with me; let Him take the rod or the staff, it is all one to me so long as He loves me."

MCCCXCIX.—The day of death becomes the good man's comfort ; and how so.

THE Persians had a certain day in the year which they called "Vitiorum interitum," wherein they used to kill all serpents and venomous creatures : such a day as that will the day of death be to a man in Christ. This day the old serpent dies in a believer, that hath so often stung him with his temptations ; this day the sins of the godly, these venomous creatures, shall all be destroyed. They shall never be proud more, they shall never grieve the Spirit of God more ; the death of the body shall quite destroy the body of death : so that sin, which was the midwife that brought death into the world, death shall be the grave to bury sin. Oh, the privilege and comfort of a true believer ! He is not taken away in his sins, but he is taken away from his sins, and death is made unto him advantage.

Brisson., de Reg. Pers., lib. ii.

"Mors mihi lucrum."

MCCCC.—Heavenly happiness not to be expressed.

NICEPHORUS tells us of one Agbarus, a great man, that (hearing so much of Christ's fame, by reason of the miracles He wrought) sent a painter to take His picture, and that the painter, when he came, was not able to do it, because of that radiancy and Divine splendour which sat on Christ's face. Whether this be true or no, penes sit authorem ; but, to be sure, there is such a brightness on the face of Christ glorified, and that happiness which saints shall have with Him in the highest heavens, as forbids us that dwell in mortal flesh to conceive of it aright, much more to express it. It is best going thither to be informed, and then we shall confess we on earth heard not half of what we there find ; yea, that our present conceptions are no more like to that vision of glory we shall there have, than the sun in the painter's table is to the sun itself in the heavens.

In Hist. Eccles.

MCCCCI.—Men to be constant in the performance of holy duties.

It is observable, that many have gone into the field and liked the work of a soldier for a battle or two, but soon have had enough, and come running home again from their colours, whereas few can bear it as a constant trade. War is a thing that they could willingly woo for their pleasure, but are loth to wed upon what terms soever. Thus many are soon engaged in holy duties, easily persuaded to take up a profession of religion, and as easily persuaded to lay down ; like the new moon, which shines a little in the first part of the night, but is down long before half of the night be gone—the lightsome professors in their youth, whose old age is wrapped up in thick darkness of sin and wickedness. Oh, this constancy and persevering is a hard word ! This taking up the cross daily, this praying always, this watching night and day, and never laying aside our clothes and armour—i. e., indulging ourselves to remit and unbend in our holy waiting upon God, and walking with God—this sends many sorrowful from Christ ; yet this is the saint's duty, to make religion his every-day work, without any vacation from one end of the year to the other.

"Hic magnus sedet Æneas, secumque volutat, eventus belli varios,"—VIRGIL.

"Hic labor, hoc opus est."

"Alacriter incumbendum est inchoatis," &c.—CASSIODOR., lib. v., ep. 15.

MCCCCII.—How it is that there are so many professors of religion, and so few Christians and practisers of religion.

ALL Israel came joyfully out of Egypt under Moses' conduct, yea, and a mixed multitude with them ; but when their bellies were a little pinched with hunger, and their greedy desires of a present Canaan deferred—yea, instead of peace and plenty, nothing but war and penury appeared—they, like white-livered soldiers, were ready to fly from their Exod. xiii.

"Et fuga cervis,
a patribus datur,
et patrius pavor inclat artus."—LU-CRETIUS.

colours, and make a dishonourable retreat into Egypt. Thus the greatest part of those who possess the Gospel, when they come to push of pike, to be tried what they will do, deny, endure for Christ, grow sick of their enterprise—alas! their hearts fail them, they are like the waters of Bethlehem; but if they must dispute their passage with so many enemies, they will even content themselves with their own cistern, and leave heaven to others that will venture more hardly for it

MCCCCIII.—God's comfortable presence in the midst of spiritual deserts.

Symond's Cave and Cure of a Deserted Conscience.

Hag. ii. 9.

"Diruit, ædificat,"
&c.

"Fortior ut possit cladibus esse suis."
—OVID, Amerun.

"O amor, ô bonitas, nostris bene provida rebus."— MIRANDULA.

THE gardener digs up his garden, pulls up his fences, takes up his plants, and, to the eye, seems to make a pleasant place as a waste piece of ground; but every intelligent man knows that he is about to mend it, not to mar it—to plant it better, not to destroy it. So God is comfortably present with us, even in our spiritual deserts; and though He seems to annihilate or to reduce His new creation, yet it is to repair its ruins and to make it more beautiful and glorious. Or, as in the repairing of a house, we see how they pull down part after part, as if they intended to demolish it quite, but the end is to make it better—it may be some posts and pillars are removed, but it is to put in stronger; it may be some lights are stopped up, but it is to make fairer: so, though God take away our props, it is not that we may fall, but that He may settle us in greater strength. He batters down the life of sense to put us upon a life of grace; and when He darkens our light that we cannot see, it is but to bring in fuller light into our souls; as when a star shines not, the sun appears, repairing our loss of an obscure light with his clear bright shining beams: so, though God do forsake His people, yet not totally, not for ever, not ceasing the affection of love, but the acts of love for some time, and when He seems to be turning a man into a desolate and ruinous condition, yet even then He is building and preparing him to be a more excellent structure.

MCCCCIV.—The Christian's spiritual growth, when seemingly dead and declining.

"Omnis medicina habet ad tempus amaritudinem, sed," &c.—JEROME.

'Descendit ut as-cendat.'

Eph. iv. 16.

Col. ii. 19.

As, in the lopping of a tree, there seems to be a kind of diminution and destruction, yet the end and issue of it is better growth; and as the weakening of the body by physic seems to tend to death, yet it produceth better health and more strength; and as the ball by falling downward riseth upward, and water in pipes descends that it may ascend: so the Christian's spiritual growth, when seemingly dead and declining and to stand a stay, is still carried on by the hidden method of God to increase; for every true Christian is a member of a thriving body, in which there is no atrophy, but a continual issuing of spirits from the head, so that life being wrought by the Spirit of Life, never dieth, but is always on the growing hand, ripening and increasing, even in the midst of tentations and trouble.

MCCCCV.—Backwardness in the service of God reproved.

"Ubi cadaver ibi erunt et aquilæ."

Symond's Cave and Cure of a Wounded Conscience.

A STONE need not to be driven downward, because that motion is suitable to it and it affects the centre; the eagles fly willingly to their prey; a hungry man needs not either persuasion or compulsion to eat his meat: so, did but men delight in God, what means their hanging back from Him? How is it that the counsels and thoughts of their hearts, the pressing persuasions of the Word, the strong motions of the Spirit, the shining examples of the godly, the wise advice of faithful friends, the sweet inducements of precious promises, the sad menaces of fearful evils—yea, the heavy strokes of an angry God—yea, the tender mercies of a melting Father—yea, the bleeding wounds of a crucified Redeemer—how is it that none of these do more prevail with them, to a more ready walking with their God? Surely such backwardness, such unwillingness in the service of God, cannot but be hateful unto Him.

"Te pater Æneas et avunculus exci-tat Hector." — VIRG.

MCCCCVI.—Religion consisting in duty both to God and man.

As the boat cannot move rightly when the oars only on one side are plied; or as the fowl, if she use only one wing, cannot fly up: so religion consisteth of duties to be performed, some to God and some to man—some for the first table of the law, some for the second; otherwise that religion will never profit that hath one hand wrapped up that should be towards man in all offices of charity, though the other be used towards God in all offices of piety.

"Qui Deum asare negligit, proximum diligere nescit." —
—GREG., Moral,
lib. x.

MCCCCVII.—The paucity of true believers.

It is the observation of a learned man, that if the world were divided into thirty equal parts, nineteen of those thirty would prove to be overspread with heathenish idolatry, six of the eleven remaining with the doctrine of Mahomet, so there would remain but five parts of the thirty wherein were anything of Christianity; and among those Christians, so many seduced Papists on one hand and formal Protestants on the other, that surely but few are saved. Nay, such is the paucity of true believers, that, as that olive-tree mentioned by the prophet, with two or three berries on the uppermost bough, Satan may be said to have the harvest and God only a few gleanings. It should, therefore, make us strive the more tanquam pulvere Olympico, that we may be of the number of those few that shall inherit salvation.

Brerewood's Enquiry in Language.

Isa. xvii. 6.
Horat., Ode i.

MCCCCVIII.—Spiritual sloth in the ways of God reprov'd.

THERE is mention made of certain Spaniards, who live near unto a place where there is great store of fish, yet are so lazy, that they will not be at the pains to catch them, but buy of their neighbours. And such is the sinful stupidity of most men, such the spiritual sloth upon them, that though Christ be near them, though salvation be offered in the Gospel, and, as it were, brought to their very houses, yet they will not work out their salvation. This was the case of the Israelites: it is said that they despised the pleasant land (Ps. cvi. 24). And what could be the reason? Canaan was worth the looking after, for it was a paradise of delight, a type of heaven; ay, but they thought it would cost them a great deal of trouble and hazard in the getting, and they would rather go without it. And thus many had rather go sleeping to hell than sweating to heaven.

Purchas's Pilgrimage.

"Non dormientibus provenit regnum colorum, nec otio et desidii torpentibus, beatitudo æterni-tatis ingeritur."
—PROSP., de Vita Contemplat.

MCCCCIX.—To be more careful for the body than the soul, a thing justly reprobable.

THERE is a parable of a woman who, travailing with child, brought forth twins, and both children being presented to her, she falls deeply and fondly in love with the one, but is careless and disrespectful of the other; this she will nurse herself, but that is put forth. Her love grows up with the child she kept herself: she decks it fine, she feeds it choicely; but at last, by overmuch pampering of it, the child surfeits, becomes mortally sick, and when it was dying, she remembers herself, and sends to look after the other child that was at nurse, to the end she might now cherish it; but when the messenger came, she finds it

De Wann's Serm.
de Tempore.

"Speculum exen-plorum."

dying and gasping likewise, and examining the truth, she understands that, through the mother's carelessness and neglect to look after it, the poor child was starved: thus was the fond partial mother, to her great grief, sorrow, and shame, deprived of both her hopeful babes at once. Thus, every Christian is this mother; the children are our body and soul: the former of these it is that men and women fall deeply and fondly in love with, whilst, indeed, they are careless and neglect the other; this they dress and feed; nothing is too good or too dear for it; but at the last the body surfeits, comes by some means or other to its death-bed, when there is very little or no hope of life. Then men begin to remember the soul, and would think of some course to save it; the minister he is sent for in all haste to look after it; but, alas! he finds it in part dead, in part dying, and the very truth is, the owner, through neglect and carelessness, hath starved the soul, and it is ready to go to hell before the body is fit for the grave. And so the foolish fond Christian, to his eternal shame and sorrow, loseth both his body and soul for ever.

Hardwick, ut antea.

MCCCCX.—The nature and properties of the Holy Spirit set forth for our instruction in the similitude of a dove.

Winton's Serm.,
Lond., 1615.

Gen. viii. 11.

Ps. lxxviii. 13.

Isa. xxxviii. 14.

Matt. x. 16.

Acts ii. 1.

Rom. viii. 26.

Acts ii. 3.

THOUGH Pliny and all the heathen writers were silent, the Holy Word of God hath enough to set out unto us the nature and properties of the dove. There is, first of all, Noah's dove, with an olive-branch in her mouth, a peaceable one. 2. David's dove, for the colour, with feathers silver white, not speckled as a bird of divers colours, but white, the emblem of sincerity; and there is Solomon's dove, for the eye, a single and direct eye, not leering, as a fox, and looking divers ways. 3. Isaiah's dove, for the voice in patience, mourning; not in impatience, murmuring and repining. Lastly, our Saviour Christ's dove, for bill and claw, innocent and harmless, not bloody or mischievous. Now, qualis species, talis Spiritus (as the dove, so the Holy Ghost). 1. A Spirit that loves ὁμοθυμαδόν (men of one accord). 2. Et qui fugit fictum (cannot abide new tricks), mere fictions indeed, feigned by feigned Christians, party propositions, half in the mouth and half in the mind. 3. And when He speaketh, He speaketh for us with sighs and groans that cannot be expressed; such is His love, and so earnest. 4. And hurts none, not when He was in the resemblance of a dove. No, not when He was fire; He was harmless fire at the same time. And thus it is that the nature and properties of the Holy Spirit are set forth for our instruction in the resemblance of a dove, teaching us to be peaceable; to love singleness in meaning, speaking, and dealing; to suffer harm, but to do none.

MCCCCXI.—Magistrates, ministers, &c., to be examples of good unto others; and why so.

Conrad. Gesnerus, Hist.

Oppiana.

Pierius, Hieroglyph.

Strabo, lib. xvii.

Ps. lxxxvi. 5.

"In vulgus manant exempla regentum."—CLAUD.

NATURALISTS report of the bird ibis, whereof there are many in Egypt, especially in the city of Alexandria, that it eateth up all the garbage of the city, but leaves somewhat behind it that is more noisome than any filth it had eaten. Others write that it will devour every serpent it meets with; but from the egg of this bird cometh the most hurtful of all serpents, the basilisk, the sight whereof killeth. Thus it is to be heartily wished that those who are entrusted for the people's good, whether in Church or state, be not like unto this bird, seem to do something good, but much hurt withal; but that in them, as they are God's upon earth, may always be found that which the Psalmist hath of God in heaven, "Thou art good, and dost good;" that their lives may be examples of good, because that otherwise their authority will be less prevailing for suppressing those evils whereunto their bad examples give encouragement.

MCCCCXII.—God to have all the glory.

JUSTINIAN is said to have made a law, that no master-workman should put up his name within the body of that building which he made out of another man's cost; and our own history tells us, that when William of Wickham (Wykeham), then chaplain to Edward III., was by him made overseer of the work for the repair of Windsor Castle, that those three words, which he caused to be inscribed upon the great tower, "Hoc fecit Wickham (This made Wickham)," had not he construed them another way, as that not he made the work, but the work made him, had quite lost him the king's favour. Thus it is that God is jealous of His honour; He cannot endure that the creature should have any share primarily therein, but as derived and participated only: let every man, then, especially such whose greatness makes them too apt to take too much unto themselves, ascribe all unto God, give all the glory to God, and, when they begin to give unto God, never give over giving till they have given all that they are, all that is His due, all honour and glory, praise, power, and dominion for evermore.

Mysingerus, in Institut. lib. 1, in Tit. de Kerum.

Godwinus, de Præsulis Angliæ, in Vita ejus.

"Deo dator sit laus, honor," &c.
Ps. cxv. 1.

MCCCCXIII.—Man to be thankful unto God upon consideration of the creatures.

It was a divine saying of Epictetus, that heathenish philosopher, admiring the singing of birds, "Si luscinia essem, &c. (If I had been made a nightingale, I should have sung like a nightingale; now that I am made a man, a reasonable creature, shall I not serve God, and praise Him in that station wherein He hath set me)?" Thus he, a heathen, and thus we, Christians, are to consider the creatures leading the way unto the duty of thankfulness—first, what they are mutually to each other; and then, what they are to us; and, lastly, what they are to God, in their kind—ever thankful: so that it is conceived that one of the foulest and most shameful things that the creatures shall lay to man's charge at the day of judgment is, that all other creatures, from the creation, have been obedient to God without the least digression, only man, for whom and for whose service all else were made, have failed in His service, and proved rebellious and unthankful.

Astedii Theolog.
Nat.

"Justum est ut
creatura laudet Creatorem; ipse enim ad laudandum se creavit."—AUG.

Origen.

MCCCCXIV.—Riches, the danger of them being not well used.

IN an artichoke there is a little picking meat, not so wholesome as delicious, and nothing to that it shows for; more than the tenth part is unprofitable leaves; and besides, there is a core in the midst of it that will choke a man, if he take not good heed. Such a thing is wealth, that men so covetously desire: it is like some kind of fish, so full of bones, and unseen, that no man can eat of them without great danger. The rich man's wealth is very troublesome to the outward man, like a long garment that is too side (long); if he tread upon it, he may chance to catch a fall—a fall into much discontent and envy of the world; but to the soul, riches, if not well employed, prove very pernicious, making a man vainly confident, thinking that he is so walled and moated (defended) about, that he is out of all gunshot, when he is more open to danger than a poorer man. Then they make him proud; and pride, saith St. Bernard, is the rich man's cozen (that which deceives); it blows him up like a bladder with a quill: then he grows secure, and so falls into sudden ruin.

Ote's Exposition on Jude.

"Si recte fueris,
non est ut copia
major ab Jove donari possit tibi."—
AUSONIUS.

Prov. x. 15.

MCCCCXV.—Mortification, the great necessity thereof.

SOME physicians hold that in every two years there is such store of ill humours and excrementitious matter engendered in the body of man, that, if not by physic purged out, a vessel of one hundred ounces will scarce contain them; so that, according to this account,

The Newlander's Cure.

"Scelerum collu-vies, farrago vitiorum, errorum turba."—ISID., de Sum. Bona,
Col. iii. 5.

in a short time the whole body would be morbus complicatus (nothing but diseases). If it be so, then, in the body, what shall we think of the soul? Certainly, there is a world of wickedness and superfluity of naughtiness, even a bed of spiritual diseases, daily gathered and got together in the sin-sick soul; purged, therefore, it must needs be by the practice of mortification, according to that of the apostle: "Mortify, therefore, your earthly members;" not as those religious Roman bedlams, who whip and lash their bodies, but to dead (deprive of life) that body of sin, that it may not have dominion over us, nor reign in our mortal bodies.

MCCCCXVI.—The excellency of unity in Church and commonweal.

Nat. Hist., lib. ii.

PLINY writes of a certain stone, called lapis Tyrrhenus, that "grandis innatat, comminutus mergitur (while it is whole and entire it swims aloft, but if it be broken into pieces, every piece and parcel sinks to the bottom)." So the Church and commonweal, by unity, float and swim aloft, and are supported and kept above water; but if they crumble into sects and factions, and divide into parts and parties, like those who fled to Frankfort, in Queen Mary's days, or that uncommunion-like sacramentarian difference, that made Strigelius wish himself in his grave, they are near unto destruction—for unity is the life and soul of both Church and state: "da unum et populus est, tolle unum et turba est (a disgregation (dispersion) rather than a congregation, confusion rather than order or government)."

Adamus, in Vita
Strigeli, Elborow's Serm.,
1637.

MCCCCXVII.—Love, the great want thereof to be deplored.

Judges v. 8.
1 Sam. xiii. 19.
1 Kings viii.
2 Sam. i. 21.
Ote's Explanat., on Ep. of Jude,
Jer. viii. 22.
Judges ix. 45.
Ezek. xxviii.

As in the days of Deborah there was neither spear nor shield; as in the days of Saul there was no smith in Israel; as in the days of Solomon there was no manna to be found; as on the mountains of Gilboa no rain; in Gilead no balm; no flowers in Bashan; in Sichem no corn, being sown with salt; in Tyrus no ships; in Cimmericia no light; so, in England, no love, or—which is to be deplored—but a little. We have plenty of all things but of love. If there be a hundred men in a town or place, scarce two love together and agree as they should. And in this we are worse than devils: seven of them could agree in Mary Magdalen, and a legion in another, which is seven thousand six hundred and twenty-two, as Vegetius and Varro affirm; but scarce seven men of seven hundred love as brethren. It cannot be said, with St. Paul, "As touching brotherly love, you need not that I write unto you," for most men in our days are either brethren and not good fellows, or else good fellows and not brethren. The composition is rare. There be few Philadelphians in the world, Schismatics are all for the brotherhood, and nothing for fellowship; on the contrary, wicked atheists are all for fellowship and nothing for brotherhood. So that such are the divisions that are to be found in the midst of us: not as Laban's sheep, into three companies, some white, some black, some speckled, but into threescore—if possible, into more; so that there is little love and less agreement. But God, it is to be hoped, will make us friends in heaven, where all injuries shall be forgotten.

Luke viii. 2.
"Rara est concordia fratruin,"—
Ovid.

1 Thess. iv. 9.

MCCCCXVIII.—Almsgiving, how to be regulated.

Knoles's Hist. Turk.

SELYMUS, the great Turk, as he lay languishing, his incurable disease still increasing, leaning his head in the lap of Pyrrhus, the bassa (basha), whom of all others he most loved: "I see," said he, "O Pyrrhus, I must shortly die, without remedy:" whereupon the great bassa took occasion to talk with him of many great matters, and amongst others, that it would please him to give order for the well bestowing of the great wealth taken from the Persian merchants in divers places of his empire, persuading him to bestow the same upon some notable hospital for relief of the poor: to whom Selymus replied, "Wouldst thou, Pyrrhus, that I should bestow other men's goods, wrongfully taken from them, upon works of charity and devotion, for my own vain-glory and praise? Assuredly, I will never do it. Nay, see they be given again to the right owners: "which was forthwith done accordingly. What a shame, then, is this to Christians, who, minding nothing less than restitution, make ex rapina holocaustum. Out of a world of ill-gotten goods, they cull out some small fragments to erect some poor hospital; having cheated thousands, build almshouses for some few, and then set a glorious inscription in the front: whereas this one word, "Aceldama," would be far more proper. But this is not the right way of almsgiving. "Take heed how you do your alms," saith our Saviour, where the word "alms" is, in the Syriac, "justice:" showing that alms should be of things well gotten, when a man is able to say, "This, by the blessing of God, is the fruit of my own labours." And then, too, he who gives alms to the poor must do it with discretion, "omni petenti, non omnia petenti (to every one who doth ask, but not everything that he doth ask)."

"De justis laboribus faciendæ: aut elemosynæ," &c.
—AUG., de Divit.

Matt. vi. 1.

Notæ Ministri-
um Lond., in loc.

AUG., Serm. Dom
in Monte, lib. 1.

MCCCCXIX.—Unanimity, the excellency thereof.

DAVID and Jonathan had but one heart; Eusebius and Pamphilus Martyr but one name; Pylades and Orestes but one life; Ruth and Naomi but one affection; Basil and Nazianzen, of whom it is said that "anima una erat inclusa in duobus corporibus (there was but one soul shut up in two bodies, and there was a whole multitude but as one man)." Oh, the excellency of unanimity!—unanimity of truth, not of error. Happy days were those when, amongst the people, there was cor unum, via una (one heart, and one way to walk in), when they were all but as one man, which made their very enemies to say of them, "Ecce ut invicem se diligunt (See how these Christians love one another, how they knit and close together)!" But now it is come to "Ecce ut invicem se oderunt (Behold, how they hate one another, divide and separate one from another)!" The master to the church, the mistress to the chamber, the servant to the fields, yet all in one house; some to the sacrament, some to breaking of bread, and some to neither, yet all in one parish. Their hearts are divided; the cord of love is untwisted. They may sing and say, "Come, Holy Ghost!" but no marvel that He comes no faster; they are not of one mind—accord is wanting—and therefore not fit for the Spirit to come into them.

1 Sam. xviii. 1.

Ote's Explanat. on Jude.

Acts iv. 32.

Eusebius, in Hist.

"En quod discordia cives perduxit mi-seros!" —VIRG.,
Eclog., 1.

MCCCCXX.—The formal Christian described.

IN the "History of the World encompassed by Sir Francis Drake," it is recorded that, in a certain island to the southward of Celebes, among the trees, night by night did show themselves an infinite swarm of fiery-seeming worms, flying in the air, whose bodies, no bigger than an ordinary fly, did make a show and give such light as if every twig on every tree had been a lighted candle, or as if that place had been the starry sphere. This was but a semblance, but an appearance: no more is that of all formal Christians but a flaunt—but a flourish, their knowledge is but a form, their godliness a figure, their zeal a flash, all they do but a shadow of what they should do. They make use of God for their own purposes, and care only to make Divine authority a colour for their own hypocritical designs; in whose silent faces are written the characters of religion which their tongues and gestures pronounce, but their hands recant, whose mouths belie their hearts and fingers oppose their mouths.

Nichols's Annas Redivivus.

Trapp's Con. on Evangel.

"Odi virum duplicem natum. Bon-um sermonibus, inimicum moribus." —PERS.,
Sat. v.

MCCCCXXI.—God afflicting His children to try their sincerity.

As a father will sometimes cross his son, to try the child's disposition, to see how he will take it, whether he will mutter and grumble at it, and grow humorous and wayward, Gataker's Serm.

"In fornace ardet palea, et purgatur aurum," &c.—
AUG., in Ps. lx.

2 Kings vi. 33.

Isa. viii. 17.

Job xiii. 15.

Seneca, ad Marcum,
cap. 13.
Diog. Laert.

neglect his duty to his father because his father seemeth to neglect him, or make offer to run away and withdraw himself from his father's obedience because he seems to carry himself harshly and roughly towards him, and to provoke him thereunto : so doth God oftentimes cross His children, and seemeth to neglect them, to try their disposition, what metal they are made of, how they stand affected towards Him, whether they will neglect Him because He seemeth to neglect them, cease to depend on Him because He seemeth not to look after them, and say with Joram's profane pursuivant, "This evil is of God; and why should I depend upon Him any longer?" or whether they will constantly cleave unto Him, though He seem to cast them off, and say with Isaiah, "Yet will I wait upon God, though He hide His face from us; and I will look for Him, though He look not for us;" and with Job, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him;" and with the heathen, "Iratum colere numen (to worship even an angry God);" and with the cynic to his master Antisthenes, "Nullus tam durus erit baculus, &c. (There shall be no cudgel to be found so crabbed as shall beat me from you)."

MCCCCXXII.—The original and excellency of the Hebrew tongue.

Leigh's Critica Sacra in Vet. Test., in Præfat.

Buxtorf, de Ori- gine, &c.
Drusii Obiter,
Sacra, lib. xv.

Fulk, on Rhem.
Test.
Rev. xix. 4.

THERE are three tongues that are in a more especial manner famous all over the world—the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew: the first propter regnum, because of the monarchy of the Romans, who, as they subjected the people whom they did conquer to their laws and customs, so did they force them to learn their language; the second propter doctrinam, because in it the great philosophers and wise men of the world left the monuments of their wisdom and learning to posterity; the third propter Deum, because in it God delivered His law, and the interpretation of it by Moses and the prophets, to the people of Israel His chosen. The Latin is a common tongue, the Greek a copious tongue, but Hebrew the most ancient and holy tongue: for antiquity, the tongue of Adam; for sanctity, the tongue of God. In this tongue God spake to the prophets and patriarchs, in this tongue the angels spake to men, in this tongue the prophets wrote the Old Testament, and in this tongue, as is thought, shall the saints speak and sing praises unto God in heaven.

MCCCCXXIII.—Justice commutative, to do as we would be done by.

Lazius, de Reb. Gest.
Romanorum,
Matt. vii. 12.

Jellius Spartianus,

"Quod sibi quis
noluit fieri, non in-ferat ulli,"—
PROSP.

Trapp, on Evang.

Isa. lvii. 7.

SEVERUS, the emperor, had that sentence of our Saviour often in his mouth, "Quod tibi non vis fieri, alteri ne feceris (Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them)," and commanded it to be proclaimed by the crier whensoever he punished such of his soldiers as had offered injury to others. And, without all doubt, for a man to do as he would be done by is the royal law, the standard of equity, the golden rule, according to which we must square and frame all our actions and transactions with others; and were but men as faithful disciples of active charity as they are for most part doctors of the passive, the work would soon be done. It is confessed that charity begins at home. How is that? In regard of order, but not in regard of time; for so soon as a man begins to love himself, he must love his neighbour as himself: neither may any man at any time hide himself from his own flesh—that is, from his neighbour, of the same stock with himself.

MCCCCXXIV.—God exercising the graces of His children.

Bas. Seleuc.,
Hem. xxi.

THE nurse goeth aside from the child to teach it to find its feet and see how it will go alone; the eagle, when her young ones are fledged, turneth them out of the nest, not bearing them on her wings, as at other times she was wont to do, but, that she may inure them to fly, flieth from them and leaveth them to shift for themselves. Thus God seems to withdraw Himself from His children, to exercise those excellent graces of patience and confidence in Him, that, like tapers, burn clearest in the dark ; to teach them to swim without bladders, and to go without crutches ; as not to trust in themselves, so not to trust in the means, but in Him that worketh by them, and can work as well for them without them when they fail.

"Tentat ut probet Deus."—AUG.

MCCCCXXV.—Inhumanity condemned.

BENZO, relating the Spaniards' cruelty upon the poor natives of America, saith, that in one of their islands, called Hispaniola, of twenty hundred thousand, when the people stood untouched, he did not think that at the time when he penned his history there were above one hundred and fifty souls left alive ; whereupon he breaks out into a passionate exclamation upon the horror of such inhumanity, "O quot Neronēs, quot Domitiani, quot Commodi, quot Bassiani, quot immites Dionysii eas terras peragravēre (Oh, how many Neroes, how many Domitians, with other the like infamous, egregious tyrants, have harrowed those countries) ! " But had Benzo lived to have written the history of our times, he might have truly said, "Barbarous and inhuman Christendom, men of blood and cruelty, whose hearts are so bound and confirmed with sinews of iron, that they are no more moved with the life of a man than if a dog had fallen before them : so fallen from their kind, as if rocks had fathered them, and they had sucked the dragons in the deserts rather than the daughters of men." "Non in compendium, sed occidendi causa occidentes," murder upon every occasion, and killing because they delight in killing ; whereas the care and study, not only of Christians, but of civil and good-natured people, should be to parcē civium sanguini (spare the blood of men), because they are all kinsmen and brethren in the flesh.

In Hist. Novi Orbis.

"Ah nimium faciles ! qui tristia crimina credis, flumina tolli posse putatis aqua !" — OVID., Fast. ii.

Seneca, de Clem., lib. ii.

MCCCCXXVI.—How far there may be a lawful compliance with others of different judgment.

ST. AUGUSTINE, preaching to the Roman colonies in Africa, spake broken, barbarous Latin, to the end they might understand him. "When I come to Rome," saith St. Ambrose to Monica, the mother of St. Augustine, "I fast on the Saturday ; when I am at Milan, I fast not." Calvin was cast out of Geneva for refusing to administer the Lord's Supper with wafer-cakes, or unleavened bread ; de quo, restitutus, nunquam contendendum putavit (of which, being afterwards restored, he thought best to make no more words, but to yield), though he let them know that he had rather it were otherwise. Thus it was that Christ Himself is said to come eating and drinking, and to sit at meat with publicans and sinners : and thus must all of us do, with St. Paul, be all things to all men, that we may win some ; to turn ourselves into all shapes and fashions, both of speech and spirit, to win men unto God ; to make use of things indifferent, to do what we can to preserve our good esteem with others, that we may the sooner prevail with them ; and whatsoever Church we come to, ejus morem servare (to do as they do), not giving offence carelessly, not taking offence causelessly, the defect whereof is charged upon the best, when Christ said, "The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light."

Zuingeri Theatrum Hum. Vitæ.

Beza, in Vita.

Matt. xi. 19.

Luke v. 30.

1 Cor. ix. 22.

Trapp's Com. on the Evangel.

Luke xvi. 8.

MCCCCXXVII.—Rulers and men in authority subject to many failings in government.

THE Bythinians, being convened before Claudius, the emperor, cry down Junius Clio, that he may be president over them no longer. The noise being somewhat confused, the emperor understood not their desires, and thereupon demanded of those next him what the people would have. Narcissus, a familiar, or rather an auricular buzz of the court, Tacitus.

Suetonius.

Xyphilin., in Claud.

answered, like a false echo, that the people gave his excellency great thanks for their president, and requested the continuance of him to be still over them. The emperor, meaning well, but ill informed, to gratify them, as he thought, assigned them their old president again, whereby the emperor was abused and the people still oppressed, whereas they had been eased had it not been for the misinterpretation of a crooked interpreter. Thus it is that rulers and men in power, by reason of flesh and blood, do travail with infirmity, and bring forth escapes (mistakes). The wisest governors, who in speculation of justice are admirable, in their practice may be quite transported; they that in thesi are sharp, in the application are oftentimes very dull; they may do wrong, non voluntate nocendi (not with the purpose to do ill), sed necessitate nesciendi (but because they cannot come to the knowledge of the right). Many biases they have to draw them awry: affection at one time may dazzle their eyes, and wrong intelligence at another time abuse their ear.

Strode's Anat. of Mortality.

“Magistratus est medicus civitatis; oeneque præcæ, qui juvat,” &c.—
THUCYD., lib. vi.

MCCCCXXVIII.—The least degree of true saving faith accepted by God.

Trapp's Exposit. on Matt.

Matt. xi. 7.

“Tarda solet magnis rebus in esse fides.”—OVID,
Ep. xvi.

SMOKE is of the same nature with flame, for what is flame but smoke set on fire? The least spark of fire, if cherished, will endeavour to rise above the air, as well as the greatest: so, a little grace may be true grace, as the filings of gold are as good as gold, though nothing so much of it, as the whole wedge. A reed shaken with the wind is taken for a thing very contemptible at the best; how much more when it is bruised? The wick of a candle is little worth, and yet less when it comes to smoke, as yielding neither light nor heat, but only stink and annoyance, such as men bear not with, but tread out. So doth not God, who hath a singular sagacity, and can soon resent the least of provocations; yet the bruised reed He will not break, and the smoking flax He will not quench; nay, the very pantings, inquietations, and unsatisfiableness in the matter of grace spring from the truth of grace, and are such as God makes high esteem of.

MCCCCXXIX.—God's children afflicted to make them perfect.

Catker's David's Remembrances; Sermon.

“Nihil prodest medicamentum, nisi quis ejus prius coxerit amaritudinem,” &c.—
THRYVER, in Apophthegm.

Ps. xxxix. 10.

2 Cor. xii. 7.

A PHYSICIAN or surgeon, when he meeteth with a sore festered or full of dead flesh, he applieth some sharp corrosive, to eat out the dead flesh that would otherwise spoil the cure, which, being done, the patient, it may be, impatient of anguish and pain, cries out to have it removed. “No,” says the surgeon, “it must stay there till it hath eaten to the quick, and effected that thoroughly for which it is applied;” commanding those that are about him to see that nothing be stirred till he come again to him. In the meantime, the patient, being much pained, counts every minute an hour till the surgeon come back again; and if he stay long, thinketh that he hath forgotten him, or that he is taken up with other patients, and will not return in any reasonable time; when, as it may be, he is all the while but in the next room to him, attending the hour-glass, purposely set up till the plaster have had its full operation. Thus, in the self-same manner, doth God deal oftentimes with His dearest children, as David and St. Paul. The one was instant, more than once or twice, to be rid of that evil; and the other cries out as fast, “Take away the plague from me, for I am even consumed,” &c.; but God makes both of them to stay His time. He saw in them, as in all others, much dead flesh, much corrupt matter behind, that was as yet to be eaten out of their souls; He will have the cross to have its full work upon us, not to come out of the fire as we went in, nor to come off the fire as foul and as full of scum as we were first set on.

MCCCCXXX.—Resurrection of the just asserted.

TREES and other vegetables, in the winter-time, appear to the eyes and view of all men as if they were withered and quite dead, yet, when the spring-time comes, they become alive again, and, as before, do bring forth their buds, blossoms, leaves, and fruit. The reason is, because the body, grain, and arms of the tree are all joined and fastened to the root, where the sap and moisture lies all the winter-time, and from thence, by reason of so near conjunction, it is derived in the spring-time to all the parts of the tree. Even so the bodies of men have their winter also, and that is in death, in which time they are turned into dust, and so remain for a time dead and rotten; yet, in the spring-time, that is, in the last day, at the resurrection of all flesh, then, by means of the mystical union with Christ, His divine and quickening virtue shall stream and flow from thence to all the bodies of His elect and chosen members, and cause them to live again, and that to life eternal.

Strode's Analogy of Mortality.

"Surrexit Christus, exulset universus mundus," &c.—AUG., in Paschale.

MCCCCXXXI.—The inestimable value of Christ Jesus.

CHARLES, duke of Burgundy, being slain in battle by the Swiss at Nancy, anno 1477, had a jewel of very great value, which, being found about him, was sold by a soldier to a priest for a crown in money; the priest sold it for two crowns. Afterwards, it was sold for seven hundred florins; then for twelve thousand ducats; and last of all, for twenty thousand ducats, and set into the pope's triple crown, where it is to be seen at this day. But Christ Jesus is a commodity of far more value—"better than rubies," saith Solomon—and all the things that may be desired are not to be compared to Him; He is that Pearl of price which the merchant purchased with all that ever he had. No man can buy such gold too dear. Joseph, then a precious jewel of the world, was far more precious, had the Ishmaelish merchants known so much, than all the balms and myrrhs that they transported; and so is Christ, as all will yield who know Him.

Henr., Alstedii Chronologia.

Prov. viii. 11.
"Omnia habemus in Christo et omnia in nobis Christus," &c.—AMBRGOS.
Matt. xiii. 46.
Gen. xxxvii. 37.

MCCCCXXXII.—To depend upon God's bare Word.

THE earth that we tread on, though it be a massy, dull, heavy body, yet it hangeth in the midst of the air, environed by the heavens, and keepeth its place steady, and never stirreth an inch from it, having no props or shores to uphold it, no beams or bars to fasten it, nothing to stay or establish it, but the Word of God. In like manner must we learn to depend upon the bare Word of God; and when all other aids and comforts have taken their leave of us, then to rest and rely upon God Himself, and His infallible, unfailable Word of promise, not on the outward pledges and pawns of His providence, nor on the ordinary effects and fruits of His favour: so shall we see light, even in the midst of darkness, and be able to discern the sweet sunshine of His blessed countenance through the thickest clouds of His fiercest wrath and displeasure.

Gataker's David's Remembrancer's 1^a Sermon.

Heb. i. 3.

"Nil desperandum Christo duce," &c.—JUVENAL.

MCCCCXXXIII.—The day of death better than the day of life.

PLATO maketh mention of Agamedes and Trophonius, who, after they had builded the temple of Apollo Delphicus, they begged of God that He would grant to them that which would be most beneficial for them, who, after this suit made, went to bed, and there slept their last, being both found dead the next morning; whereupon it was concluded that it was better to die than to live. "Whilst I call things past to mind," said that incomparable Queen Elizabeth, "I behold things present; and whilst I expect things to come, I hold them happiest that go hence soonest." And most true it is that death being æterni natalis (the

In Axio.

Camdeni Elizabeth

"Nonne moti satius," &c.—CLAUDIUS.

Numb. x. 25.

• Sir Fr. Bacon.

birth-day of eternity), as Seneca at unawares call it. And if death, like unto the gathering host of Dan, come last into the field to gather the lost and forlorn hope of this world, that they may be found in a better, needs must, then, be the day of death better than the day of life; therefore, as a witty man closed up a paper of verses concerning worldly calamities and natural vexations—

“What, then, remains, but that we still should cry
Not to be born, or, being born, to die?”

MCCCCXXXIV.—Men to be prepared for crosses, afflictions, troubles, &c.

Dyke's Serm.,
Westm.

IN or about the year 1626, a book, formerly printed and intituled “A Preparation to the Cross of Christ,” composed by John Frith, martyr, was brought to the market in Cambridge in the belly of a fish, and that a little before the commencement time, when, by reason of the confluence of much people, notice might be given to all places of the land, which, as a late reverend divine observed, could, in his apprehension, be construed for no less than a heavenly warning, and to have this voice with it, “England, prepare for the cross!” A great work of God it was, to be sure, and a fair warning to us of this nation before the sad days of trouble came, had but men made good use of it; but, surdo narratur, no man prepared for the cross; since which time here hath been enough of the cross, cross-doing, and cross-dealing one with another, and much ado hath been about pulling down and defacing material crosses, such as in themselves were but civil, not religious marks, as that princely Job defined them, when they should rather have been busied in pulling down the old man out of their hearts, and so made way for spiritual crosses, and been prepared for the worst of times that could be.

King Charles I.
Εἰκὼν Βασιλική,

MCCCCXXXV.—Man's extremity, God's opportunity.

Eusebii Hist., lib.
ii., cap. 5.Josephus, Antiquit.,
lib. xviii.“Quum duplican-tur latres, tunc venit Moyses.”—
AUGUST.

PHILO the Jew, being employed as an ambassador or messenger to Caius Caligula, then emperor of the Romans, his entertainment was but slight, for he had no sooner spoken on the behalf of his country but was commanded to depart the court; whereupon he told his people that he was verily persuaded that God would now do something for them, because the emperor was so earnestly bent against them. And, certainly, God's help is then nearest when man's is furthest off; the one's extremity is made the other's opportunity. “Ubi definit philosophus, incipit medicus,” &c. (Where the philosopher ends, there the physician begins); and where the physician endeth, there the minister beginneth; and where man's aid endeth, there God's beginneth. Deliverance is oft nearest when destruction seemeth surest.

MCCCCXXXVI.—Parents not to be too much dejected for the death of an only son or child.

Strode's Anat. of Mortality,
Gen. xxii. 10.
John iii. 16.
Zach. xii. 10.
1 Sam. i. 8.“Vos quibus est virtus, muliebrem tolite luctum.”— HORAT., Od. xvi.

ABRAHAM was ready to have sacrificed his only son Isaac; and God gave His only Son Christ Jesus to death for our salvation. It is most true that the death of an only son must needs be grievous, and the cause of great heaviness and lamentation; but let all disconsolate parents take notice what Elkanah said to Hannah, “Am not I better to you than ten sons?” So doth God say: “What though I have taken away your only son, the child of your delight, there is no just cause of complaint; I have taken but my own. I will be better than ten hundred sons to you, and you shall one day find that he is but gone before, as your fief in trust, to take possession, and keep a place for you in heaven.”

MCCCCXXXVII.—How it is that men may be said to learn of little children, dumb shows, &c.

SEXTUS TARQUINIUS, the son of Lucius, being suborned by his father, pretending to be banished, fled fraudulently to the Gabii, where, having screwed himself so much into their bosoms as he thought was sufficient for his design, sent secretly to know his father's pleasure, who, leading the messenger into the garden, walked awhile, and, not speaking one word, with his staff struck off the heads of the daisies which grew there. The messenger reports this to his son, who thereupon put the chief noblemen of the Gabii to death, and so, by force and injustice, usurped a power over that commonweal. Such was the tacit counsel that Periander, the Corinthian, gave unto Thrasybulus, the tyrant of Athens, when, pulling the upper ears, he made all the standing corn equal, intimating thereby what a tyrant must do who would live safe and quiet. Thus it was—but in a better way and a far better sense—that, when the disciples were building castles in the air, querentes non querenda, seeking who should be highest in heaven, when they should rather have been inquiring how to get thither, Christ sets a little child before them, who neither thinks great things of himself nor seeks great things for himself, confuting hereby their preposterous ambition and affectation of primacy. And thus it is that dumb shows may be said to speak out much to the purpose, and speechless children read many a significant lecture to the sons of men—as of simplicity, humility, innocence, ignoscency, &c.; not of childishness, peevishness, open-heartedness, &c.; “non præcipitur ut habeant ætatem, sed innocentiam parvulorum (not of their age, but innocence):” whereupon some, misunderstanding the text in a Nicodemical way—as one Goldsmith, an Anabaptist, and Masseus, a Franciscan friar—to abundance of more than childish folly.

Polyænus, lib. viii.

Frontinus, lib. I., cap. I.

Plin., Jun., de Virt. Illustrib.
Horat., lib. xvi.

Aristot., Polit., lib. iii., cap. 13.
Benedict.

Aretius, in loc.

Matt. xviii. 4.

Schulteti Annals Sedul., lib. iii., cap. 1.

MCCCCXXXVIII.—God's judgments, the causes of them to be considered.

LAY a book open before a child, or one who cannot read: he may stare and gaze upon it, but he can make no use of it at all, because he understandeth nothing in it; yet bring it to one who can read, and understandeth the language that is written in it, he will read you many stories and instructions out of it. It is dumb and silent to the one, but speaketh to and talketh with the other. In like manner it is with God's judgments. As St. Augustine well applies it: all sorts of men see them, but few are able aright to read them, or to understand them, what they say. Every judgment of God is a real sermon of reformation and repentance: every judgment hath a voice, but every one understands not this voice—as St. Paul's companions, when Christ spake to him, they heard a voice, and no more. But it is the duty of every good Christian to listen to the rod and Him who sent it, and to spell out the meaning of God's anger; to inquire and find out the cause of the cross and the ground of God's hiding His face—why it is that He dealeth so harshly with them, and carrieth Himself so austere towards them.

Gataker's David's Remembrancer.

In John, cap. 24.

“Documenta, documenta.”

Acts ix. 7.

Micah vi. 9.

MCCCCXXXIX.—The love of God the only true love.

EVERY beam of light proceeding from the body of the sun is either direct, broken, or reflex: direct, when it shineth out upon the centre in a lineary motion, without any obliquity; broken, when it meets with some grosser body, so that it cannot shine outright, but is enforced to incline to one part or other, and therefore called a collateral or broken light; reflex, when, lighting upon some more gross body, it is beaten back, and so reflects upon its first principle. Thus, let the sons of men pretend never so much to the love of God, their love is either a broken or reflecting love, seldom direct—broken, when it is fixed upon the Stapletoni Prompt. Morale.

"Illi diligunt Deum qui non aliud," &c.
—AUG., de Vita Christi.
Ps. lxxiii. 25.

things of this world; reflex, when it aims at self-interest : whereas the love of God is the only true love; a direct love, without obliquity; a sincere love, without reflection; such a love as breaks through all impediments, and hath nothing in heaven but God, and desireth nothing on earth in comparison of Him; such a love as looketh upon the world by way of subordination, but upon God by way of eminency.

MCCCCXL.—The active Christian, object of the devil and wicked men's malice.

Ep. ad Staum.

LUTHER was offered to be made a cardinal, if he would be quiet. He answered, "No; not if I might be pope!" and defends himself thus against those who thought him haply a proud fool for his pains: "Inveniar sane superbus, &c. (Let me be counted fool, or anything," said he, "so I be not found guilty of cowardly silence)." The Papists, when they could not rule him, railed at him, and called him an apostate. He confesseth the action, and saith, "I am, indeed, an apostate, but a blessed and holy apostate—one who hath fallen off from the devil." Then they called him devil. But what said he? "Prorsus Sathan est Lutherus, &c. (Luther is a devil; be it so; but Christ liveth and reigneth—that is enough for Luther. So be it)." Nay, such was the activity of Luther's spirit, that when Erasmus

Ep. ad Spalatinum.

Trapp's Exposit. on St. John.

was asked by the Elector of Saxony why the Pope and his clergy could so little abide Luther, he answered, "For two great offences: meddling with the Pope's triple crown and the monks' fat paunches." And hence was all the hatred. If he would have been quiet and silent, they would have never meddled with him. Thus it is that a wolf flies not upon a painted sheep, and men can look upon a painted toad with delight. It is not the soft pace, but the furious march of the soldier that sets men a-gazing and dogs a-barking. Let but a man glide along with the stream of the world, do as others do, he may sit down and take his ease; but if he once strive against the stream, stand up in the cause of God, and act for Christ, then he shall be sure to meet with as much despite and malice as men and devils can possibly throw upon him.

"Non est mollis ad astra via." —OVID.

MCCCCXLI.—When lighter afflictions will not serve the turn, God will send heavier.

Firmicus, de Errori Gentil.

THE physician, when he findeth that the potion which he hath given his patient will not work, he seconds it with one more violent; but if he perceive the disease to be settled, then he puts him into a course of physic, so that medicè miserè (he shall have at present but small comfort of his life). And thus doth the surgeon too: if a gentle plaster will not serve, then he applies that which is more corroding, and, to prevent a gangrene, he makes use of his cauterizing knife, and takes off the joint or member that is so ill affected. Even so God, when men profit not by such crosses as He hath formerly exercised them with, when they are not bettered by lighter afflictions, then He sends heavier, and proceeds from milder to sharper courses. If the dross of their sin will not come off, He will throw them into the melting-pot again and again, crush them harder in the press, and lay on such irons as shall enter more deeply into their souls. If He strikes and they grieve not, if they be so foolish that they will not know the judgment of their God, He will bring seven times more plagues upon them—cross upon cross, loss upon loss, trouble upon trouble, one sorrow on the neck of another—till they are, in a manner, wasted and consumed.

"Quando hæc non successit aliâ aggredienda est via." — TERENT.

MCCCCXLII.—Zeal of heathens to their false gods condemning that of Christians to their true God.

THERE is mention made of five men of the tribe of Dan who rushed into the house of Micah and took away his carved and his golden images; he follows them with a loud cry; the Danites ask him what he ails, wherefore he made such a noise: "Oh," says he, "ye have taken away my gods which I made, and what have I more? and what is that you say unto me—'What aileth thee?'" Poor man! how sadly doth he bemoan the loss of his false gods! "And what have I more?" says he, concluding that, in taking away of them, they had taken away all that he had. But which of us are so zealous for the true God as he was for the loss of his false one? We daily lose the sight of His comfortable presence; sin deprives us of Him; who lays it to heart? In losing of Him, we lose all; and yet we are no more moved than if we lost nothing at all. One said of the Papists, "I pray God that their charitable blindness do not one day rise up against our uncharitable knowledge!" so it may very well be said of too, too many. God grant that the ignorant zeal of pagans and infidels to their false gods be not matter of condemnation to those that are better instructed in the knowledge of the true and only God!

Judg. xviii. 24.
Stapleton's Promp.
Moral.
Dom. Pasch.
Felton's Serm.
Lond., 1612.

MCCCCXLIII.—Ministers to be careful in the practice of that which they preach unto others.

IN a certain battle against the Turks, there was a bishop that thus encouraged the army: "Play the men, fellow-soldiers, to-day, and I dare promise you that, if you die fighting, you shall sup to-night with God in heaven." Now, after the battle was begun, the bishop withdrew himself; and when some of the soldiers inquired among themselves what was become of the bishop, and why he would not take supper with them that night in heaven, others answered, "Hodie sibi jejunium indicxit, &c. (This is fasting-day with him, therefore he will eat no supper to-night, though it were in heaven)." Thus it is a sad thing when ministers, like those Pharisees of whom Christ Himself spake, shall say and do not; have tongues to speak by the talent, and hands that scarce act by the ounce; have heaven, like that ridiculous actor of Smyrna, at their tongue's end, but earth at their finger's end: whereas, Christ was full of grace as well as truth; John Baptist a burning and a shining light; it was Origen's "jussit et gessit (his teaching and his living were both one);" and that is the best sermon surely that is digged out of a man's own breast, when he practiseth what he preacheth—the want whereof occasioned Campian, our Jesuited countryman, to write "Ministris eorum nihil vilius (Their ministers are most base)."

Manlii Lec. Com.
"Multi sacerdotes,
et pauci sacerdotes;
multi nomine pauci opere," &c.—
CHRYSOSTOM, in Matt.
Bernardi Ep. xxii.
In Epist.

MCCCCXLIV.—No comfortable return of prayer till sin be removed.

A MAN that is wounded may cry and call upon the surgeon to have some ease of his pain, but if he will not endure to have the splinter or the arrow-head pulled out that sticketh fast in the flesh, and causeth the grief, he may cry long enough, but all in vain; and if people should pray to God to stay the rage and fury of the burning, when a house or town is on fire, and themselves in the meantime pour on oil or throw on fuel, there will be but small hope of quenching the same. So there can be no comfortable return of our prayers unto God till sin be removed; it is but folly to seek unto God by prayer till the partition wall of sin that is betwixt us and Him be broken down. It is sin that crosseth and hindereth the effect and fruit of prayer: like those heathens of whom the cynic made this observation, that they prayed indeed to their gods for health, but at the very same time, when they prayed, they used such excess as could not but greatly impair their health, and so wilfully deprived themselves of that they prayed for.

Isid., de Sum. Bone,
lib. iiii., cap. 7.
"O quam falluntur,
sua qui jucunda Tonant!"
"Vota putant; cum sint pectore nata malo."
Eather vii. 4.
Isa. ix. 12.
Ps. lxxvi. 18.
Diog. Laert., lib. vi.

MCCCCXLV.—Knowledge and learning to be owned wheresoever they be found.

Exod. xii. 35.

Holcot, in Sap

* Origen.

Fuller's Sermon,
Lond., 1649.

1 Sam. xiii. 19.

It is observed that the Egyptians had idols and very heavy burthens; these the Israelites detested: but they had withal vessels of gold and silver, and these, according to God's command, they made a religious use of. One seeing Virgil very studious in a dull piece of Ennius poetry, asked him what he did with that book; he answered, "Lego aurum in stercore (I am gathering gold out of a dunghill)." Thus it is that knowledge is to be owned wheresoever or in whomsoever it is found; fas est et ab hoste doceri (a man may learn of his enemy)—nay, aliena pericula (another man's harms) may teach us how to beware. Much of morality may be picked up from the heathens, much of the knowledge of God from philosophers, much of learning from the poets, and much of Divine truth from some of our well-read adversaries of Rome, of whom it may be said, as it was sometimes of another, * "Ubi bene, nemo melius; ubi male, nemo pejus." Where they have written truth, as in mere speculative points of God, the blessed Trinity, &c., there no man better; and there it is that, as the Israelites, so we may go down to the Philistines' forges to whet our swords and spears, to be furnished with sharp arguments and solid reasons, to the confutation of false and heretical opinions; but where they have roved from the truth, as in the doctrine of merit, indulgences, &c., where you shall be sure always to find a Matthew sitting at the receipt of custom, there no man worse; and there we may and must forsake them.

MCCCCXLVI.—Merit-mongers condemned.

Trapp, on Evang.

"Sufficit ad meritum scire, quod non sufficient merita."
—BERNARD, Sermon.
Ixxviii, in Cant.

A GARDENER, offering a rape-root (being the best present the poor man had) to the Duke of Burgundy, was bountifully rewarded by the duke, which, his steward observing, and thinking to make use of his bounty, presented him with a very fair horse; the duke, ut perspicaci erat ingenio (being a very wise, discreet man), perceived the project, received the horse, and gave him nothing for it. Right so will God deal with all merit-mongers who think, by their good works, to purchase heaven, which cannot be, the work being finite, the wages infinite; so that merit must needs be a mere fiction, since there can be no proportion betwixt the work and reward. There is, indeed, mention made of a mercy-seat in the temple, but there was never heard of any school of merit but in the chapel of Antichrist.

MCCCCXLVII.—He that truly feareth God careth not for the affronts of men.

Hollinshed, Chron.
in Henry VIII., anno 1524.

Gen. xli. 19.
2 Sam. xvi.
Isa. xx.
Jef. xix.
Ezek. iv.
Hosea i.
Finner, of Catechism.

"Æquo animo audienda sunt imperitorum convitia."
—SEN., Ep. lxxvi.

NOAH is commanded by God to make such a vessel as should save him and his from a flood which should drown all the world beside; he sets upon the work; the people laugh at him, and think the poor old man doted, and had dreamed, not, as we say, of a dry summer, but a wet winter, and that he was no wiser than the prior of St. Bartholomew's, who, upon a vain prediction of an addle-headed astrologer, went and built him a house at Harrow-on-the-Hill to secure himself from a supposed flood that that astrologer had foretold. Many a broad jest, many a bitter scoff was, no doubt, broken upon Noah; yet, for all that, he went not only about, but through the work that God had enjoined: so did Abraham, Lot, David, And thus, he that truly feareth God careth not for the affronts of men. He is a fool, we say, that will be laughed out of his coat; but he is a fool indeed that will be laughed out of his skin—nay, out of his soul, out of his eternal salvation—because he is loth to be laughed at by lewd and wicked men. No, no! the true fear of God will make a man set light by such paper-shot; it will carry him through the pikes, not of evil tongues only, but of the most eager opposition that either Satan himself or any limb of his shall at any time be able to raise against him.

MCCCCXLVIII.—How every good Christian is to order his life.

It is said of the Israelites, in their travels through the wilderness, that they wandered like pilgrims, without house or home, they fought like soldiers the battles of the Lord, and they called upon the name of the Lord their God, who heard them in the midst of their distress. And thus it is that every good Christian is to order his life: as a pilgrim, not seeking high things for himself, but, having food and raiment, therewith to rest contented; as a Christian soldier, not to be ashamed to confess the faith of Christ crucified, but to fight manfully under His banner against the three arch-enemies of mankind—the world, the flesh, and the devil; lastly, as the true servant of God, to tread often upon the threshold of His sanctuary, to frequent His ordinances, to be always in such a frame of spirit as to bless and praise and magnify and speak good of His holy name.

Holcot, in Lit. Sap.

Jer. xlv. 5.

1 John iv. 15.

Ps. cxlvii.

MCCCCXLIX.—Men to hear the Word of God, though they come with prejudicate thoughts.

WHEN one Henry Sutphen was preacher at Bremen, the holy Roman Catholics were not idle, but sent their chaplains to hear every sermon, that they might trap him in his words; but God (whose footsteps are in the midst of the flood) would have His marvellous power to be seen in them, by the conversion of them; insomuch, that the greatest part that were sent to hearken did openly witness his doctrine to be the truth of God, against which no man could contend, and such as in all their life they had not heard, persuading them also who sent them, that, forsaking all impiety, they should stick to the Word of God, and believe the same, if they would be saved. Thus it is good to come and hear the Word, though it be with ill intent, to sit under the ordinance though a man be, as it were, upon thorns all the while he is there. They that come to see fashions, as Moses came to the bush, may be called as he was; they that come to sleep, as old Father Latimer said in a sermon before King Edward VI., may be caught napping; they that come with a resolution to steal, peradventure the first words they hear may be, "Thou shalt not steal," or, "Let him that hath stolen steal no more," and so become honest men; they that are sent upon any wicked design, as Saul's messengers were to take David, the Spirit of God may come upon them; and they that come to catch at the preacher, may be caught themselves, as Augustine by St. Ambrose; lastly, they that come, as it were, in despite of Christ may become lovers of Christ, as the officers that were sent to apprehend Christ were so taken with His parts, their malice being turned to admiration, that they were made proclaimers of His divine excellencies, saying, "Never man spake like this Man."

Sleidani Ceriment

Anno 1550.

Exod. xx. 15.

Eph. iv. 28.

1 Sam. xix. 20.

Lit. Confess. v. 1.
Cap. 14.

John vii. 46.

MCCCCCL.—The great work of repentance not to be deferred; and why so.

God spake thus unto Noah, "An hundred and twenty years hence will I bring in a flood that shall drown the whole world, and therefore, if thou wilt be saved, go thy way out of hand, and build thee such an ark as I will show thee." He was then five hundred years old, and might have thought thus with himself, "I am five hundred years old, and it will yet be one hundred and upwards before the flood do come; why, I may be dead and rotten in my grave before that time, or, at leastwise, very near the end of my days; and who would go moil and toil so about building a vessel of such bulk and bigness to prolong his life for so short a time? and, if it must needs be done, I may go and take pleasure for these hundred years yet, and then set upon it twenty or ten years before, and get more help then, and dispatch it the sooner." But Noah did not, he could not, he durst not defer the doing Gataker's Noah's Remembrancer.

Gen. vi.

of it, but fells his wood, saws out his planks, hews out his timber, and so falls to work. The same case is ours: God foretells us that a second general destruction shall come, not by water, but by fire, the fiercer element of the twain, which even heathens have taken notice of; and that none shall then be saved but those that have a spiritual temple, or sanctuary, built in their souls, a house for the blessed Spirit to dwell in—as hard and difficult a work as ever the making of the ark was; for, before the spiritual building can be raised, we must pull down an old frame of the devil's rearing, that standeth where it must stand, and rid the place of the rubbish and remainders of it. Let us, then, fall to work betime: we are so far from being able to promise to ourselves a hundred years, that we cannot assure ourselves of one hour—no, not of one minute.

2 Pet. iii. 7.
Cic., de Nat. Deorum.
Justin., Apolog.
Lactant., de Ira Dei.
Athenagoras, de Resurrect.
1 Pet. ii. 5.
Eph. ii. 22.
2 Cor. x. 4.
1 John iii. 8.
"Mortallum nemo est, qui crastinum sibi audeat polliceri."—EURIPID.

MCCCCLI.—Likeness to be a motive to loveliness.

Ulyss., Aldrovand., Ornith.

Holcot, in Lib. Sap., cap. xi., v. 25.
Virgil., Æneid, lib. iv.

"Similisimili gaudet. . . Sævis inter se convenit uris."—VIRGIL.

THE natural philosophers and others write of a monstrous bird, called a harpy, which, having the face of a man, is of so fierce and cruel a nature, that, being hunger-bitten, will seize upon a man, and kill him; but afterwards, making to the water to quench her thirst, and there espying her own face, and perceiving it to be like the man whom she had devoured, is so surprised with grief, that she dies immediately. Thus our likeness to Christ, and His likeness to us, in all things (sin only excepted) ought to be an argument of love, not of hatred. Birds of a feather will flock and keep together; beasts, though by nature cruel, yet will defend those of their kind: how much more should one man love another, bear with one another, and stand by one another in the midst of any danger or difficulty whatsoever, they being all fellow-members of that mystical body whereof Christ Jesus is the Head!

MCCCCLII.—Spiritual and corporeal blindness, their difference.

Act. and Monum.

"Cælum terraque non aspicit; sed cæli terræque Dominum spectandi facultas non eripitur."—PETRARCH, de Casitate.

Passeratius, de Castitate.

Heb. xi. 6.

A BLIND boy who had suffered imprisonment at Gloucester not long before was brought to Bishop Hooper the day before his death; Mr. Hooper, after he had examined him of his faith and the cause of his imprisonment, beheld him very steadfastly, and tears standing in his eyes, said unto him, "Ah! poor boy, God hath taken from thee thy outward sight, upon what consideration He in His Divine wisdom best knows, but hath given thee another sight much more precious; for He hath endued thy soul with the spiritual eye of understanding." O happy change! Doubtless there is a wide difference betwixt corporeal and spiritual blindness, though every man be blind by nature; yet the state of the spiritually blind is more miserable than that of the other blind. The bodily blind is led either by his servant, wife, or dog, but the spiritually blind is misled by the world, the flesh, and the devil—the one will be sure to get a seeing guide, but the other follows the blind guidance of his own lusts, till they both tumble into the ditch. The want of corporeal eyes is to many divinum bonum, albeit humanum malum, but the want of faith's eyes is the greatest evil which can befall man in this life; for reason is the soul's left eye, faith the right eye, without which it is impossible to see the way to God.

MCCCCLIII.—Good conscience a man's best friend at the last.

Greg. Mag., Moral.

It is a witty parable which one of the fathers hath of a man who had three friends, two whereof he loved entirely, the third but indifferently. This man, being called in question for his life, sought help of his friends. The first would bear him company some part of his way; the second would lend him some money for his journey; and that was all they would or could do for him; but the third, whom he least respected, and from whom he least expected, would go all the way and abide all the while with him—yea, he would appear with him and plead for him. This man is every one of us, and our three friends are the flesh and the world and our own conscience. Now, when Death shall summon us to judgment, what can our friends after the flesh do for us? They will bring us some part of the way, to the grave, and further they cannot. And of all the worldly goods which we possess, what shall we have? What will they afford us? Only a shroud and a coffin, or a tomb at the most. But maintain a good conscience, that will live and die with us, or rather, live when we are dead; and when we rise again, it will appear with us at God's tribunal; and when neither friends nor a full purse can do us any good, then a good conscience will stick close to us.

Hughes' Serm., 1622.

"Instar omnium conscientia bona."
—SEN., Ep. lxi.

MCCCCLIV.—The captivated soul restless till it be in Christ Jesus.

THERE is mention made of a certain bird in Egypt, near the river Nile, called avis paradisi, for the beauty of its feathers, having in it, as we say, all the colours of the rainbow—the bird of paradise, which hath so pleasant and melodious notes, that it raiseth the affections of those who hear it. Now, this bird, if it chance to be any way ensnared or taken, it never leaves mourning and complaining till it be delivered. Such is the soul of every regenerate man: if it be taken by Satan, or overtaken by the least of sins, weakness, or infirmity, it is restless; with the spouse in the Canticles, no sleep shall come into the eye, nor any slumber to the eyelids, till reconciliation be made with God in Christ Jesus.

Alb. Magnus, lib. llii.

Geacner, de Avibus.

MCCCCLV.—Sin of a dangerous, spreading nature.

AMONGST many other diseases that the body is incident unto, there is one that is called by the name of gangrena, which doth altogether affect the joints, against which there is no remedy but to cut off that joint where it settled, otherwise it will pass from joint to joint till the whole body is endangered. Such is the nature of sin, which, unless it be cut off in the first motion, it proceedeth unto action, from action to delectation, from delight unto custom, and from that unto habit, which being, as it were, a second nature, is never, or very hardly, removed without much prayer and fasting.

Cannon's Serm.,
London, 1617.

"Viresque acquirunt cundo,"—VIRG.

MCCCCLVI.—Lex talionis.

MAXENTIUS, that cruel tyrant, coming with an army against Constantine the Great, to deceive him and his army, he caused his soldiers to make a great bridge over Tiber, where Constantine should pass, and cunningly laid planks on the ships, that, when the army came upon the planks, the ships should sink, and so drown the enemy. But Maxentius, hearing of Constantine's sudden approach, in a rage, rushed out of the gates of Rome, and commanded his followers to attend him, and, through fury, forgetting his own work, led a few over his bridge; and the ships sinking, himself and his followers were all drowned. Thus it is that the mischiefs of wicked men fall usually upon their own heads; their plots recoil upon themselves. They do but, as it were, twist a cord to hang themselves. Whilst they dig a pit for others, the earth, falling in, beats out their own brains. This is that lex talionis (that retaliation) which Christ threatens and that David asserteth. "Nec enim lex justior ulla est (Most just it is that he who breweth mischief should have the first draught of it himself)."

Eusebii Hist., lib.
ix., cap. 9.
Cuspinianus, in Hist.
de Catechiz.

Jeanmat's Spiritual Trumpet,
Matt. vii. 2.

Ps. vii. 16.

MCCCCLVII.—*Anabaptistical spirits, their madness.*Edlin's Serm., Lond.

1 Kings xvii. 6.

SUPPOSE a man invited to Dives' rich table, furnished with all sorts of delicacies and delicious fare, and that he should pass by all the provision, and sit sullenly at the table, not eating a bit of the meat, but, staring about him, should look for a second course to drop down from heaven, or to be ushered in by a raven, as it was to the prophet Elijah, would not one think such a one to be a kind of madman? Yes, surely. And such have been at all times, and are, the Anabaptistical spirits of our times. Whereas God hath, in His Word, set before them a plentiful feast of holy and sacred viands, full and clear discoveries of Himself, yet they must needs gape after new revelations and enthusiastical inspirations, not much unlike to the man who pulled out his eyes, and then put his spectacles on his nose, that he might see the better.

MCCCCLVIII.—Not to be at peace with sin.

Xenophon.

Herodotus, lib. i.

Bayley's Serm., 1608.

CRÆSUS, being taken captive of Cyrus, used this one reason to prefer peace before war, namely, because in the time of peace the children might, in all likelihood, bury their parents, but in war, the parents, with much heaviness, buried their children. Now, in the spiritual warfare we may use the same argument to prefer war before peace, because in peace our children and wicked offspring—that is, our sins—do, as it were, bury us alive; whereas if we make but war against them, we bury them, and get peace with God: so that he who hath peace with his sins, the Lord proclaimeth war against him, the issue whereof will be most uncomfortable.

MCCCCLIX.—Ministers to be had in respect by the people.

Lord Burleigh.

Sir Henry Croke.

"Quis homo est
tanta confidentia, qui sacerdotem audeat violare?"—
PLAUT.
Gibson's Serm., 1628.
Judges xvii. 10.

It was a good speech of an honourable person, when some others were undervaluing the ministers of God's Word and sacraments: "Well," said he, "God bless them by whom God blesseth us!" And a great judge, giving the charge at an assizes, professed, in open court, that he would as soon bind a man to his good behaviour for contempt of a minister as for contempt of a magistrate. This was a good resolution then, but in these licentious days of ours most fit to be put into execution, wherein men have taken upon themselves a sinful liberty, both by words and deeds, to throw dirt in the very face of the ministry. How comes it to pass, else, that the calling is made so contemptible above all others—that the name of priest is become so odious? Well, they will one day find that God hath made them fathers (so Micah called the young Levite), teachers, seers, guides, such as watch for the good of men's souls, &c. Let men, then, highly esteem them whom God hath thus honoured.

MCCCCLX.—*The good man's comfort in death.*Anselmi Similitud.

Dan. iii. 22.

It is reported of St. Anselm, that, riding abroad, a hare, that was almost hunted to death, squatted down betwixt his horse's legs. The good man, conceiving that the poor languishing creature made to him for shelter, relieved her from the rage and violence of the huntsman and his dogs. They that stood by wondered that he should spoil their game, and some of them laughed at it, which, the good man perceiving, wept, and said unto them, "My friends, this is no laughing matter!" and thus he applied it: "This hare may very well be compared to every Christian soul: when he is at the point of death, then it is that the devil labours all that he can to make his passage out of this world uncomfortable; then it is that, Nebuchadnezzar-like, he heats the oven of his persecution seven times hotter than before; and then it is that, like a subtle sophister, he brings out his strongest arguments, to drive the poor soul to desperation. In the midst of this great extremity the poor soul looks about for comfort, but finds none—none in any outward things, miserable comforters are they all; but then, by the eye of faith, looking up unto Jesus, is rescued out of the snares of the devil, and is saved.

"Quanto propinquius mortem hominis videt diabolus, tanto crudelius persecuciones excruciat." &c.—Isid., de Sum. Bono, lib. i.

MCCCCLXI.—To beware of errors and erroneous teachers.

It is said of Spondanus, the same that epitomised "Baronius," that he gives his reader Popish poison to drink so slyly, quasi aliud agens (as if he were doing something else), and meant no such matter; and Schwenkfeldius, who held many dangerous heresies, did yet deceive many by his pressing to a holy life, praying frequently and fervently, &c., by his stately expressions, ever in his mouth, as of illumination, revelation, deification, the inward and spiritual man, &c.; so cunning in the cogging of his die, as St. Paul phraseth it, so wily in the conveyance of his collusion, that, like a serpent, he stung with hissing. Such are therefore to be avoided, how slyly soever they seek to insinuate with their pithanology (plausible arguments) and feigned humility, whereby they circumvent and beguile the simple. There is no dealing with them; shun their society, as a serpent in the way, as poison in your meat; for such is the nature of their erroneous doctrine, that, as a noble writer saith, "It is like the Jerusalem artichoke: plant it where you will, it overruns all the ground, and chokes the heart of it."

Whear, de Methodo Legend. Hist.

Erasmus, in Eph. iv. 14.

Book.

MCCCCLXII.—The way of religion irksome in the beginning, but comfortable in the end.

AN heifer that is not use d to the yoke struggles; the yoke pincheth the neck, but after a while she carries it more gently. A new suit, though never so well fitted to a man's body, is not so easy the first day as after it is worn awhile. Two millstones, after they be made fit, do not grind so well at the first as afterwards. As we see it is with a man when he goes to bathe himself in the midst of summer, there is a trembling of his body when he first puts into the water, but after he hath drenched himself all over he is not sensible of any cold at all. So the way of piety and religion is irksome at the first, but after it gives great comfort and contentment; it is called a yoke, grave cum tollis, &c. (grievous when a man takes it up, but, after it is borne awhile, both easy and light). It is a strait way, yet try it; put into it, however: do but digest (patiently bear) the difficulty of the entrance, and then thy feet shall not be straitened; thou shalt find more and more enlargement, each day will bring more comfort than the other.

Shute's Sermon, before East India Company, 1630.

"Omnia dum incipias, graviasient," &c.—TER, Heaut.

Greg. Mag., Moralia, Matt. xi. 29.

Matt. vii. 13.

Prov. iv. 12.

MCCCCLXIII.—Lewdness of the preacher's life no warrant to slight the ordinance of preaching.

It was an unhappy meaning that Sir Thomas More had, though he spake it pleasantly, when he said of a vicious priest, that he would not, by any means, have him say the Creed, lest it should make him call the articles of his faith into question. Thus too, too many are apt to call the truths of God's Word into question because of the lewdness of the preacher's life. One will not have his children baptized by such a one; it goes against another's stomach to receive the sacrament from the foul hands of such a one; others care not for their doctrine, because they say and do not, &c. A preposterous zeal, God wot! Elijah received comfortable food from a raven, as well as from an angel. If God speak to thee as He did to Balaam, by the mouth of an ass, thou must have so much patience, saith Luther, as to hear him. If God will have thee to be saved by one who, peradventure, shall be damned, hear Gibson's Sermon, 1638.

1 Kings xvii. 6.

Let. Com., Tit. de Ministerio.

what he saith, and look not what he doth; if thy pastor live lewdly, that is his own hurt; if he preach well, that is thy good; take thine own and go thy way. Good water, which passeth into a garden through a channel of stone, doth the garden good, though it do the channel none; and so may the Word and water of life, conveyed by a bad instrument of a stony heart, do good to the Church of God, though it work not upon himself. And good seed, though it be cast into the ground with foul hands, will fructify; one may be a bad man, yet a good seedsman, both in the field and the Church; yet woe be to him by whom the offence cometh, by whose means the offerings of the Lord are so slighted. Eli's sons smoked (suffered) for this. And to many which have prophesied in His name, Christ will say, in His just displeasure, "Away from Me, ye workers of iniquity!"

"Erret non erret ille, tu non erras si credideris."—
LUTHER, ut supra.

1 Sam. iv. 17.

Luke xiii. 27.

MCCCCCLXIV.—Wicked men made by God instrumental for the good of His people.

De Orat. et Medit.
stat., lib. iii.

Dan. iii. 25.

Rom. viii. 28.

LEWES, of Granada, that devout Spaniard, maketh mention of a very poor diseased man, dwelling in Italy, who was brought so low that he could stir neither hand nor foot; and seeking for a skilful physician to heal him, he found a potent enemy to torment him, who, to add unto his misery, cast him into prison, and there kept him, with a very small allowance of bread and water, so much only as should keep life and soul together. But it so happened that, there being a new face of government in that province, he was released from his imprisonment and his disease together, for the want of food, intended to take away his life, proved the only remedy to preserve it. And thus it is that God makes use of wicked men for His people's good. The wicked cast them into the furnace, thinking to destroy them, but they rise out thence more glorious than before. They plough deep furrows on the backs of God's people, but that makes them more fruitful in good works; put them to death, that proves their advantage; vex, grieve, trouble, and torment them, yet, do what they can do, they are still gainers, not losers; so true is that of the apostle, πάντα συνεργεῖ εἰς τὸ ἀγαθόν, &c. ("All things work together for the best to them that love God)."

MCCCCCLXV.—How it is that one man may be said to be punished for another man's sin.

Shute's Serm. on Plague of Frogs, &c.

A MAN that hath fed high for a long time comes to have a plethory of crude and undigested humours in his stomach: it so falls out that this party, riding afterwards in the wet and taking cold, begins to shiver and shake, and afterwards falls into a durable, lasting fever: if the physician be a wise man, one that hath parts and skill, ask him what was the cause of this sickness, and he will tell you, the ill-humours of the body and the abounding of them: yet it is like enough it had not turned to a fever so soon, if he had not taken cold of his feet, or been some way troubled in his journey. So, when God brings punishment upon people, the proper cause is in every man's self; there are personal sins in every man to make him obnoxious to the curse of God; yet may the sins of the father or parent or neighbour be the occasion that God will punish sin: so that it may be said, that the personal sins of men are the primary, internal, antecedent, dispositive cause of God's judgments; but the sins of other men, as they are members of the whole, may be the external, irritating, exciting cause of God's judgment upon a people or nation.

MCCCCCLXVI.—The soul's comfortable enjoyment of Christ.

Gataker's Serm. on Death's Advantage.

It were a great grace, and such as would minister much comfort to a courtier lying sick at home with the gout, to have the prince not only to send to him, but in person also to visit him ; but much more comfort and joy would it be to him to be able, being recovered, to repair to the court and there enjoy his prince's presence, with such pleasures and favours as the place may afford. How much more, then, in this case, is it a grace and a comfort that God vouchsafeth to visit us here by His Spirit, sometimes more familiarly and feelingly, but always so effectually, as thereby to support us even in the greatest of extremity ; but how much more exceedingly shall our joy and comfort be increased when, being freed from all infirmities, we shall be taken home to Him, that we may enjoy Him for evermore. As that courtier, having assurance given him of recovery by such a time, would exceedingly rejoice to think of the joy of that day, and count every day a week, if not a year to it, wherein he should, being recovered, return to the court, and be welcomed thither in solemn manner by all his friends there, and by the prince in a more especial manner ; so well may the faithful soul not a little joy to forethink with itself what a joyful hour that shall be unto it wherein, by death parted from the body, it shall solemnly be presented before the face of Jesus Christ, and, entering into the heavenly place, shall be welcomed thither by the whole court of heaven, the blessed saints and angels.

MCCCCLXVII.—Unhappy prosperity, happy adversity.

It is a philosophical observation of turtle doves and some other birds, that used to take their flights into other parts beyond the seas, that if the south wind blow they would be sure of a good guide to direct them, but if the wind be northward, then they venture of themselves, without any conduct at all. This may note unto us the unhappy prosperity of the wicked and the happy adversity of the godly. He that spreads his sails before the south wind of prosperity, blowing honours, riches, and preferment into his lap, had need of a good pilot, the special counsel of God, to lead him, and the extraordinary mercies of God to support him, if ever he intend to arrive at the port of eternal bliss ; whereas he that sets out whilst the north wind of adversity and trouble beats fiercely upon him, minds his way, rides through the storm, well knowing that the way to heaven is by the gates of hell, and that by many tribulations he must, and shall at last, enter into happiness.

Berchorii Red. Moral.

"Luxuriant animi rebus plerumque secundis,"—OVID, Art. ii.

"Omnia qui ad Paradisum redire desiderat, oportet transire per ignem et aquam," &c.—AUG., in Serm. ad Lippium.

MCCCCLXVIII.—Every wicked man a curse to the place he lives in.

BIAS the philosopher being at sea in a great tempest, with a number of odd fellows, some of them very rake-shames (dissolute wretches) and naught (worthless), they began (as men in such cases usually do) to call upon the gods, which he perceiving, comes to them and saith, "Sirs, hold your peace, lest the gods take notice that you are here, and so not only you, but we also suffer for your sakes." And it is observed that St. John leaped out of the bath because Cerinthus was there ; his reason was, lest the bath should fall for his sake only, being a wretched blasphemous heretic. Thus it is that a wicked man, though he think he hurt nobody but himself, is a plague and a curse to the place he lives in ; let him be never so noble, never so honourable, potent, or wealthy, if he be a profane man, a lewd, loose libertine, he engageth the place of his abode to the wrath of God, and hasteneth His judgments thereunto.

Dlog. Laert., in Vita.

Irenæus, lib. iii., cap. 3.

Shute's Serm. on Exod.

MCCCCLXIX.—The soul's restlessness till it be united unto Christ.

A VIRGIN being espoused to one that is shipped for the East Indies or some such long-winded voyage, if she do indeed faithfully and unfeignedly affect him, though she joy to read a letter or see some token from him, yet it is nothing in that kind that can give her contentment—nil mihi rescribas (nothing would serve her turn but his presence). Oh, how she hearkens after the ships for his return, and joys to think of that day wherein they shall be so fast knit together, that nothing shall separate them but death ! Thus the Christian soul contracted to Christ may receive many favours and love-tokens from Him, such as are all the blessings she enjoyeth, whether spiritual or temporal, yet they cannot all of them give any true contentment, but help rather to inflame her affection towards Him, and make her, if she sincerely love Him, as she professeth and pretendeth to do, the more earnestly and ardently to long for that day wherein she shall be inseparably linked unto Him, and everlastingly enjoy His personal presence, which, above all things, she most earnestly desireth.

Cataker's Serm. on Death's Advantage.

MCCCCCLXX.—Partiality of affection in hearing sermons condemned.

Williams' True Church.

"Veniant ut audiant, non ut discant : non id agunt ut aliqua illo vitia deponant sed," &c.
—SEN., Ep. xx.

A SCHOLAR, coming to St. Paul's Churchyard, asked a bookseller whether he had Abulensis' Works, and the man said no, but he had Tostatus', which was as good. The scholar replied, Tostatus' would do him no good, unless he had Abulensis' ; which, indeed, was the same book, Alphonsus Tostatus being episcopus Abulensis (bishop of Avila, in Spain). Thus it is with the partial and prejudicate opinions and fancies of many men and women, when they rather respect quis prædicat than quid prædicatur (who preacheth than what is preached) : for, if the self-same sermon were preached by divers men, the sermon should never be respected according to its worth, but according to the fancy, opinion, and affection which they bear unto the deliverer, because commonly they know no other difference but the names, voices, and faces of their teachers. Sure it is that Christ made the best sermons that ever were preached, and yet they were not best liked, because they liked not the Preacher.

MCCCCCLXXI.—Every man to confess that his own sin is the cause, though not always the occasion, of punishment.

Shute's Serm. on Exod. viii.

"Ille ego qui feci," &c.

It is said of Prince Henry, that delitiæ generis humani (that darling of mankind), as it was once said of Titus Vespasianus, whose death was then to this kingdom as so much of the best blood let out of the veins of Israel, when it was told him that the sins of the people caused that affliction on him—"Oh, no," said he ; "I have sins enough of my own to cause that !" So should we all confess : though God take occasion by another man's sin, or by the neglect of another person, to fire my house, yet the cause is just that it should be so, and that I myself have deserved it, whatsoever the occasion be. God had cause against the seventy thousand who died of the plague ; though David's sin were the occasion, yet the meritorious cause was in them ; therefore, whensoever it pleaseth God to lay His hand of anger upon us, though another may be the occasion, yet ille ego qui feci, let every man in particular acknowledge that it is he who hath sinned, and so justify God in his sayings, and clear him when he is judged.

MCCCCCLXXII.—Ministers of the Gospel to be of godly lives and conversations.

Godwin's Moses and Aaron, lib. iii., cap. 4.

Abbot's Serm., Kent.

"Bene vivendo et bene populum docendo," &c.—CHRYSOST., in Matt.

As the Jews, in their preparation to the passover, did for four hours search out all leaven out of their houses, and then for two hours cast it out, and, lastly, cursed all the leaven that they had not seen and could not find : so let all the priests of the Lord's house, all the ministers of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, be careful to search, to purge, and to execrate all the leaven of wilful and reigning sin, and to oppose and mortify the least sins, that so they may be priests after God's own heart, stars in God's right hand—such as Gregory Nazianzen, of whom Basil speaks, that he did thunder in his doctrine and lighten in his conversation—and that, having an inward principle of the light of holiness in them from Christ, they may shine out holily unto others, not only in the pulpit and prayer, but in the whole course of their lives also.

MCCCCLXXIII.—The right use of human learning

MAGNUS, a Roman orator, accused St. Jerome for bringing too many uncircumcised Greeks into the temple, and by that means defiling candorem Ecclesiæ sordibus ethnicorum (the unstained candour of the Church of Christ with the impure sentences of heathen orators); but the good father, with sufficient reason, doth clear himself from those aspersions. And so it is to be desired that all persons may do the like, and not to show themselves to be greater disciples of nature than scholars of grace, or to have studied more in the school of humanity than in the university of divinity; because human learning is to be used, not as a means to satisfy our stomach, but as the sauce to provoke our appetite; not to add strength unto the truth, but ornament to our speech, being, as it were, trimming to a plain suit, and garnish to a good dish of meat; and, indeed, to speak the best of it, it is but a learned kind of ignorance, which, yet being guided and bridled by the Spirit of God, wrought, as one well observed, to speak like Balaam's ass, to good purpose.

Jerome, Epist.,
tom. ii.

Edes' Serm., Duty of a King.

MCCCCLXXIV.—Happiness of him who hath the Lord to be his God.

ST. AUGUSTINE hath this passage of one that, passing by a stately house, which had fair domains about it, and asking another whom he met, to whom that house and land belonged, he answered, "To such a one." "Oh," says he, "that is a happy man indeed!" "No," says the other, "not so happy as you think; for it is not such happiness to have that house and land; but he is happy indeed who hath the Lord to be his God: it is a privilege that exceeds all things whatsoever; for he who hath honour and riches may go to hell for all of them, but he who hath God to be his God is sure to be everlastingly happy."

Shute's Serm., on Exod., viii.

MCCCCLXXV.—Catechising an excellent way to instruct youth.

THE Jewish rabbins observe a very strict method in the instruction of children and others, according to their age and capacity: at five years old they were filiis legis (sons of the law), to read it; at thirteen they were called filiis præcepti (sons of the precept), to understand the law—then they received the Passover as a sacrament, for even children did eat it, as a remembrance of their deliverance out of Egypt, and then also they were purified; at fifteen years old they came to be Talmudistæ, and went to deeper points of the law and Talmudic doubts. Thus did the Jews: and let no Christians lag behind them in propagating the truths of Jesus Christ their Master. Let children be well instructed, principled, and catechised in the fundamentals of Christian religion, for without catechising the people perish in the want of knowledge, and become fit matter for every priest, Jesuit, and sectary to work upon. The Papists have confessed that all the ground we have gotten of them is by catechism; and the little ground they have gotten of us is by a more diligent acquiring and practising of it: in a word, catechising is as well a family as a Church duty. Were but the family well instructed, the minister would have less work to do; there would not be so many uncatechised heads, nor so many weathercock Christians, as now are to be found amongst us.

Martinus, de Rep.
Heb.

Plantavit Florede-
glum Rabinic.

Donne's Serm.,
Lond., 1621.

MCCCCLXXVI.—To rest contented with God's good will and pleasure.

THERE is a story of two neighbours: the one of them threw himself upon the providence of God in all things; but the other, by his industry and pains, would be making out a fortune to himself, so that, if anything fell cross, atque Deos atque astra vocat crudelia (he would nothing but murmur and repine). Now, so it happened, that the grounds and granaries

Bromiardi Sax.
Præd.

"Deus est; faciat quicquid vult."

"Sorte tua conten-tus abi."

Gen. xlii. 36.

of the one were fertile and full; of the other, barren and empty. Many wondered at it; but one, wiser than the rest, made answer, "Do not marvel at this thing: the one hath enough, because he dependeth on God; the other little enough, because he will be wiser than God, who disposeth all things." And many such there are nowadays to be found amongst us, such as, although they pray daily, "Thy will be done!" yet are restless and discontented, if it be not done according to their own will; whereas all true children of God submit themselves to His most wise, powerful, and good will, and that, too, like the good old patriarch, even in those things which may seem unjust, in such things as may thwart and cross their intentions, well knowing that to throw themselves upon God's will is the readiest way to have their own will in all things.

MCCCCLXXVII.—The poorest man may, in his calling, do very good service unto God.

"Speculum exemplorum."

William, Of the Church.

"Egentes in mundo sed locupletes Deo, vitis vacui, sed vir-
tutibus pleni," &c.
—CASSIODOR., in Psalms.

It is reported of an abbot who lived after a most strict and severe kind of life, and being desirous to know with whom he should be associated in heaven, was informed, in a vision, that such a one in such a town should be his next companion in the joys of heaven; whereupon the abbot went and inquired what such a man should be: and understanding that he was but a poor tradesman, who lived uprightly in his calling and brought up his children honestly in the fear of God, he went home and learned humility, making this conclusion to himself, that God is no respecter of persons, but is far better pleased with him that is faithful and diligent in the meanest office, than with him that is careless and negligent in the highest employment. And thus it is that the poorest shepherd and the meanest ploughman are necessary and useful in the Church of God, and may, by performing the duties of their calling; do as acceptable, though not as excellent, service unto God as any other in a higher place; the fidelity of the service, and not the excellency of the service, being that wherewith God is most affected. But what, then, shall become of such who, though otherwise born of gentle blood, and bred up at the feet of Gamaliel, in the schools of the prophets, men of pregnant capacities and able bodies, yet live out of all honest vocations, sacrificing their precious time either to Morpheus, the minister of sleep, Bacchus, the god of wine, or Venus, the goddess of beauty, as if neither the true God nor the commonwealth deserved any service at their hands, but that all were due to the bed, the tavern, and the brothel-house?

MCCCCLXXVIII.—The happy succession of a Christian family.

Plin., Nat. Hist.,
lib. vii., cap. 47.

Ps. lxxii. 17.

Sim. de Muis., in loc.

It was accounted a great honour, nay, the very height of felicity, that in one house and race of the Curio there were known to be three excellent orators, one after another, by descent from the father to the son; and the Fabii afforded three presidents of the senate in course, one immediately succeeding the other. The like hath been amongst us in several high places of government and judicature. But if this kind of succession be so honourable, so happy, how happy, how honourable doth the succession of religion from father to son make families to be? There it is that the name of Christ may be said to live for ever, "filialitur nomen ejus," so the words are; it shall be begotten as one generation is begotten of another, and so make a happy succession of Christ's name: so that it must needs be, then, a blessed tenure where Christ is held in capite; a happy family where Christ and the name of the family go hand-in-hand together.

MCCCCLXXIX.—No salvation but by the mercies of God in Christ Jesus.

THERE is a story of one who, falling asleep, dreamt that he was in a large field, hedged in on all sides with thunder, lightning, hailstorms, and the like tempestuous weather, and that he saw certain houses afar off, and, making towards one of them, craved admittance till the storm was over. "What art thou?" said the master of the house. "I am such a one," says he, telling him his name. "And I," says the master, "am called Justice. Thou must not look for any comfort from me, but rather the contrary." At another house he was answered, that there dwelt Truth, one that he never loved, and must therefore expect no shelter there. Well, he goes to the third, the house of Peace, and there he finds the like entertainment. In the midst of this distraction, he lights upon the house of Mercy, and there, humbly desiring entrance, was made welcome and refreshed. This may be but a dream, imaginary, yet the application is a real truth. Then, thus, it is not the sewing up together of some few fig-leaves of merit (as some suppose) that will cover the nakedness of a poor distressed soul, nor the outward varnish and goodly splendour of moral virtues and humane performances (as others think) that can add anything of comfort to the wounded conscience. When the habitations of Justice, Truth, and Peace are bolted fast upon the drooping soul, then are the gates of Mercy wide open to receive it, there being no salvation but by the mercies of God in Christ Jesus.

Surius, in Vita Domini.

Bromiardi Sum. Prædic.

"Misericordiarum, Domine Jesu, uldima sunt refugia."—BERN., in Cont.

MCCCCLXXX.—An hypocrite, being true to none, is beloved of none.

THE griffon, in the fable, when the battle was to be fought betwixt the beasts of the field and the fowls of the air, would partake of neither side, but stood neutral until he could perceive which side did get the best of the day; and therefore showed his fore part, like a fowl, unto the birds, and his hinder part, like a four-footed beast, unto the beasts, thereby to gull them both; but his deceit being perceived of both, he was hated and rejected of both, as unworthy to be trusted on either side. Thus it fares with the hypocrite, who, being desirous to serve two masters, and to retain the favour both of God and the world, is hated both of God and the world: the devil hates him, because he retaineth unto Christ, and Christ hates him much more, because he doth but only retain unto Him; the world cannot abide him, because he professeth godliness, and God can worse abide him, because he doth but profess it: neither of them doth love him, because he hath been true to neither, nor yet indeed unto himself, but hath betrayed Christ for the world's sake, and the world for Christ's sake, and himself for sin and Satan's sake.

Æsop., Fab.

Williams' Of the Church.

"Odi virum duplicem natum, bonum sermonibus, inimicum moribus."—PERS., Epigr. i.

MCCCCLXXXI.—The Church's sad condition to be laid to heart.

IT is reported of Alexander, who, being in extreme thirst, when a draught of water was offered unto him, he thought it a hard thing, and no way suitable to the dignity of a prince, that he alone should quench his thirst when others in his army had not wherewithal to abate theirs; wherefore he returns the cup with this speech, "Nec solus bibere sustineo, &c. (I cannot endure to drink alone, and here's not enough for every one to wet their lips)." Thus Uriah, while the ark and his lord Joab were in the field, will not go down to his house—no, not so much as to refresh himself. And what says old Anchises when Æneas would have saved his life: "Absit ut, excisa, possim supervivere, Troia (Far be it from me that I should desire to live, when Troy suffers that it does)." And thus, far let it be from any true-hearted Christian to live deliciously when, not Troy, but the Church of God is under a cloud of sorrow and affliction, so that, what betwixt the popish and the peevish party, she is ready to be overwhelmed. Too, too much to blame, then, are all they that, with those Jewish priests Curtius, lib. viii.

2 SAM. xi. 11.

Virgil.

Josephus, *de Bello
Judæico*, lib. vi.

at the taking of Jerusalem by Titus, the Roman emperor, have not only a desire to live, but to live in pomp, in bravery; in giving liberty to themselves in all sensual delights, in abating nothing of their carnal contentments, when they see and hear of the Church of God suffering grievous things, and brought unto lamentable straits, under the burthen of sore and most heavy pressures.

MCCCCLXXXII.—Mercies of God in Christ Jesus, the danger of dallying with them.

Bacon's Not. 374.

Granatus., Dux Peccatorum.

Bromiardi *Sum.
Præd.*

Ps. lxxxviii.

ONE who had plied his cups hard, and, coming home drunk, finds a candle lighted on the table, but, through the swiftness and violence of the spirits, being oppressed to and fro, he seeth things double—instead of one candle, he sees two; and going, as he thinks, to put out one of them, he finds himself in the dark, and cries out, “Where is the other candle?” But all in vain. Thus carnal-minded men, being, as it were, intoxicated with the delights and pleasures of this world, do, through the multiplying-glass of their own deceitful fancies, see not only one or two, but the many and superabundant mercies of God; yet, extinguishing and not seasonably applying the sweet and tender mercies of God, in Christ Jesus, to their souls, like children who have played away the candle and go to bed darkling, so they, having abused the time of mercy, are cast out into utter darkness to all eternity; and then, when it is too late, they cry out, as the drunkard did for the candle, “Lord, where are Thy mercies of old?”

MCCCCLXXXIII.—God not to be set out by any representation or image to the eye of man.

Plin., Nat. Hist.,
lib. xxxv., cap. 9.

M. Tul. Cic., *de
Invent.*, lib. ii.

Rhodoginus, Var.
Lect., lib. iv.

“Procul hinc
Zeuxis, procul esto Licippus.”—Hor.

IT is recorded of Zeuxis, one of the best Gentile painters in the world, that, going about to draw the portraiture of Juno, he singled out five of the fairest virgins in Agrigentine, and painted her according to that which he saw most commendable in any one of them; but when he went about to make the picture of Venus, he selected fifty of the fairest maids in Sparta, and said fifty more, fairer than those, were not sufficient patterns to afford him form and beauty to express the perfection of such a goddess; and therefore, when his art was not able to reach her excellency, he drew on his table a large picture of a temple, with a door open, and the goddess, as it were, going in, so that the beholder could see nothing but her back parts. Now, if so excellent an artist could not express the excellency of flesh and blood, how shall any man be able to paint or set out by any presentation to the eye of man the spiritual and invisible God? And therefore, let Demetrius, the silversmith, and Alexander, the coppersmith, and all the other carvers and painters, pack and be gone, and never employ their skill to resemble the image of the incomprehensible God, because the drawing of His image will but rather show the greatness of their folly than be able to express the least part of His glory.

MCCCCLXXXIV.—In time of prosperity to provide for adversity.

Ulyss., *Aldrovandi
Ornitholog.*, lib. xx.

Plin., Nat. Hist.,
lib. x., cap. 32.
“Tu quoque fac
timeas, et quæ tibi
læta videntur, dum
loqueris fieri tristia,
posse puta.”—
Ovid, iv., Pont.
Acts ix. 31.

THE naturalists observe, that while the halcyon bird is brooding her eggs, and bringing forth her young ones, there is usually fair weather: from whence we call good times “halcyon days.” She neglects not any of those days, but sits close upon her nest, and is very diligent in bringing forth, lest, if there should be a change of weather, the waters should grow high, and her young ones be in danger of drowning. Thus, in the times of prosperity, we must provide for adversity—lay hold upon the opportunities of peace and liberty, to edify ourselves in the most holy faith. This was the Church’s care, and this must be ours, while our ship is in the haven, to mend it there ; when it is out at sea in a storm, it will be too late then. There is yet some hope, but how long there will be, God knows. Let us provide for worse times, that we be not surprised on a sudden when they come upon us.

MCCCCLXXXV.—Mercies of God in Christ Jesus to be sought while they may be found.

HE that intends to speak with any one in a well-fortified castle must come by day, whilst the drawbridge is down, otherwise, being once up, there will be no entrance at all. Thus, many a man loseth mercy, as Saul did his kingdom, by not discerning the time. Esau came too late, and the foolish virgins did not lay hold upon the first opportunity. He, therefore, that resolves for heaven must in the time of this life make good his passage, strive to enter whilst the bridge of mercy is let down ; for if it be once drawn up, there is no by-ward, no loophole to creep in at ; and that soul must needs then be exposed to the justice of God where Mercy hath shut up her tender bowels of compassion.

Bromlardi Summa Prædicator.

"Fac bene dum vivis, post mortem," &c.

MCCCCLXXXVI.—A great fault in women not to nurse their own children.

It is reported of Gracchus, a nobleman of Rome, that when the nurse brought home his child, he gave her a pearl of very great price, and another, of far less value, to the mother ; and being demanded why he respected the nurse so much, and the mother so little, answered, that the mother bare the child but nine months in her womb, and the nurse bare him above thirty months in her arms. It was otherwise with Anthusa, the mother of that golden-mouthed father : she was able to draw arguments to dissuade her son from leading a monastic life, by his drawing of her breasts when he was an infant. But now it is much to be feared that very few women can make out any such reason to persuade or dissuade their children, which is the cause so many times that, as parents have shown little love and affection in the nursing of their children, so their children, in like sort, do perform little regard and obedience to the honouring of their parents.

Val. Max., lib. iv.,
cap. 6.

Zuingeri, Theat.
Hum. Vitæ.

William, Of the Church.

MCCCCLXXXVII.—The implacable malice of wicked men against professors of the Gospel.

FELIX, earl of Wartenburgh, one of the captains of Charles V., swore, in the presence of divers at supper, that before he died he would ride up to the spurs in the blood of Lutherans. But God soon cooled his courage, for that very night he was choked and strangled in his own blood. After John Huss was burnt, his adversaries got his heart, which was left untouched by the fire, and beat it with their staves. And the bones of Martin Bucer and Paulus Fagius were taken up and burnt, after they had a long time been buried in silence. Oh, the desperate madness and malice of all persecutors, such as burn in anger against the godly ! It was St. Paul's prayer that he might be delivered from unreasonable and wicked men. The word is ἀρόπων (absurd men), such as put themselves upon ways of opposition against all reason and common sense ; nay, such is their rage and bitterness of spirit, that it makes them break all bonds of humanity, and go against laws or anything, so as they may but torment the dear servants of God.

Fac. Illiric. Cat.
Tert. Veritas.

Acts and Monuments.

a Thess. iii. 2.

MCCCCLXXXVIII.—The multitude, not to be guided by them.

Bromiardi Summa Prædicatorum.

Zuingeri *Theat.
Hum. Vitæ, lib. vii.*

"Turba tremens sequitur fortunam."
—JUVEN.

"Pauci quos æquus amavit Jupiter,"
—OVID.

It is reported of a certain duke of the Saracens—and he none of the wisest—who, being almost persuaded to be a Christian, would needs be baptized; but being brought to the water-side, and having one foot in, before he would wet the other, he demanded of the baptizer where his father, mother, kindred, and friends were, who died without baptism. It was answered that they were all in hell, with a multitude of unbelievers besides. "But whither shall I go," says he, "when I am baptized?" "To heaven," says the priest, "if you live a good life." "Nay, then," says he, pulling his foot out of the water, "take your baptism to yourself; let me go to that place where the many, not where the few—where my friends and acquaintances and a great number of others of all sorts are. I love to see my friends about me." And this is just the fashion of this present wicked world: men are much taken with the many; they choose rather to follow the multitude, to do evil, than to close with the remnant who shall be saved, to do any good. A sad choice, God wot, to be so far taken with the common rabble, who know not God, and run headlong to hell, rather than to join with the little flock of Christ, who shall be assuredly saved!

MCCCCLXXXIX.—Every man to think the best of his own wife.

In Appendice Xenophontæ adject. Operibus.

"Uxor bona chara supellex."—OVID.

"Quicunque bonus
maritus et prudens, suam amat et cu-
rat,"—HOMER.

XENOPHON being demanded (asked) if his neighbour had a better house than himself, and that he might have his choice of them, which would he have, his or his own, he answered, "His:" so, being demanded the like question of his horse, of his field, and the like, he still answered, "His;" but being asked if his neighbour had a fairer or better wife than himself, which of them he would rather have, "Hic Xenophon ipse tacuit," he either said his own, or said nothing, silently concluding that she was the best. Thus it is that every man must think his own wife to be the fairest and faithfulest that he could find, esteeming of her as of the best treasure he hath, loving her above all others: not like the Egyptian frogs, croaking in other men's chambers, but as the adamant turns only to one point, so keeping to his own wife so long as they both shall live.

MCCCCXC.—To be ready to suffer persecution by Christ's example.

Burrough's Mares' Choice, p. 91.

Phil. ii. 5.
"Qui in Christo
credimus, Christi sectemur exemplar."—JER., Ep. ix.

THERE is mention made of a Roman servant, who, knowing that his master was sought for by officers to be put to death, he put himself into his master's clothes, that he might be taken for him; and so he was, and put to death for him. Whereupon, in memory of his thankfulness to him, the master erected a brazen statue, with this inscription, "Servo fideli (To the trusty servant)." Thus Christ, who was not a servant, but our Lord and Master, yet, when He saw we were like to die, He took upon Him the form of a servant, He came in our likeness, that He might die for us; and He did so. Now, He requires not of us to erect any brazen monument in memory of Him or in honour to Him, but that we should be ready and willing to suffer for Him, when He calls us thereunto. Certainly, His example in humbling Himself so much to suffer for us should be mightily prevalent with us, that if He emptied Himself so much to become the Son of Man, how much more should we, having so fair a Copy to write by, be much more willing to empty ourselves, that we may be the sons of God.

MCCCCXCI.—Pride, the vanity thereof.

Val. Max.
Quintus Curtius, de Reb. Gestis Alexand.

VALERIUS MAXIMUS, an eminent observer of times and persons, says, that Alexander the Great had three ill qualities—first, he looked upon his father, though otherwise well enough qualified, as a man of no desert at all; secondly, though he was a Macedonian born, yet he put himself into the Persian garb, because more rich and costly than his own ; thirdly, his conquest had so swelled him, that he would be no longer a man, but he must be a god forsooth, and no less than the son of Jupiter. Such is the nature of pride, and natural condition of all proud men, whether it be in relation to things spiritual or temporal, that they think no man good enough to be their fellow. "Stand further off," says one ; "I am holier than thou !" "Keep your distance," says another ; "I am richer, greater, &c., than thou !" Let a man be but once got upon a footcloth, how big doth he look upon inferior passengers ! And if he have purchased a little more land than his neighbours, you shall see it in his garb : if he command, it is imperiously : if he salutes, it is with a surly and silent nod : he thinks, with the pharisee, he is not like other men ; he looks upon himself as a giant, and upon all the world besides as dwarfs, as if made for nothing but to be laughed at, when himself is but a man, and, God knows, a foolish one too, whom a little trash can affect so deeply, not remembering that as the king so the beggar, as dieth the wise man so the fool, and that the rich and the poor shall both meet together in the grave.

Feri Postillæ.

"Quid superbis terra et ciris," &c.
—ORIGEN, Homil.
on Ecclæ.
Eccles. vii. 15.

MCCCCXCII.—More teachers than learners.

A CERTAIN king desirous to know what professors he had most of in his kingdom, one of his courtiers answered, "Physicians." "That is impossible," said the king ; but to make it good, the king, being disguised, he went along with him the next day amongst a multitude of people, and feigning himself not well, but troubled with such and so many diseases that he could not tell what to do without remedy, then everyone began to tell him what was good for such and such a disease, some one thing, some another : none heard his complaint but prescribed a remedy, and that he was a fool that was not then a physician. So it is now amongst us : he is nobody that is not a teacher—teaching cobblers, teaching tradesmen, teaching soldiers ; all teachers and preachers ; all got into the upper form when their place is in the lower ; they are up in the Mount with Moses when they should stand below with Aaron amongst the people ; they are teaching others when it is fit they should be taught themselves, their foolish heads, like over-seething pots, casting out the froth of their own shame.

Cassiani Collat.,
lib. ii.

Williams, Of the Church.

"Miser est qui docet antequam didicit."
—SIDON.,
Ep., lib. iv.

MCCCCXCIII.—Prosperity of the wicked not to be envied at.

WHEN a soldier was to die for taking a bunch of grapes against the general's command, and going to execution, he went eating his grapes ; one of his fellows rebuked him, saying, "What ! are you eating your grapes now ?" The poor man answers, "I prithee, friend, do not envy me these grapes, for they do cost me dear ;" so they did indeed, for they cost him his life. Thus, let no man envy the prosperity of the wicked, nor fret at the men of this world who live in pleasure and wallow in the sensual delights of this life ; they know no better, they seek after no better things. There is little cause why any man should grudge what they have, for they must give a sad account of what they have received, and pay dear at the last—even without God's preventing mercy, the loss of their immortal souls to all eternity.

Burrough's Moses Chieft., p. 99.

"Quid proderit arca plena," &c.—
AUG., de Verb. Dom.
Serm. xii.

MCCCCXCIV.—To be watchful in the performance of holy duties.

It is said of the cranes, that, roosting by the water-side, one of them is always upon the watch, with a stone in her claw, so that, upon the approach of their enemy, down falls the stone into the water, wherewith, being awakened, they take themselves to flight for further safety ; and that natural music-master, the nightingale, being to delight herself with her night songs, and fearing lest that by sleep she should endanger herself to birds of prey, sets

Ulyss. Aldrovand., Ornitholog., lib. i.

Flin., Nat. Hist.,
lib. x.

her breast against a thorn, to keep her waking. And thus must we be watchful over ourselves in all things, especially in the performance of holy duties, whether it be in prayer, when we speak unto God, or in hearing when God speaks unto us, or in sacramental actions, wherein God offereth Himself freely unto us, or when we be about to sing the songs of Zion; then it is that we must use all good means to keep us waking, because we are ever hand-while apt, through our sluggishness, to take a nap, and thereby to endanger our souls to those ravenous and hellish fowls who take their chief delight in the works of darkness, and are ready to seize upon us if they find us sleeping.

"Up te ipsum serves non expergisceris!"
—HORAT., Ep. vii.
Col. iv. 4.

MCCCCXCV.—Magistrates, ministers, &c., to be men of courage.

Suetonius, in Vita.

ELVIDIUS PRISCUS, being commanded by Vespasian, either not to come into the senate, or, being there, to speak nothing but what he directed, made answer, that, being a senator, it was fit he should go into the senate, and, being there, it was his duty to speak in his conscience what he thought to be true; and then, being threatened if he did so he should die, further added that he never as yet told him that he was immortal; "and therefore," said he, "do what you will, I will do what I ought; and as it is in your power to put me unjustly to death, so it is in my power to die resolvedly for the truth!" Here, now, was a brave-spirited heathen, fit for Christian imitation, for he can never be a faithful man who is afraid to speak his mind. Men of public employment for the people's good must, and ought to, stand up for the truth, to be men of courage, men of resolution, not fearing the frowns of any whatsoever; not echoing out the dictates of others, but freely speaking their own thoughts, without any fear at all.

"Reipub. causa te exponens et non cedens neque fugens," &c.—
AQUIN., de Regim.
Princip.

MCCCCXCVI.—To be temperate in meat and drink.

Dan. i. 8.

Matt. xi. 11.

Epist. ad Sullanum.
Epist. xxii. ad
Eustach.

Confessionum, lib. x.

1 Cor. ix. 27.

Parcus, in locum.

"Vina venusque nocent. Hoc ten-dumque humano in corpore monstrum est."—MANTUAN.

DANIEL was afraid of taking liberty to his flesh in eating the king's meat; mean was the provision of John the Baptist—his fare was locusts and wild honey—and yet there was not a greater born of a woman before him; a few loaves and a little bread was Basil's provision; and Jerome reports of Hilarion that he never did eat anything before the sun went down, and that which he did eat at any time was very mean; nay, Jerome himself lived very abstemiously with cold water and a few dried figs, for to eat anything so much as boiled was accounted luxury; and to make up the mess, St. Augustine hath such an expression concerning himself as this: "Hoc me docuisti, Domine, &c. (Thou, Lord, hast taught me this: that I should go to my meat as to a medicine)." He meant, as not to satisfy his appetite, but to repair nature. Thus, it hath been the care of all God's dearest servants to keep down their bodies, to club them down—so signifieth the word ὑποπιλάω (to deny contentment to the flesh)—not making the least provision for it; so that they have, in their several generations, become eminently instrumental to God's glory; whereas, they that cater only for their bellies have their brains sunk down into the quagmire of their bellies, so that their parts, those gifts of understanding they were wont to have, are as the light of a snuff, fallen down into the socket, even drowned with the filth of their intemperance, being fit for nothing.

MCCCCXCVII.—Consideration of the shortness of life to be a memento of death.

Olav Mag., Hist.
Septentrional.

It is reported of the birds of Norway, that they fly faster than the fowls of any other country, not because nature hath given more nimbleness or agility to their wings, but by an instinct; they, knowing the days in that climate to be very short, not above three hours long, do therefore make the more haste to their nests. Thus should every one of us do : and strange it is that we do not so. Shall birds make such use of their observation—know their appointed time ? Then let us practically, knowing the shortness of our lives, by a speedy and seasonable repentance, make haste to our home, the house appointed for all living.

"Vive memor quam sis ævi brevis."
Jer. viii. 7.
Job xxx. 23.

MCCCCXCVIII.—Practice of the law abused.

FERDINANDO, king of Spain, when he sent Pedrarias to be Governor of the Western Islands, forbade him to take any lawyer or advocate along with him : his reason was, that they might not sow the seed of suits where there were none before. And it was usually put on by King James, in a cautionary way, upon the convention of any parliament, that they should have a care of the wrangling lawyer, and another sort of peevish people, in a more especial manner ; not but that the laws are right, but the practice of them is much abused : God and men have made them righteous, but the lawyers have found out inventions. They are virgines in calamo (pure virgins as they were first penned), but meretrices in foro (prostituted whores as they are pleaded)—lawyers being now like the physicians in Christ's time, on whom the poor widow had spent all that she had, and was never the nearer to her health : so men may spend their money, and lose a great deal of precious time, in running after lawyers, and in the end be in a far worse case than they were at the beginning.

Rerum Ger. Scriptores

Willan's Conspiracy against Kings, God's Laughter & a Sermon at Court, 1627.

MCCCCXCIX.—Flesh and blood not to be hearkened unto.

It is reported of a young man who had devoted himself to a religious life, whereupon his parents, disliking that way, wrote divers letters unto him, to dissuade him ; but he, being resolved to go on, when any letters came afterwards directed to him, he would not so much as open them, but threw them into the fire. And thus it is that a man is no sooner entered into a trade of godliness, and shall give up his name unto Christ, but flesh and blood will be ready to come in and say, "Spare yourself : what need you to do thus and thus ? You may do well enough at last." This, now, is destructive counsel, pleasing damnation : hearken not to it, throw away these letters, these carnal suggestions ; do not by any means answer them, but be resolved in thine heart, and say, "I know in whom I have believed : I did not choose this way rashly ; but I felt the power of God upon my heart before I made my choice, and I had grounds and arguments for my so doing, and whatsoever can be suggested to the contrary I will not give ear unto it."

Cassiani Collata, lib. ii.

Burrough's Moses' Choice.

MD.—The benefit of meditation, as to the mollifying of the heart.

WAX, when it is laid in cold places, becomes so hard and stiff, that it will break rather than bow ; but being laid in the sun, becomes soft and pliable, fit for any impression. So, when we neglect the duty of meditation on good things, our hearts, being changed from God, wax hard and obdurate ; but when, by meditation, we draw nigh unto Him, the beams of his favour shining upon our hearts do make them soft and flexible, and fit for any holy impression that He shall be please to stamp upon them.

Downham's Guide to Godliness.

Ficinus, in Dionys. Areopagite, de Div. Nom.

MDI.—A good wish to good government.

PTOLEMY, king of Egypt, feasting on a day seven several ambassadors, requested each of them to name three of the best customs that they had in their several and respective commonwealths ; and first the Roman ambassador said : "We do greatly reverence our

Williams, Of the Church.

Valingeri Theatrum Hum. Vitæ.

temples, we do faithfully obey our governors, and we do severely punish all lewd livers;" secondly, the Carthaginian said, "With us the nobles are ever warring, the commons ever labouring, and the philosophers ever teaching;" thirdly, the Sicilian said, "With us justice is exactly kept, merchandise is truly exercised, and all men account themselves equal;" fourthly, the Rhodian said, "With us old men are honest, young men are shamefaced, and women are silent;" fifthly, the Athenian said, "With us rich men are not factious, poor men are not idle, governors are not ignorant;" sixthly, the Lacedemonian said, "With us envy reigneth not, for all men are equal; covetousness corrupteth not, for all goods are common; and sloth dwelleth not, for all that can, do labour;" and lastly, the Syconian said, "With us voyages are not permitted, lest they should bring home new fashions; physicians are not suffered, lest they should kill the sound; and orators are not entertained to maintain and plead causes, lest they should make the good evil and the evil good." Here, now, are governments of all sorts, and it is to be heartily wished that the civil magistrate, and such as are entrusted with the people's interests, would truly imitate what is good in any of them, that, when the Governor of all governors shall come to judgment, He may say unto them, "Euge, boni servi, &c. (Well done, ye good and faithful servants; enter into your Master's joy)."

"Gubernatio recta est cum sit gratia gubernati non gubernatoris."— MARSIL. FICINUS, in Plat. de Regno.

MDII.—The ways of godliness more comfortable than worldly men can imagine.

Burrough's Master's Choice.

PETER MARTYR, in his sermons on 1 Corinthians, hath a passage which occasioned the conversion of that noble marquis Galeacius Vico: "If so be," says he, "one should see a company of musicians that are playing and dancing, according to their art, upon some hill a great way off, he would think that they were a company of madmen out of their wits; but if he come nearer and nearer, and hear the melodious sound of the music, and observe their art in all they do, how the musicians keep their time and the dancers their measures, then he will be of another mind." And so men of the world look upon the ways of godliness as very uncomfortable, and upon the people of God as afar off, and think them madmen to take such strict courses; but if they would come nearer and observe their ways, and see the equity and reason and observe the excellency and beauty that is in them, they would soon be of other minds, and find, for certain, that the service of God is perfect freedom, and that His servants are the only merry people in the world.

"Cæcus non judicat de coloribus."

MDIII.—The necessity of Divine meditation.

*Downham's Guide
to Godliness.*

It is generally observed, that a man who casteth up his food after he hath eaten it may, by the virtue of some small relics that remain behind in the stomach, live for a good time in a weak estate and poor plight, but will never be fat, healthy, and strong, if the meat be not retained, concocted, and applied to the several parts. Thus, meditation is the food of our souls, or the very stomach and natural heat whereby it is digested. Well may our souls live a kind of spiritual life by hearing and reading the Word, yet, for want of meditation and thinking of it afterwards, they retain little of that spiritual food, but cast it up all again saving some small remainders, which, upon occasion, will come into their minds; yet, for all this, they cannot be in any good plight, or have any spiritual growth, unless they digest what they hear and read by meditation, and making it truly their own by applying it home to their own souls and consciences.

"Animæ viaticum est meditatio."— BERN., in Cant.

MDIV.—A wife to be a house-wife.

THE Grecians had a custom, that when the new-married wife was brought home to her husband's house, they burnt the axletree of the waggon before the doors, to show that she must now dwell there, and not depart thence; and the Romans had a custom, that when the bride came to the entry of her husband's house, the bridegroom took her by the wings of her gown, and lifted her so high, that she struck her head and the door-post together, and so set her within the doors, to teach her, by the remembrance of that blow, not to go often forth out of her husband's house; and the Egyptians did give no shoes unto their wives, but suffered them to go barefoot, because they should abide at home. Hence it is that a woman is compared to a snail, that never goes abroad but with her house upon her head; when her husband provides things necessary abroad, she must be careful to order them at home; not to be gadding abroad, but to keep at home, her greatest virtue being not to be known of any but her husband.

Rhodogin., Lect. Var.
Carolus Sigonius,
de Repub. Rom.

Plutarch, Moral.

"Uxor bona chara supellex."

MDV.—Few or no friends to be found in time of adversity.

As it is with the deer that is hunted, when the huntsman goes into the park, he rouses the whole herd, and they all run together; but, if one be shot, and they see the blood run down, they will soon push him out of their company. Or as a man, being in his travel upon the road, and there being a sun-dial set up in the way, if the sun shine, he will step out of his way to take notice of it, but if the sun do not shine, he will go by a hundred times and never regard it. So, let but the sun of prosperity shine upon a man, then who but he?—multos numerabit amicos (he shall have friends more than a good many); but if a cloudy day come and take away the sunshine, solus erit (he may easily number his acquaintance). And so, when a man goes on in the credit of the world, he shall be welcome into all companies, and much made of by every one; but if he come once to be shot, and disgrace put upon him, then he shall soon perceive a cloud in every man's face, no one so much as regarding him.

Burrough's Mores'
Choice.

"Nil tamen attuleris," &c.

MDVI.—Divine meditation, the beginnings thereof in the matter of practice very difficult.

"Doctrinæ radix amara, fructus verò dulcis," is a saying as old as true; children in all ages have found it so. What discouragements and difficulties have they ever found in their first entrance to learning; but, having made some progress therein—the nut being once cracked, and they tasting the sweetness of the kernel—go on with cheerfulness and delight through all difficulties whatsoever, and so in time become eminently instrumental in Church or commonweal. So the greatest difficulty is in the first beginnings of the exercise of divine meditation, it being a thing so harsh to corrupt nature, so repugnant to carnal principles, yet, for all that, use and practice will make it easy, familiar; besides, the sweetness that we shall find therein, and the benefit that we shall reap thereby, will make a rich return for all our pains and labour. The thought of tediousness will be taken away, so that we shall perform the work with alacrity of spirit here in this world, and be fitted for saints in that which is to come.

Downham's Guide
to Godliness.

"Ægrè quidem, sed faciamus tamen."

MDVII.—Men to bear with the infirmities of their wives.

KING TAXILES said unto Alexander, when he came to war against the Indians, Τί δέῃ πολέμων (φάναι) καὶ μάχης ἡμῖν, &c. (Why should we make war one against another? Neither of us want either food or raiment. If thou be less than I, receive benefits of me; and if thou art greater, I will take courtesies from thee)." Hereupon they were both friends. So, if our infirmities be more than our wives', why should we be grieved to bear with theirs, seeing they bear a great deal with us? If their infirmities be more than ours, why hath God made us the stronger, but to be the better able to bear the infirmities of a weaker vessel? If we bear with one another, patience healeth what offence wounded; but if the one be fire and the other flax, then nothing can follow but combustion, even the flames of contention and debate.

Plutarch, in Vita Alexandri.

MDVIII.—Piety, not promotion, that makes up a godly minister.

Laurent. Surius, in Vita.

It was the speech of Boniface, who was a martyr, one asking him whether it were lawful to give sacramental wine in a wooden cup, "Time was," said he, "when there were wooden chalices and golden priests, but now there are golden chalices and wooden priests." Thus it was of old. They thought then to gain men's devotion by outward pomp and bravery. Yet when wooden chalices came in, that things were carried in a lower way, the ministry lost nothing of its lustre: whereas many ministers think, if they should be poor and mean, every one would condemn their ministry; hence they fondly imagine that the way to have the ministry respected is to get great livings. But they are quite out: that will not do it; for it is piety, not promotion, that makes up a godly minister; and a poor godly man, who exerciseth his function conscionably, will gain more respect than any other dignitaries whatsoever.

MDIX.—Friendship tried in times of affliction.

Josephus Antiquit.
Jud., lib. xix.,
cap. 9.

1 Sam. xxii. 1.

"Amicus certus in re incerta," &c.,
Prov. xvii. 17.

It is reported of Herodias, wife to Herod the Tetrarch, when the emperor had deprived her husband of the tetrarchy, and banished him into France, understanding that Herodias was Agrippa's sister, gave her all her husband's estate, supposing that she would not go along with him; but she answered the emperor, saying, "There is a cause that hinders me from partaking the benefit of your bounty, the affection I bear to my husband, because I have shared with him in his felicity:" whereupon the emperor, being displeased with her answer, banished her likewise. Memorable is that, also, of David's brethren, and those of his father's house, who, when they heard of his being in the cave of Adullam, slighted the forfeiture of their goods, and, venturing the displeasure of Saul, went down to comfort him. And thus it is that true friendship is best tried in times of affliction and distress. A brother, a friend, a wife, is for the time of adversity. Away, then, with those summer birds, those false-hearted friends, who, like ditches, are full in the winter season but dry in the heat of summer, when we have most need of them.

MDX.—Natural wants and weaknesses not to be objected against the practice of divine meditation.

Downham's Guide
to Godliness.

"Sed contra audentior ito."

MEN who are sick and weakly in their bodies do not altogether abstain from food and physic, but rather use them, that they may recover their strength again; and though their appetite is small, yet they force themselves, that, by eating a little and a little, they may get a stomach. Shall a man who is dim-sighted shut the windows, because the house is dark? Shall he not rather open them to let in the light, that he may the better see to go about his business? And the colder a man feels himself, the more needful he thinks it to come to the fire and warm himself, or use some exercise, that so he may recover his natural heat. Thus, in like manner, the sight of our own natural wants and weaknesses is not a sufficient plea to bar us from the exercise of divine meditation, but rather incite us there-unto, it being an excellent means to clear up our sight, to enlighten our minds with more knowledge, to get spiritual health and strength, and to warm our cold and frozen hearts, that so, by God's assistance, we may perform service unto Him with more heat of godly zeal and fervour of devotion.

MDXI.—The greatest boasters the smallest doers.

ERASMUS, in his Adages, reports of a young man who had travelled many countries, and at last, returning home, began to praise himself in every company; and amongst his many other excellent feats that he had done, he said that, in the Isle of Rhodes, he out-jumped all the men who were there, and all the Rhodians could bear him witness of the same; whereupon a stander-by said, ἰδοὺ Ῥόδος, ἰδοὺ πῆδημα ("If thou sayest true, think this to be Rhodes, and jump here"). And then he could do just nothing, but hid his face for shame. Thus, as those sticks that send forth most smoke do afford least heat, so those men who are the greatest boasters are, for the most part, the least doers; according to our English proverb, "Great boast and small roast." Alas! what are words? Mere vanity, if not attended with deeds. Hence is that saying, "Loquere ut te videam (So speak that I may see you)." Make no more words but what may be demonstrated by deeds in the view of all men.

Hieron. Thryverus, in Hippocrat. Ast. rium.

"Minima possum qui plurimum tantum. —Therap.

MDXII.—God rewarding the least of good done to His people.

It is reported of Herod Agrippa—the same who was eaten up of worms—that being bound in chains and sent to prison by Tiberius, for wishing Caius in the empire, one Thaumastus, a servant of Caius, carrying a pitcher of water, met him; and Agrippa, being very thirsty, desired him to give him drink, which he willingly did; whereupon Agrippa said, "This service thou hast done in giving me drink shall do thee good another day." And he was as big as his word; for afterwards, when Caius was emperor, and Agrippa made king of Judea, he first got his liberty, then made him a chief officer of his household, and, after his decease, took order that he should continue in the same office with his son. How much more, then, shall Christ reward those who shall give to His distressed members but a cup of cold water—one of the least, readiest, and meanest refreshments that may be—in the midst of their afflictions? Shall not he who receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet have a prophet's reward? Yes, surely, they shall not be unrecompensed; when Christ shall appear in His glory, He will own them before men and angels.

Acts xii. 8. Josephus, ap. Anti. quitat. l. viii. cap. 8.

"Grave nimis est at ~~seem~~ 'abomin' illi fraudetur bonus," &c. Matt. x. 42.

MDXIII.—Want of matter not to be pretended against the practice of divine meditation.

Look but upon an earthly-minded man, and he will have matter enough to think and meditate upon in worldly things, if it were for a whole year together, building, as it were, castles in the air, busying himself about things that are not, or ever shall be; and herein they are such quick workmen, too, that they can both gather their straw and burn their brick in full tale. Strange, then, that any man should object the want of matter or barrenness of invention in the meditation of things spiritual; whereas, did he but resort to God's storehouses (like the Egyptians to Joseph's), did he but open the large volume of the creation, and unclasp the Book of Holy Scriptures, he might find abundant matter of meditation, besides the consideration of his own misery, his manifold sins and corruptions, wants and imperfections, God's great mercies and blessings, the administration of His Strong's Sermon, Westminster, 1652.

"Monstrat qualem herba Deum."

judgments, the workings of His providence, &c.; so that there is no want of good seed, no cause to complain of anything but the barrenness of heart and averseness to good things, if there be not bringing forth fruit in a plentiful manner.

MDXIV.—More comfortable to have a strong faith than a weak one.

Williams, Of the Church.

As two ships, sailing together, the one sound and well tackled, the other leaking and wanting sails, though both do arrive at the same port, yet not both alike disposed—the one comes in merrily and confidently, the other with much difficulty and doubting: so the strong in faith doth singingly walk towards heaven, goes on comfortably and with full assurance; when they of little faith do but, as it were, creep thither with many doubts, great fears, and small joy. And, therefore, as it is no wisdom for any man to continue poor that may be rich, or to live in fear when he may be free from it, so it is no point of wisdom, no piece of Christian prudence, for a man to content himself with a weak faith when by any means he may increase it.

MDXV.—Men to be forward in promoting the cause of God and religion.

Theodoret., Hist. Ecles., lib. iv., cap. 23.

Acts x., 26.

“Si perit ecclesiæ causa, periisse juvabit.”—PROSPER.

Phil. ii. 21.
Theophil. A uselm,
in loc.

FAMOUS is the story of one Terentius, a captain in the Emperor Valens' army, who, returning from Armenia with a great victory, the emperor bade him ask what he would; he only desired, as a recompense for all his service, that there might be granted a church to the orthodox in Antioch (where, to the honour of the place, Christ did, as it were, at first spread His glorious banner), that they might freely meet there, and publicly join together in the service of their God. The motion, he could not but know, must be exceedingly unwelcome to the emperor, because he was an Arian; and so it proved, for the emperor tore his petition and bade him ask something else: but Terentius gathered up the torn pieces of the paper, and said, “Hoc tantum desidero, &c. (This I ask as a reward of my service, and I will ask nothing else).” Here was a free-spirited man, a true Christian soldier, that summed up all his service for the public in a humble petition for the Church's good. “Dic mihi musa virum (Show me such another).” Do men improve their interest in great ones, and make such use of opportunities as may conduce to the good of God's cause and religion? They do not. It is too, too apparent that men are too much biassed, too much self-ended, seeking quæ sua, non quæ Christi (their own things, not the things of Jesus Christ), preferring their own private gain and worldly profit before the advancement of God's true religion.

MDXVI.—God's omnipresence, the consideration of it to be a restraint from sin.

Epist. xi.

Downham's Guide to Godliness.

“Datus totus oculus est,” &c.—AUG., in Pt. cxx.

It is the persuasion of Seneca to his friend Lucilius, for the better keeping of himself within compass of his duty, to imagine that some great man, some strict, quick-sighted, clear-brained man, such as Cato or Lælius, did still look upon him, and, being come to more perfection, would have him to fear no man's presence more than his own, nor any man's testimony above that of his own conscience; and adds this reason, because he might flee from another, but not from himself, and escape another's censure, but not the censure of his own conscience. Thus, did but men set God before their eyes, and always remember that His eyes are upon them, it would be a notable bridle to pull them back and to hold them up when they are ready to fall into any sin; it would make them to watch over themselves, that they did not do any wickedness in His sight, who is greater than their consciences, and so upright in His judgments, that, though conscience may be silenced for a time, and give no evidence, or be a false witness to the truth, yet it is impossible to escape His sentence, either by flight or any appeal whatsoever.

MDXVII.—The Holy Scriptures to be valued above all other writings.

JOSEPHUS, in his Book of the Antiquities of the Jews, maketh mention of one Cumanus, a governor of Judea, that, though he were but a heathen and a wicked man, yet he caused a soldier to be beheaded for tearing a copy of the Book of Moses' Law, which he found at the sacking of a town. And venerable in all ages, and among all nations, have been the books that contained the laws either of their belief or polity : as the Jews their Talmud ; the Romans, the Laws of the Twelve Tables ; the Turks, their Alcoran ; and all Pagans, the laws of their legislators. And shall not Christians have, then, a high esteem of the Holy Scriptures, and deem them (as the good old Christians did) to be the mirror of Divine grace and man's misery, the touchstone of truth, the shop of remedies against all evil, the hammer of heretics, the treasury of virtue, the displayer of vanities, the balance of equity, and the most perfect rule of all truth and honesty.

Lib. xx., cap. 4.

Holdsworth's Serm.,
1632.

"Schola ecclesiæ, eruditio vitalis," &c.—CASSIODOR.,
in Ps. cxv.

MDXVIII.—Men to be forward in frequenting the ordinances of God.

IT is a note of Mr. Calvin's upon that text, "Seek ye My face," that superstitious people will go on pilgrimage to the image of such a lady or such a saint, or to visit the monument of the sepulchre at Jerusalem, and they will go over mountains and through strange countries, and, though they be used hardly and lose much of their estates, sometimes in perils of false brethren, other times in the hands of Arabian robbers, they satisfy themselves in this, "I have that I came for." Alas ! what came they for ? The sight of a dumb idol, a mere nothing. If they, then, will endure such hardship for the sight of a mere empty shadow, how much pains should we take to see God in His ordinances ! What though the way to Zion lie through the valley of Baca ; surely, when God moves the hearts of men to join with His people, a little difficulty cannot hinder them : they will be content to go through the valley of tears, so as they may appear before God in Zion ; they will go through thick and thin, rather than not go to Church at all. And thus, as it is prophesied of the Church of God, that she should be called "Sought out"—i. e., sought unto, or sought after—it is heartily to be wished that it might be so, a place had in high estimation and regard, which, out of respect and devotion, men would repair and resort unto, encouraging others also so to do, saying, "Come, let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, that our hearts may be refreshed with the consolations of our God, in the way of His ordinances."

Ps. xxvii. 8.
Burrough's Moses Cholera.

Ps. lxxxiv. 6.
"Per ardua virtus."

Isa. lxi. 12.
Note Diversi,
Minister, in locum.

MDXIX.—Experimental knowledge the only knowledge.

IT is well known that the great doctors of the world, by much reading and speculation, attain unto a great height of knowledge, but seldom to sound wisdom ; which hath given way to that common proverb, "The greatest clerks are not always the wisest men." It is not studying of politics that will make a man a wise councillor of state till his knowledge is joined with experience, which teacheth where the rules of state hold and where they fail. It is not book knowledge that will make a good general, a skilful pilot—no, not so much as a cunning artisan—till that knowledge is perfected by practice and experience. And so, surely, though a man abound never so much in literal knowledge, it will be far from making him a good Christian, unless he bring precepts into practice and, by feeling experience, apply that he knows to his own use and spiritual advantage.

Shute's Serm.,
Lond., 1629.

"Experientia do-cet."

MDXX.—The Church of the Gospel, its amplitude above that under the law.

Leigh, Crit. Sacra,
in loc.
Luke x. 34.
Acts x. 11.
Matt. xiii. 47.
Esther i. 3.

THE Samaritan's Inn was called πανδοχεῖον, because it gave entertainment to all strangers. In St. Peter's sheet were all sorts of creatures, four-footed beasts, and creeping things. The net mentioned in St. Matthew's Gospel caught all kind of fish. Ahasuerus's feast welcomed all comers. Such is the Church of the Gospel in its amplitude. The prophetic Gospel was hedged in and limited within the pale of Palestine, but the apostolical Gospel is spread over the face of the whole earth. Then it was lux modii (a light under a bushel), now lux mundi (the light of the world). Then the prophets sang, "In Judæa notus est Deus (In Judah is God known, His name is great in Israel)!" but now we sing, "Laudate Dominum, omnes gentes (Praise the Lord, all ye nations)!" Then the name of Christ was an ointment kept close in a box, but now it is an ointment poured out. And, lastly, then the Church was a garden enclosed, a fountain sealed up; but now it is a springing well, that overflows the world to renew it, as Noah's flood did to destroy it.

Stiles' Serm., Lond., 1627.
Ps. lxxv. 1.
Ps. cxvii.

MDXXI.—The company of wicked men to be avoided.

Burrough's Motes
Christ.

Ps. xxvi. 9.

It was once the prayer of a good gentlewoman, when she was to die, being in much trouble of conscience, "O Lord! let me not go to hell, where the wicked are, for, Lord, Thou knowest I never loved their company here." The same in effect, though not in the same words, was that of holy David: "Lord, gather not my soul with sinners!" Thus, if men would not have their souls gathered with wicked men hereafter, they must take heed of joining with them here. Can God take it well at any man's hands to go and shake hands with His enemies? God Himself will not so much as reach out His hand to the wicked; why, then, should any of us do so? Can we be in any place where we see God dishonoured, and sit still, as though not concerned therein? Certainly, the sight of sin, whensoever, wheresoever, or by whomsoever it is committed, should cause horror in the soul; it should make us forbear coming into such wretched company.

Biblia Vulgat, Edit.
Job viii. 20.

Ps. cxix. 53.

MDXXII.—Time mis-spent to be carefully redeemed.

Downham's Guide
to Gadliness.

"Validis incumbere
remis.

"Plus vigila semper," &c.

Heb. iv. 1.

It is observable that when men have mis-spent their youth in riotous living, neglected all means of thriving, and prodigally wasted their estates, but coming to riper years, and being beaten with the rod of their own experience, in the sight of their folly, do not only desist from their former lewd courses, but are sorry and ashamed of them, and set themselves with so much the more care and diligence to recover and repair their decayed estates, and with the greater earnestness use all good means of thriving. And he who, being to travel about important business nearly concerning his life and estate, if he have overslept himself in the morning, or trifled out his time about things of no worth, when he sees his error and folly, he makes the more haste all the day following, that he may not be benighted, and so, coming short of his journey, be frustrate of his hopes. And thus must every good Christian do, labouring with so much the more earnestness after the spiritual riches of grace and assurance of his heavenly hope by how much the longer he hath neglected the spiritual thrift, and travelling so much the more speedily in the ways of God by how much the longer he hath deferred his journey and loitered by the way; fearing, as the apostle speaketh, lest, a promise being left of entering into God's rest, he come short of it.

MDXXIII.—Sacrilege, the heavy judgments of God depending thereon.

POMPEY THE GREAT, who is noted by Titus Livius and Cicero to be one of the most fortunate soldiers in the world, yet, after he had abused and robbed the Temple of Jerusalem, he never prospered, but, velut unda supervenit undam (as one wave followeth another), so ill successes succeeded to him, one on the neck of another, till at last he made an end of an unhappy life by a miserable death. Many more examples of the like nature are recorded to posterity—to what purpose? To forewarn them of the heavy judgments that depend upon all sacrilegers; that as the ark of God could find no resting-place amongst the Philistines, but was removed from Ashdod to Gath, from Gath to Ekron, and so from place to place, till it came to its own proper place, so shall it be with the goods of God's Church, of what nature soever, being wrung out of the Church's hands by violence. "Quæ malignè contraxit pater, pejori fluxu refundet hæres (That which the father hath so wickedly scraped together, the son shall more wickedly scatter abroad);" and so it shall pass and repass from one to another, until it be far enough from him and his for whom it was collected; so that the outside of all his goodly purchase will be the judgment of God against himself, and the curse of God to remain upon his posterity.

Josephus, Antiquit., lib. xiv., cap. 8.

"A sacris abstinendæ manus."

Pet. Blessens., Ep. x.

MDXXIV.—Nothing but eternity will satisfy the gracious soul.

WHEN there were several attempts made upon Luther to draw him back again to the Romish side, one proposed a sum of money to be offered unto him. "No, that will not do," says another; "illa bestia Germanica non curat argentum, &c. (that German beast cares not for money, nor any temporal thing whatsoever)." And so they ceased any further tampering that way. Such was the Christian resolution of those forty martyrs under the persecution of Licinius, the emperor, anno 300, that when Agricolaus, his chief governor, and one of the devil's prime agents, set upon them by several ways to renounce Christ, and at last tempted them with money and preferments, they all cried out, with one consent, ὦ αἰδιότης, ὦ αἰδιότης, χρήματα δίδως τὰ ἀπομένοντα, &c. ("O eternity, eternity! Give money that may last for ever, and glory that may never fade away"). Nothing but Jesus Christ and Him crucified will serve St. Paul's turn. And thus it is that nothing but eternity will satisfy the gracious soul. Let all the world, the things of heaven and earth, present themselves to the soul, by way of satisfaction, it will say, "What are ye, temporal or eternal?" If temporal, away with them! But if they bring eternity along with them, if the inscription of eternity be set on them, then it closes with them, and is satisfied in the sweet enjoyment of them.

Melch. Adamus, in Vita.

Basil., Magn. Hom. in Forty Martyres.

1 Cor. ii. 2.

MDXXV.—The Ranters' religion.

It is reported of the Lindians, a people in the Isle of Rhodes, who, using (accustomed) to offer their sacrifices with curses and execrable maledictions, thought their unholy holy rites were profaned if that, in all the time of the solemnity, vel imprudenti alicui exciderit verbum bonum (any one of them at unawares should have cast out or let fall one good word). Such is the irreligious religion and desperate carriage of a wretched crew called Ranters, whose mouths are filled with cursing and blasphemous speeches, in such a horrid and confused manner, that, if Pythagoras's μετεμψύχωσις were to be credited, a man would think Rabbshakeh's soul had been transported into their bodies, their dialect being alike devilish, their language semblable (resembling).

Herodotus, Strabo.

Lactant., de Vero Dei Cultu.

"Atque Deos atque astra vocant crudelia," &c.—VIRGIL:

MDXXVI.—Flatterers to be avoided.

Trog. Pchlp., Hist.

WHEN Xerxes, with his multitudinous army, marched towards Greece, and asked of his friends what they feared most, one said, that when the Greeks heard of his coming, they would fly away before he could come near them; another said, he feared the air had not room enough for the arrows of his army; another feared all Greece was not sufficient to quarter his soldiers in; and then Damascerus, the philosopher, said, he feared that all those parasites would deceive him. And no wonder, for many men have been eaten up and cheated out of their whole estates by such dissembling and devouring caterpillars; adulationis unctio est domorum enunctio (the oil of flattery hath soaked up many a good family). "Plus nocet lingua adulatoris quàm gladius persecutoris (A flatterer's tongue doth more mischief than a persecutor's sword)," saith another; so that better it were for men to live eis kópakas (among ravens) than eis kólakas (among flatterers); for ravens feed only upon dead carcases, and flatterers feast upon living men: they are therefore to be banished from our ears, or, at the least, no ways trusted, and by no means countenanced; which if they be, it is to be feared that they will not only deceive us, but also destroy us, and mislead from the ways of goodness.

St. Aug., in Ps. xcvi.

Diog. Laert., in Vita Diag. Cyn.

"Adulatores sunt hostes et scintille diaboli."—JER., in Prov. i, Prov. xxvi. 28.

MDXXVII.—The vanity of temporal things compared with those eternal.

Can. in 2 Reg., cap. xv., q. 20, et in cap. xvii., q. 21.

ABULENSIS, setting out the vanity of all worldly excellency, observes, that those who have been the most glorious in what man accounts excellent have had inglorious ends, whereby their splendour hath been much eclipsed: as in Samson, for strength—and what a contemptible end had he?—Absalom for beauty, Ahithophel for policy, Asahel for swiftness, Alexander the Great for conquests, yet poisoned in the end; and he instanceth also in kingdoms, as that of the Assyrian, the Chaldean, Persian, Grecian, and Roman, how soon were they gone. He might have added commonwealths; for be they never so well settled, they must have their ending too—

"Crowns have their periods, length of days their date, Triumphs their tombs, felicity its fate."

Burrough's Muses' Choice.

"Sic parvis est componeremagnas," &c.

Such, then, is the vanity of all temporal things, compared with those eternal; the beauty of all worldly things being but a fair picture drawn upon the ice, that melts away from it. The fashion of this world passeth away; and did but worldly men consider what is become of all those that have had as great dealings and as many merry-meetings as they, and have indulged the flesh as much as they, that they are gone, rotten in their graves, and their souls, it may be, crying under the wrath of an infinite God, and all their bravery and delights at an end, they would then leave doting on the world, and fix their hearts upon things that shall make for their eternal and everlasting good.

MDXXVIII.—Ceremonies of the Church not to be any cause of separation.

Barlow's Defence of Art. of Relig.

PLINY, in his Natural History, reporteth of hedgehogs, that having been abroad to provide their store, and returning home laden with nuts and fruit, if the least filbert fall but off, they will, in a pettish humour, fling down all the rest, and beat the ground for very anger with their bristles. And such is the peevish fancy of many straight-laced Christians amongst us, such as in themselves are bells of passing good metal, and tunable enough, though by the artifice of some rung miserably out of tune, that will leave our Church, and remain obstinate for trifles and accidents, ceremonies, things in themselves adiaphorous, indifferent and harmless—that fire hath tried them to be but stubble and straw controversies, easy to be moderated, if malice and prejudice make not men irreconcilable.

Land's Ep. Ded. in Reply to Ether.

1 Cor. iii. 13.

MDXXIX.—The tongue, for the most part, a mischievous member.

Æsop being sent by his master to buy all the best meat he could get in the market, bought all tongues; and being sent again to buy all the worst, he bought all tongues again: being demanded why he did so, he answered, that no flesh was better than a good tongue, nor any worse than a bad tongue. And most true it is, as Bias told Amasis, king of Egypt, the tongue is the best and worst member of the body—for the most part an unruly mischievous member, lambit et lædit (a killing and destroying member), a dangerous weapon, and the worst of all other weapons. The stroke of a sword may be borne off, the shot of an arrow may be shunned, or, if not, the wounds may be healed; but there is no way to escape a poisoned tongue, no salve to cure it: hence it is well observed, that a word and a pest grow upon the same root in Hebrew, signifying, that the plague and an ill tongue go together.

In Vita Æsop.

Plutarch.

"Lingua mali pars pessima servi."—JUVENAL.

Saintes Pagine] Thes. Ling. Sancta.

MDXXX.—In the midst of worldly enjoyments to mind eternity.

THERE is a notable story of one Theodorus, a Christian young man, in Egypt, who, when there was a great deal of feasting, with music, in his father's house, withdrew himself from all the company, and, being got alone, thus thought with himself: "Here is content and delight enough for the flesh! I may have what I desire, but how long will this last? This will not hold out long;" then, falling upon his knees to God in prayer, "O Lord!" says he, "my heart is open unto Thee! I indeed know not what to ask, but only this: Lord, let me not die eternally! O Lord, Thou knowest I love Thee! oh, let me live eternally to praise Thee!" and then, when his mother came to him, and would have had him come in to the rest of the company, he made an excuse and would not, only upon this meditation, because he saw this could not hold out long. And thus it is heartily to be wished, that the sons of men, when they find their hearts beginning to be let out upon any temporal good, when they are in the midst of all their worldly delights and pleasures, would think upon eternity, and reason with themselves thus: "I am now in the midst of all temporal enjoyments, but will they hold out? I was made to abide for ever—I was made for that God who must abide for ever.—What are a few hours here? If years, they are nothing to eternity. Those that abide longest in the fruition of health and prosperity, their time is but a bubble; they are gone, and the memory of them is perished." Xenophilus, in Pliny, lived a hundred and five years without any sickness, but what is that to eternity?

Burroughs's Ab. 17
Choice.

"Sursum corda."

Lib. vii., cap. 5.

MDXXXI.—Popery, a mere heap of confusion.

It is said of the nabis, a beast in Egypt so called, that it hath the shape of several beasts; and of Hannibal's army, that it consisted ex colluvie omnium gentium (of the very scum of all nations). Thus, the whole body of Popery is nought else but a very amassed lump of pagan rites and old heretical dregs, as in their purgatory, idolatry, sacrifice for the dead, holy water, free-will, challenge of the Church, merit of works, renouncing of Scriptures, &c.; so that, as Josephus said of Apion's writings, that they were ψεύσματα συγκεκτλκα, a mere dunghill of shameless untruths rather than orthodox verities—a mere heap of trash and trumpery.

Plin., Nat. Hist.,
lib. vii., cap. 18.

Lib. I.

MDXXXII.—Children to have a care how they marry without consent of parents.

TERTULLIAN, the African father, writing to his wife concerning marriage, closeth all with a piece of admiration: "Unde sufficiam ad enarrandam felicitatem ejus matrimonii, quod Ecclesia conciliat, confirmat oblatio," &c. (Oh, how shall I be able sufficiently to describe the happy

Williams, Of the Church.

Gen. xxiv. 38.
Judges xiv.

Bosqueti Tabula
Naufragii.

state of that couple whom the Church hath joined, prayer and thanksgiving have confirmed, angels in heaven proclaimed, and the parents on earth approved) !” Such were those of Rebekah and the woman of Timnath—the one for Isaac, the other for Samson—though both appointed by God, yet consented thereunto by parents on all sides; but, on the other side, oh, how miserable is the state of that pair which, by contemning the advice and consent of their parents, do so highly offend God that they can expect no blessing from God till, with weeping tears, they have sued unto God for pardon, and by all possible means of submission and humiliation, which is the best plank after shipwreck, sought to be reconciled to their parents, and labour in what they can to make a compensation for their former disobedience, with a care of conscionable walking before them.

MDXXXIII.—Afflictions of this life, the comfortable use that is to be made of them.

Fluctuat in Mari Chlor.

“Dabit Deus his quoque finem.”—
VIRGIL, Æn. i.

A SHIP, after a long voyage, being come into harbour, springs a leak : the master is somewhat troubled at it, and is never at quiet till it be stopped, so that it is an evil to him ; yet he comforts himself in this, that it did not happen unto him when he was out at sea : that had been a great deal worse, and might have proved the ruin of them all. And thus it is for troubles and sorrows ; there is a comfortable use to be made of them : so long as they happen to us in this life, we may say they are upon us ; but, blessed be God, they are upon us here in this world, so that by a sanctified use to be made of them, they shall never be eternally upon us in the world to come. Hence is that prayer of St. Augustine, and of all good men, in his words : “Domine, hic ure, hic seca, ut in æternum parcas (Here, Lord, do what Thou wilt with me, but spare me hereafter) ;” and that of Fulgentius, “Da, Domine, patientiam hic, &c. (Give patience here, Lord, and pardon hereafter ! Whatsoever my grievances are here upon earth, let me rejoice with Thee in heaven).”

MDXXXIV.—Constancy of holy duties makes the performance of them easy.

Downham's Guide
to Godliness.

“Usus promptos facit.”

It is easy to keep that armour bright which is daily used ; but hanging by the walls till it be rusty, it will ask some time and pains to furbish it over again. If an instrument be daily played upon it is easily kept in tune ; but let it be but awhile neglected, and cast in a corner, the strings and frets break, the bridge flies off, and no small labour is required to bring it into order again. And thus, also, it is in things spiritual, in the performance of holy duties : if we continue them with a settled constancy they will be easy, familiar, and delightful to us ; but if once broken off and intermitted, it is a new work to begin again, and will not be reduced to the former estate but with much endeavour and great difficulty.

MDXXXV.—Men to be provident Christians.

Shute's Serm.,
London, 1627.

1 Kings iv. 26.

Prov. xvii. 3.

It is said that, in the days of Solomon, Judah and Israel dwelt safely, every man under his vine and under his fig-tree, from Dan even to Beersheba—i. e., from one end of the country to the other ; but then, at the very next verse following, it is said, “And Solomon had forty thousand stalls of horses for his chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen.” What ! peace and plenty, horses and horsemen ? Quam male conveniunt ? (How can they stand together) ?” Very well. No doubt but this was one of the greatest points of Solomon's wisdom, to foresee a danger and shun it ; in times of peace to provide for war. And thus it must be the care of all good Christians to be provident Christians : with Joseph, in times of plenty to lay up for times of dearth; now, in the strength of youth, to provide for the weakness of age; now, in the time of Gospel light and knowledge, to be stocked and store with graces and Gospel promises, to live upon in worse times. Gen. xli. 49.

MDXXXVI.—Hell-torments, the eternity of them to be considered.

It is reported of a voluptuous young man, who could not endure to be crossed in his ways—and of all things he could not bear to be kept awake in the dark—but it so happened, that being sick, he was kept awake in the night, and could not sleep at all; whereupon he had these thoughts: "What! is it so tedious, then, to be kept from sleep one night, and to lie a few hours in the dark? Oh, what is it, then, to be in torments and everlasting darkness! I am here in my own house upon a soft bed in the dark, kept from sleep but one night; but to lie in flames and endless misery, how dreadful must that needs be!" These and such like meditations were the happy means of that young man's conversion; and, by the blessing of God, may be the like unto divers others, when they shall consider the eternity of hell-torments, that they are everlasting, for ever and ever—a fatal, soul-wounding expression—when there shall be a suffering of as many years as there be sands on the sea-shore and stars in the firmament for their number, yet no comfort at all. Oh, this eternity of torments is the hell of hell! In the curse of Adam there was a donec reverteris, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat thy bread, until thou return," &c.; there is no donec (no time limited), no bounds set to the torments of the damned in hell—they are for evermore.

Drexel, Conid. de Æternitate.

"Mors ibi semper incipit et deficere nescit."—Græg. Moral. in Matr.

MDXXXVII.—Christian perfection to be attained by degrees.

METEORS, soon after their first appearing, make the greatest show; a fire of thorns, as soon as it is kindled, gives the fairest blaze, and makes the most noise and crackling, and both of them decrease little by little, till they disappear; whereas the morning light shineth more and more unto the perfect day. Mushrooms come to their perfection in one night's growth, but trees of righteousness, of God's right planting, are still in growth, and bring forth most fruit in old age. Summer fruits are soon ripe and soon rotten, but winter fruits last longer. Infants in the womb that make more haste than good speed prove abortive, whereas those that stay their time come to their growth by degrees. And thus it is that we must think to aspire unto perfection, but in a gradual way; not imagine that we can the first day, and in the beginning of our first conversion, attain unto it; for, as nemo repente fit pessimus (no man is made the worst at the first), so nemo repente fit optimus (no man is made the best all at once); which made a good old Christian cry out, "Nolo repente fieri summus, &c. (I would not upon the sudden attain to my highest pitch, but grow towards it by little and little)." "Nondum apprehendi, &c. (I have not yet attained, but I press hard forward)," &c., says the blessed doctor of the Gentiles; and so must we, from knowledge to knowledge, from virtue to virtue, from faith to faith, from one degree of grace to another, unto a perfect man, and unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ.

Whitaker's Serm. Westm., 1650.

Prov. iv. 18.

Ps. xcii. 14.

St. Bernard, in Cant.

Phil. iii. 14.

"Festina lente." Eph. iv. 13.

MDXXXVIII.—The liar's reward and punishment.

ÆSOP tells us a tale how a town shepherd ran to the village, where he dwelt, twice or thrice, and told the people the wolves came and were devouring their sheep; but when they came out to rescue their cattle, they saw there was no such matter: at last, the wolves came indeed, and the shepherd ran into the town, as before, crying out that his sheep were all at the mercy of the cruel wolves; but the people, being formerly deceived by this lying shepherd, would not believe him, nor step one foot out of doors to save their goods, until they were all destroyed by the savage beasts. His accustomed lies made them so diffident to believe the truth, that they were all undone by the bargain. And such is the reward of all liars, that they shall not be believed when they speak the truth : as Demetrius Phalerius, being asked what was the fruit and reward of lying, answered, "Quod ne vera quidem dicentibus, deinceps, fides adhibeatur," that after a man is known to be a liar, everything is questioned that he speaks ; let him have never so much gold in his chest, his words are but brass, and pass for nothing—yea, he is no better than a dumb man in effect : for it is all one whether one cannot speak, or cannot be believed when they do speak.

Aristotle, apud
Dig. Laert., lib. v.

MDXXXIX.—In all our doings, to think upon eternity.

Barrough's Muses'
Choice.

In Vita ejus, per
anonym.

Jerome, in Drexelli
Considerat. de Æternitate.

AMONGST many other rites and ceremonies of older times in the consecration of bishops, they had this speech made unto them, "Habeatis æternitatem in omnibus cogitationibus vestris (Have eternity in all your thoughts) ;" whether it were so, penes sit authorem ; but certain it is that, at the decollation of the late Archbishop of Canterbury, January 10, 1644, there stood on either side, as he was to pass, a generation of people that echoed out unto him the like saying, "Remember eternity!"—a sweet breath, had it not come from corrupt lungs ; a good memento, had it proceeded from sanctified hearts ; but it is much to be feared that they spake rather ex livore malitiæ, quàm ex zelo justitiæ (rather out of malice than love to his soul), being not silent many days after in quarrelling his salvation. However, there is a right, good, and godly use to be made of the thoughts of eternity ; so precious are they, that if men would but spend one quarter of an hour of every day therein, thus thinking with themselves, "This body of mine, though frail and mortal, yet must live for ever ; and this soul of mine must live eternally ; it is too, too much time that I have spent in seeking after contentment for the flesh ; but what have I done for my soul ? what for eternity ?"—it cannot be imagined what good such thoughts would do, for, without all doubt, there are many blessed souls now in heaven praising and magnifying God that they were so well employed, and too many, in the neglect thereof, howling in hell for ever.

MDXL.—Gluttony reprov'd.

Lib. ii., cap. i.

Hist. Animal., lib.
ix., cap. 17.

Ulyss. Aldrovandus,
de Piscibus.

Phil. iii. 19.

Lib. de Jejunio.

"O prodigia rerum, luxuries."—LUC.

CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS, in his book called Pædagogus, maketh mention of the sea-ass, and, citing Aristotle for his author, saith, that amongst all other living and sensible creatures, this only hath his heart in his belly, whom Epicharmus, an ancient poet, termeth ἐκτραπέλογαστωρ, such a one as varies from the ordinary course of nature. And such are all they that do indulgere genio (pamper themselves), quorum animi in patinis (who mind nothing but their guts), and are so given over to their carnal appetite, that they take more pains to satisfy it than to please God ; ὧν ὁ Θεὸς ἡ κοιλία (whose belly is their God), and, as Tertullian sets them out, their stomach is their altar, their belly is their God, their priest is their cook, their Holy Ghost is the smell of their meat, the graces of the Spirit are their sauces, the kitchen is their church, &c. : thus, being transformed from men to beasts, they are led more by their sense and appetite than by reason and religion, and have their gluttonous paunch the chief seat of their souls, not their hearts, where it should be.

MDXLI.—Innovations in Church or state very dangerous.

Williams, Of the Church.

AMONGST the Locrians there was a statute of that strictness, that, whosoever desired to bring in a new law, he should come and declare it publicly in the market-place before the people, with a halter about his neck, that, if his law was not thought meet to be enacted for the good of the commonwealth, he might presently be hanged for his desire of innovation. And good reason too; for it is very dangerous to innovate anything, either in Church or commonwealth: not but that it is in the power of supreme authority to change and correct such laws as shall seem fit to be changed for the good of the people; yet, according to the strict rules of policy, that is not to be done neither but upon pure necessity, what apparent profit soever may be pretended to the contrary.

MDXLII.—To be careful how we come under the evil of a reviling tongue.

DAVID, upon sad experience, compareth a wicked, reviling tongue to three fatal weapons, a razor, a sword, and an arrow:—to a razor, such a one as will take off every little hair: so a reviling tongue will not only take advantage of every gross sin committed by others, but those peccadilloes, the least infirmities, which others better qualified cannot so much as discern; secondly, to a sword that wounds: so the tongues of reproaching men cut deeply into the credits and reputations of their brethren—but a sword doth mischief only near hand, not afar off; and, therefore, it is in the third place compared to an arrow, that can hit at a distance: and so revilers do not ill offices to those only in the parish or town where they live, but to others far remote. How much, then, doth it concern every man to walk circumspectly; to give no just cause of reproach, not to make himself a scorn to the fools of the world; but, if they will reproach (as certainly they will), let it be for forwardness in God's ways, and not for sin, that so the reproach may fall upon their own heads and their scandalous language into their own throats.

Burrough's Moses' Choice,
Ps. lli. 2.

Ps. lvii. 4.

Ps. lxiv. 3.

"Plena victoria est acclamatione ta-cere," &c.—VAL.
EPISCOP., in Serm.

MDXLIII.—Correction of children and servants, how to be moderated.

ST. JEROME, writing to Celantia, a worthy matron, amongst much other good counsel that he there gives her, thus adviseth: "Familiam tuam ita rege et confove, &c. (that she should so govern her family and cherish it, as that she should rather seem their mother than their mistress, and draw from them reverence rather by loving benignity than rigorous severity);" and he adds this reason, for that obedience is always more faithful and acceptable which floweth from love than that which is extorted by fear. Thus, in the correction of children and servants, if there be no other help, justice must be observed: first, that there is a fault committed, and that the fault so committed deserveth punishment, and that the punishment do not exceed the quality of the fault, which will otherwise seem to rage and revenge, rather than to chastise for amendment.

Ep. de Institutione Matris-Familias.

"Cuncta prius tentanda," &c.—OVID.

"Sed parcius utere
loris," OVID, Met.,
lib. ii.

MDXLIV.—Christians not to revile and reproach one another.

It is a notable speech of one Nemon, who was a general of the Persian army, that, when he was fighting against Alexander, one of his soldiers ran upon Alexander's face with much ill language and many opprobrious terms; the general, hearing of it, smote him on the face, saying, "I did not hire thee to reproach Alexander, but to fight against him." Thus, if a heathen could not endure to hear that his enemy should be reproached, how much less will God bear it to have His children reproaching one another? It was, therefore, a brave speech of Calvin, "Etiamsi Lutherus vocet me Diabolum, &c. (Although Luther call me Devil, yet I will honour him as a dear servant of Jesus Christ)." And so, though those that are our brethren do cast reproach upon us, we should honour the grace of God in them, and not cast reproach upon them again. It is more than enough that the briars and thorns of the wilderness, such as are without, do tear the flesh and rend the good names of Christians; let not them do it, then, one unto another.

Plutarch, in Vita
Alexandri.

Melch. Adamus, in Vita.

MDXLV.—A child of God bettered by afflictions.

Clark's Prof. in Martyrlogy.

"Dolor hic tibi pro-derit olim."
OVID, Amer., iii.

STARS shine brightest in the darkest night ; torches are better for the beating ; grapes come not to the press till they come to the press ; spices smell sweetest when pounded : young trees root the faster for shaking ; vines are the better for bleeding : gold looks the brighter for scouring ; glow-worms glisten best in the dark ; juniper smells sweetest in the fire ; pomander becomes most fragrant for chafing ; the palm-tree proves the better for pressing ; camomile, the more you tread it, the more you spread it. Such is the condition of all God's children : they are then most triumphant, when most tempted ; most glorious, when most afflicted ; most in the favour of God, when least in man's ; as their conflicts, so their conquests ; as their tribulations, so their triumphs—true salamanders, that live best in the furnace of persecution. So that heavy afflictions are the best benefactors to heavenly affections ; and where afflictions hang heaviest, corruptions hang loosest ; and grace that is hid in nature, as sweet water in rose-leaves, is then most fragrant when the fire of affliction is put under to distil it out.

MDXLVI.—The great benefit of repentant tears.

Jul. Solinus.

2 Kings v. 14.

St. Ambrose, in Luc., lib. xix.

"Lachrymæ pondera vocis habent."
—OVID, de Ponto,
lib. iii.

It is reported of a river in Sicily, wherein, if black sheep be but bathed, their wool immediately will turn white ; and it is well known that the waters of Jordan cleansed the leprosy of Naaman, the Syrian. So, whosoever he be that bathes himself in the pure fountain of repentant tears shall be purged from all the filthiness of sin ; though it be as "red as scarlet, yet it shall be made as white as wool." And the reason is given by St. Ambrose : "Quia lacrymæ tacite quædam preces sunt, non postulant, sed merentur, non causam dicunt sed consequuntur (Our tears are a kind of silent prayers, which, though they say nothing, yet they obtain pardon, and though they plead not a man's cause, yet they procure mercy from God's hands) ;" as we find in St. Peter : "Non legitur quid dixerit, &c. (He said nothing, that we can read of, but wept bitterly, and obtained mercy)."

MDXLVII.—How to bear the reproaches of men.

Marsil. Ficinus, in Vita Platoni.

"Nihil utilius quàm tacite provocari."
&c.—VAL. EPISC.,
in Serm.

DIONYSIUS, having not very well used Plato at the court, when he was gone, he feared lest he should write against him, and therefore sent after him, to bid him have a care how he set out anything prejudicial unto him. "Tell him," says Plato, "I have not so much leisure as to think upon him." So we should let those that reproach us know so much from us, that we have not leisure to think of them ; and though we should not be insensible, yet not to take too much notice of every reproach that is cast upon us ; but as, when the viper came upon St. Paul's hand, he shook it off, so, when reproaches come upon our good names or credits, shake them off, for it is a dishonour to think upon them as if we had nothing else to do.

MDXLVIII.—The true love of God will cause a man to love His ordinances.

Luke x. 35.

Tho. de Trugillo, ThezaurusConcionat.

"Rex non diligitur si odio lex ejus habetur."—ISID.

If the wounded Jew in the parable should have cast away the twopence which the Samaritan left to provide for him, it had been an argument that he neither regarded him nor his kindness. And it was a sign that Esau loved not God, because he esteemed not his birthright. Thus the true love of God is far from us, if we set not a high esteem upon His ordinances, those pledges of His favour which He hath left with us—to wit, the Word and sacraments : the Word, wherein we hear Him speak lovingly ; and the sacraments, wherein we see Him speak comfortably to us.

MDXLIX.—The vanity of gay apparel.

It is a pretty observation of a Jewish rabbi, that it was good policy for husbands to attire themselves below their ability, for so they might the sooner thrive; and to clothe their children according to their ability, so they might the better match them; but to maintain their wives beyond their ability, for so, perhaps, they might live in more peace than they should otherwise do. But now it is so, that husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and servants, are very vain in the matter of apparel, all of them antic and fantastic in garb and fashion; of many whereof it may be truly said, that when they have their best clothes on, they are in the very midst of their wealth; whereas a modest, discreet man goes in a plain suit, but hath rich linings.

Plantavit, Florileg.
Rabbinicum.

"Mollia indumenta animi mollietatem in-dicant." — BERN, in Apellan.

MDL.—Reproaches to be borne cheerfully, because God is concerned therein.

As a man going to sea, if he know that the mariner hath skill, that he loves him, and hath promised that he will have a care of him, and that many others have had experience of his former industry, this is much; but when he considers that his life is the mariner's life—that being both in one bottom, if the one perish the other cannot be safe—this, now, is full assurance that, as far as the mariner can do it, it shall be well with him. Thus, in the matter of reproaches and the cheerful bearing of them, were it that we only did know that God had a love to us and were merciful to us, that were enough to assure us; but when we shall find that, as God hath loved us so He hath engaged Himself that He will stand by His people in the time of their suffering, add hereunto our own experience of God's gracious dealing with us in the day of our trouble, this is somewhat more. But, lastly, to rise somewhat higher, when we shall consider that it is God's own case, so that our reproaches and sufferings are His reproaches and sufferings—as Luther, writing to Melancthon, at that time much distracted with fears concerning the Church's good, "Si nos ruinius, ruit et Christus (If we fall, Christ falls with us)"—this may fully assure us in the cheerful bearing of them, because He is chiefly concerned in them.

Burrough's Motes
Choice.

"Contumeliæ sunt Christi insignia,"
&c.—THYRVERUS.
In Vita ejus.

MDLI.—The true love of God will cause familiarity with God.

WHERE there is love, free from jealousy, betwixt man and wife, they are, as it were, incorporated; they think themselves never better than when they are in one another's company, talking and discoursing together, laying open each other's griefs, and making one another partaker of each other's comforts. So, we must have such interest in God: if we love Him, we must, in a humble, distanced manner, be familiar with Him; let never a day pass over our heads wherein we have not fetched a walk or two in the gallery of our hearts with Him, and there laid open ourselves before Him, both concerning our miseries and our sins, saying, after this or the like manner: "Thou seest, O Lord, what sorrows I endure within and without! I beseech Thee, give me grace so to carry myself as that Thou mayest have the glory of Thy own work. And Thou knowest, O my God, that I have this infirmity or that weakness; and that were it not for Thee I should fall into fearful breaches of Thy law; but, Lord, help me against this or that sin, as against pride, deceit, vain-glory, and the like, that I may, in a more settled and constant course, honour Thee, my God, to whom I am so infinitely bound," &c.

Rest of Thankfulness; a Sermon,
London, 1627.

Job xii. 27.

MDLII.—No man too good to learn.

ST. AUGUSTINE, writing to Auxilius, his fellow-bishop, about the matter of excommunication, in all humility, saith: "Senex à juvene co-episcopo, et episcopus tot annorum à collega nec

Ep. lvi.

dum anniculo, paratus sum doceri (Though I be an old man and a bishop of so many years' standing, yet I am ready to be taught of a young man, my companion, scarce of one year's growth)." Thus, dimly, in their own conceits, have those great lights from time to time shined out in the firmament of the Church, having been ever glad of any auxiliary to add unto their lustre. Then, if the greatest clerks have need to be instructed, what shall we think of the meanest? How much knowledge do they want that know almost nothing, when they that think they know so much do, notwithstanding, want so much as that they may be taught something by the meanest? No age superannuated, no condition of man so exalted, but may, in one thing or other, in ordine ad Deum, learn of the youngest and the meanest, either by bringing to their mind what hath been forgotten, confirming in what they have already learnt, or instructing in what, for all their parts, they never as yet heard of.

"Omnis ætatis homines schola admittit."—SEN., Ep. lxxvi.

Boys' Postills.

MDLIII.—Consideration of the name of Christ to be a motive from sin.

SUPPOSE one were set upon going to do mischief, and his father and mother should throw themselves down in the path, that if he goes on he must tread upon them, and they should say thus: "You shall tread upon the bowels out of which you came, upon the loins that begat you!" this would certainly be a great stop. And thus, when we find our hearts begin to stir, and corruption boil, the name of Christ calls, "Stay!" and says, "If you go to sin, you shall tread upon Me, trample upon Me and My blood, and bring reproach upon Me!" this must needs be a great stop in the ways to sin. In all the Word of God there is scarce a stronger argument to keep man from sinning than the consideration of Christ's name lying prostrate before us, that the name of Christ shall suffer by it. For the people of God to suffer by our sins is an evil thing; for a man to have his kindred ashamed of him is a sad thing; but for a man to be a reproach to Jesus Christ, to be a grievance to the blessed Spirit of God, this, if he have any ingenuity, any spark of grace left in him, any love of Christ remaining in him, will take him quite off from the ways of sin and wickedness.

Burrough's Masses
Choi. c.

MDLIV.—How to be truly thankful unto God.

"Per brachium fit judicium de corde" is the physician's aphorism; and therefore, when they pass their judgments of men's hearts, they do it by the pulse beating in their arms, and not by the words that proceed from their mouths. So wise men will look more to doing than to saying, though both are good and both must be done, remembering that Jesus did and said. And then it is that men are truly thankful unto God, when they act what they say; as, Noah is no sooner out of the ark but he builds an altar for the Lord, before he provides a house for himself; he talks not of it, but does it; for to thank God with our tongues, and not to live answerably thereunto, is no better than to say, "All hail, King of the Jews!" and to spit upon Him—"Hosanna!" with one breath, and "Crucify him!" with another; to have Jacob's smooth tongue and Esau's rough hands; a great deal of formal hypocrisy hung out at the sign of the lips, and no reality at all in the heart and hand, where it should be.

Hippocrates, Aphorism.

Acts i. 1.

Root of Thankfulness
a Sermon, 1627.

MDLV.—A man to be clear of that fault he reproves in another.

It was Plutarch's shame, when his servant could thus upbraid him, "Non est ita ut Plutarchus dicat (It is not as my master saith); his opinion is, that it is a shame for a philosopher to be angry, and he hath often reasoned of the mischiefs that come thereby, and hath written a book of not being angry, et ipse mihi irascitur (yet he is angry with me)." A great fault it was in Plutarch, then, and it is no less in those that are guilty of the same

Williams, Of the Church

"De cohibenda iracundia."
"Tunc est de ori," &c.

sin they reprove in others now, and little good will come thereby; for the eye which is filled with dust can never see clearly the spot that is in another's face, nor that hand which is besmeared with mire wash any other member clean, nor that man who is corrupted with sin do any good when he reproveth his own sin in another; as, when one thief reproves another, one drunkard condemns another, they may shame one another, but seldom mend one another. "Mundus à vitiis esse debet, qui aliena corrigere curat (He must needs be clean himself who goes about to cleanse another)." Gregoriū Homil.

MDLVI.—Reproaches and sufferings for the name of Christ marks of salvation.

THERE is mention made of one Æschylus, who, being condemned to be stoned to death, and all the people being ready to do execution upon him, his brother ran in unto him, and showed them that he had but one hand, and that he lost the other in defence of his country; whereupon there was none that would throw a stone at him. And thus it is that reproaches and sufferings in the cause of Christ are notable marks to safeguard us in the time of trouble: it was Jeremiah's plea, "O Lord, Thou knowest: remember me, and visit me: know that for Thy sake I have suffered rebuke." This is the evidence that a gracious heart hath to itself that God will spare him, when others shall suffer from His wrath; for the more any man is called to suffer in the cause of God, and when he finds his heart ready and willing to yield to God in suffering, the more evidence he may have to his soul that, when others be called to suffer from wrath, he shall be spared; this being the bottom of the Psalmist's prayer, "Remember, Lord, the reproaches of Thy servants, how I do bear in my bosom the reproach of Thy mighty people." Burrough's Mistake
Choice,
Jer. xv. 15.
Ps. lxxxix. 50.

MDLVII.—Mercies of God to be particularly recorded to posterity.

THE Jews (as the Rabbins do observe), the night before the Passover, are wont to confer with their children on this wise: the child said, "Why is it called the Passover?" The father answered, "Because the angel passed over, and destroyed us not." The child said, "Why do we eat unleavened bread?" The father answered, "Because we were forced to make haste out of Egypt." The child said again, "Why eat we sour herbs?" The father said, "To put us in mind of the afflictions in Egypt," &c. Thus ought we to deal in all the great and marvellous kindnesses of God: to speak publicly of them for the generations to come; with David, to tell what God hath done for our souls; to declare His glory among all nations, and His wonders amongst all people. The prince must speak of them to his subjects, the minister to his people, the master to his servants, and the father to his children. Menochius, de Repub. Heb.
Ps. lxxvi. 16.
Ps. xcvi. 3.

MDLVIII.—Parents not to be forsaken, though they be infidels and wicked.

WHEN St. John had baptized Chrysippa, the wife of the governor of Patmos, she presently thereupon would forsake her unbelieving husband. By no means; that must not be. St. John told her that he had a commission to join her to Christ, but no warrant to keep her from her husband; and, therefore, he suffered her not to depart, but commanded her to return unto her house again. It is also written of St. Martin, that he lived with his parents, who were Gentiles, and performed all good offices to them as became a good Christian child, because the Church of God, when she receiveth any one to Christ, doth by no means acquit the obligation of that law which bindeth a son unto his father. Thus, we are not, with the prodigal, to run out of our father's house, not to condemn them that begat us, but to condemn their impiety if they seek to mislead us; for it is not to be believed that God, who Prochorus, in Vita
St. John, cap. xxi.
Sulp. Ser., Hist.
Williams, Of the Church.

commanded us to honour father and mother, would ever bid us to forsake them. And, therefore, if any man hath an infidel to his father, let him not be persuaded by him to do any disservice unto God, but continue his obedience to Him, and, in so doing, he shall receive the reward of his duty, and the father shall find the punishment of his iniquity.

MDLIX.—The martyrs' welcome to heaven.

Granatons., Medit.

WHEN a father sends his son abroad about some earnest business, and he meets with much difficulty in the way, and comes home in rainy, tempestuous weather, how gladly doth he entertain him. The whole family are ready to tend upon him: one makes a fire, another gets him dry clothes, a third is busy in preparing somewhat to comfort his wearied spirits. And thus the people of God, when they meet with hardship in the pilgrimage of this world, and suffer even unto death for righteousness' sake—whether they be martyrs in will and in deed, as St. Stephen; in will and not in deed, as St. John; in deed, but not in will, as the innocents—when they come and meet with Christ, for whom and in whose cause they have suffered, how shall they be received? with what welcome shall they be entertained? what riches of glory shall they enjoy in the highest heavens for evermore? They shall have crowns upon their heads, palms in their hands, long white robes upon their backs, and shall sit at the right hand of God, when all their persecutors shall stand like so many base, unworthy creatures before them.

Willan's Serm., 1629.

MDLX.—The formal Christian discovered.

Leech's Serm.,
Lond., 1627.

Look but upon a pageant, on some triumphant day, what a goodly show it makes without, how it is carried on men's shoulders; oh, but look then again within it, and you shall find little substance, only a few gilded laths and pasteboards, things of small concernment. Then again, a maypole stands on high, decked with ribbons and garlands on the top, gazed upon by all men; oh, but it hath no rooting, no sap to preserve it. Such are all formal Christians, top and top-gallant: they have fair gilded outsides, some certain general notions swimming in their heads, but, as the apostle's phrase is, they are not rooted, not principled; their heads are uncatechised, and their hearts unsanctified; they make a goodly show, have abundance of form, but no power of godliness in them.

Col. ii. 7.

MDLXI.—The printing of learned men's works instrumental to God's glory.

Calamy's Epist.
Dedic. before Dr.
Taylor's Paternoster
Works.

It is the opinion of some learned men, that the saints who are now triumphing in heaven have an augmentation of glory bestowed upon them, according to the good they do, after their deaths, as by sermons preached or books printed while they were living. Instance is given in the apostle St. Paul, whose glory in heaven, say they, is increased according as men are converted by reading of his epistles; which doctrine, if it be true, will be a mighty encouragement to persuade the friends of deceased ministers and other learned men to publish the sermons and works they leave behind them. Howsoever, whether this be true or no, sure it is that, by the publishing thereof, especially when perfected, after their deaths, much glory is brought unto God and much benefit to the souls of the living.

MDLXII.—Reproaches and sufferings made honourable by God.

It is said of Joan, countess of Shrewsbury, that in the midst of a dance at court, she let her garter fall unawares; and blushing at the accident, the king took it up in his hand, whereat the nobility smiled. "Well," says he, "I will make this an honourable ornament ere long;" and upon that came the order of the Knights of the Garter, the garter being an ornament of the highest nobility, such as kings wear about their necks, as an ensign of their princely order. Thus, if man can put honour upon such mean things, then God much more. It is He who ennobleth reproaches and sanctifieth afflictions to His children, and maketh the sufferings of His servants as so many ensigns of heavenly nobility; so that, if men had but the true skill of Christianity, they would be ambitious of the crown of martyrdom, look upon it as a blessed thing, when men speak all manner of evil of them, and, with Moses, rather choose to suffer with the people of God than enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season.

Edward III.

Guil. Camdeni Britannia in Con. Brit.

Matt. v. 11.

Heb. xi. 25.

MDLXIII.—God showing mercy only for Christ Jesus' sake.

DAVID, after his victory over the Philistines, calls Ziba before him, and asks him whether there were not yet any man left of the house of Saul, that he might do him kindness for Jonathan's sake; whereupon they presented unto him Mephibosheth, a poor, lame, impotent man, who no sooner sees the king, but he falls on his face, and looks upon himself as a dead dog, far below the king's favour. "No matter," says the king, "fear not; for I will show thee kindness for Jonathan's sake," &c. And thus, if there be any forlorn Joseph who is fallen into the pit of despair, let him but cast up his eyes to the hills from whence cometh his salvation, and God will show him mercy for Christ Jesus' sake. If there be any lame, impotent Mephibosheth, any wounded spirit, any of the household of faith, that is distressed, God will inquire after them, and do them good, for Christ Jesus' sake.

Leech's Serm.,
London, 1631.

2 Sam. ix. 7.

MDLXIV.—God's goodness to us to be a motive from vain swearing.

POLYCARP, that religious martyr and bishop of Smyrna, in the time of the fourth persecution, under Marcus Antonius Verres, when he was commanded to swear but one oath, made this answer: "Fourscore and six years have I endeavoured to do God service, and all this while He never hurt me. How shall I speak evil of so good a Lord and Master, who hath thus long preserved me?" and added further, being thereunto urged by the proconsul: "I am a Christian, and cannot do it. Let heathens and infidels swear if they will; I cannot do it, were it to the saving of my life." Thus it is that, if nothing else will keep a man from idle swearing and taking of the blessed name of God in vain, the very consideration of benefits received from Him should be motive and dissuasive sufficient not to lade Him with oaths, who hath so laden us with favours, and that, whilst He is every moment doing good for our souls and bodies, we should dare to return Him evil for the good He doth unto us.

Eusebii Hist., lib.
ii., cap. 15.

"Te pater Æneas
et avunculus excitat
Hector."—VIRGIL.

MDLXV.—The sword of war impartial.

WHEN the Duke of Medina Sidonia was armed by the King of Spain, his master, against the Protestant party, he spoiled all before him, and flew as well upon those of his own religion as others. One asked him why he had no more care to spare those of his own religion. His answer was, "My sword knows no difference betwixt Catholics and Lutherans." Thus it is that whensoever God shall be pleased, for the sins of a people or nation, to give the sword a commission to eat flesh and drink blood, it will make little or no

Hispan. Rerum Scriptores.

"Tutius est igitur
fictis contendere verbis, quam pugnare manu."—
OVID, Metam.

2 Chron. xxxvi. 17.

Josephus, *de Bello
Jud.*

Egesippus, de Excidio Hierusalem.

difference at all betwixt the precious and the vile, the godly and profane; the bullet will not distinguish betwixt the commanders and the commanded. No argument was found so forcible as to persuade the enraged Babylonians to spare the poor captive Jews; and at another time, it was neither the religion of God Himself, the memory of ancient prophets, nor the glory of their temple, nor the beauty of their well-compacted city, nor the multitudes of people, nor any respect in the world, could move the incensed Romans to have the least pity on them. But there is no such need to step over our own threshold to prove the truth of this assertion; it is yet in fresh and bleeding memory that the sword of war is impartial, sparing none that come before it, and pitying none that come nigh it.

MDLXVI.—Afflictions fit us for heaven.

Acts and Monuments.

"Post afflictiones
vita tranquillior,
post tenebras venit lux."—GREG. NA-ZIANZEN, in Orat.
ad Cyprian.

It was a notable expression of Master Hawks, writing a consolatory epistle to Master Philpot, then a prisoner in the bishop's coal-house: "This bishop's coal-house," says he, "is but to scour you and make you bright, and fit you to be set up on the high shelf"—meaning heaven. As, when good housewives would set up vessels of brass or iron, they first take cinders or ashes and scour them, whereby they are fitted to be set up, so all afflictions and troubles of this life are but means that God useth to furnish His people withal, to make them bright and clean, that so they may be set on high. They must not come on the high shelf till all the rust be taken off, not enter into heaven till they have been in the furnace of afflictions, and are washed and cleansed and purified from the filth and dross of sinful pollutions.

MDLXVII.—The great weight of government.

Andrew Winton's Serm. at Court,
1617.

Exod. xxviii. 29.

Numb. xi. 14.

"Onos, onus."

Chrysost., ad Pagan-um Antioch.

It is a moral that is given of Aaron's apparel, that he carried the twelve tribes in his breast-plate, next his heart, to show that in care he was to bear them. But he had them also engraven in two onyx stones, and those set upon his shoulders, to show that another while he was to bear them in patience also. And it was so with Moses, too: at one time, he bears the people as a nurse doth her child, that is, full tenderly; but when they fall a-murmuring, as they did often, he bare them upon his shoulders in great patience and long suffering—yea, he complained, "Non possum portare (I am not able to bear all this people)." Thus it is that governments may well be said to have their weights, be heavy, when shoulders and all must be put to them, when they need not only a good head, but good shoulders that sustain them; yet that not so much while they be in good tune and temper—then they need no great carriage; but when they grow unwieldy—be it weakness or waywardness of the governed—in that case they need; and in that case there is no governor but that, at one time or other, he hath load enough upon his shoulders, and finds the weight of government, onus humeris angelorum non leve, insupportable.

MDLXVIII.—New inventions of sin condemned.

Piutarchi Symposiac.

Rhodogin., Lect.

"Cunctarum novi-tas gratissima re-rum."—OVID, iii.
Pont. 4.

SARDANAPALUS, that wretched epicure, made proclamation through the coasts of Assyria that he should be well rewarded who could devise some new way of delight, never thought on before; and as he was industrious to find out new ways of pleasure, so was Perillus as careful to invent a new way of punishment, by the making of a brazen bull at the command of a tyrant, by whose means he was the first who bellowed out his life in the same. Thus it is with us: we are all for invention and new devices of sin, altogether unknown to the ages of our forefathers—new lords, new laws, new lights, new doctrines, new fashions, new faces, nay, almost new kinds of men and women—"hic mulier, hæc vir”—scarce discernible by their habits whether men or women, or neither, or some kind of monster betwixt both—new devices for gain, new ways of cheating, new ways of breaking; so that, without all doubt, God is devising some new manner of judgment, as was said of Korah and his accomplices. Numb. xvi. 29.

MDLXIX.—To bless God for all.

THERE is a kind of dialogue betwixt one Doctor Thaulerus and a poor man who lay begging by the highway-side: “Good morrow, poor man,” says the doctor. “I never had any bad morrow,” said the beggar. “No?” says the doctor. “Thou art a miserable, poor man; thou art as good as naked, without any clothes on thy back; no friends, nor any one to relieve thee; how can it, then, be true that thou sayest, thou never hadst any bad morrow?” “I’ll tell you,” says the beggar. “Whether I am sick or in health, whether it be warm or cold weather, whether I be clothed or naked, rich or poor, I bless God for all.” “Oh, but, friend,” said the doctor, “what if Christ should cast thee into hell?” “If He should,” says he, “I would be contented; but I have two arms—the one of faith, the other of love—wherewith I would lay such fast hold on Him that I would have Him along with me, and then I am sure that hell would be heaven if He were there.” And thus it is that we should bless God at all times, in all places, upon all occasions, and in all conditions, as well for years of dearth as years of plenty; in times of war as well as times of peace; for adversity as well as prosperity; in sickness and in health, in weal and in woe, in liberty and restraint; whether it be that the Lord giveth, or whether He taketh away, still to bless the name of the Lord.

De Salis, Introduction à la Vie Déot.

“Semper Deo gratias agere studeamus,” &c.—AUG., de Verbo Dom.

MDLXX.—Godliness a great mystery; and why so.

THE world hath her mysteries in all arts and trades—yea, mechanical appertaining to this life—which are imparted to none but filiis scientiæ (apprentices to them): these have their mysteries—have them?—nay, are nothing but mysteries. So they delight to style themselves by such and such a mystery, such and such a craft, &c. Now, if godliness be great gain, and profitable unto all things, a trade of good return, and in request with all good men, then is she to be allowed her mysteries, at least, such as all other trades have, and the rather for that, that there is mysterium iniquitatis (a mystery of iniquity); so that it would be somewhat hard if there were not mysterium pietatis (a mystery of godliness), to encounter it; that Babylon should be allowed the name of a mystery, and Sion not; that there should be profunda Satanae (deep things of Satan), and there should not be deep and profound things of God and godliness, for the Spirit to search out and dive into.

Winton’s Serm. at Court, 1614.

1 Tim. vi. 6, 7.

2 Thess. ii. 7.

Rev. xvii. 6.

Rev. ii. 24.

MDLXXI.—How a man should demean himself, being fallen into bad company.

IT is said of Antigonus, that being invited to a great feast, where a notable harlot was to be present, he asked counsel of Menedemus, a discreet man, what he should do, and how he should behave himself in such company, who bade him only to remember this, that he was ἀδελφός τοῦ βασιλέως (the son of a king). So, good men may be invited where none of the best may meet; many a honest man may fall into a knave’s company: the best counsel is, keep ever in mind that they are king’s sons, God’s children; and therefore it were a base thing for them to be allured by the wicked to do things unseemly, and that they should much degenerate if they should make any sinful compliance with such as are notoriously wicked.

Plutarchi Moralis.

“Ante circumspiciendum est cum quibus edas et bibas, quam quid edas et bibas.”—SEN., Ep. xi.

MDLXXII.—The desperate sinner's madness.

Com. in Luc., cap.
iv.

"Quæ te dementia
cepit?"—VIRG.

Eph. v. 5.

ST. AMBROSE reports of one Theotymus, that being troubled with a sore disease upon his body, when the physician told him that, except he did abstain from intemperance, as drunkenness and excess, he was like to lose his eyes, his heart was so desperately set upon his sin that he said, "Vale, lumen amicum (Farewell, sweet light, then)! I must have my pleasure in that sin; I must drink, though I drink out my eyes; then, farewell, eyes! and farewell, light and all!" Oh, desperate madness! for men to venture upon sin, to the loss, not only of the light of the eye, but the light of God's loving countenance for evermore! It is to be supposed that no man will so far own by his words as to say, "Farewell, God and Christ, and eternal life and all! I must have my sin!" yet, though directly they say not so, they do in effect say it. They know that the Scripture saith that no drunkard, whoremonger, nor covetous nor unclean person shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; then whosoever that, knowing this, goeth for all that in such a way, doth, as it were, say, "Farewell, God and heaven! and farewell, all that God hath purchased by His blood! Rather than I will lose my sin, I will lose all!"

MDLXXIII.—Christmas-day to be held in remembrance.

Winton's Serm. at Court, 1616.

Lu' c' i. 14.

Ps. cxviii. 24.

As kings keep the day of their inauguration; as cities have their palilia, when the trench is first cast up, and churches their encanias, when they are first dedicate; as men their γενέθλια, when they first came into the world: so all good Christians celebrate the day of Christ's nativity—a day of joy, both in heaven and on earth: in heaven, for a day of glory unto God on high; on earth, for a day of peace here below, and goodwill towards men—a day of joy to all people past, present, and to come; such a day as wherein, after long expectation, the best return was made that ever came to the poor sons of men, such a day as the Lord Himself made. Let us, therefore, rejoice therein.

MDLXXIV.—How to feast comfortably.

Sandy's Travels.
Rhodogin, Lect.
V^{ar}.

"Convivium à pre-catione captum."
Ecc.—CHRYSOST.,
Hœn. de Fide Animæ.

JOSEPH had his tomb in his garden, to season his delight with meditations of his death; the Egyptians had a skeleton, or carcase, brought into their feasts for the same purpose; at Prester-John's table a death's-head is the first thing set on; and Philip had not only a boy every morning, but a dead man's skull on his table every meal, to put him in mind of his mortality. And thus ought we all to do, mingle our feasting with the meditation of our farewell out of this wretched life; when we sit at dinner, to think of our dissolution, and ever to set our own carcase before the eyes of our minds, saying within ourselves, "Alas! this feeding and feasting is but a little repairing and propping up of a poor ruinous house, that ere long will fall down to the ground, and come to nothing."

MDLXXV.—Heaven not to be found upon earth.

Burrough's Motet'
Choice.

Comines' Hist.

It is storied (told) of a king of Persia, that he must have an imaginary heaven, and thereupon he is at the charge of a stately brave palace, where, in the top, he caused the heavens to be artificially moulded, and the sun, moon, and stars to be painted, and under them the clouds, that by art moved up and down, distilled rain, and made great cracks of thunder; above that was placed a great throne, glittering with all the art that nature could afford. This might be sufficient for a heathen who knew no better things; but how sad is the condition of a company of drossy-spirited men, who (with that Duke of Bourbon, in France, who, if he might but have his palace in Paris, would not change it for Paradise) can be content to take the things of this world for their portion—if they had but this or that thing, it were heaven to them. It argues they have low thoughts of an immortal soul, and are ignorant of what an immortal soul is capable of, that can think themselves satisfied in any creature, and have loose thoughts of God, as if there were no treasures in Him, but only a few temporary earthly delights—as meat, drink, and sports, and whatsoever the vanity of this world calls delightful.

MDLXXVI.—Affliction, if anything, will make us seek God.

THE Persian messenger (though a heathen), as Æschylus, in one of his tragedies, observeth, said thus: "When the Grecian forces hotly pursued our host, and we must needs venture over the great water Strymon, frozen then, but beginning to thaw, when a hundred to one we had all died for it, with mine eyes I saw," saith he, "many of those gallants whom I had heard before so boldly maintain there was no God, everyone upon his knees, and devoutly praying that the ice might hold till they got over." And Pharaoh was at high terms with God, but when extremity came upon him, then he was humbled. Thus it is that many men, like the dromedary, of exceeding swiftness (the female especially), run over hill and dale, take their whole swing of pleasure, and snuff up the air of all sensual delights. Age, death, and sickness are afar off; youth, health, and strength possess them: there is no coming to them then; no meddling with them till their month come, till winter come, a day of sorrow and distress overtake them; then they will seek unto God. And herein is folly condemned even of her own children, and wisdom justified of her very enemies: that they that greedily seek sin are at last glad to be rid of it, and they that merrily scorn religion at last are glad to be sheltered under the protection thereof.

Winton's Serm at Court, 1511.

Exod. v. 2.

Isa. lx. 6.

Jer. ii. 24.

"Afflictiones humiliter castigat cœlestia multiplicat."—GREG., Hom. super Evang.

MDLXXVII.—Deceit and unfaithfulness in trade and commerce condemned.

LYSANDER, the Lacedemonian, held for a main principle of his religion, that children were to be deceived with trifles, as rattles and gewgaws, but old men were to be gulled with oaths and held with fair promises; and it is now almost grown a trade for men to be so slippery in their dealings one with another, that they can find loopholes to wind out of the most cautelous (cautious) contracts for advantages, break faith, promises, bonds, run away with men's goods; so that Turks and Jews are more trusty than such hollow shifting Christians: and hence it is that God's justice and His just revenge on all trades at this day is such, that scarce any prosper in them, God having divorced His blessing from them, because they have turned their trades into crafts, not for the help, but the overthrow one of another.

Bodin's Commonwealth.

Plutarch.

"Non hospes ab hospite tutus."—OVID.

MDLXXVIII.—The great danger of living in any one known sin.

THERE have been prodigals in all ages, such as, having a fair inheritance, have lost it all upon one cast of the dice. A man may escape many wounds and shots in the wars, and yet may be killed at the last with the stab of a penknife or the prick of a pin or needle. It is reported of Sir Francis Drake, that having compassed the world, and being in a boat upon the Thames in a very rough tide, he said, "What! have I escaped the violence of the sea, and must be now drowned in a ditch?" Thus, many a man that hath escaped many gross sins may, by some little secret lust, be deprived of the glory of the kingdom of heaven. Moses came within the sight of Canaan, but for one sin, not sanctifying God's name at the waters of Meribah, he never set foot within it. Great affliction it was, no doubt, unto him to be so near, and yet so far off from entering ; and no less will it be to any man that, for one sin, not sanctifying the name of God as he ought, shall come short of heaven : not but that there may be some remainders of sins, and yet the heart be taken off from every sin ; but if there be any secret closing with any one sin, all the profession of godliness and leaving all other sins, will be to no purpose, nor ever bring a man to happiness.

Sir, F. Bacon, By Way of Discourse.

Numb. xx. 13.

MDLXXIX.—Rich men to be mindful of what they have received at God's hand.

Andrews' Serm. at Court, 1616.

Luke xvi. 25.
Rom. xiii. 3.

In Moral. super Iscariot.

"Discant divites non in facultati-bus," &c.—
AMBROS., in Lur.

Matt. xix. 24.

2 Pet. ii. 15.

Numb. xxiii. 10.

ST. GREGORY confesseth thus much of himself, that never any sentence entered so deep into his soul as that text, "File, recordare, &c. (Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy pleasure or good things, and likewise Lazarus pains ;" and that as surgite mortui was ever in St. Jerome's ear, and non in commensationibus (not in surfeiting) in St. Augustine's, by which he was first converted ; for he, sitting in the See of Rome, when it was grown rich and of great revenue, was, as he saith, still afraid of this text, whether his exalting into that chair might not be his recompense at God's hands, and all that ever he should receive from Him for all his service, mercedem non arrham (his portion of earth), not the earnest of heaven. Thus did the good father ; and would God his example herein might make a due impression, and work the like fear in so many as have, in the eyes of all men, received the good things of this life : for it is too apparent that divers that have so received, and that in a measure even heaped up and running over, carry themselves so without remembrance of themselves, as if no such simile were in all the Bible as that of the needle's eye, no such example as that of the rich glutton, no such memento as that of Abraham to him ; but they that have learned a point of divinity, such as Abraham never knew, Balaam's divinity (it is to be feared), to love the wages of unrighteousness, and yet they must needs into Abraham's bosom, die the death of the righteous.

MDLXXX.—Sin unrepented of heavy upon the soul at the time of death.

Pintus, in Daniel.

"Apparent rarinantes in gurgite asto."

Rom. vii. 24.

A MASSIVE piece of timber floating up on the water may be easily drawn towards the shore ; so long as it swimmeth, anyone may turn it this way or that way at pleasure ; but if it once be grounded, not many men can move it but with great pains and industry. Thus, man's life is the water, death the shore, and sin the piece of timber : whilst we live in strength and health, borne up by the streams of worldly pleasure and delight, sin seems but light unto us ; great sins appear as little sins, and little sins as no sins at all ; but at the time of our dissolution, when we are ready to touch upon the brink of death, then sin appears in its colours, in its true proportion : small ones so great in the magnitude, light ones so ponderous in the weight, that the poor miserable sinner finds them a burden insupportable, too heavy for him to bear, and, looking about for help, cries out with St. Paul, "Miserable man that I am ! who shall deliver me," &c.

MDLXXXI.—Godliness a very gainful trade.

De Trugillo, Serm.

A MERCHANT who drives a rich trade will, by a bargain, in one morning, get a hundred pounds or more, whereas many other poor people are fain to work hard to get a shilling or eighteenpence a day. Now, every one would be of the gaining side. It is the common voice of nature, "Who will show us any good ? How shall we come to be rich ?" Oh, prize the trade of godliness, then ! Therein is great gain to be had. As for the works of morality and common grace, they are like the trade of the poor labouring man, who earns some small matter, who works hard, and gets only some outward blessings from God; but godliness is a full merchant's trade, that brings in hundreds and thousands at a clap. And such a trade God would have us set our hearts upon, to look after great and glorious things. As Cleopatra, that Egyptian princess, said to Marcus Antonius, it was not for him to fish for gudgeons, but for towns, forts, and castles: so it is not for those who are acquainted with the ways of godliness to be trading for poor things, for temporal, transitory trash, but for eternal life, glory, and immortality.

"Nulla Deo merces est melior, eaque habet pietatis munera."—AMBROS., in Lib. de Viduis.

Platarch, in Antonia.

MDLXXXII.—Consideration of our secret sins a motive to compassionate others.

WE may read of a judge in the primitive times, who, when he was seriously invited to the place of judgment to pass sentence upon another, withdrew himself, and at last, being earnestly pressed, came with a bag of sand upon his shoulders to the judgment-seat, saying, "You call me to pass judgment upon this poor offender. How can I do it, when I myself am guilty of more sins than this bag hath sands in it, if the world saw them all?" This was not so well done as a public magistrate, being invited to do justice, yet becoming as a conscionable Christian. And thus ought all good men to do: the consideration of their bosom sins should work in them compassion towards others, saying within themselves, "Can I be as Judah, to cry out upon Tamar, 'Let her be burnt!' when I remember the ring and the staff laid in pawn to her in secret? How can I be extreme against my weak brother, when, if my faults were written on my forehead, I might deserve as severe a censure myself?"

Abbott's Secret Sins Discovered.

Zuingeri Theat. Hum. Vitæ.

Gen. xxxviii. 24.

MDLXXXIII.—Ministers to preach the Gospel, notwithstanding the discouragements of their auditory; and why so.

TULLY maketh mention of Antimachus, a famous poet of his time, who, having penned some excellent quaint piece, read it openly before a judicious auditory. But, whether through disaffection to the person or disregard of the poem, they all left him, except Plato; which he perceiving, resolved to go on, with this confidence, that, Plato being there alone, he cared not though all the rest were absent. Thus ministers are to preach the Gospel of Christ. Though they meet with many discouragements to the work of their ministry, though the congregation be so thin that there may seem to be more pews and pillars in the church than people, and they as stupid and senseless in the matter of attention as the seats they sit on—some highway-side, some thorny, some rocky hearers—yet, for all that, there may be one Plato, one good-grounded hearer, who may prove the crown of all his labours, and in whose conversion he shall have much cause of rejoicing before men and angels in heaven.

Libro de Claris Oratoribus, et in Bruto.

"Plato erit instar omnium."

"Qui animarum curam pro Domino suscipit," &c.—GLOSS., super Prov. xi.

Mark iv. 5-8.

MDLXXXIV.—The misgiving thoughts of a worldly-minded man in reference to the enjoyment of heaven.

A BEGGAR asking an alms, if a man put his hand in his pocket and take out a penny or twopence, he hath hope to have that; but if he chance to pull out a piece of gold, then his heart fails, because it is too much. Cast a bone to a dog, he falls to it presently; but set a joint of meat before him, well dressed, in a fair, large dish, he dares not venture upon that. So, for these subluxary things, as riches, honours, and preferments, such as God casts many times to dogs, worldly men may fall upon them, and think they are for their tooth; but when they come to the dainties and infinite treasures of God, can a drunkard, who Burrough's Moses' Choice.

"Haud tali se dignatur honore."

prizeth nothing but a little swilling drink—can a swinish, filthy, base, low-spirited man, who never minded anything but the satisfying of his unclean lusts—think that God should make it the greatest work that He hath in the world to communicate the riches of His goodness and grace to such a one as he is? He cannot but have misgiving thoughts, and think that he hath no part in them.

MDLXXXV.—A heavenly-minded man looks through and beyond afflictions.

Relat. di Betero.

TRAVELLERS tell us that they that are on the top of the Alps may see great showers of rain fall under them, which they overlook, but not one drop of it comes at them. And he that is on the top of some high tower mindeth not the croaking of frogs and toads, the hissing of serpents, adders, and the like venomous creatures that are below. Thus, a heavenly-minded man, who dwells in heaven on earth, looks through and beyond all troubles and afflictions, rides triumphantly through the storm of disparagements—nay, he boldly stares Death in the face, though never so ugly disguised. As Anaxarchus said to the tyrant, “Tunde, tunde, Anaxarchum non tundis,” beat him and bruise him and kill him it may, but he will keep up his soul in the very ruins of his body.

“Quò fata trahunt retrahuntque sequuntur.”—VIRG.

Diog. Laert., in Vita.

MDLXXXVI.—Deliberation to be used in all our ways.

Pintus, in Ench.

He that is to climb up some high ladder must not think that, setting his foot upon the lowest round, he can skip over all the rest, and be at the top, without evident danger to himself. Such is the course of our life: just like a ladder of many rounds, set up to some high place. The first step is, or of necessity should be, the thought of God and goodness, and the last step the full assurance of heaven; but there are in the middle many other steps, as of means, consideration, deliberation, &c.—how to love God above all things, and our neighbours as ourselves, and how to demean ourselves in the midst of a crooked and froward generation—which, if we miss and step over, no marvel if we never come to the top, but perish in the midway to all eternity.

“Cuncta prius tentanda.”—OVIU, Mt.

MDLXXXVII.—Heavenly-mindedness of a child of God.

Speed's Chronicle as Walsingb.

It is recorded of Edward I., that he had a great desire to go to the Holy Land, but, being hindered by a domestic war, he gave his son a strict charge, upon his death-bed, that after his death he should cause his heart to be conveyed thither; and to that purpose he had prepared two-and-thirty thousand pounds to defray the charge, and ordered that sevenscore knights, with their several retinues, should attend it thither. Thus the saints and dear children of God, though they have not their bodies in heaven, yet their hearts are there; they are like eagles, always mounting upwards; their treasure is in heaven, and there will their hearts be also; they may have many weights of corruption without that press them downwards, yet they have an inward principle that works upwards—a special work of God so ordering it, that their conversation is altogether in heaven; and that though, with the Church, they be black and dark in regard of their infirmities, yet they are like unto pillars of smoke that ascend upwards.

“Propter Deum fastidit omnia terrena.”—MUSCUL., in Pi. lxxiii. 5.

Phil. iii. 20.

Cant. iii. 6.

MDLXXXVIII.—To be careful of our precious souls.

Val. Rothm., Carahd., lib. iii.

CHARLES V., when he was solicited by a great counsellor, Antonius de Lena, to cut off all the petty princes of Germany, and then he should rule alone, cried out, “Anima, anima

(My soul, my soul)!" "Nay," says the tiger, "if your majesty have a soul, give over your empire." The emperor had some care of his soul, the bloody advocate had none. Oh, the precious soul of man!—the master-wheel of all our actions, the chief seat of the image of God!—that for which Christ emptied Himself of glory; that wherein Christ desires to dwell by faith! How ought such a jewel to be kept with all diligence! Let the men of the world prize their soul at never so low a rate, yet let all good men set a high value upon theirs.

Paul. Jovii Hist.,
lib. xxvii.

"O anima insignita Dei imagine, deco-rata." &c.—BERN.,
In Medit.

MDLXXXIX.—The world's uncertainty.

As it cannot be otherwise but that the sun shining out in our horizon must needs be the occasion of darkness in another, so that our day is their night, and when it is day with them it is night with us: thus it is with the things of this world; they are at no certainty. Many are made poor, that a few may become rich; one is made honourable by another's disgrace; this man full by that man's emptiness. If the day of prosperity smile upon one, the night of adversity lowers upon another; one weepeth, and another rejoiceth; one gains by another's loss. Why, then, should any man think that to be certain with him that is so inconstant to all besides him?

Leech's Serm.,
Lond., 1624.

"Rara si constat sua forma mundo, Si tantas vaiat vices."
—BOETH., De-consolant., lib. ii.

MDXC.—How to know whether a man be heavenly or earthly-minded.

ALL things in nature have a principle to carry them to their proper place—as, for example, take earth and close it in a vessel, and take fire and put it in another vessel, then open the vessels, let them out, and they will both go to their proper place—the one upward, the other downward: because the place of fire is on high, hence it is that sparks fly naturally upwards; and, because the place of earth is below, thence is it that it tends downward. Thus, if the place and centre of the heart be in heaven, then certainly it will move upwards towards heaven; but if on earth, then it will bear downward. So, likewise, the souls of men, when they are gone out of the body, they go to the place where they had a principle to carry them; not a principle that shall be put into them when they die, but a principle that they were led by before: so that, if their hearts be pressed down by earthly things when they die, they will fall down; but, if heavenly-minded, they will mount upwards. It stands, therefore, upon every man to know how his soul worketh.

Burrough's Moss's
Choice.

"Exitus acta probat."

MDXCI.—Children to be ready in relief of the parent's necessities.

LUTHER hath a story of a good father in Germany, that had made over all his estate to his sons, reserving only to himself a power, by turns to come and take his diet at their tables. One of the sons, being at dinner, and having a goose before him, espied his father coming, and set the goose underneath the table till his father was gone again. Then he takes up the goose, which God had miraculously turned into a great toad, which leaped into his face, and, notwithstanding all his striving, it could not be removed till it had stifled him. Let all children seriously look upon this example, and look to it, that they relieve their parents, for parents helped them when they were not able to help themselves. Let parents not be slighted, not mocked, not cursed, not smitten, but submitted unto and relieved by the examples of Christ, of David, and of Joseph, and of divers others, that, for their filial love, are recorded as famous in their several generations.

Loc. Com. Tit. de Amore erga Parentes.

Abbot's Secret Sin
Discovered.
Deut. xxvii. 16.
Prov. xxx. 17.
Exod. xxi. 15.

John xix. 26.
1 Sam. xxii. 5.
Gen. xlviii. 12.

MDXCII.—Captious hearers of the Word condemned.

Pintus, Com. in Isaiam.

SUPPOSE a company of people coming to a working goldsmith's shop: one buys a chain, another a diamond ring; this buys a jewel, that a rich piece of plate: and that there should be one amongst them so self-conceited, as to take up a coal from off the floor, and handle it so long till he had all besmeared his fingers, refusing what the shop afforded, so as he might but have that coal along with him. Were not this great absurdity? Yet, such and more is the condition of those captious hearers of God's Word, that, whilst others carry away good and wholesome doctrine, precious promises, such as is food for their souls, they come only to carp and catch at their minister, that so they may more easily traduce him, and brand him with the black coal of infamy and disgrace; but they shall one day find, that the more they throw dirt in his face, the more they bespatter their own.

MDXCIII.—Things of heaven to be waited for with patience.

Leech's Sermon,
Lond., 1622.

"Perfert patientia palmam."

IN the way of trade, if a man go and buy a commodity of five or ten shillings price, he lays down ready money; but if the price rise high, and come to a good round sum, then he doth but give something in earnest—the great payment (it may be) comes six or twelve months after. So, when men will bargain with God for their obedience, to have credit and esteem in the world, these are but poor trifling matters, and God gives them presently; but because the covenant that is betwixt God and Christ, and so betwixt Christ and us, is about great matters, and God intends to reward His people with glorious things eternally in the heavens, we have but the first-fruits of them at present, and must not expect the fullness of them suddenly: they are great things, and must be waited for with patience till they do come, and, being once come, they will make amends for all our tarrying.

MDXCIV.—Children to be religiously educated.

Val. Max., lib. v.,
cap. 8.

Abbot's Secret Sins Discovered.

It was the saying of Aulus Fulvius to his son, when he was discovered to be a complotter in Catiline's conspiracy, "Ego te non Catilinæ, sed patriæ genui (I begot thee not for Catiline, but for thy country)." And, indeed, too, too often it falls out that parents may be said to get children for the devil rather than God—for the ruin rather than the raising of their country; they must, therefore, look to it, that they be well educated, religiously trained up, that they may appear to be God's children as well as theirs.

MDXCV.—How the devil is said to know our thoughts.

Holdsworth's
Sermon, Lond., 1626.

"Prius complexio-nem unius culus-que adversarius perspicit, et tunc tentationis laqueos apponit."— GREG., Moral.,
lib. ix.

AN angler, having baited his hook, throws it into the water: the fish, having espied the bait, after two or three vagaries about it, nibbles at it, and after awhile swallows down the bait, hook and all. The fisher sees none of all this; but, by the sinking of the cork, he knows that the fish is taken. Thus, the devil, though a most cunning angler, knows not the thoughts of men, such as are mere pure thoughts: that is God's peculiar; it is He that searcheth the heart and trieth the reins: but if we write or speak, if the cork do but stir, if our countenance do but change, he is of such perspicuity, and so well experienced withal, that he will soon know what our thoughts are, and suit his temptations accordingly.

MDXCVI.—Faithful and seeming servants of God differenced by way of reward.

Parrotto's Moses' Chute.

GREAT men have usually two kinds of servants: some that they hire by the day, or the month, or the year, and they shall have so much, or so much wages paid unto them every night, or, it may be, every week; other servants there are that are not paid off presently, but that which they serve for is the expectation of some great office, or some reversion of lands that should fall unto them after a certain time expired, and thereupon they go on in doing faithful service, though there come nothing of it at present. This is the difference of faithful and seeming servants of God in reference to the matter of reward: they who live the best lives, such as moral, civil, honest men, who cannot yet be called truly gracious, though in some measure they may be said to do God some service, it is but such as poor labouring men do that are paid for their day's labour, and so they have their daily pay of meat and drink and clothes, such comforts as the creature can afford; but God hath other manner of servants, better qualified, such as are godly and true Christians indeed, who, though they have not so much present pay as the other, yet there are reversions and some glorious things that they expect hereafter. Hence it is that they go on, not envying them that have their daily pay in outward things, but wait patiently for better.

"Certantes in stadio numerosior corona glorificat."—CASSIODOR., lib. viii., ep. 22.

MDXCVII.—Wicked persons may be in a godly family.

ST. AUGUSTINE, writing to the clergy and townsmen of Hippo, saith: "Although the discipline and government of my house be strict and vigilant, yet, as I am a man, and live amongst men, I dare not arrogate to myself that my house should be better than the ark of Noah, the house of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and of Christ." Thus may it be also with many a good man; yea, there have been no worse men in the world than they that have had the best means of grace in Christian families: as in Adam's, there was a murdering Cain; in Abraham's, a persecuting Ishmael; in Noah's, a scoffing Ham; in Isaac's, a profane Esau; in David's, an undutiful Absalom; in Mephibosheth's, a faithless Ziba; in Elisha's, a lying Gehazi; and in the college of Christ, a treacherous Judas. And no wonder; for religion is not hereditary: yea, religion is the work of God, and He hath other ends in means of reformation than conversion, as may be seen in Pharaoh and in Eli's sons.

"Quantum libet vigilet disciplina domus mea," &c.—In Epist.

De Mediavilla, Progres. Collectis.

Rom. ix. 17.

1 Sam. ii. 15.

MDXCVIII.—The soul of man precious in the sight of God.

A SKILFUL jeweller, having taken a great deal of pains to make up some exquisite piece of art, cannot choose but be much troubled when he sees his workmanship fallen into the hands of children and fools that have no understanding, such as cannot value what work is, and therefore slight it. Such a rare piece is the soul of man, framed by God after His own Divine image, so precious and transcendant in the estimate, that the Spirit of God is, as it were, at a stand to find anything to equal it. "What shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" Now, to speak after the manner of men, how is the Holy Spirit of God grieved when that which He hath made a temple for Himself to live in shall, by sin, be made a den of dragons, a cage of unclean birds, a harbour for impure thoughts! to see that slighted which Himself holdeth so near and dearly beloved unto Him!

Pintus in Ezechiel.

Matt. xvi. 26.

1 Cor. iii. 17.

MDXCIX.—Christians having an eye upon the heavenly rewards not to be daunted at any outward troubles.

JULIUS CÆSAR, that great Roman emperor, when he was at any time sad upon the thoughts of some disaster that befell him in the way of his dominion, was wont to say, "Cogita te esse Cæsarem (Think that thou art Cæsar)!" and that was it that put him into a more joyous temper. And memorable is that place of Holy Writ, when Jonadab said to Amnon, "Why art thou lean from day to day, being the king's son?" intimating that he could have no just cause to pine and fret away himself, being the king's son and heir-apparent to the crown, whose present condition and future hopes might make him easily dispense with such matters as would be grievous to others; besides, he was of that power and authority, that he might easily remove any obstacle that lay in his way. Thus, it may very well be said of every true-hearted Christian, that, having an eye upon the reward, they should not be daunted at any outward thing whatsoever, but to think upon their crown and glory; not to have their hearts troubled, and to walk dumphishly and heavily in the ways of God; for they are the King of heaven's sons, heirs of God, co-heirs with Christ, the children of the bride-chamber, and therefore to rejoice and go on with a holy and heavenly cheerfulness and courage in all the ways of God.

Suetonius, in Vitæ.

2 Sam. xiii. 4. Annotat. in Biblia Angl.

Met. xl. 25.

MDC.—The mystery of the blessed Trinity shadowed out in familiar resemblances.

Abbot's Catechism.Damascen., Orthodox Fidei, lib. ii., cap. 4.

In a fired coal there is the substance of the coal, the light of the coal, the heat of the coal, and yet but one fired coal: so soon as the coal is fired there are these three—substance, light, and heat. So in the Divine Essence, though in a more transcendent way, is there the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Again, it may be shadowed out in a man's self: as soon as ever he is born into this world he is a creature to God, a child to his parents, a subject to his prince, and yet he is but one. So, so soon as ever that God is—that is, from all eternity—He is Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, yet but one God.

MDCI.—How to be truly rich and truly honourable.

Plutarch, Moral.Sir F. Bacon's Advancement of Learning.

Heb. xi. 26.

THERE is mention made of a painter that, having drawn the picture of a horse, would needs have him foaming at the mouth, but could not by any means do it, whereupon, in a great rage, he took the sponge wherewith he made his pencils clean and threw it at the picture, intending to have utterly defaced it; but it so fell out that the sponge, having sucked in several sorts of colours, effected that by chance which the artist by all his industry could not compass. Thus it is with them that strive to make themselves great and eminent in the world: how do they cark and care, flatter, lie, and dissemble, and all to be thought somebody amongst their fearful neighbours. But all in vain; this is not the way to do it: for, as Charles V. told his son, that Fortune was just like a woman—the more you woo her, the further she flings off. Let every good Christian, then, take up the sponge of contempt and throw it at these outward eminencies: Moses did so, and found, to his exceeding joy, that the abjection of vain glory was the acquisition of that which was true and real.

MDCII.—The difference of good and bad men in their preparation for death.

Burrough's Mors et Ubsqr.

“Piis mors ultra non est mors, sed nomen tantum habet mortis.”
CHRYSOST., Homil. in Matt. 8.

A WIFE that hath been faithful to her husband, and waits his coming home, let him knock when he will, she is always ready to open the door unto him; but another woman, that is false to her husband, and hath other lovers in the house, if her husband chance to knock at the door, she does not immediately go to the door and let him in, but there is a shuffling up and down in the house, and she delays the time till she have got the others out of the way. Thus it is when Death knocks at the door of these earthly tabernacles of ours; here is the difference: a good man is willing and ready to open to Death—his heart is in such a heavenly frame, that he is always prepared for Death; and seeing by faith the heavens opened, a crown prepared, and God in all His glory, it cannot be expressed with what cheerfulness of heart he welcomes Death, that so he may take possession; whereas the atheist, he dares not die, for fear of a non esse (that he shall be no more); the profane person is afraid of death, because of a male esse (to be made miserable) ; and every wicked, ungodly man is loth to die, for, having espoused himself to the things of this world, he shrinks at the very thought of death, and cries out to his soul, as sometimes Pope Adrian did, "O my soul! whither goest thou? thou shall never be merry more!" or, as those Jovius, in Ad-hana men, "Slay us not, for we have treasures in the field of wheat and of barley, and of oil and of Gen. xli. 8. honey," &c.

MDCIII.—Christ to be the sum of all our actions.

THERE is mention made of one in the primitive times who, being asked what he was, answered, "A Christian." "What is thy name?" He answered, "Christian." "What is thy profession?" He answered, "Christian." "What are thy thoughts?" He answered, "Christian." "Thy words and deeds, what are they?" He answered, "Christian." "What life leadest thou?" He answered still, "Christian." He had so digested Christ into his soul by faith, that he could speak nothing but "Christian." And thus it is that Christ is to be made the sum and ultimate of all our actions. We must labour that Christ may be made one with us, and we with Him, that in all our works begun, continued, and ended, we may still conclude with that expression of the Church, "through Jesus Christ our Lord."

De Mediavilla, Clavis David.

In Liturgia Ecclæ, Anglicanæ.

MDCIV.—God's immutability.

A MAN, travelling upon the road, espies some great castle : sometimes it seems to be nigh, another time afar off ; now on this hand, anon on that ; now before, by-and-by behind ; when all the while it standeth still, unmoved. So a man that goes in a boat by water thinks the shore moveth, whereas it is not the shore, but the boat, that passeth away. Thus it is with God : sometimes He seemeth to be angry with the sons of men, another time to be well pleased ; now to be at hand, anon at a distance ; now showing the light of His countenance, by-and-by hiding His face in displeasure ; yet He is not changed at all. It is we, not He, that is changed. He is immutable in His nature, in His counsels, and in all His promises ; whereas all creatures have and are subject to change, having their dependence on some more powerful agent ; but God, being only independent, is, as the school-men say, omnino immutabilis (altogether immutable).

Pintus, in Italiam.

Mal. iii. 6.
Numb. xxiii. 19.

Thomas, Prima Part. Sum.

MDCV.—The godly man rejoicing in death.

IT is storied of Godfrey, duke of Bouillon, that when, in that his expedition to the Holy Land, he came within view of Jerusalem, his army, seeing the high turrets, goodly buildings, and fair fronts (though but, as it were, as so many skeletons of far more glorious bodies), being even transported with the joyfulness of such a sight, gave a mighty shout, that the earth was verily thought to ring with the noise thereof. Such is the rejoicing of a godly man in death, when he doth not see the turrets and towers of an earthly, but the spiritual building of a heavenly Jerusalem, and his soul ready to take possession of them. How doth he delight in his dissolution, especially when he sees grace changing into glory, hope into fruition, faith into vision, and love into perfect comprehension ! Such and so great are the exultations of his spirit, such mighty workings and shoutings of the heart, as cannot be expressed !

Matth. Paris, in Hist. Ang.

"Fœlicissima justorum mors tanquam finis laborum," &c.
—BERN., de Transitu Malachie,

MDCVI.—Sin to be looked upon as the cause of all sorrow.

IN the course of justice we say, and say truly, when a party is put to death, that the executioner cannot be said to be the cause of his death ; nor the sheriff, by whose command

Winton's Sermo, as Courts, 1617.

"Gloria peccati nulla petenda tui est."—OVID, de Remed.

he doth it; neither yet the judge, by whose sentence; nor the twelve men, by whose verdict; nor the law itself, by whose authority it is proceeded in; for (God forbid that we should indict these, or any of these, of murder!) solum peccatum homicida (sin, and sin only, is the cause and occasion of all sorrows). It is not the looking upon any accidentals, any instrumentals of our miseries and vexations, but upon the principal, the prime agent, and that is sin; to take a wreak or holy revenge upon that, to send out an inquiry in our souls after that, and, having found it, to pass sentence thereupon.

MDCVII.—The good man's comfort in matter of worldly loss.

Pintus, in Dan. iv.

It was a handsome conceit of a Great Duke of Florence, that had for his arms a fair spread tree, having one branch only lopped off, with this motto, "Uno avulso non deficit alter," intimating thereby, that as long as the trunk or body of the tree was well rooted, there was no fear though a branch or two were withered. Thus a good man bears up himself in the matter of temporal loss: as to the matter of government, if a David be gathered to his fathers, a Solomon may succeed him in his throne; if a John be cast into prison, rather than the pulpit shall stand empty, a greater than John, even Christ Himself, will begin to preach; what if a Sulpitius die at Rome, a Tully is left behind; what though a good king, a good minister, a good magistrate be removed, he cheers up himself that as good may succeed: however, he lies down with patience, expecting the event. If God take away his estate in this world, manet altera cælo (he looks for a better in heaven); if he be traduced by men, he shall be cleared by God; if he lose his life here, he shall find it hereafter.

1 Kings ii. 12.

Mark i. 14.

2 Cor. iv. 18.

Luke vi. 22.

Matt. xvi. 25.

MDCVIII.—Men upon hearing of the joys of heaven to be much taken therewith.

Plutarch, in Vita Camilli.

THE Gauls, an ancient people of France, after they had once tasted of the sweet wine of the grapes that grew in Italy, inquired after that country where such pleasant liquor was, and, understanding of it, they made towards that place, and never rested till they came thither where such pleasant things grew. Thus, when the minister hath endeavoured to lay open the rich and precious things of God, and brought unto our souls some of the clusters of Canaan, and some of that wine which is to be drunk in the kingdom of heaven, let it be our parts to close in with him, in the pursuit after such good things, and not to let our hearts rest till we come to taste the sweet and enjoy the benefit thereof.

MDCIX.—Order to be in the Church of God.

Atterool, on Numb.
in Preface.

Eph. i. 21.
Col. i. 16.
1 Thess. iv. 16.

1 Cor. iii. 8.
Dan. xii. 3.
2 Cor. xv. 41

Eph. vi. 12.
Matt. xii. 24.

As there is an order in God Himself, even in the Blessed Trinity, where, though the Persons be co-eternal and co-equal, and the essence itself of the Deity indivisible, yet there is the first, second, and third Person. And as in God, so in the whole creation: angels have their orders, thrones and dominions, principalities and powers, and an archangel, that at the last shall blow the trumpet. So it is amongst the saints, the souls of just men perfected: all of them have enough, none of them want; yet there is a difference in the measure of their glory, because every one hath his own reward according to his labour. Stars are not all of one magnitude, one differs from another in glory. As for things below, some have only a being; some, being and life; others, being, life, and sense. And others, besides all these, have reason and understanding. All arts and sciences, before they can be learned, must be reduced into order and method. A camp well disciplined is a perfect pattern of good order; nay, there is a kind of order even in hell itself, a place of disorder and confusion; and shall, then, God and Belial, angels and men, saints and devils, heaven and earth, be all in order, and the Church out? It cannot be: the Church is to be as an army with banners, to consist of governors and governed, some to teach and some to hear, ordine quisque suo (all in decency and in order). Cant. vi. 4.

1 Cor. xiv. 40.

MDCX.—How the human nature may in some sort be said to excel the angelical.

A CHAIN that is made up of coarse gold may, in some sense, be said to out-value that which is made up of finer, not in respect of the nature and perfection of the gold, but because there is a very rich jewel fixed into it; so the angelical nature may, in respect of its pure and undefiled quality, be said to excel that which is human: yet the human, in another way, excels it, because there is that sparkling diamond of the Divine nature fastened into it, Verbum caro factum (the Word made flesh), the Son of God made like unto the son of man in all things (sin only excepted), passing by the angels, taking the seed of Abraham. Pintus, in Ezech.
Heb. ii. 16.

MDCXI.—Mention of the joys of heaven to be a winning subject upon the souls of men.

It is reported of Adrianus, an officer under Maximinianus, the tyrant, that seeing the constancy of martyrs in suffering such grievous things for the cause of Christ, and being very earnest to know what was that which caused them so willingly to undergo such exquisite torments, one of them (there being at that time two-and-twenty under the tormentors' hands) made answer in that text of St. Paul, "Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive, what is laid up for them that love God." Upon the hearing whereof, Adrianus was converted to the Christian faith, and sealed the profession thereof with his blood. Thus ought the very mention of the joys of heaven to be as a winning argument to work upon the souls of men, not to sit down contented with the greatest things of this world, if they once appear in competition with the things of heaven. Shall men's hearts stir when they hear of God's wrath and dreadfulness of His displeasure against sin? And shall not their hearts burn within them for joy when they hear of the goodness of God, and of the riches of the grace of God, and of the wonderful thought that He hath for the everlasting good of mankind? Surius, in Vita Adriani.
1 Cor. ii. 9.

MDCXII.—Reverence to be used in the worship of God.

WHEN Moses had received the Law from the mouth of the Lawgiver Himself, and had published the same, and finished the tabernacle of the ark and sanctuary, he musters up all the tribes and families of Israel, from twenty years of age upwards: the number of the whole army was six hundred and three thousand five hundred and fifty men of war, besides women and children and strangers that followed out of Egypt. These he divides into four gross and mighty battalions: in the midst of them the tabernacle (as it were a portable temple) was carried, being surrounded by the Levites, and the Levites by the other tribes; so that not only the pagans and heathens were forbidden access unto it, but the sentence of death passed upon every soul of the Israelites themselves that durst be so bold as to approach it, such as were not Levites, to whom the charge was wholly committed. So sacred was it, and with such reverence guarded and regarded, that two and twenty thousand priests were dictated to the service and attendance thereof, which was performed with such dutiful observance in the preserving and laying up of the holy vessels, solemn removing, together with the prudent and provident defence of the same, that it might Atterzol, on Numb.
"Templum portable."
Isidor., de Sum.
Bons.
Numb. iii. 6.

Martinus, de Repub.
Heb.

well procure all due reverence to the holy things of God, and increase zeal and devotion in such as drew near unto Him. This was their devotion to the ark of God then, and afterwards to the Temple, and ought to be continued amongst all good Christians to the house of God, the house of prayer, now in times of greater light; but, which is to be lamented, whereas most of our churches have two doors, superstition crept in long since at the one, and profaneness hath of later days shouldered in at the other: so that, had there been more fear and reverence in the hearts of men towards the worship of God and the parts thereof, there had been less slighting of His ordinances, and much less contempt of His Word and commandments.

Holdsworth's Serm.,
Lond., 1624.

MDCXIII.—A good Christian will rather part with his life than his integrity.

Lib. xlii.

PIERIUS VALERIANUS, in his Book of Egyptian Hieroglyphics, maketh mention of a kind of white mouse, called an Armenian mouse, being of such a cleanly disposition, that it will rather die than be any way defiled, so that, the passage into her hole being besmeared with any filth, she will rather expose herself to the mercy of her cruel enemy than any way seek to save her life by passing so foul an entrance. And thus every well-grounded, true-hearted Christian will, with those three nobly-spirited Hebrews, choose rather to be cast into the fiery furnace than worship the golden image; with Moses, rather suffer affliction with God's people than live a pleasant life in Pharaoh's court; with Daniel, rather be fed with water and pulse than eat of the king's portion; in a word, rather part with estate, liberty, life, and all, than part with his integrity.

Pintus, in Eccel.

Dan. iii. 18.
Exod. ii. 15.

MDCXIV.—To have children male and female God's great blessing.

Caryll, on Job ii.

As it is with the soul and the body, though the soul be far more excellent than the body, yet the soul alone is not so perfect as when soul and body are together; because, though the body be not so strong in constitution and noble in condition as the soul, yet body and soul in creation were joined together: hence is it that their greatest perfection consists in unity. So, likewise, is it in a family. Though sons in nature are more perfect, yet, because it was the first institution of a family, male and female, therefore the fullness and completeness of the blessing is in the union of both. Sons without daughters may bear up the name, and daughters without sons may enlarge the family; but where there are sons and daughters both is the perfection of the blessing, because man was so made at the first. "Male and female created He them."

Gen. i. 27.

MDCXV.—The multitude always desirous of change in government.

Decad. iii., lib. iii.

LIVY maketh mention of the citizens of Capua, that, being gathered together in a mutinous manner, they would needs depose the senate, and, being weary of their government, agreed to put them to death; but Pacuvius Calavius, the head magistrate, being willing to save them, when they had passed sentence upon one of them to have him executed, bade them first, in his stead, to choose a good and righteous senator. At the first they were all silent, not knowing how to find a better; after, when some odd fellow of the crew, past all shame and reverence, seemed to nominate one to succeed, by-and-by they grew to loud words and great outcries: some said flatly they knew not the man; others laid heinous things to his charge; some said he was of a base and beggarly condition; others objected his trade and way of living. Thus they grew more and more vehement upon the proposals of a second and third to their choice, whereupon they

Sir Walter Raleigh's Hist. of the World.

bethought themselves and repented of what they had done already, considering how much they failed, and were to seek upon every new election; and so, at length, they were content to keep their old senators still. And just thus is it with the many-headed multitude, neutrum modò, mas modò vulgus, as changeable, inconstant, and variable as the weather; never at any certain; discontented with the present government, which, if changed for another, they like that no better; weary of present things, desirous of change and alteration; either they serve basely or rule proudly. As for liberty, that is the mean betwixt them both: they have neither the skill to despise with reason, nor the grace to entertain in any proportionable measure.

"Bellus multorum capitum."

MDCXVI.—Worldly policy not to be prejudicial to the honour of God.

DAVID, coming to the court of Achish, king of Gath, saw himself in danger, and thereupon feigned himself mad, which, though he did in a politic way, to save his life and liberty, yet he had no warrant so to do, because it tended not only to his own disgrace, being king of Israel, but it was also dishonourable to God Himself, whose majesty he should have represented. Thus, there are some that think it good policy—and so it is good worldly policy—to rise early and go to bed late, to eat the bread of care, and work full hard—yea, they have set hours for working, eating, resting, &c.; but this their policy, as it is much to be feared, eats up the service of God; it leaves them small or no time wherein they may offer up the calves of their lips in the morning, or at night to come before Him with an evening sacrifice; and, therefore, prejudicial to His honour, and, as the apostle speaks of wisdom in the same respect, earthly, sensual, and devilish.

1 Sam. xxi. 13.

Peter Martyr, in locum.

Griſſiths' Bethel.

Hos. xiv. 2.

Ps. cxli. 2.

James iii. 15.

MDCXVII.—To be thankful unto God in the saddest of times and conditions.

It was a pretty, sweet passage that was once betwixt a distressed mother and a child about eight or nine years of age, who, being reduced to such a strait that hunger began to pinch them both, the child, looking earnestly on the mother, said, "Mother, do you think that God will starve us?" "No, child," answered the mother, "He will not." The child replied, "But if He do, yet we must love Him and serve Him." Here, now, was language from a little child, which, being from the heart, might well become and argue a child of grace, a well-grown Christian. Such an one was Job; though God slay him, yet he will trust in Him; and the rod and staff of God shall be David's comfort; and St. Paul had so learned the art of thankfulness, as in all conditions to be contented. And so must every one labour to have the same frame of spirit, that in the worst of times, in the saddest of conditions, whether public or private, national or personal, they be thankful unto God, and speak good of His most holy name.

Caryll, on Job ii.

Job xlii. 15.

Ps. xxiii. 4.

Phil. iv. 11.

MDCXVIII.—Ministers to be men of gravity and experience.

IN the art of navigation, it was a law wont to be seriously observed, that none should be master of a ship, or master's mate, that had not first been a sculler, and rowed with oars, and from thence been promoted to the stern; and in military discipline, a man is first listed a soldier, then riseth by degrees, before he come to be a commander. The Levites, under the law, were first probationers, before they were allowed to be practitioners. Such ought all ministers to be, men of gravity and experience, not such as run before they are sent, and thrust themselves into the vineyard before they be hired—that come from Jericho before their beards be grown; that are young in years, and as young in qualities and Nazianz., in Laud. in Basilii.

Attersol, on Numb. viii.

Jer. xxlii. 21.

Hot. ix. 7.

qualifications relating to the ministry; young Timothys and, possibly, old Demases, that have not shed their colt's-teeth, nor scarce sowed their wild oats; so that it may very well be said of them, "The prophet is a fool; the spiritual man is mad."

MDCXIX.—Worldly policy not to prejudice the truth of a good conscience.

Gen. xxxi. 19.

Lippoman, in Gen.

Seneca, de Benef.
iii.Gesp. Melo, in Matth., xxii.

RACHEL having stolen her father's idols, when he pursued her and came to search for them in the tent, she, having hid them in the camel's litter and sitting upon them, entreated him not to be angry though she rose not up to him, for she was sick, as she pretended, and said it was with her after the manner of women. If, by the custom of women, she would be understood to be in travail, then she told a flat lie, but if, by a trick of mental reservation, she did use that ambiguous phrase with an intention to deceive, then at the best she did but equivocate; and even in so saying and so doing, she made a flat breach of conscience. Thus many amongst us desire to be at as little charge as may be possible, whether to the state or to the Church; and, therefore, when they are pressed by or for either of these, then they are politicly sick in the purse, make themselves poor and needy, and will hardly part with a penny (if they can but with common civility or shameless impudency keep it), which savours not only of unthankful hearts to God, but shows that they have most wretched consciences, caring not what they do so as they may keep that which, falsely, they call their own.

MDCXX.—Holy duties call for holy preparation.

Ps. xxvi. 6.

Job i. 5.

Virgil, Æneid,
lib. ii.Coel. Rhodogin.,
Lect. Var.

Caryll, on Job.

DAVID washeth his hands in innocence before he compasseth God's altar; and Job, intending to sacrifice unto God on the behalf of himself and children, sends to them solemnly to prepare themselves; nay, the very heathens themselves would not admit any to come to their religious services unless they were first prepared—as that of Æneas to his father Anchises, upon his return from the wars, "Tu genitor cape sacra manu;" therefore they had one that cried out to the people, "Procul hinc, procul, este profani, &c. (All you that are unclean and profane, depart hence, and come not near unto us)!" And shall Christians, then, who have learnt better things, touch holy things with unholy hands or unholy hearts? No; they must not, they ought not: holy duties call for holy preparation: they must be sanctified within and without before they come to the performance of any holy duty. It is true that the duty sanctifies, but it is as true that the duty seldom sanctifies unless men be sanctified for the duty; and they get most holiness from the duty who are most holy before they come to it.

MDCXXI.—Attention in hearing God's Word commanded and commended.

Plutarch, in Rom.
Antiquitat.Shute's Serm.,
Lond., 1627.

MANY there are in our day that delight to have rings and jewels hanging at their ears, and they account it a great ornament unto them, whose vanity the poet long since, in a scoffing manner, answered; "It is," saith he, "because they have no fingers on their hands," as if the fingers, not the ears, were made for rings. However, this may be said, that if we had the richest jewels the East or West could afford us, if we had not an ear bored through to the heart, a hearing ear to hear the Word of God, they are no better than jewels in a swine's snout. Oh, the excellency of the jewel of attention—when audire terminates in obedire; when we hear the Word of God and do it; when we understand, believe, and practise what we hear!

MDCXXII.—Worldly policy not to be in anything prejudicial to commutative justice.

KING DAVID was very politic in contriving how to work himself out of the shame of adultery, and his child by Bathsheba out of the shame of bastardy, and, therefore, he so closely carried it, that Uriah was slain, and then he took her to wife; but because it did not stand with justice, first to deprave the wife, then to deprive the husband, this his supposed masterpiece of folly and worldly policy is, amongst many other good characters, brought in as a cross-bar in his arms and a foul blemish in his coat. Thus it is that few of us make any conscience at all of that justice which is commutative, due unto our neighbour. Do we not sometimes swear and lie, and swear falsely, and lay our foundation in the blood of the innocent, rather than we will not build and enlarge our houses—yea, are not many of our buildings raised out of the ruins of Zion? What care we to take advantage of our brother's simplicity? We look upon inferiors with contempt and scorn, use them but as stirrups to mount up into the saddle of our own private ends, or like so many ladders to reach our designs; and when we have got so high as they can help us, then, no matter, though, ladder like, they be hung up by the walls. As for superiors, we either not know or will not acknowledge any, living like the locusts, as if we had no supreme authority, no law, no government, to the great prejudice of the place wherein we live.

Griffiths' Bethel.

1 Kings xv. 5.

"Per fas et nefas."

Downham's Serm., 1640.

Prov. xxx. 27.

MDCXXIII.—The best of men not free from sin in this life.

As a man who, in the morning, washeth his hands and goes abroad about his worldly business, though he doth not puddle in the mire or rake amongst dunghills, yet, when he returns home again at dinner or at night, if he wash, he finds that he hath contracted some uncleanness, and that his hands are foul. There is no man can converse with an unclean and filthy world but some uncleanness must needs fasten unto him. Even so it is with the souls of men: such is the universal corruption of human nature, that the souls of the best, of the purest, of the holiest, though they do not rake in the dunghill and wallow in the mire of sin basely and filthily, yet they do from day to day, yea, from moment to moment, contract some filth and uncleanness. They may be clear from sinning wilfully and with delight, in which sense it is said, "He that is born of God sinneth not," and free from scandalous sins, whereinto many of God's dear children have, through inadvertency, fallen. but they can never acquit themselves from sins of infirmity, such as do inevitably and inseparably cleave unto the best of men, especially considering the state and condition wherein they are, having corrupt flesh and blood about them.

Caryll, on Job.

"Nullus sanctus et justus caret peccato," &c.—AUG.,
Epistol. Dogmat.

1 John iii. 9.

MDCXXIV.—Children of persons excommunicated to be baptized.

ST. AUGUSTINE writing to a young, busy bishop called Auxilius, on the behalf of one Clasicanus, saith, that for the offence of the master of the house, whom he had excommunicated before, he should not therefore excommunicate the rest of the family, and deny them the benefit of the sacrament; "for," saith he, "herein the man may perish that is a friend, and the devil be glad that is an enemy." Thus, in a manner, do they offend who refuse to baptize the children of those that are excommunicated, and such as are born in fornication, because their parents are impenitent; as though the son should bear the iniquity of the father, or the wife of the husband, or he that is not yet born the iniquity of them that are born, contrary to that of Ezekiel.

Ep. lxxv.

"Nullus à baptismo prohibendus est," &c.—AUG., in En-
chirid.

Ezek. xviii. 20.

MDCXXV.—No man so old but he may learn something.

Imp. Rom. Vita.

CHARLES V. gave for his arms Hercules' pillars, with this motto, "Plus ultra," meaning that those pillars, which are two hills at the entrance of the strait's mouth, should not bound his empire, which he intended to extend further, as indeed he did afterwards, to America. Thus it is that old men should do well, if they did sail by his compass, never to set any bounds to their knowledge, not to hug themselves in their great experience, as if there were not a "plus ultra." St. Augustine, in his old age, studied the Greek, and Cato the rudiments of grammar. As for God's school, that doth not only teach the principles, but also the perfection of Divine wisdom, which, not being attained unto even in oldest age, St. John writes as well to you fathers as to you young men and children, intimating that the fathers themselves have as much to learn as the children.

"Ad discendum, quod opus est, nulla zitas aera videri po-
test," &c.—AUG.

Zuingeri Theat.
Hum. Vita.

1 John ii. 13.

MDCXXVI.—Religion not to be made a stalking-horse to policy.

Stiles' Serm.,
Lond., 1696.

ONE of the Trent doctors, being a fisherman's son born, whilst he was of some inferior order, would always cause a net to be spread under his tablecloth when he was to sit down at his meat, and this was to put him in mind from whence he came, and that so he might not at any time be puffed up with any high conceit of his own worth. A good meaning, had it been real; but it so fell out that, being saluted with a red hat from the conclave, the net was presently laid aside, and being desired to tell the reason why it was so, made answer, "I have now caught what I fished for." Thus it is that religion is too, too often made a stalking-horse to worldly policy, so that when they have gotten enough, as they think, from God, they care not for God; and when the fish is caught, they lay by the net, for they do but go a-fishing with holiness and a profession of religion; and when they have their ends, there is an end also of their profession.

"Simulata sanc-titas."

MDCXXVII.—The painful (laborious) minister's joy at the time of his death.

Nysseus, in Vita.

It is said of Gregorius, surnamed Thaumaturgus (wonder-worker), when he asked the question, being now ready to die, how many infidels yet remained in the city Neocæsaria, answer was returned unto him, "Seventeen," that he rejoiced greatly, and comforted himself, and gave thanks unto God, saying, "Totidem erant fideles, &c. (There were only so many faithful and believers when I was made bishop of that place." A great work of God by a wonder-working man! And such will be the crown and rejoicing of all painful and laborious ministers of God's Word and Sacraments, that when they shall be ready to give an account of the souls committed to their charge, that they can do it with joy, and not with grief, that they have been faithful, and looked more after the flock than the fleece, and that it is not with them, as it often falls out with too, too many, whose rising hath been the fall of the Church, and mightiness the miseries thereof.

Ruffin., lib. ii.,
cap. 9.

"Beile agente po-pulo unusquisque pro suo merito remuneratur, sed sacerdos pro bonis omnium," &c.—
CHRYSOST., in Matt. xxv.

MDCXXVIII.—Parents to show good examples to their children.

Dialogo Creatura-rum.

"Probum esse oportet patrem qui gnatum suum," &c.
—PLAUTUS.
Griffiths' Beibel.

WE may read in the fable what the mother-crab said to the daughter: "Go forward, my daughter; go forward!" The daughter replied, "Good mother, do you show me the way!" whereupon the mother, crawling backward and sidling, as she was wont, the daughter cried out, "Lo, mother! I go just as you do!" Let parents, then, be sure that their carriage be just and justifiable, especially in the sight of their children, lest, instead of being their correctors, they prove their corruptors; let them never be able to stop their mouths, and twit them in the teeth, when they reprove them, with their own vicious pattern; as if, where the parents were naught themselves, the children should hold it a kind of sauciness to be good, and had rather be bad for company than their mannerly carriage should seem to teach their betters.

MDCXXIX.—The trial of true and false professors.

As it was with Naomi and her two daughters-in-law, Orpah and Ruth, all the while that she was Naomi (beautiful and had enough), they both stayed with her; but when Naomi became Marah (bitter and empty), then Orpah took her leave of her, but Ruth abode with her still. Here was the trial, whether Orpah or Ruth had the more sincere affection to Naomi; Ruth loves her mother's person, Orpah her outward estate and preferment. Thus, while religion and prosperity go together, it is hard to say which a man follows; but when they are forced to a separation, where the heart was will soon be manifest. Many will hold on with God as long as the sun shineth, as long as it is fair weather, as long as the profession of the Gospel is countenanced; but if the storm arise and troubles come, then they pull in their heads, then they deny and forsake God, then they draw back from and betray His truth. But the upright in heart are like Ruth: whatsoever becomes of the Gospel, they will be sharers with it in the same condition—be it affliction or be it consolation, be it fair weather or be it foul, be it light or be it darkness, they will take their lot with it, whatsoever it be.

Caryll, on Job iii.

Matt. vii. 27.

Ruth i. 16.

MDCXXX.—The necessity of being found with Christ's righteousness.

It is the observation of St. Ambrose, that Jacob, though he were not by birth the first-born, yet, hiding himself under his brother's clothes, and having put on his coat, which smelled most sweetly, came into his father's presence, and got away the blessing from his elder brother. So, it is very necessary that we lie hid under the precious pureness of Christ our Elder Brother, that, having the sweet savour of His garments, our sins may be covered with His perfections, and our unrighteousness with the robes of His righteousness, that so we may offer up ourselves unto God a living and acceptable sacrifice, not having our own righteousness, but that which is only to be found in Christ Jesus.

De Jacob, lib. i., cap. 2.
Gen. xxvii. 36.

2 Cor. ii. 15.

Rom. xii. 1.

MDCXXXI.—The scoffing drunkard's sad condition.

THERE is mention made of a notable soaker, who, being brought before Pyrrhus for railing against him in his cups, said: "It is true that I spake somewhat against thee; and much more should I have spoken, had not the wine failed me!" Thus, it appears, ex confesso, that where men do swill immoderately, they will make every object they light upon matter of reproach; no person shall be free from their derisions: they will observe no laws, reverence no magistrates, respect no friends, spare no cost, regard no religion, keep no church, fear no God: tell them of God's displeasure, like so many Michals, they will jeer you to your face; tell them of Solomon's induction, like so many Edomites, they will make songs of you—all and every of these are but a May-game and a mocking-stock unto them.

Plutarch, in Vita Pyrrhi.

Griffiths' Bethel.

Isa. v. 11.

MDCXXXII.—Graces of the Spirit to be held fast in the midst of temporal losses.

As it is with a man in a wreck at sea, when all is cast overboard, the victuals that feed him, the clothes that should keep him warm, yet he swims to the shore with his life in his hand; or as it is with a valiant standard-bearer, that carries the banner in the time of battle, if he sees all lost, he wraps the banner about his body, and chooseth rather to die in that as his winding-sheet, than let any man take it from him or spoil him of it: he will hold that fast, though he lose his life with it. Thus Job, in all his troubles, is said to hold fast his integrity. And so must all of us do, hold our spirituals whatsoever becomes of temporals; when wife and children and friends and liberty and life and all is going, say unto peace of conscience, to innocency and integrity, as Jacob said to the angel (whether they be those summer-graces of prosperity, as joy and thanksgiving, or the winter-graces of adversity, as patience and perseverance, or the grace of humility that is always in season), "We will not let ye go!" for indeed there is no blessing without them. There is not a man upon the face of the earth but, if he be of a heavenly temper and spiritual resolution, will in the greatest storm, in the hottest assaults, wrap himself round about with his integrity, and will not let it go till he go along with it.

Caryll, in locum

Fullet's Serm.,
Lond., 1652.

MDCXXXIII.—Children not to marry without their parents' consent.

CYRUS, an heathenish king, having conquered Babylon, and returning home in triumph, was offered by his uncle Cyaxares to have his daughter in marriage; but he thanked his uncle, praised the maid, liked well the portion: as for consent to the match, he returns this answer, "Uncle, I commend the stock, and the maid, and the portion; howbeit," saith he, "by the counsel of my father and my mother, I will assent unto you!" as if he had said, "Without their advice, I can do nothing." And thus all dutiful children are content to submit to their parents' directions, and to be ordered by them, especially in the matter of so high concernment as marriage. Thus like Jacob and Samson is the manner of children nowadays, who consult with their parents last of all—nay, regard not their parents' consent at all—but make their choice after the lusts of their eyes and delight of their own deceitful hearts, making up a match in great haste and repenting at leisure.

Xenophon, Cyropæd.
lib. viii.

Attersol, on Numb.

Gen. xxvii. 46.
Judges xiv. 3.

MDCXXXIV.—How it is that wicked, drunken men think well of themselves.

THERE is a story of a Frenchman, that lodging one night in a courtesan's house at Rome, when in the morning he took his gold chain, he found it would go but thrice about his neck, whereas it was formerly wont to go four times, and thereupon he guessed that the courtesan had, as she had indeed, taken away some of the links; but she cunningly dissembling, to excuse her fault, would needs make the Frenchman believe that his head was much swollen that night, and, to confirm her words, she caused him to view himself in a false glass, which made all things seem a great deal bigger than indeed they were; and so, not knowing how to help himself, he was fain to persuade himself that all the fault was in the growth of his head. To this chain may be likened the soul of man, which, being sober, perceives that by intemperance the memory and understanding, which are two main links of it, are taken away; but the devil, like a cunning courtesan, as it were by a false glass, makes men believe it is nothing so, but, on the contrary, that all things are greater than they were—their memory greater, their understanding greater, their strength greater, their wits riper; whereas it is nothing so: their understanding is infatuated, their will perverted, their memory enfeebled, their comeliness deformed, all out of order.

Othon. Melandri
Teco-seria.

Shute's Serm.,
Lond., 1633.

"Multum merum pauca cogit sa-pientia."—MÉNAND.

MDCXXXV.—The evil of division.

The rabbins have a conceit, why, after the work of the second day was finished, God, beholding what He had done, did not add any approbation to it. When He made the light, which was the first day's work, He approves it—God saw the light and said it was good; but to the work of the second day, God subjoined no approbation, by saying it was good. The reason which they give of it is this: because then was the first disunion, that made the first second that ever was; all before was one, sub unissimo Deo (under the one-most God). But to leave this fancy to the Jewish doctors, amongst many others of the like nature, there is somewhat in the notion itself, namely, that division and disunion are the evils of the creature—all natural disunions are the afflictions of natural things; and so civil disunions and civil dissensions are much more the affliction of people and nations. Christ assures us that the strongest kingdom, divided, cannot stand; whereas, contrarily, weak things are strong by union, and that not only by union with the strong, but by union amongst themselves; and things obscure, united, are honourable, especially when united to things that are honourable.

Caryll, on Job.

Plantavit, Florileg. Rabbinicum

Mark iii. 24.

"Vis unita fortior."

MDCXXXVI.—The persons of poor men not to be slighted.

It is reported of Master Fox, the martyrologist, when it was told him that a certain man, of none of the highest or greatest calling, who had received much comfort from him in the days of his trouble, was desirous to acknowledge his thankfulness towards him, and asked him whether he remembered such a one, he answered, "I remember him well; I tell you, I forget lords and ladies to remember such as he is." But now it is otherwise in the world: many there are that look so high, that they cannot discern their lower brother, whom notwithstanding God loveth, for whom Christ died, and to whom the Word of Salvation is preached—nay, so supercilious and lofty are most men, that they look upon a lower, a poorer man, no otherwise than if God had made them so on purpose to be laughed at; but let all such know for a certain, that they are the same with them, and though they have not vestem communem (the same coat), yet they have culem communem (the same skin), and that he that mocketh the poor reproacheth Him that made him.

Greenham's Works.

Attersol, on Philemon.

"Nil habet infelix paupertas durius, in se, quam quod ridiculos homines facit,"—JUVENAL.

MDCXXXVII.—To be careful of extraordinary drinking.

CYRUS, the Persian monarch, being demanded of his grandfather Astyages, why he would drink no wine, answered, "For fear lest they give me poison; for," quoth he, "I noted yesterday, when you celebrated your nativity, that somebody had poisoned all the wine they drank, because, at the taking away of the cloth, not one of all those that were present at the feast arose in his right mind." Let all men take heed, then, how they multiply their cups, as in that feast of Ahasuerus, at Shushan, where every man drank as much as he list; but content themselves with Timothy's modicum, prescribed by St. Paul. "One cup is enough, two are too much, and three too little." But how may that be? When a man hath taken off three, he is fit, if possible, for three hundred, and then ab hilaritate ad ebrietatem lubricus est gradus (he shall find, to his sorrow, that from mirth to madness the step is very slippery).

Xenophon, in Cyropædia.

Esther i. 8.

1 Tim. v. 23.

Lud. Vives, in Exercit. Ling. Lat.

MDCXXXVIII.—The great pains that wicked men take to go to hell.

It is observed of Antiochus Epiphanes, one of the kings of Syria, that he was a most cruel persecutor of the Church, and undertook more troublesome journeys, and went upon more hazardous designs, merely to trouble, vex, and oppose the Church of the Jews, than ever any of his predecessors did about any other conquest or noble enterprise; that he travelled more miles to do mischief—as he that compareth their journeys—than any of the saints did to do good; and thereupon concludes the story of him with this general truth, concerning all wicked men: that they go with more pains to eternal death than the saints to eternal rest; that they toil themselves more and suffer more hardship to work out their own damnation than the godly do to work out their salvation. Thus it is that a wicked, ungodly man is said to “travail with pain all the days of his life,” and wearying himself in the way to hell, doing the devil’s drudgery; and whereas a good man is merciful to his beast, he is unmerciful to himself, and tires himself more than a good man will tire his beast; for he that will follow sin and serve his own lusts—especially the lust of pride and oppression—serveth a hard master; one that will make him sweat for it, and pay him home at last with eternal death. So that the work of sin is bad enough, but, as to the sinner, the wages is worse.

Buntingus, Itinerarium Patriarchæ, &c.

Caryll, in Job.
Job xv. 20.

P. ov. xii. 10.

MDCXXXIX.—Proper names of men not to be so much regarded as appellative.

Adams, in 2 Pet.

“Ex nominis significatione non est judicandum de moribus.”—DEMOSTH.

Holdsworth’s Sermon,
London, 1632.

A POOR shepherd in Germany, when divers, observing the Cardinal of Cologne, and admiring his pomp as a prince, whereas his calling was but a bishop, “O,” says the shepherd, “cum damnatus fuerit rex, quid fiet de episcopo (If the great duke should go to hell for pride, what would become of the humble bishop)?”. Thus, as with titles, so is it with the names of men: it is not the proper name, but the appellative—not the nominal, but the real—that makes a good construction in God’s grammar. Abraham is a good name, but the “father of the faithful” is a better; Moses a good name, but the “servant of God” much better; David a good name, but a “man after God’s own heart” far better. So it may be said of St. John—he had a good name, but to be the “beloved disciple of Jesus Christ” was much beyond it; Paul a good name, but to be a “chosen vessel of the Lord” much more. So that grace is not tied to names. Theodorus, Theodosius, Dorotheus, Theodatus, Deodatus, Adeodatus, all signifying “the gift of God,” may well be given to our children; but it is the grace of God that maketh happy. No man hath the mystery of his fortune written in his name. Names are not prophetic, much less magical; yet the civil use of them is for distinction, nomen quasi notamen, and the religious use of them hath, by good antiquity, been always observed in the sacrament of baptism.

MDCXL.—Excessive drinking condemned.

In Sophocles.

Theopompus, in Hist.
“Αναξ πρηνέας δ είνος.—
PHIL.

Hom. xiii. in Ebricitat. et Luxur.

ANACHARSIS had a saying, that the first draught of wine is for thirst, the second for nourishment, the third for mirth, the fourth for madness; whereupon Calisthenes, being pressed to quaff off a great bowl of wine, which bowl they called “Alexander,” gravely replied that he would not, for drinking of Alexander, stand in need of Æsculapius, i. e., he would drink no more than what should do him good. And it were heartily to be wished that all men were of his mind; but so it is, that nowadays a drunken health, like the conclusion in a syllogism, must not be denied. Yea, such and so excessive is the custom of high drinking, that St. Basil makes it a wonder how the bodies of drunkards, being by nature framed of earth, do not, with so much moisture, dissolve into clay and water.

MDCXLI.—Books of piety and religion testimonial at the great day of judgment.

It is usual, in Scripture, to ascribe a testimony to the more notable circumstances and accidents of human life, as to the rust of hoarded money, to the solemn publications of the Gospel, the dust of the apostles' feet ; and so downward, in the primitive times, when grown persons were baptized, they were wont to leave a stole, or white garment, in the vestry, for a testimony and witness of their baptism : wherefore, when one Elpidophorus had revolted from the faith, the deacon of the church came and told him, " O Elpidophorus ! I will keep this stole as a monument against thee to all eternity ! " And thus it is that books of piety and devotion, being public monuments, are much of this nature—a testimony likely to be produced in the day of judgment, not only against the authors, but the person into whose hands they shall happen to be perused, in case on either side there be any defection, in judgment or manners, from the truths therein expressed.

Matt. x. 14.

Manton, in Præfat.,
Com. in Jacobum.

Nicephorus, in Hist.
Eccles., lib. iii.

MDCXLII.—Atheistical, wicked men, at the hour of death, forced to confess God's judgments.

It is the report of a reverend divine—now with God—concerning an atheist in England : " A young man," says he, " was a Papist, but soon fell into dislike of their superstition. He became a Protestant, but that did not please him long. England could not content him : he reels to Amsterdam ; there he fell from one sect to another, till he lighted upon the Familists. The first principle they taught him was this : there is no God—as, indeed, they had need to sear up their consciences and dam all natural light that turn Familists. Hereupon he fell to a loose life, committed a robbery, was convicted, condemned, and brought to die. At the execution he desired a little time, uttering these words : " Say what you will, surely there is a God, loving to His friends, terrible to His enemies ! " And thus it is that the lowliest reprobates, the most wretched atheists, that spit in the face of heaven and wade deepest in blood, are forced, at the time of death, when they see the handwriting of God's judgments upon the wall, to confess there is a God, who is just in all His ways and wondrous in all His works.

Dr. Westfield.

Julianus, Antiochus.

Dan. v. 5.
Rev. xv. 3.

MDCXLIII.—Fleshly lusts, the danger of them.

It is said of the torpedo, a kind of dangerous sea-fish, that it is of so venomous a nature, that if it chance to touch but the line of him that angles, the poison is thereby derived to the rod, and thence to the hand of him that holds it ; whereupon the party is so benumbed and stupefied on a sudden, that he loseth the use of his limbs. Even so, when enchanting lusts insinuate themselves into, or, indeed, but barely touch upon, voluptuous minds, they grow, with the companions of Ulysses, not only brutish, but withal so senseless, that they have not the power to think a good thought or to do any good action.

Plin., Nat. Hist.,
lib. xxxii., cap. i.

Ovid, Met.

MDCXLIV.—The grand imposture of pretended revelations.

MAHOMET, that grand hellish impostor, often pretended visions from heaven, and the story assures us that he cunningly made use of the disease of his body to persuade his disciples of the soundness of his doctrine ; for being afflicted with the falling-sickness, when at any time a fit was upon him, he made the people believe that he was in an ecstasy, or ravishment of the spirit, at the appearance of the angel Gabriel, who revealed many mysteries unto him ; and having, by long use and familiarity, taught a pigeon to feed at his ear, he by art prevailed with the people to feed at his poisonous mouth, as if his words had been the inspirations of the Holy Ghost, who, as he affirmed, came then to him in the form of a dove, and taught him those secrets. Thus it is, that when vain men, such as the apostle calls " filthy dreamers," would put a new nothing upon the world as an infallible truth, and have it swallowed down without chewing, received without disputing, then

Frid. Sylburgii Mat- bonetica.

Jude 8.

Caryl, on Job iv.

usually they pretend that it is quid divinum (a doctrine or message come down immediately from God), and so shaping their own dark conceptions by the light of Divine revelation, do with the more estimation put off either such points of doctrine or such rules of policy as themselves have only invented.

MDCXLV.—To be favourable in the censure of our brother.

Bleidan's Comment.

"Quid de quoque viro et cui dicas sipe caveto."—HORAT., Ep. 1.

1 Cor. xiii. 5.

In Friesland there was a false prophet, one George David, who called himself God's nephew, and said that heaven was empty, and that he was to choose some to fill it, and none (forsooth) must come there but whom he liked. And we have some amongst us, such mad prophets, that will elect and damn whom they please; but, as themselves say, "The Pope hath no power to make saints," so we may very well say, "They have no authority to make devils." Every man is to be reputed honest till he be disproved: charity thinks no evil.

MDCXLVI.—The world's deceitfulness and treachery.

Treasury of Ancient and Modern Times.

Griffiths' Bethel.

Matt. xxvi. 48.

"Conscientia codex est in quo," &c.—CHRYSOST., in Pr.

It is said of the city of Athens, that it was a goodly place for a philosopher to pass through, for there he should see and hear many things that might better his understanding (it being, as it were, the nurse and mother of all learning), but it was not good for him to stay there, because he could hardly live in safety. So may it well be said of this world, that if a man do but only pass through it, he may behold many admirable works of God to better his knowledge, but, if he take up his abode here, then he is in jeopardy of his life; for the world salutes passengers after a friendly manner, and bids them welcome, but with that proviso to its servants which Judas gave to his complices, "Whomsoever I shall kiss, that is He; hold Him fast!"—treacherously kissing and killing them; entertaining them with a smile, but sending them home not by cheering, but by a weeping cross. It gives them for a while the liberty of the house, to call for what they list; they may have all the deadly sins at their service, but they shall have a cutting reckoning in the end; conscience keeps the bar, and will make them pay with a witness: for, in the very height of their contentments, they shall be arrested upon an action of riot, and (if God's great mercy prevent not) be cast into hell, without bail or mainprize, for ever.

Commonness of the death of others taking away the sense of death.

and roost in steeples, being used to the continual ringing of at all; or as those that dwell near the fall of the river deafens them so, that they mind it not. Thus it is that is made but, as it were, a formal thing: many have the grave is worn out of their hearts; they have gone they are grown familiar with death; they look upon and be buried, and when the solemnity is over, the the grave is out of their sight, preparation for their worldly business, to trading and dealing, that ever should be were buried.

of God's honour condemned.

ed, who, when his father was endangered he cried out, "Parce, rex est (Oh, spare him; he's the king)! " So, when God's glory is in question, what a numbness, what a dumbness is it not to say, "Oh, spare Him; He's the Lord!" Luther will be accounted proud, passionate, enemy to the Pope, or anything, rather than to be found guilty of sinful silence when the cause of God suffereth. To hear blasphemers wound and tear the sweet and sacred name of Christ in pieces would make a dumb man speak, though there be a time (yet an evil time) when a prudent man is to hold his peace.

In Ep. ad Staupium.

MDCXLIX.—The deepest dissembler at one time or other discovering himself.

XENOPHON writes of the Persians, that they taught their children to lie to their enemies and to speak truth to their friends; but they soon forgot their distinction, and so discovered themselves. As it is in the fable: a wolf, being crept into a sheep-skin, went so long to school, till he came to the spelling of his paternoster; and, being asked "What spells P and a," he answered, "Pa;" then, "What spells t-e-r," he answered, "ter." "Put them together," said the master. The wolf cried, "Agnus." "Ore protulit quod in corde fuit," saith the moral, intimating that the deepest dissembler will at one time or other discover himself. No man can personate another long, neither can any so transform himself, but now and then you shall see his heart at his tongue's end. The devil may transform himself into an angel of light, and men may seem to be zealous in a good matter when their hearts are ranging after their lusts; yet, mark them well, and at one time or other you shall find that true which the damsel said unto Peter, "Thou art a Galilean; thy speech bewrayeth thee," &c.

Lib. de Instit. Cyri.

Absternius, in Myth.

"Nemo potest personam fictam diu ferre," &c.—SEN., Ep. ad Neronem.

Mark xiv. 70.

MDCL.—Wise men dying as well as fools.

It is observed concerning Paracelsus (a great physician, and a man exceedingly well versed in chemical experiments), that he bragged and boasted that he had attained to such wisdom in discerning the constitutions of men's bodies, and studying remedies, that whosoever did follow his rules and keep to his directions should never die by any disease : casually he might, and of age he must ; but he would undertake to secure his health against all diseases. A bold undertaking ! But he who, by his art, promised to protect others to the extremity of old age from the arrest of death could not by all his art and skill make himself a protection in the prime of his youth, but died even as one without wisdom, before or when he had seen but thirty. Thus it is that wise men many times do not only die as well as fools, but as fools without wisdom. They that have most worldly wisdom usually die with the least, in not preparing wisely for death : they may be said to have had wisdom, but they died as if they never had had any—that is, they apply not their wisdom while they live to fit themselves for their death ; they die before they understand what it is to live, or why they live ; and so, dying unpreparedly, they die foolishly.

Fuller's Holy State.

Christoph. Pezelii Mellificium Hist.

Eccles. ii. 16.

Caryll, Serm. on Job
iv. 21.

Job iv. 21.

MDCLI.—Neglect of restitution condemned.

A GREAT lady in Barbary, being a widow, called to her an English merchant trading in those parts, with whom she knew her husband had some commerce, and asked him if there were nothing owing to him from her deceased husband. He, after her much importunity, acknowledged what, and showed the particulars. She tendered him satisfaction; yea, and after his many modest refusals, as being greatly benefited by the dead Barbarian, forced him to take the uttermost penny, saying thus: "I would not have my husband's soul to seek your soul in hell, to pay his debts." Here, now, was a fire in a dark vault, great zeal in blind ignorance, seeing that by the candle-light of nature which St. Augustine delivered long since for a doctrinal truth, "Non dimittitur peccatum nisi restituatur ablatum," thus, in Master Latimer's old English, "Either restitution or hell." But—oh, the sadness of these

Adams' Sermon, on
2 Pet.

"Si in ignem mit-tatur, qui non dedit rem propriam, ubi putas mittendus
erit," Sec. — AUG., de Verb. Dom., cap.
xx.

grasping times!—where is the man who restoreth what is unjustly taken away, what hath been indirectly gotten? The estates, credits, goods, and good names of men are taken away by exactions and slanders; but where is the man who maketh restitution? Zaccheus may very well rise up in judgment against such a griping and exacting generation as this is.

MDCLII.—Wives to love their husbands cordially.

Griffiths' Ethel.

It is not without some significancy that the Church, in the solemnity of marriage, ordaineth that there shall be a gold ring: of gold it must be, intimating that love should abound betwixt the married couple—love, the best of graces; and round it must be, to show that love must continue to the end. Besides, this ring must be put by the man upon the fourth finger of the woman, signifying also thereby that, as there is a vein in that finger which correspondeth with the heart, so she should be cordially affected to her husband, having no thought in that kind of any other man as long as he lives whom God, by His ministry, hath given unto her.

Pet. de Clavis Rubell.

MDCLIII.—The wicked man's folly in his worldly choice.

Swinburn's Court of Wards and Liveries.

WHEN an heir is impleaded for an idiot, the judge commands an apple or a counter, with a piece of gold, to be set before him, to try which he will take; if he take the apple or the counter, and leave the gold, then he is cast for a fool, and so held by the judgment of the court as one that is unable to manage his estate, because he knows not the value of things or how to make a true election of what is fittest for him in the way of subsistency. This is the case of all wicked men, thus foolish, and much more: when bugles and diamonds, counters and gold, are before them, they leave the diamonds and gold, and please themselves with toys and baubles; nay, when, which is infinitely more sottish, heaven and hell, life and death, are set before them, they choose hell rather than heaven, and death rather than life—they take the mean, transitory, trifling things of the world before the favour of God, the pardon of sin, a part in Jesus Christ, and an inheritance amongst the saints in light celestial.

"Mutant quadrata rotundis."

MDCLIV.—Custom in sin hardly broken off.

Abbemill Mytholog.

THERE is an apologue, how four things, meeting, boasted their incomparable strength: the oak, a stone, wine, and custom. The oak stood stoutly to it, but a blast of wind came and made it bow; the axe felled it quite down. Great is the strength of stones, yet gutta cavat (a continual dropping) wears them away, and a hammer beats them to pieces. Wine overthrows giants and strong men, senators and wise men, et quid non pocula possunt? yet sleep overcomes wine. But custom invicta manet (remains unconquered). Hence it was that the Cretians, when they cursed their enemies, did not wish their houses on fire, nor a sword at their hearts, but that which in time would bring on greater woes, that mala consuetudine delectentur (they might be delighted with an ill custom). And, to say truth, custom in sin is hardly broken off. When vices are made manners, the disease is made incurable; when, through long trading and custom in sin, neither ministry, nor misery, nor miracle, nor mercy, can possibly reclaim, a man may very truly write on that soul, "Lord, have mercy on it!" for custom is not another nurture, but another nature, and what becomes natural is not easily reduced: it is the principal magistrate of man's life, the guide of his actions; and as we have inured ourselves at the first setting out in this world, so commonly we go on, unless we be turned by miracle, and changed by that which is only able to do it, the grace of God.

"Laqueo tenet ambiciosi consuetudo mali."—JUVENAL.

Shute's Serm.,
Lond., 1627.

MDCLV.—Wives to be subject to their husbands.

WHEN the sun is down the moon takes upon her the government of the heavens, and outshines the stars, yet not without borrowing her best light from the sun ; but when the sun appears she veils her light, and by degrees vanisheth out of sight : so the wife, in her husband's absence, shines in the family, tanquam inter ignes luna minores (like the fair moon amongst the lesser stars) ; but when he comes in it will be her modesty to contract and withdraw herself, by leaving the government to him only. Cardinal Wolsey's "Ego et rex meus (I and my king)" is insupportable in politics ; so "I and my husband" is insufferable in economics : for let but the moon get the upper hand of the sun, the wife over her husband, the glory of that family must needs be eclipsed.

Horatius.

Burton's Melancholy.

MDCLVI.—The safety of God's people.

PLUTARCH, in the relation of Alexander's wars, saith, that when he came to besiege the Sogdians, a people who dwelt upon a rock, or such as had the munition of rocks for their defence, they jeered him, and asked him whether his soldiers had wings or not. "Unless your soldiers can fly in the air, we fear you not!" Such is the safety of God's people : He can set them upon a rock so high, that no ladders can be found long enough to scale their habitations, nor any artillery or engine strong enough to batter them down : so that, unless their adversaries have, and those more than eagles' wings, to soar higher than God Himself, they cannot do them the least annoyance—their place of defence is the munition of the rocks, safe enough from all dangers whatsoever.

Plutarch, in Vita.

Caryll, on Jeb.

Isa. xxxiii. 16.

MDCLVII.—Not to consent unto sin.

WHEN Lucretia, that gallant Roman lady, was ravished by Tarquin, Augustus makes this observation : "Duo fuerunt et unus adulterium admisit (There were two persons, and but one adulterer) ;" a conjunction of bodies, but a distraction of minds. This is the direct condition of every regenerate man : sin is rather done on him than of him ; there will be sensus, but his care is that there shall not be consensus, nor the least consent unto sin : though lust yield, and sin must be bred, yet he is sure to lock up the midwife of consent, that it may prove an abortive brood, be stifled in the womb, and still-born. And thus ought all of us to do : if sinners entice us, not to consent unto them. All of us have lust about us, a very body of death ; Satan, the father, is ready ; Lust, the mother, is willing ; keep away Consent, the midwife, that though sin be done upon us, we may have this inward comfort, that we consented not.

Sueton., in Vita.

Adams, on a Ps.

Prov. i. 10.

Rom. vii. 24.

MDCLVIII.—Children to submit to their parents' correction.

It is said of Ælian, that after he had been long absent from his father, and being asked what he had learned, answered, he should know that ere long ; and in the meantime, his father correcting him, he took it in good part, and said, "Sir, you see I have learned somewhat, for I have learned to bear with your anger, and patiently to endure what you please to inflict upon me." Thus it is that children should show their obedience, in quietly bearing their parents' corrections—the rod of correction being monile ingenuorum, such a jewel that it makes God's jewels of so many as willingly submit thereunto. It is the unum necessarium, a most necessary lesson to be learned—necessary for parents, because they are bound to do it, and for children, because they are by God commanded to suffer it.

Rhodogin., Lect. Var., lib. xxii., cap. 22.

Prov. xv. 5.

Nazianz., de Plaga Grandin.

MDCLIX.—The different effects of the Gospel preached.

As the same light of the sun offendeth weak eyes, but comforteth those that are stronger-sighted; and as the heat thereof hardens clay, but softens wax; or as the same star is to some φωσφόρος, to others ἑσπερός (to some a morning star, ushering in light and day, and to others an evening star, bringing darkness and night): so the Gospel is preached indifferently to all manner of persons, παντὶ τῷ λαῷ (to all people); but it works in a different manner. It hath not the like effect on all people; forasmuch as, being received by the faithful, it produceth in them life and salvation, as containing all the causes thereof in itself; but being rejected by unbelievers, it becometh in them the occasion of a greater condemnation, and makes their perdition inevitable: to some it is a comfort, to others a terror; the rise of one man, and the fall of another.

*Annotat. of Sundry Divines on 2 Cor.
ii. 1.*

1. Luke ii. 34.

MDCLX.—Content with God's good pleasure a great blessing.

WHEN Æsop, with the rest of his fellow-slaves, were put to carry burthens to a city, one chose to carry this merchandise, another that; every one had his choice; and Æsop chose to carry the victuals. Every one laughed at this, that he, being the weakest, had elected the heaviest burthen. Away they went together, and after some miles, they went to breakfast—his burthen was the lighter for that; then to dinner—it was lighter still; then to supper—now it was easy: the next day they had eaten up all his burthen, and he went empty to the city, whither they, being laden, could not reach. Thus it is in the world: the covetous man chooseth gold for his burthen; the proud, fine clothes; the ambitious, mountains of honour; every worldling his several luggage; but a child of God contents himself with God's good pleasure, and sets up his rest with that of St. Paul, if he have food and raiment, therewith to rest contented; and so he goes the lighter to heaven.

In eius Vita.

"Trabit sua quemque voluntas."

1 Tim. vi. 8.

MDCLXI.—Children to be carefully educated by parents.

It was a saying of Alexander, that he was as much beholden to Aristotle for his breeding, as to Philip, his father, for begetting him: "for the one," said he, "gave me a being; the other, a well-being." St. Paul was brought up at Gamaliel's feet; Timothy was instructed in his youth; and King Saul tells David that Goliath was a man of war from his youth up. All this to show that children should be carefully and religiously educated by their parents; for they can never fight the Lord's battles as they should that are not sworn soldiers in their very swaddling clouts. What attacks lies that man open to who wants manners and religious education! Every one espies, and either jeers or pities, his breeding; every step he treads and word he speaks bewrays him to a kind of nothing in the habit of somebody. He is commonly used like a whetstone, for every one to sharpen their wit upon; and if at any time he counterfeit and look big, yet he may be easily discovered to be an ass, for all the lion's skin that he stalks in.

Ptolearch, Apophthegm.

1 Sam. xvii. 33.

*Leech's Sermon,
London, 1724.*

MDCLXII.—God loveth a cheerful giver.

It is Pliny's observation, that never any good came to a man by offering a beast in sacrifice, "remitentem et se trahentem ab aris (such a one as violently drew back from the altar and could not be brought to it)," but, as it is said, "like a bear to the stake," with much force. Thus it is in the matter of charity and liberality: that which is extorted from a man he properly giveth not. Liberality implieth liberty, and necessity and liberty in this kind cannot well stand together. God loveth a cheerful giver, because he gives his heart

"Hic est gratum si quid opus est ultro feras."

*Annotat. of Sundry Divines, &c.
2 Cor. ix. 7.*

first to Him before he give his alms to the poor, and, giving that with lightsome countenance, he more refresheth the receiver, giving him hope of future bounty. "Bis dat qui cito dat (He that gives quickly gives twice)," said the heathen—first to the expectation, then to the necessity, of his wanting brother; and with such a giver God is well pleased.

MDCLXIII.—An uncharitable rich man no heavenly-minded man.

WHEN Dionysius, the Syracusan tyrant, saw what heaps of gold and silver his son had hoarded up in his closet, he asked him what he meant to let it lie there, and not to make friends with it, to get the kingdom after his decease. "O fili, non est in te animus regni capax (Son, thou hast not a spirit capable of a kingdom)!" says he. And thus, we may safely conclude, wheresoever we see a wealthy, rich man piling up his bags, and purchasing the whole country about him, and yet perceive no works of charity or piety in him, that he is no heavenly-minded man, and justly say of him, "Non est in illo animus regni cœlorum capax (He hath not a soul capable of the kingdom of heaven)!"

Justin., lib. 4.

"Nihil miserius est quam propter nummos Deum contemnere."—AMBROS., in Ep.

MDCLXIV.—Children to set their hands to all honest employments.

THE patriarchs of old were principal men and princes in their generations, yet their tender daughters were brought up in doing household business. Rebekah went, with her pitcher on her shoulders, to give drink to her father's camels; and the seven daughters of the Priest of Midian accustomed themselves to draw water and fill the troughs to water their father's sheep; and some say—how true, is uncertain—that Christ Himself wrought as a carpenter at His father's trade. Such was the harmless simplicity of those days, and such was the obedience of children, that even she that was appointed to be the mother of patriarchs, prophets, and kings, refused not to set her hand to ordinary employments. But how is the case altered in these days of ours! Our delicate damsels are ready to urge Rebekah's example for the wearing of bracelets and jewels about their necks, but they will not hear of Rebekah's carrying the pitcher upon her shoulders; they would be clothed like the lilies of the field, but they cannot endure to spin nor work at all: so that, whereas Solomon's good housewife laid her hands to the wheel, they, for want of taking pains—especially if once married—set all upon wheels, and, while they do nothing, they undo themselves, and bring all to nothing.

Griffiths' Bethel.

Gen. xxiv. 17.

Exod. ii. 16.

Baronius.

Prov. xxxi. 13.

MDCLXV.—The right use of human learning in divinity.

IT is seen by experience, that when a man crops a flower from the earth he can get nothing out of it but the sweetness of the smell or delightfulness of the colour; but when the diligent bee comes, he will make another manner of work with it: he will extract honey, which is, as it were, the very spittle of the stars. So, when simple, carnal-minded men read the poets and the philosophers, they gather nothing but delight and pleasure; but when the diligent bee comes, a wise man, a serious considerate man, he draws honey and comfort out of them; or, which is more to the purpose, as a man that cometh into a garden of roses, and seeing them blush upon him, is not afraid to pluck one, yet in the meantime he hath a great care that he do not prick his fingers; so, in the reading of the poets and philosophers, we should pluck the rose but shun the thorn or prickle—always take the best, and be sure to avoid that which is harmful; for the mixture is such, that as the rose grows in the midst of thorns, so the doctrine of the poets is mixed with barbarism, superstition, and corruption.

Basilius.

Featly's Clavis Mystica.

Greg. Nazianzen.

MDCLXVI.—Drunkenness a great punishment of itself.

Radulph. Fornerius,
Select., lib. iii.

"Ubi regnat ebrietas ratio exultat," &c.—RAVEN.

Prov. xxiii. 29.

THERE is mention made of a monk at Prague, who, having heard at shrift the confessions of many drunkards, wondered at it, and for experiment would try his brain with this sin, so accordingly stole himself drunk. Now, after the vexation of three sick days, to all that confessed that sin he enjoined no other penance but this, "Go and be drunk again." Surely his meaning was like that of Seneca, sceleris in scelere supplicium (that drunkenness was a torment and affliction to itself). And most certain it is, that besides all other plagues, drunkenness is a woe to itself. When the carouser pours in his wine it troubles him, and he would give somewhat to avoid it; when it offends the stomach, it troubles him worse; when it comes up again, it troubles him worst of all: so that the merry madness of a few hours is paid home with the affliction of a tedious age.

MDCLXVII.—Men to be careful in the choice of servants.

In Hist. Tripart.

2 Tim. iv. 10.
3 John 9.

Griffiths' Bntel.

Ps. ci. 6, 7.

CONSTANTIUS, the father of that good emperor Constantine, gave it out upon a time, that all such Christians as would not leave their religion and deny the faith should be deprived both of their honours and their offices, and thereupon some (with Demas and Diotrephes, loving pre-eminency) forsook Christ and embraced this present world; others stood confidently to it, accounting all but dung and dross in comparison of Christ, with whom they chose rather to die than, for life or liberty, honour or offices, to deny Him. When the emperor had by this means made a perfect discovery who were true Christians and who false, by a public edict he banished all the halting hypocrites out of his dominions, saying, they would never be faithful to him who were false unto their God. And what he then said of subjects may as truly now be said of servants, "They can never be faithful to their masters that are false to their Maker." It doth, therefore, concern men to take up David's resolution, to be careful in the choice of their servants, and to entertain such only as have been well principled in religion, such as have been well instructed in their duties to God and man; if otherwise, they may prove to be poison to their children, moths to their wardrobes, thieves to their store, and an ill example to the whole family.

MDCLXVIII.—The necessity of using human learning in divinity.

Day, on 1 Cor. xv.

Acts xvii. 28.

Tit. i. 12.

Diog. Laert.

Matt. vii. 12.

Luke iv. 23.

"Sacerdotis est,
in omni doctrina esse versatum," &c.—AMBROS,
in Hexam.

IT was the saying of Menander, who lived three hundred years before St. Paul, "Evil words corrupt good manners;" of Aratus, "We are the workmanship of God;" and of Epimenides, "The Cretians are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies;"—all three of them men famous in their generations, though such as knew not God nor had any glimpse of the Gospel of Jesus Christ; yet the great doctor of the Gentiles scorns not their sayings, but brings them into the garden of God, and there makes as so many flowers of them—nay, Christ Himself owns Socrates and Plato, the one for that golden rule, "Quod tibi non vis fieri, &c." (Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them), and the other for that excellent caution, "Medice, cura teipsum (Physician, heal thyself)." Vain, then, must needs be the opinion of such that think there is nothing to be uttered in sermons or other divine discourses but Scripture. Alas! they understand not what perfection God requires to be in him that is truly called a man of God—one fitted to every good work, that can speak to a poet after the manner of a poet, and to a philosopher in the language of a philosopher; which, unless he can do, and so accommodate himself to the party with whom he deals, it is impossible he should be a fit and complete man in the service of God, the neglect whereof hath been a great inlet to idleness, negligence, and ignorance in the study of divinity.

MDCLXIX.—Blessedness of the poor in spirit in the matter of hearing God's Word.

It is fabled that when Juno, on a day, had proclaimed a great reward to him that brought her the best present, there came in a physician, a poet, a merchant, a philosopher, and a beggar. The physician presented a hidden secret of nature, a prescript able to make an old man young again; the poet an encomiastic ode of her bird, the peacock; the merchant, a rare hollow jewel to hang at her ear; the philosopher, a book of strange mysteries; the poor quaking beggar, only a bended knee, saying, "I have nothing that is worth acceptance: accipe meipsum (take myself)." Thus it is that many come unto God, in the hearing of His Word, with prescripts of their own—they have receipts enough already, they care for no more; others, like the poet, come to admire peacocks, the gaudy popinjays and fashionists of the time, all to be daubed with gold and silver feathers; others, like the merchant, present jewels, but they are hollow—they come with critical or hypocritical humours, like carps, to bite the net and wound the fisher, not to be taken; some, like the philosopher, bring a book with them which they read, without minding the preacher, saying they can find more learning there than he can teach them; but blessed are the poor in spirit, that, like the beggar, give themselves to God—Juno gave the reward to him, and God gives the blessing to these. It is a poor, reverently devoted heart that carries away the comfort, godliness in the humble dust of adoration, that shall be lifted up by the hand of mercy.

Imagines Deorum, per Curtium.

Adams's Exposit. on 2 Pet.

Luke i. 51.

MDCLXX.—Christ to be our example and pattern of imitation in life and death.

ST. JEROME having read the life and death of Hilarion (one that lived most Christianly and died most comfortably), folded up the book, saying, "Well, Hilarion shall be the champion that I will follow: his good life shall be my example, and his godly death my precedent." How much more, then, should each of us first read with diligence the life and death of Jesus Christ, and then propound Him to ourselves as the most absolute pattern for our imitation; resolving, by the grace of God, that Christ shall be the copy after which we will write, the pattern which we will follow in all things that He hath left within the sphere of our activity: so also in that necessary duty of preparation of death; He did so (John xiv.), and we must do so: for, as in shooting, there is a deliberate draught of the bow, a good aim taken before the loose be given, so, if ever we look for comfort in death, we must look at death through the preparation for it.

Hier. Guadalupe, in Vita.

Price's Sermon, Lond., 1619.

MDCLXXI.—The greatest of things wrought by God without means.

As when Gideon was to fight with the Midianites, pretending that his army was but few: "How many hast thou?" saith the Lord. So many thousand. "They are too many;" the Lord will not have them all, but commands them to be reduced to one half, and yet there were too many: the Lord would not work by them; they were too strong. At last He comes to make choice of them by lapping in the water; then they came to three hundred men, to fight against three hundred thousand—for it is said they covered the earth like grasshoppers. And now the Lord begins to work by these men. And how doth He work? By weapons? No; but with a few broken pitchers in their hands: and they had the day of it—the Midianites He delivered up into their hands as a prey. This was a wonderful act of the great God, who, not tied to means, wrought out victory by His own arm. It is true that means and second causes He hath much honoured in the world, and commands them to be used; but when He comes to effect great things, such as was the redemption of mankind by Christ, such as shall be the resurrection of the dead at the last day, then such means and causes as seek to set Him forward He rejects them, and works not by them, but the clean contrary. The greater stench the bodies have sustained in the grave shall work it unto greater sweetness; and the greater weakness it had, the greater strength shall accrue unto it; and wondrous puissance shall God work unto that part that lacked honour, according to His blessed dispensation in all things.

Judges vii. 4.

Day, on 1 Cor. xv.

MDCLXXII.—Not to be angry with our brother.

Plutarchi Agraph.

"Vince animos iramque tuam."—
OVID, Ep. iii.

A RAILING fellow fell very foul upon Pericles, a man of a civil and Socratical spirit, and he left him not all the day long, but continued till he had brought him to his own doors in the evening, somewhat late at night; he, all this while not returning one unbecoming word, commanded one of his servants, with a torch, to light the brawler home to his house. Thus did he by the dim light of nature; and therefore, if a brother offend us upon ignorance, let us neglect it; if upon infirmity, forget it; if upon malice, forbear it; upon what terms soever, forgive it, as we would have God to forgive us. It is a saying, that every man is either a fool or a physician: so every Christian is either a madman or a divine—a madman, if he give his passions the rein; a divine, if he qualify them.

MDCLXXIII.—The natural man's blindness in spiritual things.

Cæli Rhodog., Var.
Lect., lib. xvii.

Jellani Var. Hist.

Strong's Serm.,
Westm., 1650.

Acts ix. 18.

2 Cor. iv. 8.

WHEN Zeuxis drew his masterpiece, and Nicostratus fell into admiration of the rareness thereof, highly commending the exquisiteness of the work, there stood by a rich ignorant, who would needs know what he had discovered worthy of so great applause. To whom Nicostratus made this answer: "My friend, couldst thou but see with my eyes, thou wouldst soon see cause enough to wonder as well as I do. Thus it is that the dear children of God have inexhaustible treasure even in the midst of poverty, transcendent dignity in the midst of their disgraces, height of tranquillity in the very depth of tribulation: their pulse and locusts relish better than all the glutton's delicious fare; their sheep-skins, goat-skins, and camel's hair wear finer than all the purple and soft raiment; the world's hate makes them happier than all the applauses of the capitol. Now, the sensual, carnal naturalist sees none of all this; he perceives not the things of the Spirit—neither can he, for they are spiritually discerned; no man knows them but he that hath them: but had he spiritual sight, were but the scales fallen off from his eyes, as they did from St. Paul's at the time of his conversion, then he would clearly see and say, as the same St. Paul did, that, though we suffer tribulation in all things, yet we are not distressed; we are brought into perplexities, yet we are not forsaken.

MDCLXXIV.—Negligent hearing of God's Word condemned.

Shute's Serm.,
Lond., 1627.

A SERVANT, coming from church, praiseth the sermon to his master. He asks him, "What was the text?" "Nay," quoth the servant, "it was begun before I came in." "What was, then, his conclusion?" He answered, "I came out before it was done." "But what said the preacher in the midst?" "Indeed, I was asleep in the midst." Thus many there are that crowd to get into the church, but make no room for the sermon to get into them; commend the preacher to other men's ears, but commend it not to their own hearts—audiunt sonum sed nullam vocem (they hear a sound, but for sound doctrine, that is the least part of their attention).

MDCLXXV.—God Himself to be only expected as a reward of all good endeavours.

THE doctors of Douay, in their edition of Thomas of Aquinas' Summa Theologia, have pictured him on the title-page kneeling before a crucifix, which they feign to speak unto him thus, "Bene scripsisti de me, Thoma, &c. (Thou hast written well of me, Thomas; say what reward wilt thou have.)" To which he seems to reply, "Nullam, Domine, nisi teipsum (None, Lord, but Thyself)." Now, quod illi pice et fice, that which they forge and feign of Aquinas, must be true of every one of us thus far: we must expect and desire no other reward for all our service of God (both in life and in death), but only God Himself, for He is all in all.

Griffiths's Barbal, or God's House.

MDCLXXVI.—Hope of future joy sweeteneth present sorrow.

THE slaves that serve the Turks in their galleys, if they could but think that, at seven years' end, some Christian would come and redeem them, would be better affected and tug at the oar with more cheerfulness and alacrity of spirit, especially if they could be assured of their delivery. If Jacob serve the churl Laban seven years longer, if he think he shall have Rachel at the end of it, it will be but as seven days, and he goes on with comfort and is content that God shall use him to His hand as it pleaseth Him. Thus it is that the hope of better things sweeteneth the present sadness of any outward condition. There is no grief so heavy but, if a man tie heaven at the end of it, it will become light; put but them together, and the one will be swallowed up in the other. If the times be bad, hope for better, the expectation whereof will be an excellent lenitive to allay the smart of present calamity.

Alphonse, ab Avendano, Com. in Matt.
vi.

Gen. xxix.

Rom. viii. 18.

MDCLXXVII.—The law abused by libertinism.

AS, upon some great solemn festival day, the bells in all steeples are rung, but then the clocks are tied up; there is great untuned confusion and clangour, but no man knows how the time passeth away: so, at this time, in the universal allowance of liberty by the Gospel—which, indeed, rejoiceth our hearts, had we the grace of sober usage—the clocks that should tell us how our time passeth, truth and conscience, which show the bounded use and decent form of things, are tied up, and cannot be heard. Men give so general an acclamation to the Gospel, and the salvation by it, that they keep not the law at all.

Adams's Exposit. on
2 Pet.

"Verus amor
Christi, vera est custodia legis."— ANTHOL., Sacra.

MDCLXXVIII.—How to think of God in prayer.

THERE is mention made of a Gentile and a Christian, and the Christian, being upon his knees unto God in prayer, the Gentile, using to have the image of his false god before his eye, asked him, "Who do you pray to?" The Christian replied that he knew not. "How?" says the Gentile; "pray to you know not whom?" "O," says the Christian, "ideo adoro quia ignoro, &c. (I do therefore adore Him because I am ignorant of Him; for could I but either apprehend or comprehend Him, He were not worthy of prayer—He should be my God no longer)." Thus, when we make our addresses unto God in prayer, we must have a care that we do not frame anything in our thoughts of His essential property; that were to set up some idolatrous image in our hearts; but to think of Him in His attributes, especially those of His majesty, goodness, power, mercy, &c.—such as may raise our conscience to draw more nigh unto Him; and then, being, as it were, in a divine rapture, nonplussed and overwhelmed with admiration of Him, is the only time of adoration and supplication unto Him.

De Cusa, Dial. de
Posse.

White's Serm.,
Lond., 1653.

MDCLXXIX.—A child of God triumphing over death.

It hath been an ancient proverb, when a man had done some great matter, he was said to have plucked a lion by the beard ; but when a lion is dead, even to little children it hath been an easy matter. As boys, when they see a bear, a lion, or a wolf dead in the streets, they will pull off their hair, insult over them, and deal with them as they please ; they will trample upon their bodies, and do that unto them, being dead, which they durst not in the least measure venture upon whilst they were alive : such a thing is death—a furious beast, a ramping lion, a devouring wolf, the helluo generis humani (eater up of mankind) ; yet Christ hath laid him at his length, hath been the death of death ; so that God's children triumph over him, such as those refined ones in the ore of the Church, those martyrs of the primitive times, that cheerfully offered themselves to the fire and to the sword, and to all the violence of this hungry beast, and have played upon him, scorned and derided him, by the faith that they had in the life of Christ, who hath subdued him to Himself.

Day, on 1 Cor. xx.

"In me convertite ferum."

1 Cor. xv. 57.

MDCLXXX.—To be diligent hearers of the Word of God, and remember what we hear.

It is said of our country, that we have fair houses, but bad chimneys, because there is so little smoke of hospitality ; and it may as truly be said that we have excellent ears, but bad memories—quick perceptions, bad retentions. Not a nation under heaven hears so many good sermons, not a nation under heaven sooner forgets them. Many arts are taught amongst us—of quick reading, of short writing, where, by brachygraphical (shorthand) characters, they will take a sermon verbatim ; but there is one art—it were heartily to be wished that some good body would teach it us—it is the art of memory, that, as sermons are taken word for word in our papers, so they might be written sense for sense in our hearts.

Squire's Serm.,
Lond., 1637.

"Memoria sit scriba intus ma-nens."—ARISTOT.

MDCLXXXI.—Reconciliation to be made with all men.

SUPPOSE a creditor, to whom a man is engaged, by bond or otherwise, and, upon forfeiture, should put the bond in suit ; the law is open, the judge must do right, the penalty is imprisonment. Were it not, then, a high part of wisdom, by way of arbitration or otherwise, to come to some agreement before the matter come to trial, that so, by withdrawing the action, the party concerned may be drawn out of danger ? The like is every man's case here in this world, in the point of brotherly reconciliation. Whether thou be wronged or have wronged, seek peace and pursue it, and that now, in the acceptable time, speedily, without demurs ; for thou art waylaid by death, and knowest not how soon thou shalt be arrested. If thou come without charity before God's tribunal seat, the angels are His sergeants, hell His prison, devils His hangmen, fire and brimstone His rack. Judgment must pass, execution will follow, and then to desire a composition will be too late ; the law must pass, and the Judge will prove inexorable.

Abulens, in Matt.
v. 25.

Prideaux, in idem.

"Pone vesanos animi tumores, teque pietati refer."
—SEN., in Theb.

MDCLXXXII.—The saints' everlasting peace.

Plutarch, de Numa et Rom. Fato.

THERE was in Rome a temple dedicated to Janus, the tutelar god of that city, the doors whereof stood open all the while they were in war, and shut all the time of peace ; but they were so cumbered with enemies abroad, that in eight hundred years together the doors were but thrice shut. They were open to show that the wars were open, and therefore they gave their god leave to go out and in to succour them, or else, they thought, his arm could not reach, his power could not extend, to their relief ; and when the wars were ceased, they shut the doors to keep in their god, as having no occasion to use him—a ridiculous and foolish conceit! But, for the saint's comfort, when God shall be pleased to give to this corruption incorruption, and to this mortal immortality, then there shall be for ever a cessation from war; the Temple of Janus shall never be opened again, it shall be shut to all eternity: there shall be no cause of war, but the people of God shall live in perfect peace; under the defence of His protection shall they be secured for ever.

"Certe pax optima ierum."— AUGUSTIN.

MDCLXXXIII.—To make our calling and election sure.

THERE is a tale of an old usurer, who had nothing in his mouth but "It is good to be sure." If his servant went to receive money, he would follow him. Why? "Oh, it is good to be sure." Though himself had locked the door, yet he must needs rise out of his bed in the cold, to feel it fast. Why? "Oh, it is good to be sure." Let him have told his money never so often over, yet he will tell it again. Why? "Oh, it is good to be sure." It came to pass that he fell very dangerously sick, and his servant, perceiving little hope of life in him, asked him, "Master, have you said your prayers?" "Yes, I have said them." "Nay, but say them again, master; you know, it is good to be sure." "No," says the worldling, "it is more than needs; I am sure enough of that." He bids his servant open his chest, and bring him all his gold in it, to look upon. The honest servant, willing to work his master to repentance, having opened it, told him, "Master, the devil is in the chest; he lays his paw upon all the gold, and says it is all his, because it was extracted out of the life-blood of widows, orphans, and poor wretches." "Says he so?" quoth the extortioner. "Then bring me the gold, the chest, the devil, and all. It is good to be sure." And hence, it may be, it is, that usually wicked men are said to get the devil and all. Thus, the voice of nature is all for the matter of security in all purchases, bargains, and sale; but as for the things that concern eternal bliss—how to make out evidences for heaven, to make their calling and election sure—no care is taken at all for that. But a day will come when the purchase of their lands, the leases of their houses, bonds and specialties of their moneys, with the great care of keeping their shop books exactly, will be as so many bills, to rise up in judgment against them.

Speculum Exemplorum.

Granatens., De Pecatorum.

"Quærenda pecunia primum est, virtus post nummos."

MDCLXXXIV.—Repentance not to be put off till old age.

COMMON experience teacheth that a ship, the longer it leaketh, the harder it is to be emptied; a house, the longer it goes to decay, the worse it is to repair; and a nail, the farther it is driven in, the harder it will be to get out. Such is the condition of repentance put off till old age. Let us not, then, think to sacrifice our health and youth to the service of sin and Satan, and leave God only the dog-days of our age, a body full of sores, and a soul full of sin. Is it to be thought that the trembling joints, the dazzled eyes, the fainting heart, the failing legs of unwieldy, drooping, and undisciplined old age, may empty, repair, pluck out, the leaks, the ruins, and nails of so many years' flowing, failing, and fastening, and so make that the task of our old age which should be the practice of all our life; settling our everlasting, our only, our surest making or marring upon so tottering, sinking, and sandy foundation as old age is.

Prideaux' Serm.,
Oxon, 1636.

"Senectus ipsa totus morbus," &c.—
TERENCE.

MDCLXXXV.—The uncertainty of temporal victories and successes.

WHEN Philip of Macedon had obtained a great victory at Cheronia, being puffed up with success, he wrote to Archimedes in such lofty expressions, that enforced this slight answer: "Sir," saith he, "you write very stately to me, and in very high terms—the reason

Liv., Hist., libe XXXI.

"Terciti quò fata ferant, ubi sistere
detur."—VIRG.

Day, in 1 Cor. xv.

I partly know; but, if you will but take so much pains as to measure your own shadow, you shall soon find that it is no more, no longer, no larger, than it was before your victory. You were as great a man then, and as many inches about as you are now, &c.; and what you may be, and how soon, you know not." Such and so uncertain is chance (as men call it), and success so variable, that no man can tell how he shall begin or where he shall end. Inter utrumque volat, so mutable are the smiles of the world, that there is no victory constant; but still she hovers about, moves and changes her tent and tabernacle from one side to another. Hence no boasting or bragging in these earthly conquests, which have made the greatest emperors of the world, after a full gale of fortune, for fear of cross blows, to retreat and leave their honours, and betake themselves to a solitary and monastic life, lest they should have a foul end after a so fair beginning.

MDCLXXXVI.—The place of purgatory a mere dream.

Hondius, in *Treb.
Univers. Mundu.*

Bellarmino, de Purgat., lib. i., cap. 7.

In Fine, lib. xii.

Lomb, Dist. 45,
lib. iv.

St. Augustin., de Peccat. Remiss., cap.
xxviii.

SOME of the geographers, for the proving of a black rock, many hundred miles about, seated directly under the North Pole, send us to Gyraldus Cambrensis, he to a priest of Norway, the priest to an Oxford magician—who was carried thither to see it by the devil, if we will believe the narration. So the best proofs of our adversaries for their subterranean purgatory comes by many deductions from the same author, as it appeareth by the divers apparitions they so confidently allege of it. One of their greatest champions is fain to rake hell itself to find out purgatory, and, like that lunatic in Athenus, that thought all the ships to be his own that arrived in the haven at Athens. So, wheresoever there is of fire doubtfully mentioned in Scripture, it is straightway conveyed by him to heat Purgatory Kitchen. The Fathers father not (howsoever the great cardinal marshal them) any glowing or local purgatory, but, rightly understood, are as far from it as it from truth. Take one for all: "Non est ullus ulli locus medius, ut possit esse nisi cum diabolo qui non est cum Christo (There is no medium place; he must needs be in hell with the devil that is not in heaven with Christ)."

MDCLXXXVII.—Men by nature desirous of things unlawful and prohibited.

Adams's Serm.,
Lond., 1623.

"Non quia cocta, sed quia capta."

"Nitimur in vetitum semper," &c.
—OVID.

It was the saying of an ingenious, witty divine, that our grandmother Eve got such a cold in Paradise, that all her posterity have ever since had a cough of the lungs; nothing will down with them but forbidden fruit. Would you have a book sell well, the stationer will soon find a way for that: let it be but prohibited and called in by authority. The only way to make a woman be a blab of her tongue is to bid her keep counsel. Venison is nothing so sweet (they say) as when it is stolen, and then it comes to be dear many times with a witness. Thus it is that nothing more inflames the natural affections of men than the prohibition of things they desire: they long to be meddling with the forbidden morsels of sin; they love to eat that on earth which they may chance to digest in hell. It is quite against the nature of man to be confined, to be limited; he will have his own will, though it be contrary to the will of God; though he get hell for his will, he will have his will. And so much the stronger the interdiction is of anything, so much the more (such is the exorbitancy of his nature) he is inflamed with desire, till he have accomplished it.

MDCLXXXVIII.—Christ's wounds the only hiding-place of a Christian.

Antennarius, in Mytholog.

THERE is an apologue how the dove made moan to her fellow-birds of the tyranny of the hawk: one counsels her to keep below, but the hawk can stoop for his prey; another adviseth to soar aloft, but the hawk can mount as high as she; another, to shroud herself in the woods, there she shall be sure—but, alas! that is the hawk's manor, the place where he keeps his court; another bids her keep the town, there she was sure from the hawk—but so she became a prey to man, and had her eyes put out to make the hawk sport; at last, one bids her rest herself in the holes of the rock, there she should be safe, violence itself could not surprise her. This dove is the soul of every man; she would gladly be secured from Satan. "Come to me," saith Riches; "here thou shalt be sure!"—no, wealth is the devil's stirrup, whereby he gets up and rides the covetous man. "Come to me," saith Pleasure; "here thou shalt be safe!"—as if she were not as very a whore as Delilah, to betray thee to the Philistines. Honour says, "Come to me; here thou art sure!"—as if the devil durst not come near the court gates, or greatness were a supersedeas to sin, or a protection against the arrest of judgments. No, there is no assurance in any of these; yet there is a rock of safety, clefts in that rock, the wounds of Jesus Christ, there and there only the soul shall be in safety.

Cant. II. 4.

MDCLXXXIX.—No safety to be expected in the midst of public danger.

It is the observation of Platina, that when one Facinus Canis was hired by the Ghibellines to suppress the contrary faction of the Guelphs in the city of Papia, and the covenant was, that he should have the goods of the Guelphs for his pay, he, obtaining the victory, falls a-rifling the Ghibellines also without any distinction at all; and being accused therefore, as not standing to his promise, made this answer, that themselves indeed were Ghibellines, and should be safe, but their goods were Guelphs', and must go to wrack as well as those of their adversaries. Just like that of Garnet, the provincial, who, being questioned by Catesby whether, with a safe conscience, they might proceed in their powder-project, seeing that, in blowing up of the king and Protestants, divers also of their own party must necessarily go the same way, replies very profoundly, that no doubt it might well be done, seeing it would redound to the good of the Catholic cause. What! not spare their own side to do ours a mischief? No, it will not be; there is no safety, there can be no immunity, from damage in the times of public danger. The truth of this assertion hath been experimentally felt in these late differences amongst us: if our persons were on the right side, our goods were on the wrong—all proved fish that came to the net; whether friend or foe, the goods were sure to suffer.

In Vita Fla.

Arraignement of Traitors, 1660.

Frideaux' Serm., Oxon.

MDCXC.—How it is that the Law is said to be the strength of sin.

As when a physician that is skilful in his profession doth all that belongs to the best of his judgment, the drugs that he gives and the ingredients that he infuseth are able to work their effect if they fall into a suitable body, but if the patient be froward, and will not be ruled, or his body be distempered, he is never the better for it; now, the fault is not in the physician, nor in the physic—they be both very good—but in the party that was not prepared for it, or that would not receive it and convert it to that use for which it was prepared: thus it is that God gave the Law for a good law, a holy and just law, as a true direction for the reformation of life and manners; but the party that received it did not take it thus, so that occasionally, not from the nature of the law, but by the ill acceptance of the party, it comes to be the strength of sin. The Law of itself is said to be a light unto our feet and a lantern to our paths, and the light of itself, were we but able to follow it; but, because of our own natural indisposition, it comes so to pass that the Law, which should pull down sin, gives strength unto it, and, being made to kill sin, gives life unto it.

Day's Exposit. on 1 Cor. xv. 47.

"Index peccati lex est, plectenda vendendo." — BILLII Antholog.

Ps. cxix. 105.

MDCXCI.—God's promises are, for the most part, conditional.

Merchanti Hortus
Pastorum.

A PROCLAMATION is read, wherein a Christian king grants honour and wealth to certain of his subjects, with assurance of donation upon their just demand. One amongst the multitude leaps at the news, springs away, and stays not to hear it out. There is a condition following: provided, first, that they put on arms, and expel the Turk which infests some part of his dominions. This man comes one of the foremost to demand the promised honours; he is asked for a testimony of his valour and service in the wars. Alas! he never tarried to hear that condition, and therefore lost the retribution. Thus it is that God promiseth eternal life to men, but, withal, chargeth them to believe in Christ and to do Him faithful service against the world, the flesh, and the devil; but so it is, that many are quite lost for not staying to hear the proclamation of the Gospel out: they run away with opinion of sufficient belief, and never think of obedience; whereas the promises of God are conditional, made up with provisoes. As there is a reward promised, so there is a condition premised. It must be our obedience first, and then comes in God's recompense; our devotion goes before, and His retribution follows after.

MDCXCII.—To be careful of vows and promises made in the time of extremity.

Æn. Sylv., Com.,
lib. ii.

Ps. cxxv.

THEODORICUS, archbishop of Cologne, when the Emperor Sigismund demanded of him the directest and most compendious way how to attain to true happiness, made answer in brief, thus: "Perform when thou art well what thou promisedst when thou wast sick." David did so; he made vows in war, and paid them in peace; and thus should all good men do, not like the cunning devil, of whom the epigrammatist thus writeth:

"Ægrotat dæmon, monachus tunc esse volebat; Convaluit dæmon, monachus tunc esse nolebat."

Well Englished—

"The devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;
The devil was well, the devil a monk was he."

Prideaux, Higginson Selab.

Nor like unto many nowadays, that, if God's hand do but lie somewhat heavy upon them, oh, what promises, what engagements are there for amendment of life! How like unto marble against rain do they seem to sweat and melt, but still retain their hardness! Let but the rod be taken off their backs, or health restored, then, as their bodies live, their vows die; all is forgotten: nay, many times it so falleth out, that they are far worse than ever they were before.

MDCXCIII.—The good Christian's absolute victory over death.

Æt. Roma.

Xyphilus, in Vita Vespasiani.

Plutarch, in Cæsare.

WHEN the Romans had made war upon the Carthaginians, and often overcame them, yet still, within eight or ten years, or less, they made head again, and stirred up new wars, so that they were in successive combustion. And it hath been the same in all the nations of the world. He that was erst an underling not long after becomes the commander-in-chief, and the same thing that the Lord hath now made the tail may be the head in time to come: as, for example, Cerealis gets a great conquest over the Cimbrians and the Teutons, and shortly after Sylla had the like over him; and Sylla no sooner shines out to the world, but is eclipsed by Pompey; and Pompey, the glory of his time, is, by the conquering hand of Cæsar, outed both of life and honours; and Cæsar, in the height of all his pompous state, falls by the hands of bloody conspirators, in the senate-house. Thus, in the course of this world, as one man is set up, another is pulled down; the conqueror is oftentimes conquered himself; but in the victory that every good man hath over death, it is so absolute, that it is without any hope or comfort on Death's part, and without any fear or suffering on their part: for it is so taken away as if it had never been, and that which had the greatest triumph, the mightiest trophies in the world, unto which all kings and princes have bowed their heads and laid down their sceptres, as so many morsels to feed on, shall, by the hand of Jesus Christ, be turned into nothing, shall have no name or notion, and be bereft of all hope of recovery.

"Pis mors non est mors, sed nomen tantum habet mortis; imò et ipsum nomen sublatum est."—CHRYSOST., in Matt. x.

I Cor. xv. 54.

MDCXCIV.—To be always prepared for death.

WHEN Harold, king of Denmark, made war upon Harquinus, and was ready to join battle, a dart was seen flying into the air, hovering this way and that way, as though it sought upon whom to rest. When all stood wondering to know what would become of this strange prodigy, every man fearing for himself, at last the dart fell upon Harquinus' head, and slew him. Thus Death shoots his arrows amongst us: here he hits one that is rich, there another that is poor; now he shoots over at one that is elder than ourselves, anon he shoots short at one that is younger; here he hits one on the right hand, our equal, another on the left, inferior; and none of us know how soon the arrow may fall upon our own heads. Our turn will come; let it be our care, then, that we be not surprised on a sudden.

Conrad. Lycosth., de Prædigiis et Omentis.

"Vive memor mortis, uti memor sis et salutis."—AUSON.

MDCXCV.—Religion pretended, mischief intended.

CELSUS, the philosopher, upon his defence of Paganism, setteth an inscription on the Word of Truth; Manicheus, that blasphemous heretic, taking in hand to write to the Church his damnable paradoxes, doubteth not to begin thus, "Manicheus, apostolus Jesu Christi, &c. (Manicheus, the apostle of Jesus Christ);" the Macedonian heretics were always saying, "Nos recta fide incedimus (We walk in the right faith)," all of them seeking the cloak and coverture of religion; it is the old proverb, "In nomine Domini incipit omne malum" (well Englished, "In My name have they prophesied lies"). Thus it was with them, and is it not the same (nay, worse, considering the abundance of means afforded to be better) with us now, and but some few years ago? Parsons, that arch-traitor, when he was hatching mischief against his prince and native country, set forth (as if he had been wholly made up of devotion) that excellent piece of Christian resolution. "And now, for Sion's sake, I will not hold my tongue," says one, &c. So says another; and so a third—Sion at the tip of the tongue, but Babel at the bottom of the heart; religion pretended, mischief intended; like sons of Simon, rather than children of Sion, writing pharmaca medicines where they should write venena poisons; and by this means they do sugar the brims of their intoxicated cups, that men the more greedily, and without suspicion, may suck in their venomous doctrines, that are administered unto them therein.

Origenes, contra Cel., lib. i.

Augustin., contra Ep. Fundament., cap. i.

Chrysostom., Sanct. Ep. Jer. xxlii. 25.

Camden, Ellicab.

"Sub dulci melle venena latent."—OVID, Amor. l.

MDCXCVI.—Why God suffers His children to be in a wanting condition.

SEVERUS, the emperor, was wont to say of his soldiers, that the poorest were the best; for when they began to grow rich, then they began to grow naught. Hence is that of the poet, "Martem quisquis amat, &c. (If you will bring up a boy or young man to be a soldier, learn him first to endure poverty, to lie hard and fare hard, and to encounter all the hardship that necessity can present unto him, and then he will deal the better with his enemies)." So, in the school of Christ, the Lord suffers His people to be in a wanting Ælius, in Vita.

Day, on I Cor. xv.

condition, not because He doth not intend to supply them, not because He cannot provide for them, but the reason is, to bring them up in the discipline of war, to train them up as weaned children, lest they should be taken off with the things of this world, and, as it were, drowned in the vanities of this life, and so forget God and their own soul's health, which is most of all to be regarded.

MDCXCVII.—All men alike in death.

Lucianus.

Adams, on Ep.
2 Pet.

"Omnia mors æquat."—CLAUD.
de Raptu Proserp.

LUCIAN hath a fable, the moral is good: Menippus, meeting with Mercury in the Elysian fields, would needs know of him which amongst all the ghosts was Philip, the great king of Macedon. Mercury answers, "He is Philip that hath the hairless scalp." Menippus replies, "Why, they have all bald heads." Merc.: "Then, he with the flat nose." Menip.: "They have all flat noses." Merc.: "Then, he with the hollow eyes." Menip.: "They all have hollow eyes, all have naked ribs, disjointed members—all are carcases." "Why, then," says Mercury to Menippus, "in death there is no difference betwixt the king and the beggar." And it is true, "Mors sceptrā ligonibus æquat." Men upon earth, as in the game of chess, supply different places; one is a king, another a queen, another a bishop, another a pawn; but when the game is done, and they are shuffled into one bag, into the grave, they are all alike.

MDCXCVIII.—Ignorant worldly purchasers.

Luke xiv. 18.

Alphons. ab Avendano, Com. In Evang. St. Matt.

Eccles. xi. 9.

Prov. xxiii. 32.

Brown's Sermon,
Lond., 1629.

Prov. vii. 22.

Luke xii. 20.

IN the parable of the supper and the guests that were bidden, we find one that had bought a farm, and he must needs go see it; another had bought five yoke of oxen, and he must by all means go try them. Strange purchasers! What! buy a pig in a poke? Land and oxen unsight, unseen. But we may read of another manner of purchaser, and that a woman, too, that first considered a field, and then bought it: she cast up the price, considered the soil, the tenure, the situation, then drives the bargain, and takes possession. Now, the worldly purchaser buys hand over head, considers not what he buys; the voluptuous epicure eats, drinks, and is merry, but he never looks after the reckoning, that after all this he must be brought to judgment; the drunkard swills and carouses, and rises up early to take his fill of wine, never minding the shot, that there is mors in olla, in the end it will bite like a serpent, and sting like a cockatrice; the luxurious man spendeth his time in dalliance, little thinketh that there is a sting in the tail of his wantonness, nocet emptæ dolore voluptas, that he is but as an ox to the slaughter and a fool to the correction of the stocks; the griping, covetous wretch that joineth house to house and land to land, making his barns bigger, takes no notice that he is but a fool for his labour and shall be suddenly snatched away from all. All these, and many more like these, poor ignaroes, take upon trust, and pay dear in the conclusion; whereas the serious Christian sits down, casts up his charges, considers what it will cost him to be rich in this world, what his honour and greatness will come to, and then purchaseth accordingly.

MDCXCIX.—Men to be careful of what they promise unto God in the matter of charity.

Day, Sermon on 1 Cor.
xv. 16.

It is usual with men, that when they are to go upon some long journey or voyage into a far country, they promise that, if God be pleased to return them safe, they will give so much or so much to the poor; or as a man, passing by an hospital, promiseth the poor people that, as he cometh back again, he will give them something towards their relief, but when he comes back he passeth by, not so much as thinking of them: this is the case of many men in these promising days of ours : if they may be but prosperous in such a voyage, successful in such a design, if God will but do thus and thus by them, then they will do thus and thus unto Him ; they will relieve the poor—there is no act of mercy but they will be one of the foremost to put it on ; yet, when their turn is served, they never think of their promise at all. But let all such know that their promise stands upon record in heaven : they may seem to forget it, and sneak away, not paying the shot of their engagement here in this life ; but God will call them to a reckoning for it, and take it upon their bodies and souls hereafter. Let none think, therefore, to pass a vow to the Lord in a good mood for a good purpose but that He will take it and exact it at their hands.

"Fit ut sæpenumero promptiores in promittendo homines sint, quam in exequendo."—DION., lib. xxxviii.

MDCC.—Things of the world not to be so highly prized.

It is a rabbinical conceit, that Moses, being a child, had Pharaoh's crown given him to play withal, and he made no better than a football of it, cast it down to the ground and kicked it about, as if it were a sign of his future vilipending (disesteeming) temporal things, that he should esteem the reproach of Christ greater than all the treasures of Egypt. Thus ought we all to do (especially when riches stand in competition with Christ), away with them, or they will make away with us. It is Christ's own counsel, "Sell all thou hast and give it to the poor ;"—sell it ; or, if no man will buy it, give it ; or, if no man will take it, leave it : it is not worth thy keeping, especially not worth thy carking : do thou part from it rather than it shall part thee from Christ ; for he that impoverisheth his soul to enrich his body is more mad than he that kills his horse to lose his money at a race.

Plantavit., Florileg. Rabbinicum.

Heb. xi. 26.

Luke xviii. 22.

Jerome, in locum.

MDCCI.—How it is that godfathers and godmothers undertake for children in baptism.

AN infant, being born to an estate of inheritance, cannot actually take possession, but is carried to some part of the land in the nurse's or some other's arms, where the guardian of the child taketh livery and seizin (possession) for its use, and promiseth fealty, and to do such service as the premises are bound to ; all which the heir, though but then an infant, is fully to make good when he comes to years of discretion. Thus, in the sacrament of baptism, the child is conditionally received into the congregation of Christ's flock ; but the godfathers and godmothers, answering to the stipulation of the Church proposed unto them, and undertaking on the child's part, the child, coming to years of understanding, is engaged to perform in as full a manner, to all intents and purposes, as if it had been able to have answered for itself.

Edlin's Serm., Lond., 1651.

MDCCII.—The poor's relief heaven's treasure.

As when a man is outed in England, whether it be by banishment or otherwise, if he have but laid up a bank at Venice, Amsterdam, or some such like place, he goes thither with more comfort and much more confidence than otherwise he should have done, because he shall meet with that there in safe hands which will welcome him when he comes to it : hence is it that we are called upon to lay up treasure in heaven, to make unto ourselves friends of unrighteous mammon : such are our good works and alms-deeds, which, being sent before, are laid up as a stock of money in a faithful hand, not in a bankrupt or mountebank's hand, but in the trusty hand of God Almighty, which will repay us again, with interest. And thus it is that all good men have made sure that, when they shall come to die, they have sent their charity before them, to lie in bank for their better refreshing.

Day, on 1 Cor. xv

1 Cor. xvi. 2.
Luke xvi. 9.

"Plus valet amicus in via quam denarius in corrigia."—GORRAN.

MDCCIII.—*Ill-gotten goods never prosper.*Morrison's Travels.

It is an observation set upon the house of Desmond, in Ireland, that Maurice Thomas, the first earl, raised it by injustice, and by injustice Gerald, the last earl, ruined it. The crafty fox in the fable hugged himself to think how he had cozened the crow of his breakfast; but when he had eaten it, and found himself poisoned with it, he wished that he had never meddled with it. Thus, wealth got by deceit is like a piece of buttered sponge (an Italian trick) : it goes down glib, but in the stomach swells, and will never be got up again. The gains a man gets by cheating and baseness, at last he may put it all in his eye, yet see himself most miserable.

"De malè questis vix gaudet," &c.

MDCCIV.—Men to be careful of their principles in religion.

Abbot's Serm.,
Oxon., 1610.

As, in the things of this life, men have great care to gain the skill to know money, whether it be current and lawful; and wares, whether they be good and merchantable; and meat, whether it be wholesome and sound: much more, then, may we think it concerneth us, there being so much counterfeit, false, and unsound doctrine abroad, to learn skill and knowledge of the true religion, to beware of our principles, to stir up and sharpen our endeavour upon the search and trial of the true faith, and to gain ability to judge and discern of that which is erroneous and false.

MDCCV.—To be fruitful in children a great blessing of God.

In Com. super Aug.
quint. de Civit. Dei, lib. xv., cap. 8.

Lev. xxvi. 9.

Ps. cxxvii. 3.

Gen. xlii. 16 and xxvi. 5.
Job xlii. 16.
Ps. cxxviii. 6.
Esther ix. 10.
Isa. xlvii. 8, 9.

LUDOVICUS VIVES maketh mention of a town in Spain, consisting of about one hundred families, all of them inhabited by the seed of one old man, then living; so that the youngest of them knew not what to call him; and he giveth this reason: "Qui lingua Hispanica supra avavum non ascendit (Because the Spanish tongue hath not any word of expression higher than the great grandfather's father)." Such as this must needs be, then, a numerous issue, a prolifical and fertile brood, and, without all doubt, a great and inestimable blessing of God, especially when they are not so much the fruits of their bodies as of their prayers: such as was promised to Abraham, to Isaac, to Job, and to the man that feareth the Lord. Yet let none trust too much in this blessing; it was Haman's fault, and his children's ruin; nor any grumble and count them a cross or a curse to their faint estate; nor look upon them as a bill of charges, when God hath put them upon the account of mercies. Neither let the barren womb be discouraged, for that God, who knows how to raise good out of evil, doth sometimes bless an adulterous union with increase, and sometimes to the chaste love of honest wedlock denies it.

MDCCVI.—Better to be honestly than hastily rich.

Homer.

THE poet feigned Pluto to be the god of riches and of hell—as if hell and riches had both one master—and to be lame, yet, withal, swift and nimble as fire. When Jupiter sent him to a soldier or a scholar, he went limping; but when to one of his bawds or mistresses, he flew like lightning. The moral is thus: the riches that come in God's name, and are sent to honest men, come slowly; but they that come by unjust dealing flow in apace. He that resolves to be evil may soon be rich. When the spring of conscience is screwed up to the highest pin that it is ready to crack, when religion is locked up in an out-room, and forbidden, on pain of death, to look into the shop or warehouse, then is the devil on his throne. But more safe and welcome is the gain that comes in the slow wain of honesty than that which comes hurrying in the swift chariot of iniquity.

Adams, on 2 Pet.

"Dives qui fieri vult, et citò vult
fieri."—JUVENAL

MDCCVII.—God's watchfulness over His people for their good.

THE Egyptians had an idol, called Baal-Zephon, which is by interpretation dominus speculæ (lord of the watch-tower). His office was to fright such fugitive Jews as should offer to steal out of the country; but when Moses and the people of Israel passed that way, and pitched their camp there, this drowsy god was surely fast asleep, for they all marched on their way without let or molestation; whereas He that keepeth Israel neither slumbereth nor sleepeth. He kept His Israel then, and since; He made good His title then, and will do the like to us. His eyes run to and fro through the world; He is watchful over His people for their good.

Exod. xiv. 2.

Abulens., in locum,

Pestell's Serm., Leicester, 1632.

MDCCVIII.—Husband the head of the wife.

THE Persian ladies have to this day some semblance of a foot worn in the top of their coronets, in token that the top of their glory must stoop even to their husbands' feet, remembering that of Vashtai; and who knows it not but that the virgin, when she is married, leaveth to be called after her father's name, and from thence forward is owned by her husband's; besides, women are said to be under covert-baron, for that whatsoever contracts or bargains they make are of no force either by the laws of God or man, except the husband do approve the same. Hence it is that the husband is called the head of the wife. And man is more excellent than woman—not to go so far as Aristotle, to say she is only σφάλμα φύσεως (the aberration of nature)—and surely more eminent, respectu originis et ratione finis (the man was not created for the woman, but the woman for the man); and then, ratione Domini (God gave him not only power to rule over the beasts, but the woman too). And every school-boy can say, "The masculine is more worthy than the feminine:" so that obeying husbands and commanding wives may be well said to live very unnaturally and contrary to the order of creation.

Bizari, Rer. Persic. Hist.

Esther i. 20.
Eph. v. 22.

Lib. de Cura Rel Famil.

1 Cor. xi. 9.
Gen. iii. 16.

MDCCIX.—Riches, the danger that attends them.

ÆSOP hath a fable of the two frogs that, in the time of drought, when the plashes (puddles) were dry, consulted what was best to be done: one advised to go down into a deep well, because it was likely the water would not fail there; the other answered, "But if it do fail, how shall we get up again?" Thus, riches are a pit whereinto we soon slip, but can hardly scramble out; small puddles, light gains, will not serve some; they must plunge into deep wells, excessive profits: but they do not consider how they shall get out again, they do not mind the great dangers that are attendant upon riches, whereby it comes to pass that they are either famished for want of grace or drowned in a deluge of wealth. If, then, this world be a sea, over which we must swim to the land of promise, there will be no necessity of such abundance of luggage, except it be to make us sink the deeper.

Valentine's Serm., Lond., 1623.

"Opes irritamenta malorum."

MDCCX.—The inconstancy of worldly honours and preferments.

WHEN Alexander, in the height of his glory, kept (as the history saith) conventum terrarum orbis (a parliament of the whole world), himself was summoned by death to appear in another world; and it was res spectaculo digna (saith another historian), a wonderful precedent of the vanity and variety of human condition, to see mighty Xerxes to float and fly away in a small vessel, who but a little before wanted sea-room for his navy; but if ever there was a lively spectacle of the world's vanity and misery, it was in Zedekiah. This is the world's inconstancy, the world's grand imposture (deception), the flux and reflux of honours and advancement; men erewhile shining in glory, like stars in the firmament, now vanishing Plutarch.

Denison's Serm., 1621.
Justin.

2 Kings xxv. 7.
"Nihil est in vita durabile: non opes, non imperium."—MANASSÉ, Annal.

like comets. How hath the moon of great men's honours been eclipsed at the full, and the sun of their pomp gone down at noon! Such is the uncertainty of all worldly honours and preferments whatsoever.

MDCCXI.—God fetching testimonies of truth out of the mouths of adversaries.

Exo i. viii. 19.

Dan. iii. 29.

John vii. 46.

Acts and Monuments.

Bellarmin, de Justitia, lib. v., cap. 7.

Ps. cxxvi. 4.

Numb. xiii. 11.

THE Egyptian sorcerers were forced to confess that the finger of God was in the miracles that Moses wrought before Pharaoh. Nebuchadnezzar, as stiff as he was against the three children, yet, when they are freed from the flames, God extorteth this speech from him, "That no god could deliver like their God." The wife of Haman, as ill-affected as she was towards Mordecai, yet she saith, "If Mordecai be of the seed of the Jews, before whom thou hast begun to fall, thou shall not prevail against him." The officers that were sent to apprehend Christ, instead of bringing Him, they brought a testimony of Him, "Never man spake like this Man." But, to come nearer, Stephen Gardiner, some time a great man of this nation, and bishop of Winchester, lying on his death-bed, and the Bishop of Chichester, his old acquaintance, coming to visit him, when the promises of the Gospel and salvation by the blood of Christ was laid to his soul, made answer, "Nay, if you open that gap once, then farewell all." Not much unlike hereunto is the close of that learned cardinal who, after the expense of many arguments to the contrary, concludes, "Sed, propter incertitudinem propriæ justitiæ, et periculum inanis gloriæ tutissimum est, &c." (That because of the uncertainty of our own righteousness and the danger of vain-glory, the most safe way is to rely upon the merits of Christ Jesus)." Thus it is that God can fetch light out of darkness, testimonies of truth out of the mouths of very adversaries, magna est veritas et prævalebit (so great is the truth, that it will prevail); and so powerful is God, that He hath not only the tongues of men, but their hearts also, and turns them as the waters of the south, which way soever He please; so that Balaam shall bless those whom Balak curseth, and the Midianites thrust their swords into one another's bowels. Madmen must they needs be, then, to lock up the truth, for it will break forth, maugre all opposition whatsoever.

MDCCXII.—God the only Searcher of the heart of man.

Homerus.

Adams's Exposit. on 2 Pet.

Zuingeri Theat. Hum. Vitæ.

Jer. xvii. 9.

Ps. cxi. 2.

Jer. xviii. 20.

THE poets feign, that when Jupiter had made man, and was delighted with his own beauteous fabric, he asked Momus what fault he could espy in that curious piece, what out of square or worthy blame. Momus commended the proportion, the complexion, the disposition of the lineaments, the correspondence and dependence of the parts, and, in a word, the symmetry and harmony of the whole: he would see him go, and liked the motion; he would hear him speak, and praised his voice and expression; but at last he spied a fault, and asked Jupiter whereabouts his heart lay. He told him, "Within a secret chamber, like a queen in her privy lodging, whither they that come must first pass the great chamber and the presence, there being a court of guard, forces, and fortifications to save it, shadows to hide it, that it might not be visible. "There, then, is the fault," saith Momus, "Thou hast forgotten to make a window into this chamber, that men might look in and see what the heart is a-doing, and whether her recorder, the tongue, do agree with her meaning." Thus, man is the masterpiece of God's creation, exquisitely and wonderfully made, but his heart is close and deceitful above all things. Had he but pectus fenestratum (a glass window in his heart), how would the black devices which are contrived in tenebris appear palpably odious? How would the coals of festering malice blister the tongues and scald the lips of them that imagine mischief in their hearts? Then it would be seen how they pack and shuffle and cut and deal too, but it is a poor game to the innocent. In the meantime, let all such know that the privy chamber of the heart hath a window to God's, though not to man's or angels' inspection.

MDCCXIII.—The union and fellowship of God's children one with another.

THE least drop of water hath the nature of its element, hath the entire properties of it, partakes of the round figure of that element, and best agrees and unites itself to water; in like manner it is with fire and the rest of the elements: being homogeneal bodies, every part doth suscipere rationem totius (participate of the name and nature of the whole), shuns what is contrary to that nature, and most willingly gathers itself to that which is of the same kind. So it is with the true members of that mystical body whereof Christ is the head. Such is the union, unanimity, association, and fellowship of the people of God, one amongst another, that they cannot suffer themselves to be combined with wicked persons and unbelievers; no, they will associate none unto themselves by their good wills who are not endowed with grace and goodness and a godly conversation, being the true qualities and marks of that true Church whereof they themselves are true members.

Serm. on Jeremia iv.
15.

MDCCXIV.—Excellency of the crown of glory.

MANY were the sorts of crowns which were in use amongst the Roman victors—as, first, corona civica, a crown made of oaken boughs, which was given by the Romans to him that saved the life of any citizen in battle against his enemies. 2. Obsidionalis, which was of grass, given to him that delivered a town or city from siege. 3. Muralis, which was of gold, given to him that first scaled the wall of any town or castle. 4. Castralis, which was likewise of gold, given to him that first entered the camp of the enemy. 5. Navalis, and that also of gold, given to him that first boarded the ship of an enemy. 6. Ovalis, which was given to those captains (and that of myrtle) that subdued any town or city, or that won any field easily without blood. 7. Triumphalis, which was of laurel, given to the chief general or consul who, after some signal victory, came home triumphing. These, with many other, as imperial, regal, and princely crowns (rather garlands or coronets than crowns), are not to be compared to the crown of glory which God hath prepared for those that love Him. Who is able to express the glory of it; or to what glorious thing shall it be likened? Ingenium fateor transcendit gloria; if I had the tongue of men and angels, I should be unable to decipher it as it worthily deserveth. It is not only a crown of glory, but hath divers other titles of pre-eminency given unto it, of which all shall be true partakers that are godly; a crown of righteousness, by the imputation of Christ's righteousness; a crown of life, because those that have it shall be made capable of life eternal; a crown of stars, because they that receive it shall shine as stars for ever and ever.

Wolfgang. Lazius,
An Com. Reipub. Rom.,
lib. ix.

Clement. Alex., Pro-dig., lib. ii., cap. 8.

"Sic parvis est componere magna."

2 Tim. iv. 8.
James i. 12.
Rev. ii. 10.

MDCCXV.—The slavery of sin to be avoided.

WHEN Alexander found Diogenes in his tub, and disputed with him whether was the freer estate, with Alexander to command the world, or with Diogenes to be confined to a barrel, the cynic answered, "Latior tua potestas non felicior, &c. (Thou commandest others, I command myself; I am a servant to the king; the king is a servant to his slave—yea, even to my slave; I am emperor over those affections that exercise a dominion over thee)." And, surely, most true is that undeniable axiom, quot vitia tot tyranni (sin and slavery cannot be separated). The dog runs at the master's whistling, but for the master to go at the dog's commanding is a preposterous servility. Great cause have we, then, to abandon that service which must be obsequious to the vilest, proudest, basest grooms in our family, our own carnal lusts, which are no better (though they dwell with us) than the very limbs of Belial.

Diog. Laert., in Vita Diogenii.

"Impius non unus hominis, sed, quod gravis est, tot do-minorum quot vitiorum servus est."—
AUG., de Civit. Dei,
lib. iv.

MDCCXVI.—*How to use the world rightly.*Denison's Serm., 1621.

Gen. i. 9.

"Da tua dum tua
sunt."

A SERVANT, whilst a stranger walks with his master, follows them both; but when the stranger takes his leave and departs from his master, he leaves the stranger and followeth his master. Thus, whilst the world doth any way concur with the Lord and conduce to the salvation of the precious soul, so far we may accompany it; but if it once depart from that, then let us give the world a farewell, follow God, and have a care of our souls. Again, as almighty God, by bounding and confining the waters to their proper places, hath made the sea a garment, which was before a grave to the whole earth, so we, by bounding and ordering our affections towards the world, and actions in the world, may make it a help, which otherwise would be a hindrance in our way to heaven—"Fac trajectitium," saith St. Augustine, meaning, that we should employ these earthly things to the glory of God and the good of our brethren, that, like provident merchants, we may have those temporals returned in heaven, by bill of exchange, into things eternal.

MDCCXVII.—Christianity the best nobility.

Plutarch.

Winnick's Serm.,
Lond., 1634.Acts xvii. 11.
Gal. iv. 26.
Heb. ii. 11.
John i. 12.
Heb. i. 14.
Ps. viii. 6.
1 Pet. ii. 11.

John xiv. 2.

HERMODIUS, a nobleman born, upbraided the valiant captain Iphicrates for that he was but a shoemaker's son. "My blood," saith Iphicrates, "taketh beginning at me; and thy blood, at thee, now taketh her farewell;" intimating that he, not honouring his house with the glory of his virtues, as the house had honoured him with the title of nobility, was but as a wooden knife put into an empty sheath to fill up the place; but for himself, he, by his valorous achievements, was now beginning to be the raiser of his family. Thus, in the matter of spirituality, he is the best gentleman that is the best Christian. The men of Berea, who received the Word with all readiness, were more noble than those of Thessalonica. The burgesses of God's city be not of base lineage, but truly noble; they boast not of their generation, but their regeneration, which is far better; for, by their second birth, they are the sons of God, and the Church is their mother, and Christ their elder Brother, the Holy Ghost their Tutor, angels their attendants, all other creatures their subjects, the whole world their inn, and heaven their home.

MDCCXVIII.—*The devil rewarding his servants.*Cromerus, in Hist., Polon."Quod quisque fecit patitur, autorem scelus repetit."—
SEN., Herc. Fur.

CHARLES, king of Sweden, a great enemy of the Jesuits, when, in the time of war, he took any of their colleges, would first hang up all the old Jesuits and then put the rest into his mines, saying, that since they had wrought so hard above ground, he would now make a trial how they could work under ground. Thus, the devil, when the wicked have done him what evil service they can upon earth, he confines them to his lower vaults in hell for evermore. A sad reward! to sow trouble, and reap nothing but horror and vexation of spirit, still bringing fuel to that fire which must burn themselves to all eternity.

MDCCXIX.—*Everything in species made perfect at one and the same time in the creation.*White's Serm.,
Lond., 1653.

ALL artists, in what they do, have their second thoughts (and those usually are the best); as, for example, a watchmaker sets upon a piece of work (it being the first time that ever men were wont to carry a pass-time in their pockets), but, having better considered of it, he makes another, and a third, some oval, some round, some square, every one adding lustre and perfection to the first invention, whereas, heretofore, they were rather like warming-pans, to weary us, than warning-pieces, to admonish us how the time passed. The like may be said of the famous art of printing, painting, and the like, all of them outdoing the first copies they were set to go by. But it was not so with God in the creation of the several species of nature; He made them all perfect, simul et semel, at one and the same time, every thing pondere et mensura, so just, so proportionate in the parts, such an elementary harmony, such a symmetry in the bodies of animals, such a correspondency of vegetals, that nothing is defective, neither can anything be added to the perfection thereof.

MDCCXX.—Men to argue themselves into a mood of contentment.

ALEXANDER, that great monarch of the world, was discontented because ivy would not grow in his gardens at Babylon; but the cynic was herein more wise, who, finding a mouse in his satchel, said he saw that himself was not so poor but some were glad of his leavings. Thus, had we but hearts to improve higher providences, we might soon rock our peevish spirits quiet by much stronger arguments: as to take notice of God's bountiful dealing with us, that we are less than the least of His mercies; that though we be not set in the highest form, yet there are many below us; that God is our good Benefactor. This would bring us to that pass as to conclude with ourselves, having food and raiment, therewith to be content; and, though we were many times cut short of creature accommodations, yet this would limit our desires after them, and make us rest assured that nothing is withdrawn or withheld from us which might be really advantageous to us.

Diog. Laert., in Vita.

Watson's Art of Contentment.

Ps. cxlv. 15.

1 Tim. vi. 8.

MDCCXXI.—To do good for evil.

A MALEFACTOR, in birth and person a comely gentleman, was sentenced to death by a judge deformed in body; hereupon he turned all his prayers unto heaven into curses and revilings of the judge, calling him a stigmatical and bloody man. The patient judge for that time reprieved him; still he continued the same language of invectives and blasphemies against him. The next sessions, being brought again to the bar, the judge asked him if his choler were anything boiled away and spent; but then he redoubled his railings. Yet he reprieved him again, as loth to let him die in so uncharitable and desperate condition of soul. Before the third assizes, he sent for him to his chamber in London, and asked him if he were yet more pacified; still nothing came from him but words of inveterate rancour; whereupon said the judge, "God forgive thee! I do!" and, withal, threw him a pardon; whereat he was so astonished, that, being hardly recovered from a swoon that he fell into, he refused the pardon for his life, unless the judge would both pardon his malice and admit him into his service. He did so, and found him so faithful, that, dying, he gave him the greatest part of his estate. Here, now, was extreme will overcome with extraordinary goodness; a conquest without blood—the best of all victories; love overcoming evil with good. This is to be like God, whose image we bear in our creation, and to whose image we are restored in our redemption.

Adams's Exposit. on 2 Pet.

"Inimicis non est malè faciendum, vel ulciscendum injurias."—PICINUS, in Plat. Crit.

Rom. xii. 21.

MDCCXXII.—God's dwelling in the humble spirit.

A GENTLEWOMAN, of more than ordinary quality and breeding, being much troubled in mind and cast down in her soul with the sad thoughts of spiritual desertion, her husband, with the assistance of others better experienced in such cases than himself, did all that he could, by prayers unto God and otherwise, by persuasion, to reduce her to the knowledge of God's mercy and goodness to her; but all in vain; she could not be drawn either to hear or read anything that might work for her spiritual advantage. At last her husband, by much importunity, prevailed that he might read but one chapter in the Bible unto her.

White's Serm. Lond., 1653.

The chapter was Isaiah lvii. ; and when he came to the fifteenth verse, in these words: "For thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is holy: I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones:" "Oh," says she, "is it so that God dwells with a contrite and humble spirit? Then I am sure that He dwells with me, for my heart is broken into a thousand pieces. Oh, happy text and happy time, that ever I should hear such comfort!" and she was thereupon recovered. Thus it may be very well concluded that God makes His dwelling in a humble heart, not with him that is proud and high-minded, one that looks high and speaketh big words; such shall be pulled down from their seats, when the lowly and the meek shall be exalted and made a fit habitation for the high and mighty God to dwell in.

"Quamvis habitet in excelso Deus, non desinit habitare in humili spiritu." --GAB. ALVAREZ, in locum.

Luke i. 52.

MDCCXXIII.—The quietness of contentment.

THE wheels of the chariot move, but the axletree stirs not; the circumference of the heavens is carried about the earth, but the earth moves not out of its centre; the sails of a mill move with the wind, but the mill itself stands still—all emblems of contentment. And thus it is that a Christian is like Noah in the ark, which, though tossed with the waters, he could sit and sing in it; and a soul that is gotten into the ark of contentment sings and sits quietly and sails above all the waves of trouble; when it meets with motion and change in the creatures round about on every side, it stirs not nor is moved out of its place. When the outward estate is moved with the wind of providence, yet the heart is settled through holy contentment; and when others, like quicksilver, shake and tremble through disquiet, the contented spirit can say, with David, "O God, my heart is fixed, my heart is fixed!"

Watson's Art of Contentment.

Ps. lvii. 7.

MDCCXXIV.—The most silent conscience will speak out at last.

JOHN THE BAPTIST was called the Voice of Christ, "vox clamantis (the voice of Him that cries in the wilderness)." Herod did cut off his head. Now, Christ spake not many words to His apprehenders and accusers, not many to the high priest, nor to the judge, Pilate; but when He came before Herod, He spake never a word at all. Among other reasons, this is wittily given: He spake not a word to Herod, because Herod had taken away His voice in beheading John, and how should He speak without a voice? There may be a voice without speech, but no speech without voice. Now, the tongue of the soul is conscience, the voice with which she is best acquainted; but men, for the most part, have tongue-tied their consciences, taken away her voice; and who shall control them? Yet, when God shall untie those strings and unmuzzle their consciences, she will be heard, and ten concerts of music shall not drown her clamorous cries. Now it is that their conscience is bound, and they are loose; but in the day of trouble, themselves shall be bound, and God shall let their conscience loose. It shall be hard for them, with that frantic musician, to fall a-tuning their viols when their house is on fire about their ears. When all the doors are shut up to the voices of men, conscience will speak within, and that with a language loud enough to be heard, easy enough to be understood.

"Etsi clausis parietibus ais cooptus tenetis, sine teste; haec tamen conscientiam facit." &c.—AUG., Ep. ad Constant.

Donne's Serms., Lond., 1627.

MDCCXXV.—Excellency of the soul of man.

WHEN God Almighty had in six days made that common dial of the world, the light; that storehouse of His justice and His mercy, the firmament; that ferry of the world, the sea; man's work-house, the earth; chariots of light, the sun and moon; the airy choristers, the fowls; and man's servants, the beasts; yet had He one more excellent piece to be made, and that was man, a microcosm, even an abstract of the whole, to whom, having fashioned a body, proceeding by degrees of perfection, He lastly created a soul. And as the family of Matri was singled out of the tribe of Benjamin, and Saul out of the family of Matri, being higher than the rest by the shoulders upwards, so is the soul singled out from the other creatures, far surpassing them all in excellency, whether we consider the efficient cause of its creation, Elohim, the blessed Trinity, being then in consultation; or the material cause, a quinta essentia, noble and divine substance, more excellent than the heavens; or the cause formal, made after the image of God Himself; or, lastly, the cause final, that it might be the temple of God and the habitation of His blessed Spirit.

I Sam. x. 20., 27.

Pet. Cal., lib. ii., cap. 8.
Gen. i. 26.

I Cor. vi. 19.

MDCCXXVI.—The spiritual benefit of poverty.

THE naturalists, such as write concerning the several climates, observe that such as live under the frozen zone, in the northern parts of the world, if you bring them to the southward, they lose their stomachs and die quickly; but those that live in the more southern hot climates, bring them into the north, and their stomachs mend and they are long lived. Thus, bring a man from the cold, starving climate of poverty into the hot southern climate of prosperity, and he begins to lose his appetite to good things—he grows weak, and a thousand to one if all his religion do not die; but bring a Christian from the south to the north, from a rich flourishing estate into a jejune, low condition, let him come into a more cold and hungry air, and then his stomach mends; he hath a better appetite after heavenly things, he hungers more after Christ, he thirsts more after grace, he eats more of the bread of life at one meal than he did at six before, and such a man is like to live, and hold out in the way of God's commandments to the end.

Watson's Art of Divine Contentment.

"Aurem cordis tribulatio aperit, quam sæpe prosperitas hujus mundi claudit."
—GREG., Moral. xvi.

MDCCXXVII.—A foul, polluted soul the object of God's hatred.

THE rheumatic and spawling cynic, when he was entreated by the dainty mistress of the house where he was entertained that he would spit in the foulest part of the house, did thereupon very unmannerly spit in the mistress's own face, because that, in his opinion, it was the foulest. Thus, as it is the honour of the holy omnis decor ab intus (to be all glorious within), what outward wants soever seem to disgrace them, so it is the disgrace of the worldly omnis fætor ab intus (they are filthy within), what outward abundance soever doth seem to honour them. God requires truth in the inward parts; but, alas! we may say truly of these, their inward parts are very wickedness; so that when He sees their houses kept neat and clean, the floors swept, the walls hung, the vessels scoured, their apparel brushed, their bodies adorned, all curiously lighted (exalted), only their hearts filthy and polluted, He will certainly spit His contempt upon that heart: therefore wash thy heart from iniquity, O Jerusalem, that thou mayest be saved!

Diog. Laert., in Vita Diogen.

Howell's Serm., Lond., 1637.

"Ad candida tecta columbæ."

2 Kings ix. 12.

MDCCXXVIII.—The high price of the soul.

PLATO, that divine philosopher, travelling to see the wonders of Sicily, was, upon some discourse had betwixt him and Dionysius the tyrant, apprehended and clapped up in prison; his fact (offence) was made capital; but, by the favour of some near the tyrant, he was adjudged to be sold. One Annecris buys him, lays down twenty pounds, and sends him home to Athens. Seneca quarrels with the price, censures Annecris for undervaluing so worthy a man, balancing one of such high parts with such a low sum of money. But this censure cannot light upon our Saviour, who gave not for the soul of man the earth, the sea, the world, but that which was of infinite value, even His own dearest blood. Propter animam

Lactant., lib. iii., cap. 4.

Chrysost., in Ps. xlviii.

1 Pet. i. 18.

Deus fecit mundum, &c. (It was for the soul's sake that God made the world; and it was for the soul's sake that the Son of God came into the world), made Himself of no reputation, was like unto man in all things (sin only excepted), scorned, scourged, derided, &c., and at last submitted Himself to death, even the death of the cross.

Phil. ii. 8.

MDCCXXIX.—Prosperity, for the most part, draws envy to it.

Watson's Divine Art of Contentment.

"Noverca virtutis prosperitas," &c.—CHRYSOLOG, de Nugis Curial., lib. i.

SHEEP that have most wool are soonest fleeced; the fattest ox comes soonest to the slaughter; the barren tree grows peaceably—no man meddles with the ash or willow, but the apple-tree and damson shall have many rude suitors; David a shepherd was quiet, but David a courtier was pursued by his enemies. Thus it is that prosperity is an eyesore to many, and a prosperous condition for the most part draws envy to it, whereas he that carries a lesser sail, that hath less revenues, hath less envy—such as bear up with the greatest front and make the greatest show in the world are the white for envy and malice to shoot at.

MDCCXXX.—Liberty the cause of licentiousness.

Sir R. Nanton, Fragmenta Regalia.

"Soadetque licentia luxum."—CLAUD.

It was a grave and smart answer of Secretary Walsingham, a great statesman of that time, when he was consulted by the queen about the lawfulness of monopoly licences: "Licentiâ omnes deteriores sumus (We are all the worse for licence)." And most true it is, let but the golden reins of law and religion lie anything loose upon the people's shoulders, they will soon be licentious enough. If the well-compacted hedge of discipline and government be broken down, neither Church nor state shall long want those that will intrude upon their privileges, and trample all authority under their feet.

MDCCXXXI.—The folly of men in parting with their souls for trifles.

Denison's Serm., 1610.

Suetonius, in Vita.

WE laugh at little children to see them part with rich jewels for silly trifles—and who doth not wonder at the folly of our first parents, that would lose Paradise for an apple? and of Esau, who sold his birthright for a mess of pottage?—yet, alas! daily experience doth proclaim it, that many are so childish as to part with such rich and precious jewels as their immortal souls for base unworthy trifles, and so foolish as to lose the celestial paradise, the kingdom of heaven, for earthly vanities, of whom it may be truly said, as Augustus Cæsar in another case, they are like a man that fished with a golden hook, the gain can never recompense the loss that may be sustained.

MDCCXXXII.—The spiritual benefit of divine contentment.

Seneca, de Tranquill.

"Discite in hoc mundo supra mundum esse, et si corpus geritis, voluit in vobis âles interior," —AMEROS, Lib. de Virg.

Judges xviii, 24.

ZENO (of whom Seneca speaks), who had once been very rich, hearing of a shipwreck, and that all his goods were drowned at sea: "Fortune," saith he, speaking in a heathen dialect, "Jubet me Fortuna expeditiùs philosophari" hath dealt well with me, and would have me now to study philosophy." He was content to change his course of life, to leave off being a merchant, and turn philosopher. And if a heathen said thus, shall not a Christian much more say, when the world is drained from him, "Jubet Deus mundum derelinquere, et Christum expeditiùs sequi, &c." (God would have me leave off following the world and study Christ more, and how to get heaven, to be willing to have less gold and more goodness; to be contented to have less of the world, so I may have more of Christ; to sit down with a little, so much as shall recruit nature, and, if that fail, so that the slender barrel of provision fall shorter and shorter, not to murmur and say, with Micah, 'Have ye taken away my gods, and do ye ask what I ail?'")

MDCCXXXIII.—Hope to be kept up in the midst of all perplexities.

PANDORA, a beautiful woman (as the poets feign), was framed by Vulcan, to whose making up every god and goddess gave a contribution : they put into the hand of this fair enchantress a goodly box, fraught and stuffed with all the woes and miseries that might be, only in the bottom of it they placed hope. It was presented to Prometheus, but Providence refused it; then to Epimetheus, and After-wit accepted it: which he no sooner rashly opened, but there came out a swarm of calamities fluttering about his ears: this he perceiving, clapped on the cover with all possible speed, and so, with much ado, saved hope sitting in the bottom. Such an army of miseries, like the troop issuing from the womb of the Trojan horse, invaded the world, by opening the box of Pandora, by tasting the apple of Eve, that if the mercy of God had not left us hope, solum solantem spem, in the bottom—such a hope as should be able to buoy us up out of the depth of misery wherein we were involved—our case had been most desperate; let us, therefore, keep up our hope in the very midst of all perplexities whatsoever.

Hesiodus.

Corl. Rhodogin,
Var. Lect., lib. ix.

Adams's Exposit., on
2 Pet.

"Magna tamen
spes est in bonitate
Dei."—OVID.

MDCCXXXIV.—The loss of the soul irrecoverable.

ST. CHRYSOSTOM hath well observed with the anatomists, "Omnia Deus dedit duplicia (God hath in the frame of man's body given him two eyes, two ears, two hands, two feet, and the like, that the failing of the one might be supplied by the help of the other); animam vero unam (yet He hath given him, saith he, but one soul)," so that if it be lost, there is no supply to be had. Nebuchadnezzar may lose his kingdom, and it may be restored; Job, his health and wealth, and they may be recovered; Lazarus, his life, and he may be revived: but for the loss of the soul, nullo modo sarciri, nullo pretio redimi potest (no means can repair it, no price can redeem it, all the world cannot recompense it); being once lost, it is lost irrevocably.

Hon. xxii. ad Po-pulum Antioch.

Dan. iv. 31.

Job ii. 7; xlii.

Id. in Piat.,
Hom. v.

MDCCXXXV.—The hypocrite and true Christian, their difference in growth of grace.

A POISONFUL weed may grow as much as the hyssop or rosemary; the poppy in the field, as the corn; the crab, as the pear-main; but the one hath a harsh, sour taste, the other mellow as it grows. Thus, a hypocrite may grow in outward dimensions as much as a child of God; he may pray as much, profess as much: but he grows only in magnitude, he brings forth sour grapes, his duties are leavened with pride; the other ripens as he grows: he grows in love, humility, faith, which do mellow and sweeten his duties, and make them come off with a better relish.

Watson's Art of Divine Contentment.

MDCCXXXVI.—Christ Jesus, the good man's chief portion.

WHEN Alexander the Great passed into Asia, he gave large donations to his captains and men of merit, insomuch that Parmenio asked him, "Sir, what do you keep for yourself?" He answered, "Hope." And John of Alexandria, surnamed the Almoner, did use yearly to make even with his revenues; and when he had distributed all to the poor, he thanked God that he had now nothing left him but his Lord and Master Christ Jesus, to whom he longed to fly with unlimed and untangled wings. Thus, we can want nothing if we want not Christ; He is the good man's chief portion. Crosses, calamities, poverty, may take from us all the goods of this world, or our charity may give them away: the worldlings ask us what we have left for ourselves: we answer, "Only Jesus Christ; and in Him we have all things."

Plutarch, in Vita.

Surius, de Virtut. 33

Lam. iii. 24.

MDCCXXXVII.—The soul not to be starved in the want of means.

Hist. Belg., lib. ix.

It was a poor, equivocating trick of the Duke D'Alva, at the Fuyck Sconce, before Haarlem, when, having promised the soldiers their lives, he caused them to perish with hunger; and being challenged with his promise, answered, that he had given them assurance of their lives, but never promised that they should have meat or drink. And such is the folly of him that talks of saving his soul, and yet denies unto it the means of salvation, being negligent in hearing of the Word, cold and careless in prayer, remiss in the actions of mortification, and dull in the entertainment of those Christian duties and graces whereby the precious soul is not only preserved and nourished, but also adorned and beautified.

Valentine's Sermon,
Lond., 1624.MDCCXXXVIII.—*Sickness immediately inflicted by God.*Jan. Comarus, in Vita.

HIPPOCRATES gave this counsel to all physicians that resorted unto him, that when they went upon any occasion to visit their patients, they should consider with themselves whether there was not Divinum quiddam in morbis (the stroke of God in the sickness), because then, as it should seem, he held the cure to be desperate, and that it was but in vain to administer any physic. Well, this was but one doctor's opinion, and, by the leave of so eminent a man, the disease was not mortal; for then no sickness were curable, because that in every disease there is the stroke of God. Quicquid patimur venit ab alto (There is no sickness so little but God hath a finger in it, though it be but the aching of the little finger); and though there be in the body but only one disease that is called sacer morbus, yet is it most certain that there is sacrum quiddam in omni morbo (the hand of God in every sickness); and yet every sickness is not unto death, as Christ Himself testifies.

Gosson, MS.

John xi. 4.

MDCCXXXIX.—*Good and bad hearers of the Word; their difference.*Alphons ab Avendano, Com. in Matt.
xvi.

Two, walking together, found a young tree laden with fruit; both did gather and satisfy themselves for the present: one of them took all the remaining fruit and carried it away with him; the other, seeing him gone with the fruit, took up the tree itself and planted it in his own ground, where it prospered and bore plentifully every year. The first had more fruit at the present, but the other sped best, for he had fruit when the other had none. Thus it is with men at the hearing of sermons: some have large memories and can gather many observations, which they keep awhile to rehearse, not to practise; another hath a weaker capacity, but he gets the tree itself, the root and substance of the text, plants it in his heart, feeds on the fruits with comfort, and his soul is thereby nourished unto life eternal.

MDCCXL.—*The soul's safety and danger.*Ambros., de Bono Mortis, cap. 5.

THE fowl that flies low is quickly taken, but that which soars aloft nec laqueis capitur, nec visco fallitur (is neither entrapped in the snare nor entangled in the lime-bush). So the soul, whilst it is hovering about these earthly vanities, and stooping down to catch at worldly preferments, it is easily and quickly ensnared by Satan; but when it soars and mounts aloft in divine meditations, is seldom taken in the snares of temptation.

MDCCXLI.—*Wicked men reserved for exemplary punishment.*Tho. de Want., Sermones de Tempera.

THERE is a story of a bloody murderer, who, after the fact, went to sleep under a rotten wall all night, but had a vision presented unto him to bid him awake and be gone, for fear of further danger, which he did, and presently the wall fell. The murderer thereupon thought that his fact (deed) was acceptable with God. The next night following he had another vision, and heard a voice saying, "O wretch! thinkest thou that I care for wicked men? No; I would not have thee die sleeping, but have reserved thee for a halter, whereby thou shalt end thy days with public shame and disgrace!" And so it happened accordingly. Thus many notorious malefactors, who draw iniquity with cords of vanity, and sin, as it were, with a cart-rope, contriving mischief on their beds, and committing all uncleanness even with greediness, often escape great dangers in their drunkenness and other outrages; yet, in the end, some fearful and exemplary judgment overtakes them.

Isa. v. 18.

Mic. ii. 7.

Eph. iv. 19.

MDCCXLII.—Youth to be seasoned with grace, not giving the least way to the devil.

THERE was an abbot of this land who desired a piece of ground that lay conveniently for him. The owner refused to sell it, yet, with much persuasion, was contented to let it. The abbot hired it for his rent, and covenanted only to farm it for one crop. He had his bargain, and sowed it with acorns, a crop that lasted three hundred years. Thus, Satan begs but for the first crop: let him sow thy youth with acorns, they will grow up with thy years to sturdy oaks, so big-bulked and deep-rooted, that they shall last all thy life. Sin hath a shrewd title when it can plead prescription, and Satan thinks his evidence as good as eleven points at law when he hath once got possession. Let him be sure of thy youth, he will be confident of thy age. Poma dat autumnus. He well knows that the blossoms in the spring are the fruit in autumn, and that in thy youth thou art not cloth, but wool, so that the deepest purple sins are those which are dyed in the wool. Let thy soul, therefore, like Gideon's fleece, drink up betimes the dew of grace, for younger years well led are as the sweetness of a rose, whose smell remains in the dry leaves. Take, then, the first opportunity of God's gracious motions and monitions; or, if thou have omitted the first, embrace the second; or, if many have passed by unanswered of thee, embrace the present invitation, and even now, with faith and repentance, turn unto God thy Maker.

Adams's Exposit., on
2 Pet.

"Juvenilibus annis luxuriavit animi."—
OVID, Ep. iv.

Judges vi. 37.

"Quo semel est imbuita recens, scriva-bit odorem, testa diu."

MDCCXLIII.—A good conscience the best friend.

WORLDLY friends are uncertain: they go and come, and stand afar off when they should be most near; they love not in time of trouble; they are loth to come to a sick man's bedside, or if so, they cannot abide to hear his groans, and by no means to see a dead man; at the most, they can but follow one to the grave, and there leave him. But a good conscience will make one's bed in sickness, and cause him to lie the softer; will stand by him when he groans, and do him comfort; will hearten him upon death when it is coming, and say, "Thy Redeemer liveth;" will whisper to him when departing, and say, "Thy warfare is accomplished;" will lodge the body in the grave as in a bed, man the soul to heaven, and make it able to look God in the face without any terror. Yea, so fast a friend is a good conscience, that when riches, husband, wife, parents, friends, breath, life—nay, patience, hope, faith—have left us, in some measure it will stick close unto us.

Denison's Serm.,
Lond., 1621.

"*Bona conscientia
hortus deliciarum, aula Dei.*" &c.—
HUGO, de Anima,
lib. ii., cap. 9.

MDCCXLIV.—Christians to be careful, that they may find comfort in death.

ORATORS, though in every part of their speech they use great care and diligence, yet in the close of all they set forth the best of their art and skill, to stir up the affections and passions of their hearers, that then they may leave at the last the deepest impression of

Udall's Serm.,
Lond., 1638.

those things which they would persuade. Thus ought all of us to do, our whole life being nothing else but a continued and persuasive oration unto our God, to be admitted into His heavenly kingdom; but when we come to the last act and epilogue of our age, then it is that we must especially strive to show forth all our art and skill, that so our last words may be our best words, our last thoughts our best thoughts, our last deeds our best deeds; whereby stirring up, as it were, all the affections of God, and even the bowels of compassion, unto us, we may then, as the sun, though always glorious, yet especially at its setting, be most resplendent when we draw near unto our western home, the house appointed for all living.

MDCCXLV.—Purity and the heart of man seldom meet together.

Adams's Exposit. on
2 Pet.

It is observed of the word conscientia, that it ever had ill luck in the Church, and could never be found at once, in full syllables. Conscientia altogether may be called devotion; take away the first syllable, it is scientia (knowledge); cut off the next, it is entia (means or worldly maintenance). First, in the time of profaneness, there was sci and entia (learning and living, knowledge and maintenance); but con was left out, devotion was wanting, they were ungodly men. In the next age there was con and entia (devotion and exhibition), a rich and religious—yea, a superstitious number; but sci (knowledge) was wanting, they were none of the learnedest clerks. In the third age con and sci (learning and devotion) were both lost, and only entia was left; they had the honours and manors, the fat of this land. But now, in this last age, it is come quite round; we have, and not long since in a better measure had, con and sci, a learned and religious clergy, only entia is taken from them; their livelihood and subsistence is, by sacrilegious hands, exhausted. The like fortune hath a pure heart in the world; pureness goes one way and the heart another way, and these two have much ado to meet. There is no lack of hearts, every man hath one—some have more than one—and for pureness, it abounds. Proud dames will have pure houses, pure clothes, pure meat, &c.; hypocrites will have pure eyes, pure tongues, pure habits, garbs, and gestures; and the profane sort are all for brave hearts, they make a “pish” at pureness. This is the devil’s plot to keep pureness and the heart asunder. Purity will do well in nothing without the heart; the heart can be happy in nothing without purity. It is great pity two such sweet companions should be kept asunder. The God of all purity bring them together!

“Puritas cordis in querenda gloria Dei, et utilitate proximi.”—BERN., in Apolog.

MDCCXLVI.—Sin of the meanest man in a nation may be the destruction of it.

Harris's Serm.,
Westm., 1628.

EVERY particular individual man is a part of the city and kingdom wherein he was born, be it never so simple, as a letter is part of a word. Some be like to capital or text-letters, as great men; some to smaller characters, as men of low degree; some be like to vowels, as men in authority; some to mutes and liquids, as the vulgar sort: all men go to the making of a city or kingdom, as all letters go to the making up of words. And as in a word, if one letter be missed, though but a mute, it may endanger to mar the word, though not so much as if a vowel be defaced: so in a city or nation, if any one man be blotted with sin, let it be but a mean man, it may bring a destruction to that place, yet not so soon as if a man of higher place were blurred with iniquity.

MDCCXLVII.—The secure, careless sinner.

Aristot. de Animâ,
lib. iii., cap. 7.

It is said of those that are taken with the phrenetic (frantic) disease, that by how much the more the malady doth affect them, so much the more secure they are; careless of anything, presumptuous in all things; fearing nothing, as having lost the very use of common sense, by which they should judge of the nature of things, what is convenient, and what is not fitting for them: so it is with those that are laden with the frenzy of sin. By how much the more they are infected with the poisonous nature thereof, so much the more are they careless and secure from sinning; so that the greater the guilt, the less is the sense of sin—just like Agag, when he was ready to be hacked in pieces, concluded that the bitterness of death was past; or pernicious Babylon, that sits like a lady in her palace minding nothing, when much of destruction was at the threshold; or the rich fool in the midst of his abundance. Such is the careless, heedless, headless, phrenetical condition and constitution of all sin and sinners.

Holcot, in Lib. Sap.

I Sam. xv. 35.

Isa. xlvii. 8.

Luke xii. 20.

MDCCXLVIII.—The keys of knowledge much abused by those that keep them.

It is feigned of Pope Sixtus Quintus, that after his death he went to hell, but by good luck the porter would not let him in, though he had highly deserved it, but sent him to a place under his own command—purgatory: this he long sought, but could not find. At last he took heart and went to heaven, fearfully knocking at the gate. St. Peter asked him why he knocked, considering he had the keys. He answered, "Because the wards were altered, and they could not now unlock the door." It were to be wished that the moral of this fiction were not too true. How are the keys of knowledge abused by many that have the keeping of them! The Pontificians have so bruised the keys with breaking men's heads, and so furred them with the blood of innocents, that they are not able to open the gates of heaven. Some let them rust in their hands for want of use—teachers that do not teach, that can neither open the doors of heaven for others nor for themselves; some alter the wards by false and erroneous doctrine; others, like Gallio, care not which end goes forward—let the church keys hang in the town-house; let who will preach, all is one to them;—but some there are (God increase the number!) that keep them bright with fair and continual usage, whom God blesseth in the way of their ministry, with the letting in of many souls to Himself.

Adam's Exposit.
on 2 Pet.

"Sunt qui scire volunt, eo fine ut
scire valent," &c.
—BERN., super
Cant. j. Serm. xvi.

MDCCXLIX.—Humility appeaseth God's anger.

It is reported of Julius Cæsar, that he never entertained hatred against any so deeply but he was willing to lay down the same upon the tender of submission; as when C. Memnius put in for the consulship, he befriended him before others of the competition, notwithstanding that C. Memnius had made bitter invectives against him. Thus the great God of heaven, to whom all the Cæsars and kings of the earth are tributaries and homagers, doth never hate so irreconcilably but that true humiliation will work a reconciliation. Satis est prostrasse. Let but the sinner appear before Him in a submissive posture, and His anger will be soon appeased.

Suetonius, in Vita.

"Satis est pro-strasse," &c.

MDCCL.—The extreme folly of sin.

Such is the foolishness of a frantic man (the disease being got into the cock-loft of reason), that when he is in greatest misery he seems to be as one that had no misery at all; and when most oppressed with the strength of his malady, laughing and smiling as if he were not oppressed with any disease at all: so is it with him whose soul is, as it were, drenched in a deluge of sin. When he is extremely miserable, and that the strength of his sins are able to throw him down to destruction, yet you shall see him, like Solomon's fool, go to the correction of the stocks, full of jollity. Such was the state of Jerusalem, not discerning the time of their visitation, that when Christ wept for them, they could not do so Preston's Serm.

Lond., 1624.

Prov. vii. 22.

Luke xix. 45.

Luke xvii. 27.

much as throw out one sob of sorrow for themselves. Such, too, was the condition of the Old World—nothing but mirth and merriment, marrying and giving in marriage—till the Flood overtook them; and such we may see to be the daily custom of all desperate sinners, such as walk with lifted-up countenances, and hug themselves in the perpetration of their wicked designs, when destruction is at the very pit's brim, ready to overwhelm them.

MDCCLI.—The Scripture to be only rested upon.

Delpneoph., lib xii.

ATHENÆUS tells us that the Stoics had an opinion that no man could do well but a wise man, not so much as make good lentil broth but after his recipe, and that was so exact and curious, that it prescribed the twelfth part of a coriander seed. Thus, there are in the world many simple men, and more simple and sinful women, that have little besides a will and a tongue, yet are so conceited of doctrine, that if Zeno or one of their zanies prescribe it not, the broth is nought. Mors in olla (Death is in the pot), and for every sup of broth they must run to Zeno, when (Gods knows) all, at the best, is but a poor mess of pottage. Such are those human traditions, constitutions, and impositions of usurpers, but as mere artificial paper walls set up against the apostolical canons; such the inventions of men (though of those pure brains that pretend most, yea, mainly for the Word). For sometimes they prove but lapwings that cry, "Here 'tis! here 'tis!" when their nests are far enough off; and such the morality that dropped in verse from the pens of the poets; but not any of these, nor all of these (though they may be made use of in a subservient way), are to be rested on, but only the Word of God.

2 Kings iv. 40.

Harris's Serm.,
West., 1628.

John v. 39.

MDCCLII.—God a merciful God.

Notes of Sundry
Divines in loc.

Exod. xxv. 21.

2 Cor. i. 3.

Alphons. ab Aven-
dano, in Pt. cxix.

THE rainbow is an emblem of God's mercy; it is planted in the clouds, as if man were shooting at God, and not as if God were shooting at man. The situation of the propitiatory, or mercy-seat, was a strong argument of His mercy. God commanded it should be planted over the ark, in which was the Testimony, the book of cursings, that so Mercy might be near at hand to pronounce sentence of absolution, when Justice was ready to denounce judgment. It is God's nature and property to have mercy: longanimity is as God's natural child, the Holy Trinity is in travail with it. Even as anything great with young doth desire to be rid of the burthen, so doth God desire to pour out His mercy. Never any nurse, when her breasts were full of milk, was in greater pain for children to suck them than God is in pain to have His children draw mercy from Him. He spins out the thread of His goodness to an immeasurable length, and though His angle be in heaven, yet He lets down the line of His love, and baits it with His mercy, to try whether men will swallow, that so He may save their souls. Justice cometh from Him as a sting from a bee, constrainedly; mercy floweth from Him, as honey from a bee, most willingly; mercy is as essential to Him as light is to the sun or as heat is to the fire; He delights in mercy, as the senses and faculties of the soul do in their several actions. Patience and clemency and mercy and compassion and peace are the fruits of His bowels, the offspring which the Divine nature doth produce; fury and rage and anger and impatience, war and fire and sword, are forced into Him by the provoking exorbitances of the world.

MDCCLIII.—Faith not always sensible.

Tho. de Trugillo, Thesaur. Concionat.

It is said of Eutychus, that, falling down out of a window, he was taken up for dead; his friends were much troubled at the suddenness of the accident; but St. Paul, being then preaching in an upper chamber, went down and fell upon him, and, embracing him, said, "Trouble not yourselves, for his life is in him :" though he seemed dead, yet he was alive. And as substance may be said to be in an elm or an oak tree when they have cast their leaves, and there is wine to be found in an unlikely cluster, and one saith, "Destroy it not, for there is a blessing in it:" such are the beatings of the pulse, the trances and the swoonings of faith, beating many times so slowly and drawing the breath of life so inwardly to itself, that no man can perceive any life at all: so that unless the goodness of God should embrace it, as St. Paul did Eutychus, it would never recover strength again. Such was the trance of adultery in David, of idolatry in his son Solomon, of apostasy in Peter, of recusancy in Jonah, &c.

Acts xx. 9, 10.
Isa. vi. 13.
Isa. lxxv. 8.

MDCCLIV.—Minding of good things a notable way to increase grace.

DOMITIAN, perceiving many of his predecessors in the empire to be so hated of the people, asked how he might so rule as to be beloved, and was answered, "Tu fac contra (Mind and examine what they did, and do thou the contrary)." Thus, if men would but truly mind the law and the prophets, they would find themselves miserable; for totus homo est inversus decalogus (that they stood in a full contrariety to all the law): and that is the very definition of man. Now, this minding will work a godly sorrow, will make men like those that, after John Baptist's sermon was ended, came with material queries, "What shall we do?" and to make the conclusions up in their own hearts. Is it comfort that we hear of—repent, and it is ours. Is it judgment—repent, and it is none of ours. If any virtue be commended, we shall fall to practise it; if any vice be condemned, we shall labour to avoid it; if any consolation be insinuated, to appropriate it; if any good example be propounded, to follow it. Where good things are minded, graces will be increased.

Impp., Vita per Phil. Nepotem.

Wood's Serm.,
Lond., 1636.

Luke iii. 10.

MDCCLV.—The mercies of God to be recorded to all posterity.

ST. AUGUSTINE relateth of a certain Platonist, that should say, as Simplicianus, his good friend, told him, that those words of St. John's Gospel, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God: the same was in the beginning with God," were fit to be written in letters of gold, and to be set up to be read in the highest places of all churches: his reason was, because it is such a strong text to confirm the Divinity of Christ. For as St. Ambrose saith, "Erat, erat;" &c., St. John saith four times, "Erat in principio." And where doth Arius find that it was not in the beginning? And thus, verily, that Scripture where God proclaims His nature by adjectives ought to be recorded to all posterity—"The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin," &c. Now, what is meant by all these synonyms and equivocal expressions, but that, as an act of oblivion and pardon of grace, the abundant mercies of God might be set out to the comfort of all repentant sinners.

De Civit. Dei, lib.
x., cap. 29.

John i. 1.

In Lib. de Fide contra Arianum.

Exod. xxxiv. 6.

MDCCLVI.—The providence of God, not secondary causes, to be rested on.

ST. AMBROSE speaking of great drought in his time, when the people talked much of rain, he sometimes comforted himself with this hope, "Neomenia dabit pluvias (the new moon will bring us rain); yet," saith he, "though all of us desired to see some showers, yet I wished such hopes might fail, and was glad that no rain fell (donec precibus ecclesie data esset, &c.), until it came as a return upon the Church's prayers—not upon the influence of the moon, but upon the provident mercy of the Creator." Such was the religious care of that good saint then, and the like were to be wished for now, that men would be exhorted, not to

In Hexam., lib. iv.

Astra regunt homines, sed regit astra Deus.^h

be so much taken as they are with the vanity of astrological predictions, to read the stars less and the Scriptures more, to eye God in His providence, not the moon so much in its influence, still looking up unto Him as the primus motor, and upon all other creatures whatsoever as subordinate.

MDCCLVII.—Hell broke loose by the swarms of sectaries, ranters, &c.

Adam's's Exposit. on
2 Pet.

In lib. cui titulus
"Bellum Jesuiti-cum."

IN a city of Spain, a Jesuit, in the midst of his sermon, fell into a trance (if we had but faith enough to believe him), and, starting up, he told his auditory that he had been in a dream, and the scene lay in hell; there he saw many souls of all conditions (naming them whom he thought fit to traduce), from cobblers to kings: amongst the rest, he pretended to see abundance of Franciscans, whereat he stood amazed that men so holy and strict of life should come thither. This dream of his stuck in the Franciscans' stomachs, till they could requite him with another; therefore, on the next occasion, in the same pulpit, a Franciscan, preaching, fell into the like trance, and, waking, told them that he had also been in hell, and could not deny but some sprinkling of Franciscans and other orders were there, but his wonder was, that in all hell he saw never a Jesuit: at which Beelzebub, laughing, told him his error, that the number of Jesuits in hell did exceed all other societies, put them all together. "Where are they?" replies the Franciscan. "Alas!" says the devil, "they are in a room below; the common jail is too good for them; they are safe bound in the dungeon, stowed in the hold under hatches: for if they were suffered to come to the upper decks, they would set all hell in an uproar." It was well it was but a dream, for their sakes, and not so well that it is not a truth, for the Church and commonweal's sake. Many dreamers there are that say the Spirit of God is come down amongst us in these latter times; but, by the lives and practices of lewd and wicked men, it may be concluded that hell is rather broke loose and the devil let out for a season: else what means those swarms of Jesuits, sectaries, ranters, heretics, &c., that are found amongst us—men of desperate principles and loose conversations, fitter for the dark rooms of Bedlam, to recover their straggling senses, than the open air to walk in, whereby others may be infected.

Udall's Sermon, 1627.

MDCCLVIII.—Young, raw ministers to be reproved.

Menochius, de Repub. Heb.

1 Sam. ii. 13.

Phillips's Sermon,
1623.

2 Kings iv. 40.

1 Tim. iii. 6.

Numb. xvi. 3.

UNDER the law, the Levites had their appointed times for their ages, before which they might have no admittance to the service in the tabernacle, though they were never so ripe and pregnant; it was not well with the sacrifices when priests' boys were suffered to intermeddle; they never came to do any good service to God and His Church, but they came with their flesh-hooks to fetch sweet morsels from the altar, and there caused the sacrifices of the Lord to be despised. When the young sons of the prophets shall be set to gather herbs to make pottage for the food of God's household, they may happily, instead of wholesome pot herbs, bring in colloquintida, that when the broth is served, they that taste of it may say, "Mors in olla (O man of God! death is in the pot)." Thus are they worthy to be reproved that, being called to be disciples, straightway run to the apostolic function, contrary to the apostle's rule—"Neophytus ne sit,"—taking upon them to divide the Word of God to His people before years and experience, reading, and other helps, bring them to maturity of judgment; so that, for their forwardness, it may be said of them truly, what the factious company said to Moses mutinously, "You take too much upon you, ye sons of Levi." No doubt but God may enable some, as He did young Timothy; but it is not common, not ordinary. "Et da mihi talem," saith St. Bernard ("Give me such a one, and I will feed him with gold and silver"), intimating, that there was none such before, and hardly since, to be found amongst us, MDCCLIX.—A good man merciful to the very beasts.

It is said of God, that He remembered Noah and every beast—yea, such is His merciful providence, that He watcheth not over men only, but beasts; and a righteous man regardeth the life of his beast. Nay, Xenocrates, a very heathen, who had no other light but what the dim spectacles of nature did afford, is commended for his pitiful heart, who succoured in his bosom a poor sparrow that, being pursued by a hawk, fled unto him, and afterwards let her go, saying, “Se supplicem non prodidisse” (that he had not betrayed his poor suppliant). And such is the goodness of every just man, that he is merciful to his very beast. Alas! it cannot declare its wants nor tell its grievances, otherwise than by mourning in its kind; so that, to an honest heart, its dumbness is a loud language, crying out for relief. This made David rather venture upon a lion than lose a lamb; Jacob will endure heat by day and cold by night, rather than neglect his flocks; Moses will fight with odds, rather than the cattle shall perish with thirst. It is only Balaam and Bedlam-Balaamites that are wanting in this mercy to their faultless beast; and it is ill falling into their hands whom the very beasts find unmerciful.

Gen. viii. 1.
Ps. xxxvi. 6.
Shute's Serm. to the East India Company,
1629.
Prov. xii. 10.
Ælianus, de Var.
Hist., lib. xlii.
1 Sam. xvii. 34.
Gen. xxxi. 40.
Exod. ii. 17.

MDCCLX.—Negligent ministers advised.

WHEN the people of Rome heard that the fields of some of their colonies waxed barren, their advice was, that the husbandmen should melius arare et minus serere (plough better and sow less). So, when God's field waxeth barren, and the people profit not by preaching of the Word, by reason of a negligent kind of preaching thereof, it cannot be accounted ungodly counsel to such as cannot speak often, and well too, that they spend more time in their studies and be less seen in their pulpits. If they have fished all night and caught nothing, it were not amiss that they should sit down a while upon the shore and mend their nets; afterwards, with God's blessing, they may fish with better success.

Plinij Nat. Hist.
Phillips's Serm., ut
antea.

MDCCLXI.—Sin may be excused here in this world, but not hereafter.

It is said of St. Anthony, that, being upon his travel, and set down to supper, his host set a toad before him on the table, and told him that it was written in the Gospel, “De omni quod tibi opponitur comedes” (Thou shalt eat of such things as are set before thee).” The holy man, weighing with himself the irreligious entertainment of his host, signed himself (as the legend hath it) with the sign of the cross, and immediately the toad was turned into a well-dressed capon. This he did, as the story lieth; but can it be thought possible that a leopard should change his spots, or a blackamoor be washed white? Then may a man metamorphose Satan's poisons, toads, and serpents, baneful sins and transgressions, into nutrimental virtues and spiritual graces. It cannot be, for sin is crafty and full of delusion, living still upon the cheat with the sons of men: Usury walks in Alderman Thrifty's gown; Pride gets the name of decency; Idolatry praiseth itself for pure devotion; Homicide marcheth like a man of valour; Lust professeth itself Nature's scholar; Covetousness is Nabal's husbandry; inclosing of grounds is Master Usurper's policy; Drunkenness gets the name of good fellowship: so that, whereas it hath been said that black could never be turned into white, the devil hath found out some painters that will undertake it. “Errone sub illo, pro vitio virtus crimina sæpe tulit” (Virtue shall bear Vice's faults, and Vice shall have the credit of Virtue's goodness);” but, when all is done, the best of the world's wisdom is vitia non abscondere, sed abscondere (to excuse sin here in this world, which will be sure to accuse the sinner hereafter).

Laur. Surius, in Vita.
1 Cor. x. 25.
Tuteville's Serm.
1631.

MDCCLXII.—To be careful in the keeping and presenting our souls clean at the time of death.

Gataker's Serm., 1629.

James iv. 8.

Jer. iv. 14.

2 Cor. x. 3.

ONE that hath some choice jewel that he purposeth, at the time of his decease, to leave to some special friend, how chary he is of it; how careful to keep it fair and clean, when he is at some time (as occasion serveth) to wear it and make use of it; and if it should, against his will and besides his purpose upon such occasion, by some occurrent or oversight, take any soil, how diligent is he to wipe it, or burnish it to get the soil off it, and to reduce it to its former lustre again! Such is the care that every man is to have of his soul, that precious piece, that he purposeth at his departure out of this world to commend to his God, to his Christ, to make it clean and keep it clean; and because that by daily occasions, whilst he liveth here in the flesh, and is conversant in this wicked world, it will be gathering soil, let him be never so careful, he must ever and anon be washing it with the tears of repentance, and fetching off the soil by serious contrition and hearty remorse, that when the time shall come, which he knoweth not how soon or suddenly may come, it may be presented pure and spotless to Him whom he intendeth it now unto.

MDCCLXIII.—Progress in piety to be endeavoured.

Du Moulin, Combat Christien.

1 Cor. ix. 24.

Prov. iv. 18.

Cant. vi. 10.

Joshua x. 13.

Isa. xxxviii. 8.

Psa. xix. 5.

Matt. xxv. 14.

1 Thess. iv. 1.

2 Pet. iii. 18.

PROGRESS in piety and religion is not unfitly compared to a building, to a race, to the morning light, and to the moon that waxeth. Houses are raised from the foundation to the walls, from the walls to the roof; in a race, men run on to the goal; the morning light is brighter and brighter till the noonday; and the moon increaseth more and more till it come to the full. Habent et omnes virtutes suas conceptiones, nativitates, incunabula, &c. (And all virtues have their conceptions, births, infancies, and increases). So must every good Christian have. He must not stand still in religion, like the sun in Gibeon, or go back, like that on Ahaz's dial; but, as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, that rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race, he must go forward, make still some progress in piety. It is not enough that he receive a talent, but he must employ it and gain by it, like good ground, that giveth not the bare seed corn back again, but fructifieth in abundance. He must increase more and more, as St. Paul exhorted the Jews of Thessalonica, and to grow in grace and in the knowledge of God.

MDCCLXIV.—Resurrection of the dead asserted.

Gardiner's Serm.,
Oxon, 1638.

Moral, in John xix.

OUT of the earth comes the bread that we eat; the bread, after it passeth several concoctions, is altered and changed into blood, then conveyed throughout the parts of the body, and at last attains to be even of the very same substance and nature with the body. Thus, that which was earth and sprung out of the earth becomes flesh in substance, which before it was not. In the numerical resurrection, that which was flesh and after turned into earth becomes flesh again in the same nature which before it was. If that were not daily and ordinary, the difficulty would appear no greater in the one than in the other. Again, we daily see a tall, fair-spread, lofty tree to have risen out of a little seed. "If you demand," saith Gregory the Great, "ubi laet fortitudo ligni, asperitas corticis, &c. (whence was derived the solidity of the wood, the superficial hardness of the bark, the flourishing greenness of the leaves, experience testifies it proceeded from the spreading virtue which lay treasured up in the seed)." What marvel, then, if He that out of a small seed daily extracts the wood, fruit, and leaves in the trunk and branches of a tree, doth likewise reduce bones, veins, and hair out of the least remainder of our dust, and having grafted them into the former stock of the same flesh, commands again breath and warmth into that flesh, blood into those veins, strength into those bones, and beautifies those hairs with a fresher hue!

MDCCLXV.—The soldier's calling honourable.

He that, in these days of the Gospel, styleth Himself Deus Pacis (the God of Peace), did, in the days of old, under the Law, call Himself Deus Exercituum (the Lord of Hosts). The Scriptures make Christ the Captain of the Lord's army; the angels, soldiers; the Church, a squadron of armed men; every bishop or superintendent of the Church, a soldier; and the Church, upon good grounds, hath listed every child in baptism as a soldier of Christ Jesus. Eques, that formerly signified an ordinary trooper, is now our knight; miles, that was wont to be a private soldier, is now our esquire or gentleman. Such and so honourable is the condition and calling of a soldier, that, though the poets have inveighed against it, yet they must so far yield, that whatsoever of rubbish and dirt is thrown upon it, it is vitium personæ, non rei (the fault of the persons, not of the profession), since God Himself hath graced it, our Saviour hath approved it, the apostles have commended it, the saints have practised it, and our ancestors gloried in it.

Stiles's Serm.,
 Lond., 1625
 Joshua v. 14.

Job xxv. 3.

Luke ii. 13.

Cant. vi. 4.

2 Tim. ii. 3.

"Nulla fides pietasque," &c.

"Impius hæc tam culta novalia!" &c.

MDCCLXVI.—Women reformers intolerable.

It was a witty answer that St. Bernard gave to the image of the blessed Virgin, at the great church of Spire, in Germany. Bernard was no sooner come into the church, but the image straight saluted him and bade him "Good morrow, Bernard!" whereat Bernard, well knowing the juggling of the friars, made answer again out of St. Paul: "Oh," saith he, "your ladyship hath forgotten yourself; it is not lawful for women to speak in the church." Thus, it is commendable in a woman when she is able, by her wisdom, to instruct her children, and to give, at opportunities, good counsel to her husband; but when she-apostles, women, shall take upon them—as many have done—to hold out the Word in public and to chalk out discipline for the Church, this is neither commendable nor tolerable; for her hands should handle the spindle or the cradle, but neither the altar nor the Church. The commendations that St. John's elect lady had were not so much for her talking as her walking in the commandments of God.

Wilkinson's Serm.

Prov. xxxi. 19.

2 John 5, 6.

MDCCLXVII.—When it may be said to be the best time for prayer.

SUITORS at court observe mollissima fandi tempora (their times of begging), when they have the king in a good mood, which they will be sure to take the advantage of; but especially if they should find that the king himself should begin of himself to speak of the business which they would have of him, then they take that very nick of time, and seldom or never come off but with good success. Thus, when God speaks secretly to the heart to pray, fashioneth and composeth it into a praying frame and disposition, observe such a time, and neglect it not! Strike whilst the iron is hot! lay hold upon such a blessed opportunity—such a one as thou mayest never have the like again! For it is a great sign that He intends to hear thee and answer thee graciously, when He Himself shall thus prepare and indite the petition and frame the requests that thou shalt put up unto Him. This must needs be the best time of prayer.

Goodwin's Return of Prayer.

"Post est occasio calva."

MDCCLXVIII.—Magistrates and men in authority to be exemplary to all others.

It is observable, in the very course of nature, that the highest spheres are always the swiftest in their motion, and carry about with them the inferior orbs by their celerity; the biggest stars in the firmament are evermore the brightest, and give lustre unto those of a

Wilkinson's Serm., ut antea.

lesser magnitude. Thus, men that bear authority, that are eminent in power and dignity, that excel in riches and command, are placed in the highest sphere of human society, to this end, that, like sons of God, they might shine brightly unto their inferiors by their godly life and example.

MDCCLXIX.—Ministers to be acquainted with the state of men's souls.

Hildersam, on Ps. li.

MEN are careful that the physician should be well and thoroughly acquainted with the constitution of their bodies before he administer any physic unto them ; and their case shall be fully known to their lawyer before he come to plead it ; nay, if their tailor come but to make them a suit of clothes for their bodies, he must be sure to take exact measure. Thus solicitous are men in corporal things ; and it would be better with them in their spiritual estates, did they but know them that labour amongst them, such as are set over them in the Lord. Would they but acquaint themselves with their ministers, it would much advantage their poor souls. David knew this well, and though he was a prophet himself, yet he kept three seers and prophets about him—Nathan, Gad, and Jeduthun : the reason was, that they might know him well, and so far observe his ways, that they might do more good by their ministry. For, indeed, how is it possible that they that are strangers to men, and know not their ways, should ever apply the doctrine so particularly, or meet so well with their special and beloved sins, as they would the more exactly do were they better acquainted with them.

MDCCLXX.—The Christian's library.

Eccles. xii. 12.

Joshua's Resolution ; a Sermon, per Anonym.
Lapide, in Exod.
xii.

OF making many books there is no end (saith Solomon), and much study is a weariness of the flesh, every art abounding with books of its own way and profession ; yet, as Aquinas chose rather to have Chrysostom upon St. Matthew's Gospel than all the huge city of Paris, and as Justinian, out of two thousand authors, reduced the body of the civil law into a more near compendium, so it is that the Christian's library is the soonest furnished of all other : it requires no more books but two—the one, the book of God's Law, containing the theory ; the other, the book of his own conscience, which contains the practice of his duty. And what a happy student must he needs be in the school of grace that keeps for himself a true concordance out of them both.

MDCCLXXI.—The worldling's woe and the just man's joy at the time of death.

Hildersam, on
Ps. li.

IF a poor man that had all his wealth about him should fall into the hands of thieves, and be robbed and rifled by them, he must needs cry out and take on pitifully, for, alas ! he is quite undone, he hath nothing left at home to succour him and his poor family withal ; but a rich man that hath store of money at home, safe locked up in his chest (unless he be some base, miserable wretch), will never complain much or be disquieted when he hath thirty or forty shillings taken from him. Thus, for worldlings to rage and take on when they must lose their life, or their peace, or their wealth, it is no marvel ; for, alas ! when these things are gone, they have nothing left, they are at a desperate loss : but a Christian that knows and considers what he is born unto, and what he shall enjoy when he comes home to his heavenly Father's house, he cares not though he be stripped of all here in this world, and rejoiceth in death, that hastens him to a better possession.

Phil. i. 21.

MDCCLXXII.—The excellency of Christ's intercession.

It is a usual term amongst those that be graduates in the university, "Respondebit pro me, Aristoteles" (that Aristotle, the eye of nature and heart of philosophy, shall answer for them, and justify them in that wherein they cannot otherwise so well stand by). Thus it is that we are but vermiculi (poor creeping worms); nay, vernaculæ (vassals and slaves of sin). Et quid canam cælo (How shall we be able to answer the great God of heaven and earth)? We have no other anchor-hold but this, "Respondebit pro me, Jesus" (that Jesus, our blessed Saviour, will intercede and mediate for us). His wisdom will answer for our folly; His humility for our pride; His meekness for our cruelty; His righteousness for our sin and wickedness.

Wilkinson's Serms.
1616

MDCCLXXIII.—The force of justifying faith.

As the earth, though it may be made soft by those showers that fall upon it in the winter time, and bring forth a blade—some kind of visible appearance of the seed that is cast into it—yet it is not thereby made fruitful unto man; it never yieldeth any good or perfect fruit till it have received the sweet heat of the sun into the bowels of it in the spring time: even so is it with the heart of man. It may be and is oft softened by the judgments of God and terrors of the law, so that some beginnings of goodness and reformation may be wrought thereby, as in Pharaoh and the wicked Israelites, and in many a wretched man in the time of his sickness; yet all this while there is but a little blade, a very slender show of grace, till such time as Jesus, the Son of Righteousness (like the comfortable and quickening heat of the spring), do shine upon the soul by justifying faith, and then it doth bring forth fruit that is good indeed, and unto God acceptable.

Jermin, on Eccles.

Job xxiii. 16.

Exod. x. 16.

Mal. iv. 2.

MDCCLXXIV.—No true joy to be found in worldly things.

COPERNICUS, who thought the earth moved and the heavens stood still, was not yet so mad as either to look for trees in heaven or stars upon the earth; and should we not think that man to be either directly mad or grossly mistaken in his way that should knock at a grave-stone for a companion or go down into a charnel-house to make merry. And such are all they that quærent gaudium in loco non suo (that look for joy in the honours or pleasures of this world). For what is honour? Lies it not in the breath of others?—a thin cabinet of air, which every man hath a key to but himself. Let but them above him agree not to think him great or wise or noble, let but his fellow-worms forbear to honour him, and he that holds the plough shall not change joys with him. Look but upon the joy of the voluptuous, —doth not sorrow often wait so close as to tread upon the heels of it?—the epicure crying out of his gout, even at that time when he is feeding his disease with riot. The Israelites were struck with meat between their teeth, and Zimri slain in the embraces of his Cozbi; so that if a man should share in all the goodness that is under the sun, it were at the best but indolence, a privation of grief, an acquiescence, a kind of resting of the mind, no true joy at all.

Bishop of Sarum, in Serm. before the King, 1648.

"Nulla est sincera voluptas."

Num. xxv. 15-18.

MDCCLXXV.—The destructive quality of envy.

THERE is a story of two men that dwelt in a certain city, the one very covetous, the other very envious; the ruler therefore of the place sent for them both, wishing them to desire what they would, and it should be granted them, adding, withal, that he who did ask first should have his asking granted, but the other should have the same doubled. The envious man would not ask first, that his companion might not have more than himself; but the ruler pressing upon them to ask, the envious man desired that one of his eyes might

Nich. de Lyra, in
Gen. iii.

"A lterius rebus marescit opinis."— HOR., Ep. i.

be pulled out, that so his companion might lose both his eyes. Such is the destructive quality and condition of envy and every envious man. Envy is the consumption of the possessor of it; the envious man is he that foldeth his hands together, and as a man discontented for the contentment which another hath, ever studying and plotting how he may bereave him of it; he it is that eateth his own flesh, not sparing to hurt himself, that he may destroy him whom he hateth.

MDCCLXXVI.—Not to be dejected, though the joy of the just be not perfect in this life.

Bp. Sarum, ut antea.

As gold keeps the name in the leaf as well as in the wedge, in the coin as in the bullion; or as he that sees a beam or two shine through the crevice of a wall may say he sees the sun shine as well as he that walks abroad: so, neither are we so destitute of all comfort as, because the earth is not our heaven, to make it therefore our hell; but we may say there is a leaf of joy, the tin-foil of it here in this life, some few glimpses that shine in upon us. As for the full, the solid, the jubilating joy, it must not be looked for in this valley of tears. There is joy, but not here; true joy, but not yet. Tarry till the harvest we must, then we shall reap in joy, when heaven is our dwelling, the angels our partners, incorruption our change, immortality our garment. The earth is not the place of such joy, nor dull flesh the subject of it.

"Gaudia principum nostri sunt sæpe doloris."—
OVID, Met. vii.

MDCCLXXVII.—A little, with content, sufficient.

Cassian., Vellat, xxiv, cap. 13.

ABBOT MACARIUS hath a story of a certain barber who, trimming for threepence a-piece, had many customers, and found his estate to increase well thereby; but hearing that, in a city not far off, there was twelpence given for trimming a man, he would needs go thither; but when he came and found it to be so, going to the market to buy provision for his family, he found that to be so dear, that his great hire for trimming went all away in victuals, so that he had nothing to lay up for old age; which made him to think himself better in the former place, though his hire was less, and to conclude, with the wise man, "Better is a handful with quietness, than both the hands full with travail and vexation of spirit." And certainly it is so, that a little, even no more than a man can hold in the hollow of his hand, being spread abroad, is better than much which a man holdeth in both his hands, bended and folded to hold so much as they can. But then the little must be a fullness also; it must be a handful, plenitudo vole quietis (the fullness of the hand of quietness and content), fully so much as shall be sufficient for needful and convenient occasions, that want and distress may not disquiet the spirit. And then, in this sense, a little gotten and possessed, where content lays up the comfort of it, is better than much quod curæ arrodunt, solitudines imminuunt (the joyousness (gaiety) whereof cares gnaw away and troubles diminish); a little that the hand of quietness and content doth reach out, than much fullness which travail holdeth out with one hand and vexation with another.

Eccles. iv. 6.

"Vivitur exiguo melius; natura,"
&c.

MDCCLXXVIII.—For a man to be sorry that he cannot be sorry for sin is a part of godly sorrow for sin.

Bp. Sarum's Serm., Isle of Wight, 1543.

THE mother of Peter Lombard must needs be in a great strait when, having transgressed her vow of continency, she told her confessor plainly that, when she saw what a son she had brought forth, she could not repent that she had sinned in having him. A hard condition! But her confessor sadly answered her, "Dole saltem quòd dolere non possis (Be sorry, at least, that thou canst not be sorry)." And the like may be said to every troubled soul that, crying out for comfort, saith, "You tell me heavenly things of repentance, what power a religious sorrow hath, that God Himself is pleased therewith; but, wretch as I am, I cannot sorrow. If one should tell me that all the joys of heaven were to be bought for one single tear, what is that to me, if I cannot shed it?" Well, for thy comfort, if thou findest but so much impression made as to grieve really that thou canst not grieve, know that thou art already come to a degree of that which thou grievest thou art not come to; thy very being sorry that thou canst not be sorry is in some measure a true godly sorrow for sin.

MDCCLXXIX.—Kings, princes, and rulers to hearken to good counsel.

ORIGEN, speaking of Moses embracing the counsel of his father-in-law, saith, "Acceptit consilium inferioris, ut formam humilitatis principibus populorum daret (He received the counsel of an inferior, that he might leave to rulers over people a pattern of humility)." And it is said of Amalesentha, queen of Italy, that, being deprived of her husband and son together, and joining her brother Theobald in the government of the kingdom with her, she wrote thus to the senate of Rome: "Exultate et factum nostrum supernis commendate virtutibus, &c. (Rejoice, and commend our action to the Divine powers! We desire to do nothing that shall deserve reproof, who have chosen to do all things by the advice of good counsel)." A happy princess, and a more happy people, under such a government—yet both heathen! Be wise, therefore, O ye kings and rulers of the earth! for there is nothing doth make the actions of any to deserve reproof so much as when themselves in their actions refuse to be reproofed, at leastwise by good counsel. To refuse admonition is in none a greater folly than in a ruler, because it is in none more pernicious, to none more dangerous, more scandalous, being worse than a poor child that receiveth instruction.

Hom. xi. in Exod. xviii. 24.

Cassiodor, Var. Lect., lib. x.

"Vis consilii expers mole ruit sua," —HORAT., Carm., lib. iii.

Eccles. iv. 13.

MDCCLXXX.—The least proportion of godly sorrow for sin accepted by God.

Six times Elijah's servant looked towards the sea before he could see anything; the seventh time he saw but a cloud no bigger than his hand, yet that cloud, within few hours, covered the heaven with darkness and the earth with rain. Just so may be the case with many a man when he is praying to his God, as Caleb's daughter did unto her father: "Dedisti mihi terram aridam, &c. (Thou hast hitherto made me the owner of a dry, a barren heart, but give me now some springs of water, some feeling at least, some sorrow for my sins)!" Well, though at six times bending of thy knees God doth not grant it, and though at the seventh there appear but one small drop swimming in thine eyes, yet be not discomfited; that drop may prove a shower, the beginning of that thaw may at last dissolve the very heart to water; or if not so, from that small drop, that spot of sorrow, there is made—as the least piece of a broken glass may serve to reflect the face that is before it—a reflection of true repentance. And as there is full joy for the total, the full conversion of a sinner, so there is a proportion, a measure of joy for one tear—nay, for one desire of a tear—of any one sinner that repenteth.

1 Kings xviii. 44.

1 Kings xviii. 45.

Judges i. 15.

Ep. Sarum, ut antea.

"O lachrymæ lumen tuæ potentia, tribunal judicii non veretur," &c.—HIERON., in Ep.

"In magnis voluisse sat est."

MDCCLXXXI.—Rash, inconsiderate prayers reproofed.

It is reported in the Muscovite churches, that if the minister mistake in reading, or stammer in pronouncing his words, or speak any word that is not well heard, the hearers do much blame him, and are ready to take the book from him, as unworthy to read therein. And God is no less offended with the giddy, rash, precipitate, and inconsiderate prayers of Moscovit. Rutorum, &c., Religio, Ritui, &c.

many, who send their petitions in post-haste unto Him. Whereas the prophet David saith, "At last I spake with my tongue;" his tongue came after his heart, his words came after long-looking, what he would say, what he should say. And it is the advice of Solomon, his son, "Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thy heart be hasty to utter anything before God;" where he putteth the mouth before the heart, when he forbids the rashness of them, because he would not have thee to put it before the heart in using of it—not to tumble out thy words when thou speakest unto God, but that they be distinctly digested into order, understanding well what thou sayest, that others may understand thee also.

MDCCLXXXII.—Insensibility of sin, the sadness thereof.

It is reported, that the Grecians had a hill so high above that region of the air where winds are bred, that he that had drawn his name in the ashes of the last year's sacrifices might, at the next year of his return, find the letters unblown away. But thou, O man, who-soever thou art, if thy heart be so calmly seated that the devil may, at the same instant, read in the sluttish dust of it the sins which long ago he wrote there—if no thunder have cleared the air about thee, or any wind scattered those guilty characters—if all be hushed silence and sleep and rest about the conscience (like the sad country of the Sybarites, where not so much as a cock, the remembrance of St. Peter, was left alive to trouble them)—if so, know, then, that so long as thou art thus senseless of thy sins, that thy soul is utterly benumbed, thy God hath given thee over: He will not so much as favour thee with a frown or bless thee with His anger.

MDCCLXXXIII.—The vanity of using many words.

TERTULLIAN, expressing the nature of dreams, saith, "Conspice gladiatorem sine armis, vel aurigam sine curricularis, &c. (Look but upon a fencer without weapons, a coach-driver without his running chariot, acting and practising all the postures and feats of his skill: there is fighting, there is a stirring, but it is an empty moving and gesturing, notwithstanding those things do seem to be done which are not seen to be done; they are done in the acting of them, but not in effecting anything by them)." So it is in many words: there is often much fencing, but no weapons wherewith the enemy is wounded; there is much running, but no chariot that winneth the race; much seemeth to be said, but it is to as much purpose as if nothing were said, all is an empty moving of the tongue: and if there be any matter of worth in the multitude of words, it is but by chance, as, when a blind man shooteth many arrows, perhaps one may be near the mark. And so, in the multiplying of many words, perhaps some there may be which carry some weight, some matter with them; but usually, in a multitude of words, there is no multitude of matter, and in the idle tossing of many words, what can there be but a fullness of folly, when a fool's voice is known by them?

MDCCLXXXIV.—Not to repine at the loss of friends or children.

ANYTUS, a young spark of Athens, came revelling into Alcibiades' house, and as he sat at supper with some strangers, he rose on a sudden and took away one half of his plate; the guests stormed and took on at it; he bade them be quiet, and told them that he had dealt kindly with him, since that he had left the one half, whereas he might have taken the whole. So let no man repine for that friend, that child which is taken away by death, but be thankful to God for those that are left; He that taketh one might as well (if He would) have taken all: all are in His hands, and it is His great mercy that He hath left any at all.

Ps. xxxix. 3

Eccles. v. 2.

Bp. Sarum's Sermon, before King Charles at Isle of Wight, 1648.

Athenæus, lib. xii,
cap. 6.

Lib. de Anima, cap.
xiv.

Turner's Sermon, 1637.

"Follis leviora caducis verba."— OVID, Amor. ii.

Eccles. v. 3.

Athenæus, Delpnosoph., lib. xii.

Plutarch, in Alab.

MDCCLXXXV.—Men of few and men of many words; their difference.

HOMER, in his Iliad, hath appointed unto dreams two doors: the one a door of horn, which was the door of Truth; the other a door of ivory, which was the door of Deceit—for horn, as they say, may be looked through; but ivory, being thick and dark, is not transparent. These doors may very well be applied to the mouths of men, which are as the indices and tables of the heart: for to some it is a door of glass, which is soon broke open, and easily giveth pass to a multitude of words, wherein the folly of their hearts and minds is discerned; to others it is a door of brass, firm and solid in keeping in their words with more care and circumspection, and showing the firm solidity of their hearts and minds.

Jermin, Com. on Eccles. iv.

“Modum verborum quibusdam tenet, difficile est.”—CURT., lib. vi.

MDCCLXXXVI.—Why it is that the children of God die usually sooner than others.

SHOULD any of us have a child, an only son, in France, Holland, or some such like place of distance, abiding there to learn the language, to see fashions, or the like, and should hear that the country was all in an uproar, ready to fight one against another, what course should we take in this case? Should we not, in all haste, write to have him home, where he might be in more safety? In like manner doth God with His people that He hath (as it were) at nurse or at school here in this world. When trouble and danger is toward those places where they make their abode, He calleth for them away, He taketh them home to Himself, where they are sure to be safe, far out of gun-shot, and free from touch or view of evil.

Gataker's Serm., 1627.

“Alba ligustra cadunt,” &c.—VIRG

MDCCLXXXVII.—All men must die and lie down in the dust.

JACOBUS EMISSENUS, a famous writer and tutor to Ephraim, the learned Syrian, reporteth that when Noah went into the ark, he took the bones of Adam along with him, and coming thence he divided them amongst his sons, giving the skull to Shem, his first-born, saying, “Let not this delivery from the flood make you secure; behold your first parent, and the beginning of all mankind; you must all (nati natorum et qui nascuntur ab illis), and all that come from you, go unto the dust to him.” And, without all doubt, all men must die, and lie down in the dust; they may desire to stay long here in this valley of tears, and to live in this thin shadow of mortality, when, by the course of nature, they are driven on and carried out to their last home; the very increase of their life tendeth to a decrease, till they meet all in one place, that which Adam hath provided for all his posterity, and where, himself being already laid, all shall be brought unto him.

Masius, in cap. ult.

“Serius aut citius sedem properamus ad unam.”

Eccles. vi. 6.

MDCLCXXXVIII.—How it is that the sins of parents are visited on their children.

It is reported of a Persian emperor, Artaxerxes the long-handed, that, for such faults as his nobles and captains committed, he enacted: That whereas their hair was wont to be pulled, their head-tire or turbans should be so used; and for such offences as their bodies had been wont to be beaten, their robes should be publicly scourged. In like manner God dealeth with men: when they offend of themselves, He punisheth not themselves always in their persons, but oftentimes in their possessions, in their goods and chattels, and in their temporal estates; and if in their possessions, no marvel if in their children too, they being part of their possessions—nay, part of themselves. Witness that indulgent master, Matt. viii. 5.

Plutarch.

Job i. 13, Salviem, de Prov. dent., lib. ii. 6.

MDCCLXXXIX.—Reproofs of a wise man not to be slighted.

Plutarch, in Vita.

It is storied (told) of Alexander the Great, that having had a philosopher a long time with him, at length said unto him, "Recede à me prorsus, consortium tuum nolo (Begone from me; I desire not thy company);" and being asked why, made answer, "Quod quum tantopere mecum dederis, &c. (Because, having lived so long with me, thou hast not reproved any vice in me: for either thou hast observed me not to err, which is a great argumen of ignorance—because, being a man, I know myself to be exposed to many errors—or else thou hast known me to err, and hast held thy peace, which is a proof of thine unfaithfulness)." It was the praise of that great monarch thus to do, and in this he jumped, even with the Preacher, "It is better to hear the rebuke of the wise man," &c. It may be not so pleasant, but sure it is better, and there is less hurt and more good that ariseth from it. There is in reproof a jarring and harsh music, because it opposeth the fault that is committed; it disagreeeth with the mind of him that hath committed it; but yet it soundeth sweeter than the melodious songs of flattering parasites, who, leading on to wickedness, do lead into destruction.

Eccles. vii. 5.
Dr. Jermin, on Eccles.

"Si merito objurgaverit te aliquis, scito quia profitur," &c.—
SEN., in Ep.

MDCCLXC.—Magistrates to be men of understanding.

Diog. Laert., in Vita.

Garey's Serm.,
Norfolk, 1623.

1 John v. 19.
Acts xxiv. 1.

Plin., Nat. Hist.,
lib. ix., cap. 29.

"Fœlix civitas ubi preces est philo-sophus."—
ARISTOT., Rhet. ii.

